When I can manage a pipe I will try one of the penny cigars and see how I get on with that; of course I need not smoke it all at one time.

Mustn't smoke out of doors yet till I can dispose of the smoke better. Will ask the boat captain who called me a 'corker' what he does with his.

I can quite understand that one could (in time) become as attached to a pipe as to a human being—more so, for a pipe cannot falter, cannot betray, knows no change,—no coldness.—

Mine has gone out!

Relight it;—when I am more accustomed to my pipe it shall be my constant companion. I will have a special case constructed for it, and it shall lie in my bosom. I begin to feel fond of it already!

For, as the 'Wreaths of scented blue smoke curl caressingly around my ambrosial locks'—which I think I have seen in a novel somewhere—I almost fancy I can enter into the raptures of the writers on the subject.

Smoking is a peculiar sensation, to be sure, but far from disagreeable. (I wonder if I could get any tobacco anywhere that doesn't smell.)

Isn't it Byron that speaks of 'Sublime tobacco . . . mellow, rich and rare!'

Next time I buy any, though, I will ask for some not quite so rich and rather mellower.

Oh, dear me, how very odd this is—the bowl is perspiring—perspiring freely!

Digitized by Google

Don't know if this is a healthy sign in a pipe. Perhaps I have allowed it to get overheated.

Shall I lay it down for a little? Better not, it might check the perspiration. Have known dreadful consequences from checking perspiration when overheated.

Let me think over the revolution in my whole being since I first illumined this pipe.

I was almost an Anti-tobacconist: I am now on the road to being a Confirmed Smoker—I have produced more smoke as it is than most men I know could raise in double the time!

I have opened my mouth to receive the Tobacco Demon.

(Hope the Tobacco Demon will not try any nonsense inside me.) Won't think about it or of "revolutions in my being"—morbid train of thought, very.

I have kindled for the first time the fragrant offering of incense that henceforth will rise perennial from this humble fane of briar—

It has gone out again!

Resume reflections once more—(must not dwell so much on my internal sensations). In future, while I have my pipe, I shall be independent of food. Tobacco is acknowledged to be an excellent substitute. Men have sustained life on it for days—

A stream of nasty bitter juice has just come up into my mouth from the stem! I shall change this tobacco. They distinctly told me at the shop that it was sweet.

All right now; tranquil again. Have always understood that the chief merit of Tobacco is its wonderful power to soothe the mind. I certainly do feel something of this now; the world is nothing to me, my world is glowing, and crackling and swelling inside the bowl beneath my nostrils. I feel, too, a sort of slight headiness and a disinclination to exert myself which are soothing, at least, I suppose they are what is understood by the term.

I never thought of it before but what a graceful thing a pipe is when one comes to examine it; what subtle beauty in its free seductive curves; what a glancing sheen on its glossy grain!

I—I think I shall order a spittoon in the town.

I have made a discovery—if you blow down the stem instead of sucking at it, you not only make more smoke and smell, but you get rid of that unpleasant rankness which occasionally mars the enjoyment. I suppose it is quite fair too; I don't know why it shouldn't be.

Felt a distinct qualm just then: nasty word "qualm" is, so suggestive. All fancy, too. I will learn to love this pipe—as somebody did the Bottle-Imp: at least, I think he learnt to love the Bottle-Imp. I will love the Pipe-Imp.

Wonder if I have nearly finished it.

Shake out the ashes and see: only half way down—am I glad or sorry?

Smoking is distinctly an economical habit. One pipe is enough for anybody. Will it be too much for me?

I shall open the window—the juice has come up again. I want to feel the fresh air blowing in my face. I have a passion for fresh air!

Catch sight of my face in the glass as I rise. Green is simply not the word for it!

But I feel better now: I know I am under no obligation to finish that pipe, but I will—yes, I will finish it to the bitter end. Never knew quite what a bitter end was before!

There is no use in deceiving myself: smoking is not the pure unalloyed pleasure I once deemed it—perhaps I did not buy the best tobacco.

But shall I cast my pipe from me because it has ceased to charm as it was wont to do? Never! whatever its shortcomings. I will bear with it a little longer. Something within tells me it may not be for long.

I must put it down for a minute or two and gasp.

Away once more on my wild career! By smoking faster and knocking the ashes every other minute I may prove stronger than the tobacco yet...I won't be ill!

I don't think I can go on any longer: there is an obstinate little red-hot remnant at the bottom of the bowl which won't go out—one more puff and—the juice again!

I—I yield—Pipe, thou hast prevailed! I feel giddy...sea-sick ...very unwell, indeed. Oh, qualms—qualms!

Smoking...is...a...beastly habit!

THE WHEWELL SCHOLARSHIPS.

DEAR SIRS,—Will you grant me a little of your valuable space to call attention to the present position of these Scholarships, and the nature of the examination on whose results they are awarded.

They were founded in 1867, in accordance with the will of the late Dr. Whewell, for the promotion of the study of International Law orthics. Under the present system four papers are set; (1) questions in International Law; (2) either a similar paper, or a paper of essays in International Law; (3) a paper containing five and six questions on Ethics and Political Philosophy, and the same number on the work of Grotius; (4) a paper of general essays. Perhaps I can best explain the objections to the present system, by going through last year's (1879) papers question by question, and comparing them with those of the five preceding years. I may explain that where after a question I add a date, the meaning is that an almost identical question was set in that year; where I add a date with the word "partly" following, the meaning is that questions were set in that year which overlapped the subject matter of the question of 1879 to a considerable extent.

International Law.—Paper I.

1.—"Give a sketch of plan of Grotius' treatise "De Jure Belli" and the principles on which he founded the "Law of Nations." (It will be seen that this might either find a place here, or in the paper on Grotius; we may therefore look for corresponding questions in both these papers.) Essay, 1878, partly; two questions on Grotius, 1878, partly; 1877, Grotius partly; 1876, partly; 1875, both in International Law and Grotius; 1874, partly, both in International Law and Grotius.

The most inexperienced examinee will see from this that it "pays" to get up the "plan and principles" of Grotius.

2.—Position and operation of International Law—(I abbreviate the question, when possible)—1877; 1875, partly; 1874.

3.—Nature and operation of Private International Law. 1878; 1877; 1876; 1875; 1874.

4.—Jurisdiction of a state (Private International Law "pays.")
(1.) over foreigners within its limits. 1878; 1877.
(2.) its own subjects outside its limits. 1878; 1877; 1876; 1875.
(3.)—Consuls and Capitulations. 1877; 1875.

5.—Capture of Enemy's property. Post liminium. 1875, partly in four questions; 1877; 1876; 1874, partly in five questions.

6.—Blockade. 1878; 1877; 1876; 1875; 1874. (Blockade "pays.")

7.—Contraband. 1878; 1877; 1876; 1875; 1874. (Contraband "pays.")

8.—Effects in conquest on rights of conquered. 1877; 1876 partly; 1875 partly; 1874.

9.—Naturalization, Domicil. 1877; 1876; 1875; 1874.

10.—Extradition. 1878; 1877; 1876; 1875; 1874. (Extradition "pays.")

11.—Prize Courts. 1877; 1876; 1875; 1874.

12.—Recognition, and Belligerent Rights. 1877; 1876; 1875.

In this paper of twelve questions, there are four that have been set in almost identical terms every year for the last six years, and possibly for more. Every question has been set at least three times in the six years. The same process might be applied to the Essays, but space forbids. I can only say that the third Essay, "on the progress of Neutral Rights, with special reference to six 'Causes Celebres' named,"—covered the same ground as an Essay and two questions in 1878, six questions in 1877, three questions in 1876, seven questions in 1875, and six questions in 1874.

Moreover, the three essays set required mainly reproduction, and were more adapted to test memory and fast writing than originality.

As to the Ethical papers, the field being wide and only five questions set, the repetition met with in the International Law paper does not occur so frequently. Yet "the relations of Law or Jurisprudence to Morality or Ethics" have been inquired after in 1879 partly; 1878, 1877, 1876, partly; 1875, 1874, partly. The paper on Grotius can be answered in any year by a careful study of about a quarter of his work, and of the table of contents. With the general Essay paper no fault can be found.

This being so, one is tempted to ask whether the examiners have not set before themselves the promotion of the "Art of Cramming" by the means of the study of International Law and Ethics. Or are they of opinion that a good examination paper is a good thing, and should not be lightly altered, but may be continued with advantage with verbal modifications for six years or so? The present system is adapted to test powers of reproduction only, the general essay paper being the only one requiring originality, or much more thought than is required to get the right answers, which may be learnt off beforehand, out of the right mental pigeon-holes. The examination tends to promote cramming in its worst form, a getting up of disconnected tips, and opinions of writers, with reference solely to questions that have been set in previous years. And as such, it is unworthy both of the pecuniary value of the scholarships competed for, and the reputation they possess in the outer world.

That I may not be thought to criticise without suggesting remedies, I may be allowed to name changes which would be in my opinion improvements:—

1. The general paper on International Law should contain problems on the subjects of examination. Problems involving a knowledge of the Law of Blockade, of Contraband, of Duties of Neutrals, &c., might be set very easily, and would be far better tests of an intelligent study of the subject than questions which can be and are, answered by parrot-like repetition of facts.

2. The essay paper on International Law should be made to require more originality, and less reproduction of facts.

3. The Grotius paper should be abolished, and any question that may be set on it, transferred to the general paper on International Law.

4. The Ethical paper should be extended to fill up the room vacated by the questions on Grotius. It should proceed on the lines of the Ethical papers in the Moral Science Tripos, and especial care should be taken to ensure a knowledge of Ethical History, not as disconnected opinions got up from a book of reference like Bain, but as a progress of thought with a connected history.

I must apologise for filling so much of your space; the importance of the subject must be my excuse.

I am, dear Sirs, yours truly,

SIRS,—In your College news column of last week under the head of "Jesus," your correspondent states that The Debating Society passed a motion in favour of 'Compulsory Chapels.'

There is no College Debating Society in Jesus.

I presume your correspondent was alluding to a private society, limited to fifteen members, but as there are 221 men in residence, it is scarcely probable that this society would have the presumption to call itself The College Debating Society.

THE POLL DEGREE. A SUGGESTION.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Within a few hours of the appearance of Mr. J. S. Hill's article on the "Poll Degree" in the last number of the Cambridge Review, a suggestive paper was circulated by Mr. H. M. Taylor, Tutor of Trinity College, treating, inter alia, of the examinations connected with that degree. In Mr. Hill's paper a hint was dropped of a doubt whether the University ought to confer ordinary degrees at all; otherwise the criticisms and proposals of both papers dealt almost exclusively with the character of the examinations which qualify for degrees.

It is with reference to the degrees themselves that I venture to make the following suggestion, viz:—"That whilst the University should continue to confer the B.A. degree upon Honour men and Poll men alike, it should reserve the M.A. degree for those only who had attained an Honour standard in some Tripos."

In connection with this requirement there should be in addition to the three Classes of each Tripos an Honorary Fourth Class, or an Alphabetical List of all B.A.'s, not being of M.A. standing, who reach a sufficient standard to deserve the rank and status of Honour men; to whom, therefore, permission should be given to proceed in due course to the M.A. degree.

Perhaps the opportunity for thus qualifying for the M.A. degree might be extended even beyond the three years after the B.A. degree.

Away from the University the question "what degree did he take"? instead of being understood of the man's place in some Honour Class List would commonly be taken to mean, "is he a Bachelor or a Master of Arts"? Few persons hear for the first time without a feeling of great surprise that to pass from the B.A. to the M.A. degree is a mere matter of time and money.

As undergraduates Honour men are everything, Poll men nothing. The energies of College and University officers alike are devoted to the former, Scholarships and Exhibitions are founded for them, their performances are eagerly watched, their successes recorded in the Calendars. When the degree is past all is suddenly changed, a republican equality reigns, all have an equal voice in the Senate, all equal rights in the Library, and whatever else pertains to the Body Corporate of the University.

No doubt there is another aspect of the functions of our Universities which should not be overlooked. Besides being the homes of scholars, they have always been also the resort of men of wealth and position, who have come not for study only, or even chiefly, but for all the other education which results from three years of University life. And when we compare with the condition of many Universities and similar institutions elsewhere, the general and ready submission to discipline, the order and good manners which are the rule here, we may well hesitate to take any step which would deprive the men who are a few years hence to be amongst the most influential of the country of the valuable training gained during residence here.

It does, however, seem high time that we should cease to sell our higher degrees for money, and to entrust the government of the University to men who were nine-terms visitors indeed, but neither scholars nor students.

A. F. TORRY.

VIOLONCELLOS.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—Mr. Lucas has taken occasion in the last number of the Review to correct what could scarcely be more than a printer's error in the spelling of the word violoncello, because he thinks it is so common a mistake. I should scarcely think that such was the case among educated people, but his explanation would not tend much towards the elucidation of the error. What does he mean by the 'violin' or double bass? I imagine he wrote 'violon' and the printer treated him in the same way as myself. Unfortunately, however, his facts are incorrect. The 'violone,' not 'violon,' our modern 'violoncello', was in use some time before the double bass or 'accordo' was invented. When the larger instrument came into use, the title 'violone' was sometimes given to it, and therefore the diminutive termination 'cello' was employed to distinguish the smaller instrument. Anybody who has read from an old copy of Corelli's Sonatas would be aware that the 'violone' part would be impossible on the double bass, and indeed in all later editions 'violoncello' has been substituted for the older word.

Yours faithfully,

THE WRITER OF THE NOTICE.

COLLEGE CORRESPONDENCE.

ST. PETER'S.

Our first eight has been practising regularly, and seems to be improving, though still far from what it should be. A second boat has been out every day lately. H. A. Watson is second captain.

On Saturday the 14th, at the meeting of the Sexcentenary club it was moved "That Dickens has had a greater influence for good than any other Novelist." The motion was carried by a large majority. Last Saturday Home Rule was discussed, the motion being—"That Ireland is unfit to govern itself." After some lively speaking this was carried by 18 votes to 4, the Irish members of the College supporting it in a body.

CLARE.

Last Wednesday our Association team played the Old Reptonians and beat them by two goals to nothing. On Saturday our Rugby Union team was beaten by the Old Cliftonians by two goals and two tries to nothing.

Our boats commenced training on Saturday. Several changes have been made during the last ten days, but they seem to be nearly settled now, and to be getting on very fairly well.

At a meeting of the Debating Society held on Friday evening, C. F. Weston proposed "That in the opinion of this house it is undesirable that the parliamentary franchise should be extended to the Undergraduate members of this University." R. C. Craig opposed. The motion was lost by 8 to 14.

PEMBROKE.

Our second boat has shown considerable improvement during the last week. The crew went into training on Sunday. During the last few days Torkington has been stroking the 3rd boat, and they seem to have got better together.

Digitized by Google

Our Association Football team has played two matches, both resulting in draws. On Tuesday against Mr. Morris' team, when neither side obtained a goal and on Wednesday against Magdalene, when each side obtained one goal.

The Lawn Tennis Club have decided to add an ash court to the four grass courts already laid down.

The Musical Society purpose every alternate concert to allow strangers to be introduced and to perform. Tuesday, the 17th, was the first of these open concerts and was a great success, towards which the strangers contributed not a little.

On Saturday, E. White urged upon the Debating Society "the inadvisability of abolishing flogging in the army." The most noticeable feature of the evening was the boldness of the opposition: only six members finally voted against the motion but of these five had previously spoken against it. The motion was carried by a majority of 20.

GONVILLE AND CAIUS.

On Monday night C. Jones-Bateman read a paper on "the Molecular Theory." The vigorous way in which the essayist handled his subject excited the interest of the audience in no small degree.

In the Debating Society, M. J. Thackeray moved in an original and vivacious harangue that "Compensation for railway accidents should be limited." John Bull opposed him in a speech of telling eloquence, and the motion was lost.

"Trichinosis" was the somewhat repulsive subject of a paper read by F. S. Sanders before the Science and Art Society on Thursday. In consequence of the horror-striking revelations made by the learned essayist, swine's flesh and pigeon-pies will be long tabooed in Caius.

On Saturday the Once-a-Weekers were favoured with readings by the Rev. F. Wallis, and C. S. Bailey, and after a weary and cumbrious ceremonial had gone on for a considerable time, the president announced the election of ten new members.

Later on the Shakespere Society read the first two acts of "King Lear."

In aquatic matters there is not much to relate. The third boat remains the same as last week. The fourth is still not finally settled. We regret to say that a bad ankle debars our first captain from his wonted activity on the bank.

We are glad to see that J. K. Fowler, M.B., of this College, has been appointed assistant physician to the Middlesex Hospital.

The death is announced of the Ven. George Bland, M.A., Canon Residentiary of Durham Cathedral. The deceased graduated at this College in 1828, and proceeded to his M.A. in 1831. He was Rector of Slinfold, Sussex, from 1836 to 1844, when he was appointed Archdeacon of Lindisfarne, which appointment he held till 1855, when he was instituted to the Rectory of St. Mary-le-Bow, Durham, which preferment he held until 1859. He was appointed to the Archdeaconry of Northumberland in 1853 by his uncle, Bishop Maltby, and at the same time appointed to a Canonry. The value of the latter preferment is £1,000 a year, with a residence. The Canon died on Tuesday, in his 73rd year. His widow is a relative of the late Sir John Franklin, the famous Arctic explorer.

TRINITY HALL.

Boat Club. We have three eights out daily in practice and occasionally four, though we have abandoned the idea of entering two boats for the time races to get on the river. The second boat is stroked by Simpson with Heape at 6 who rowed 2 in our four last October. Isaacson strokes the third boat with Trevor-Jones for 7, both of whom rowed in the second last May. The boats want work more than anything else now, especially as on Friday and Saturday they were unable to continue their daily practice on account of the Hall Athletic Sports.

CORPUS.

The past week has not been fruitful in events sufficiently important to record in the Review.

The boats, just at present, naturally occupy a large share of interest, and as far as we can learn some considerable improvement has been witnessed during the past few days. Our "3" of last year's May boat is still on the sick list. The 1st boat went down to Clayhithe on Saturday, and both boats commenced training on Monday.

On Saturday evening, 21st inst., at the Debating Society's Meeting, F. S. Colman brought forward the well-worn motion: advocating the "Abolition of Capital Punishment." W. W. Hough opened the motion, which, after a debate which did not prove very interesting, was rejected by 26 votes to 8.

The Rev. C. E. Butler, M.A., of this College, has been appointed by the Dean and Chapter of Llandaff, Head Master of the Cathedral school.

KING'S.

On Friday next, in the Debating Society, W. E. Crewdson will move "that the adoption of some scheme of conscription would be for the advantage of England." The motion will be opposed by G. Nugent-Bankes.

In boating there is nothing to chronicle beyond the usual practice of the boats.

On Friday last a Rugby Union match was played against Jesus, in which we were defeated by two goals and a large number of tries to one try.

QUEENS'.

Our boat is constituted as follows:—Bow, Jervis; 2, Bates; 3, Walker; 4, Anderson; 5, Hind; 6, Gray; 7, Wildman: stroke, Thompson; cox, Andrews.

A scratch Fives Tournament has been begun, and so far the games have gone thus:—Rix and Dummelow beat Thompson and Hind; Bolton and Rowlands beat Ashmall and Priestley; Haynes and Higham beat Wildman and Butler. The following tie remains to be played: Temperley and Giles v. Ellis and Manley.

ST. CATHARINE'S.

On Tuesday, 17th, at the meeting of the Debating Society, E. R. Newton proposed that "this house disapproves of the agitation for the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church of England." The opposer was A. D. Davies, and the debate, which was very well kept up, was finally adjourned until the next meeting.

Our two boats are practising daily, but cannot yet be considered as definitely made up. Training has already commenced.

JESUS.

Jesus sends in an unusually strong team for the Classical Tripos; amongst its seven representatives it hopes to secure at least two firsts.

The boats are all going pretty well: the second will no doubt stay where it is, though the Hall may not be very far behind. The third boat is strong enough, but seems to lack life; while the fourth may perhaps get on the river.

The Debating Society rejected a proposal to "Disestablish the Church" at their last meeting.

In Football the Rugby Team has beaten King's, but was obliged to knock off a match with East Sheen.

CHRIST'S.

C.C.B.C. The eight is now made up as follows:—Bow, Stephenson; 2, Williams; 3, Milner; 4, Jameson; 5, Moore; 6, Davidson; 7, Price; Str. Pigeon; Cox, Polwhele. Strenuous endeavours are being made to get a second boat on with, we trust, some prospect of success. Three Christ's eights have been on the river lately—an event of sufficient rarity to deserve record. C.C.D.S. On Saturday, E. Temperley attacked "the general policy of the great European powers." He was opposed by J. E. Stephenson. The proposition was negatived by 24 to 20.

ST. JOHN'S.

We are glad to congratulate J. C. Moss on his success in the University Scholarships, which has given St. John's its 15th Craven Scholarship.

At a recent meeting of the boat club the following officers were elected for the present term:—President, Rev. A. F. Torry; First Captain, W. Barton; Second Captain, G. M. Kingston; Treasurer, A. Hawkins; Secretary, B. S. Clarke; Third Captain, B. E. Wand; Fourth Captain, G. G. Wilkinson; Fifth Captain, W. P. Mayor. At a meeting of the Cricket Club to elect officers for the coming season, the following were appointed:—Captain, J. H. Payne; Secretary, P. G. Exham; Treasurer, F. D. Gaddum; Members of Committee, J. A. Bevan, R. Spencer, E. J. Wild, A. R. Aspinall, G. M. Livett, A. H. T. Pollock, F. L. Thompson, P. T. Wrigley.

At the Debating Society, on Saturday, J. Spencer Hill proposed "that further restrictive legislation is imperatively necessary for the suppression of the National Intemperance," and after a somewhat desultory debate his motion was carried by a large majority.

MAGDALENE.

On Thursday last we played football with Pembroke. The teams, however, were rather scratch, as our College men were required to give their services to each side. The game eventually ended in a draw, each side getting one goal. The other goals claimed by us were disallowed by the umpire.

H. P. Hodson with 10 yards' start, won the Emmanuel Strangers' Race, quarter-mile, in the good time of 50⅗ seconds.

On Friday last the Cricket Club held their first meeting this year. After the despatch of some preliminary business, interesting only to members of the College, the club proceeded to elect officers for the ensuing season. C. Hughes was re-elected captain, and E. R. Yerburgh, Secretary. A. T. Holmes, L. Barlow, G. le Fleming and A. K. Field were elected on to the committee.

We have three candidates in for the Classical Tripos and we wish them every success.

TRINITY.

The "Irregulars" met on Thursday, Feb. 19th. The House after a spirited debate showed its approbation of the "opening of Museums and Picture Galleries on Sundays" by a majority of one. Next Thursday it will discuss "the freedom of the Press in England."

Serjeant W. H. Whitelock of the F company has won the Peck Challenge Bowl. His score was 36 out of a possible 75. The day was a very bad one for shooting, windy and generally objectionable.

The Trinity Bachelors' Society met on Thursday, when a paper on the Stock Exchange was read by J. S. Nicholson.

The Classical Reading Society enjoyed Plautus' Menœchini last Thursday.

On Friday, the 20th, a crowded meeting of the M. & S. discussed a motion proposed by H. H. Turner—"That more legislation is necessary to avert the existing evils of over population." Ten members, led by Y. H. Scott Elliot, spoke against the motion: three supported the opener: while one speaker gave his reasons for maintaining a strict neutrality. The motion was lost at a late hour of the evening by a majority of 9. The following gentlemen were elected members of the society:—H. F. Wade, W. Soper, H. Batten, L. Wilberforce, H. Dickinson, and J. A. Thornley.

T. A. F. C.—The above club has played four matches during the week with the following results:—

Tuesday, Feb. 17th. v. Trin. Harrovians. Lost by one goal to none.

Wednesday, Feb. 18th. (2nd eleven), v. St. John's (2nd eleven). Won by three goals to none.

Thursday, Feb. 19th. v. St. John's. Tie, no goals.

Friday, Feb. 20th. v. Old Reptonians; Tie, one goal each.

On Saturday, Feb 21st, the 1st heats of the Scratch Sixes were decided, and resulted as below. Play was interfered with by a heavy fall of rain, but in spite of this the three matches necessary to decide the first ties were all played out, the victorious teams being those captained by Messrs. Wood, Harvey, and Pollock. Six teams came to the scratch.

First Heat.—J. S. C. Wood, (Capt.), E. J. Wilson, A. E. Green-Price, J. S. Oxley, A. F. Faithful, M. Firth,—(v.)—J. H. McLean, (Capt.,) C. P. Wilson, G. N. H. Tredennick, T. W. Yardley, G. Smith, C. Earle. This proved a very good match, and was only decided about five minutes before time in favour of Wood's team by a good goal kicked by Oxley. McLean's team tried hard to equalize matters, but time was too short, and they were beaten 1 to 0. For the losers, C. Wilson and Smith played well, while Wood's efforts were well seconded by Green-Price.

Second Heat.—C. P. Harvey, (Capt.,) J. W. Liddell, J. C. Royle, S. P. Potter, C. H. Williams. J. Wilkinson,—(v.)—W. Windley, (Capt.,) J. Heald, E. G. Holmes, C. P. Guest, C. J. Wilkinson, A. H. Champion. This, it was thought, would be an easy victory for Harvey's team, but the event proved their opponents much better than was expected, and Wardley and Guest frequently endangered the opposite goal by good runs: Harvey was invaluable to his side and also had several shots, but nothing resulted but two corner kicks, which were both unsuccessful. At call of time the game was a tie, and they adjourned for a time to allow the next teams to play off their tie. On resumption, ten minutes play brought nothing decisive; at this point, however, Harvey unfortunately had an accident, but not such as to prevent his playing off the tie after a short interval. In the next few minutes he kicked a goal and thus secured victory for his side. Beside those above mentioned Heald (back), and Potter played well for their respective sides.

Third Heat.—C. A. E. Pollock, (Capt.,) W. H. Whitfeld, H. Easton, A. C. Child, A. H. Barker, H. M. Holman,—(v.)—B. F. Westcott, (Capt.,) C. F. Poole, R. C. F. Scott, J. Fayrer, J. Jacob, F. G. Walker. This, the last match, resulted in favour of Pollock's team by 2 goals to 1, all gained within the first quarter-an-hour. The first goal, resulted from a long fluky kick, by Pollock, owing to the absence of a goal keeper. The other two goals kicked by Jacobs and Child respectively. For the losers, Westcott and Poole were most conspicuous, while Whitfeld and Pollock played well on the winning side.

The 2nd ties of the Sixes were played off on Monday, in very wet weather and on a very sloppy ground: as it will be seen the teams did not consist of the same players as before, but the winners of the first ties were all drawn again and divided into their respective sixes. The two teams were captained by Messrs. Harvey and Pollock, and the game resulted in a tie, after half-an-hour's play, each side having obtained one goal. The following are the players:—C. P. Harvey, (Capt.,) J. S. C. Wood, A. F. Faithful, S. P. Potter, J. S. Oxley, M. Firth, (absent),—(v.)—C. A. E. Pollock, (Capt.,) A. J. Holman, C. H. Williams, J. C. Royle, J. W. Liddle, A. C. Child.

Harvey's team were unfortunate in having to play one short. Until half time nothing happened, but very soon after changing Harvey scored the first goal for his side by a very good shot, and this was very soon responded to by a goal, after a good run by Child. Each side then got two corner kicks, and just at call of time both goals had a narrow escape, but no advantage was gained. Harvey was well backed up by Faithful (back), and Child and Eastern did goood service for the other side. The tie will be played off to-day (Wednesday).

The following is the team that has drawn the bye:—A. H. Barker, M. Easton, W. H. Whitfeld, J. Wilkinson, A. E. Green-Price, E. J. Wilson.

EMMANUEL COLLEGE.

A meeting of the boat club was held on Tuesday night. It was proposed by the president, Mr. Shaw, that there should be a voluntary subscription to pay off the debt of the club and to pay for a new light ship for the May races. The appeal of the President was liberally responded to by those members present at the meeting. We hope that should any old members of the club, who perhaps had a share in the formation of the debt, read our letter, they will not be backward in helping so good a cause.

At the meeting of the Debating Society on Saturday, the vice-president, Hopkinson, moved that a donation of £7 10s., be handed over to the boat club towards the new boat. The motion was carried unanimously. H. W. C. Mackenzie then opened the debate, approving of the "abolition of capital punishment." His motion was lost by a majority of 10.

The Lawn Tennis Club have elected A. Durrant president, and have voted £10 towards the new boat.

We had splendid weather for our athletic sports. The events showed that no one had trained for them, which we venture to think is rather a good thing than otherwise in College sports. Shields won the Champion cup.

SIDNEY.

At a Cricket meeting, last week, the following were elected Officers for the ensuing season:—President, A. F. Ostrehan; Secretary, R. S. Goodchild.

The Debating Society mustered rather few in numbers on Saturday, to discuss the subject of "Sconcing in Hall." A. W. Richards brought forward a motion against Sconcing; and as no one had put down his name as Opposer, that duty was undertaken by A. C. Williams. After a short debate the motion was put to the House and carried by a single vote.

DOWNING.

An interesting debate took place on Saturday, February 21, under the chairmanship of H. D. Roe, D. L. Harris moved "that in the opinion of this house legislative encouragement should be given to the formation of a class of peasant proprietors in Ireland," and was successful in convincing a large majority of his hearers of the necessity of such a step. The subject to be discussed next time is the "constitutional independence of our colonies."

A "Shakspeare Club" has been recently founded in the College. At a preliminary meeting rules were drawn up and two officers elected, viz., as President, A. D. Roe and I. S. Cox, Secretary. The first regular meeting was held on Thursday, February 19, in the President's rooms when "Twelfth Night" was read. For the present the number of members is limited to ten, and the meetings are to be held fortnightly.

NON-COLLEGIATE.

The Foot-ball team (R. U.) got together by W. P. Buncombe to play against Cavendish College, on Monday, the 16th inst., was defeated, though not quite so signally as last term.

The institution of Morning Chapels at 7.30 seems to be in favour among the men, as the numbers still keep up, since there is no Dean to enquire affectionately after absentees. This says a good word for chapels being optional. We think, however, that this option is not used wisely by those men who carefully abstain from shewing themselves at least once a term. The Rev. R. B. Somerset, the Censor, conducts the service alternately with the Rev. G. F. Howard, Chaplain of Trinity.

A meeting of the Debating Society was held in the Board Room, on Thursday, the 19th inst., when E. Morgan proposed "That in the opinion of this house, the principle of Euthanasia is good, and would be beneficial to mankind." The speakers were, Buncombe, Farthing, Graham, Small, Clemson, Waughton, Naughton, Curlock, Richardson, G. H. Cameron, and Hyde. On the motion being put there were 3 for it, 15 against, and 1 neutral. It was therefore lost. On Thursday next, W. E. Peach will introduce a motion in favour of "Trade Unions."

CAVENDISH COLLEGE.—The Debating Society held its first meeting for this term on Thursday, 12th inst., when the officers were elected as follows:—President, the Warden; Vice-President, Mr. Flather; Secretary, R. C. Hitchcock; Committee, M. C. Sturges, W. P. Phillips. R. C. Hitchcock then proposed a motion in favour of affiliating Ladies' Colleges to the Universities, which was lost by 8 votes to 18.

On Monday, 16th inst., we played the Non-Colls, (Rugby), on our ground, and beat them by 2 goals and 3 tries to 1 try. On the following Wednesday, our Association team played the return match against Saffron Walden, and, after a very hot game, were beaten by 2 goals to 1. Our return match with Newmarket (Association) was played on our ground, on Friday, and resulted in a victory for us by 2 goals to none.

Our Cricket Club held a general meeting on Friday, 13th inst., when the following officers were elected:—Captain, J. S. Hill; Secretary, A. W. Bradnack; Treasurer, F. L. Brereton; Committee, W. L. F. Fetch, M. C. Sturges. The committee are taking steps to secure a better ground for our matches than we had last season.

UNIVERSITY INTELLIGENCE.

The Kaye Prize has been adjudged to the Rev. W. Cunningham, M.A., Trinity.

The American Academy of Arts and Sciences have addressed a letter to the Vice-Chancellor, in which they invite the presence of one or more delegates from Cambridge at the celebration of the 100th anniversary of the American Academy, on the 26th of May, 1880.

In June there will be held an examination in the Theory, History, and Practice of Teaching. Applications for admission must be sent to Mr. Oscar Browning, King's College, not later than May 1.

In a Grace offered to the Senate to-morrow (Thursday, Feb. 26), it will be proposed to confirm parts I and II of the Report of the Board of Natural Science Studies.

The number of students who matriculated on Feb. 16 was 63. Eighteen of these are Non-Collegiate.

The University Scholarships have been awarded, the Craven to J. C. Moss, St. John's (to whom the Examiners were of opinion that W. Wyse, of Trinity was nearly equal), and the Browne to W. Wyse. Between the merits of these the Examiners had some difficulty in deciding, as was the case last year. The examination seems to have been entirely in the hands of the two large colleges; the final list containing also the names of H. C. Goodhart; F. B. Westcott and Ll. Davies, of Trinity; and T. G. Tucker, of St. John's. Closely following on these were G. L. Duff, A. Macnamara, and J. W. Barker, all of Trinity; the latter a "double" man, and still in his first year.

CAMBRIDGE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

At a meeting of this Society held on Thursday, February 19, in St. John's College Lecture Room, No. I. Mr. W. Aldis Wright, Vice-President, in the absence of the President, in the chair, there being a large attendance, the report of the Special Committee appointed last term was read by the Secretary, and it was resolved that it should be circulated amongst the members of the Society.

The Committee's report recommends first several changes in the rules. The most important of these are to remove the restriction which limits the Society to Cambridge men, another enabling the Society to elect honorary members, and another which allows members who have subscribed for ten years to compound for five guineas. The report then mentions several suggestions which have been made for improving the Society, but abstains from making any recommendation, as it considers none of them are inconsistent with the existing or proposed laws. It further recommends that the best way of obtaining a room is by joint action with the Antiquarian Society, whose claims are now being considered by a Syndicate. If this should prove unproductive, it recommends that the Society should hire one next term. The report closes with a list of periodicals which should be taken in by the Society. Ten new members were proposed for election. Dr. Hoyman read a paper on the connexion between Greek Tragedy and Heroic Myth shewing how diverse was the treatment of the Homeric and Cyclic legends by the various dramatists and Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, and in various plays of the same dramatist.

Mr. VERRALL contended that the date (circa 420 B.C.) usually assigned to Tisias, the coeditor with Corax of a rhetorical treatise or 'art' of speaking (τεχνη), was wrong. There was no conclusive evidence either that Tisias taught Lysias at Thurii, or Isocrates about 418 B.C., and that he was in Athens in 427. The joint Τέχνη was published about 466 and Tisias may have been a coadjutor with Corax in an etymological work published about B.C. 475 and referred to by Pind. Ol. 2, 83, follg (where γαρυετον shows a double authorship).

Mr. POSTGATE contended against Balhrens that Tibullus IV., 13, was spurious. It occurred among spurious poems, it was flat and prosaic and not in Tibullus's style and was a mere cento from Tibullus and Propertius.

C.U. HARE AND HOUNDS CLUB.

The C. U. Hare and Hounds Club seems to be a great success. Scarcely three weeks ago a few men discussed the possibility of getting a small number of men together for a run across country once or twice a week. A Committee was formed, consisting chiefly of names well known at Fenner's, and the Hare and Hounds Club came into existence. It is evident from the patronage which the club receives from running men, that paper-chases are considered a good and pleasant means of training: and from all accounts the success of the corresponding club at Oxford would naturally increase this opinion. The meets have at present been very well attended, and new members are continually being admitted, so that the books at present contain more than 50 names. The runs are never very long, the distance posted in the college screens being about 7 miles: as it is found that short runs are more satisfactory than the longer and slower paper chases, of which every one has had experience at school. We have heard it rumoured that the Oxford Club is anxious to get up a united meet of the two clubs. Whether it will ever be realised or not we can hardly tell at present.

THE RIVER.

THE UNIVERSITY EIGHT.

Three weeks ago we made some remarks about the policy of Mr. Prest's choice of a stroke for the crew which is to represent us at Putney this year. By a somewhat curious coincidence it was necessary, on the day after our article was published, to try the arrangement which we had advocated as being preferable to that which had found favour with the President. Baillie was compelled through indisposition to absent himself from the boat, and Davis was placed at stroke. To us it seemed that the change produced a striking improvement in the pace and appearance of the Eight, and we believe that we were far from being alone in this opinion. We heard it very generally remarked by competent judges that it was "more like a University boat," that is, there was more life and energy, more power and length in the stroke than before. The swing both fore and aft was longer than it had been, and the men were able to finish their strokes out in a style which showed that they had begun to realise the importance of keeping their oars in the water as long as possible, and that the new stroke enabled them to carry this happy thought into practice.

Mr. Prest, however, appears to have been no better satisfied with Davis than he was before, and it was determined to remove him from the place, though Baillie had not yet recovered from his illness. A consultation with some old Blues who had come up to give him the benefit of their advice, resulted in a new arrangement of the crew, one feature of which caused something very like amazement. Nimmo, who had been considered perfectly secure in his place, disappeared from the boat altogether, and was replaced by Warlow. Davis was then transferred to six, and was replaced by Pilkington. The other change was not of so startling a character. Roden has not been improving so fast as to justify keeping him in the crew, and we have nothing to say against ejecting him, though we are not altogether convinced that his successor is the right man in the right place. But we feel it our duty to declare, with every deference to the "powers that be," that, in our opinion, the removal of Nimmo is a decided mistake. We hear that he is admitted by the authorities to be a first-rate oarsman, always rowing hard and long, and with good staying powers. But there is one fatal drawback to these fine qualifications. He is registered by the excellent weighing machine of the University Boat House at something like 14 stone. Therefore he is too heavy to row by at least a stone. A coach must draw the line somewhere, and at present it is drawn at 13 stone. A man may pull his weight up to that point, and he may be allowed, though with much doubt and trepidation, a margin of a pound or two, but a president captain will shrink from any number which expresses a weight approaching to 14 stone with as much horror as if it were the "Number of the Beast" itself. We confess we are surprised to find this fallacy about "pulling one's weight" reviving once more, after the clear and conclusive refutation by which Mr. Woodgate has disposed of it in his little book on "Oars and Sculls." We fully agree with that eminent authority that a man who gets his weight in the right way, who rows an adequate length of stroke, and who is able to last over the required course, must pull his weight, whatever that weight may be. Of course we do not mean that a crew of men rejoicing in the goodly proportions of the "Claimant" or Daniel Lambert would have much pace. It is not necessary to take such extreme cases into account, and that for the simple reason that such unwieldly members of humanity are unfit in every respect to be athletes, and coaches of Boat Clubs are hardly likely to have any dealings with them. But it will readily be acknowledged that men of the age at which rowing is usual rarely or never exceed 14 stone. If they do, it must be owing to an "accumulation of adipose matter," which would render a sliding seat decidedly less inviting than an arm chair, and make them accept very contentedly the decision of the Presidents of Boat Clubs to decline their services with thanks. Nature having thus pointed out so clearly the limit of weight in a young man of active habits, it is surely most unreasonable for coaches to fix an arbitrary line by rule of thumb and pronounce flatly that no one above that weight can fairly discharge his duty in a boat. The unusual weight in such a case must be due to bulk of frame and size of muscle, or in other words, to something which enables an oarsman to row a longer and more powerful stroke. The only instance we can recall of a weight like Nimmo's being taken into a University Eight is the occasion when Tinné rowed some years ago in the Oxford Boat. As the crews he was in were all victorious, it seems to us that the presence of a fourteen stone man in a boat cannot be so fatal as some would maintain.

We ought, however, to anticipate an objection which, we suppose, will be made to our arguments. It is said by some who prefer to put the doctrine about "not pulling one's weight" in a more plausible form that Nimmo may row very well, but he only does as much work as might be fairly expected from a man of, let us say, 12½ stone, or thereabouts. It would doubtless be a highly useful accomplishment to be able to gauge the work done by an oar so accurately that it would be possible to pronounce offhand that A was pulling precisely the proper amount of work and that B was evidently rowing so that a certain number of pounds of unproductive weight was retarding the boat. The scientific progress of the age may perhaps give us a machine which would impart such information as often as needed.

But we must be forgiven for thinking that the coaches of the present benighted epoch are hardly capable of such delicate calculations. It was obvious at any rate that Nimmo was doing far more work than anybody in the boat. But there are several in the crew of the weight which is regarded as being proportionate to his work. We are reduced then to this dilemma. Either he must have been doing his fair share of work, and these others likewise, or else he was not rowing strongly enough, and they were by a natural inference in the same plight. Mr. Prest has shown, by turning out Nimmo, that he believes the last alternative to be the true one, but he does not pursue his judgment to its logical results in ejecting the others. Of course it may be said that there is less dead weight in their case than in Nimmo's, but this is surely carrying the principle of apportioning the proper work to the weights to a preposterous extreme. It is indeed very much like a reductio ad absurdum of the whole theory. To conclude, we have no hesitation in saying that where great weight accompanies good honest muscle and size of body it must always be useful in a boat, provided the man possessing it can be taught to row in proper form, and to apply his strength effectively in the same way as the others. His work cannot be amiss, if the blade of the oar is fairly covered at the right distance behind the rigger and pulled through with that peculiar swirl behind it which is so pleasant to the eye of a coach. Believing, as we do, that these conditions are satisfied in the case of Nimmo, we venture to say once more, as we said above, that his rejection is a decided error of judgment.

This question is of so much general as well as special interest, that we hope we have not trespassed too far on the patience of our readers in discussing it. But it is time to make a few remarks about the crew as at present constituted. We have already expressed our opinion of Baillie as stroke, and we are not inclined to retract our remarks of three weeks back. We firmly believe that he will never get the most out of the men behind him. As long as he is stroke the rowing will be short and ineffective. There is to our mind a distinct change for the worse in the look of the boat since he superseded Pilkington. If the President is resolved to abandon altogether the idea of restoring Davis to the post of honour, we should much prefer to see the Third Trinity man there. He is beautifully neat, and with careful coaching, could be made to set a fairly long stroke—the only point, at present, in which he is notably defective. It is true, he is a very light weight, but Baillie is also light for his place, and as Mr. Prest has seen fit to discard for this year the principle that the stroke of the University Eight should be a heavy man, there seems no reason why he should not go still lower in the scale, if by so doing he can secure a better stroke. This arrangement would have another advantage. Baillie might then be transferred to bow, where he would certainly be much more useful than at present, while the present bow, who is admitted to be a very weak point in the boat, might be dismissed altogether. Baillie is an excellent oar, and ought to be retained if possible, but he is by no means a born stroke, and the sooner he is put elsewhere the better for our chances at Putney.

Prior is rowing very indifferently at seven. He is certainly not the man to make up for the defects of stroke, but rather aggravates them. His swing is "all over the shop," his sliding is, as a general rule, done at the wrong time, his beginning wants precision and dash, and his finish is short, sluggish, and cramped. His work, which was sometimes very fair in the tub-eight, is now conspicuous by its absence. Altogether he seems to us a most undesirable kind of seven. The present five would, we fancy, be a better man for the place, though he could scarcely be a very brilliant success. His finish is "clipped" quite as badly as seven's, and he is very much inclined to row light all through the stroke, but his beginning is sharper and his sliding very much better. Davis is now the best oar, both for form and work in the boat. He has, as we predicted three weeks ago, recovered and more than recovered all his old style. He is rowing far stronger than last year, and almost his only serious fault now is his tendency to shorten the finish of the stroke. We were watching him carefully the other day, and we came to the conclusion that his doing so arose from his anxiety to adapt the length of his own stroke to Baillie's. There is really no time for him to row it properly through. This, we need scarcely point out, is another proof of the harm done by retaining Baillie at stroke. Warlow is perhaps a trifle better than the other Queens' man, but the difference is not very remarkable. He has very much the same faults as Prior—laphazard swinging and sliding, a short stroke in the water, not much beginning, and as little or less finish than the rest of the boat. The selection of Barton for a three does not strike us as happy. The chief point about his past history in the rowing world is that his substitution for Green in the Lady Margaret Four last term had a very notable effect upon the pace of that boat. What would have been an easy victory was turned into what would have been, but for the bad steering of the Jesus crew, a very close-fought contest. Such a fact is certainly not in his favour, and, unless he can be shown to have improved a great deal since that time, it ought, we think, to exclude him absolutely from the Eight. We confess we do not consider that his rowing is any better now than it was then. He is regarded, we hear, by certain critics, as one of those oarsmen who work hard without showing it. With all due submission to those authorities, we must declare in the words by which Betsy Prig somewhat rudely conveyed to Mrs. Gamp her doubts about the existence of Mrs. Harris, that "we don't believe there's no sich a person." A man cannot possibly row hard without showing it, though it is undoubtedly true that a man may make a very great show with a very small expenditure of labour,—an operation to which boating men have given the expressive title of "sugaring," and which any coach of ordinary experience can easily detect. Barton's rowing is, to our eye, quite ineffective. The boat runs away from his oar at the beginning of the stroke, and he never overtakes it. He has not learnt to get on his work with his back and shoulders, nor to use his slide at the right time. The result is that he is obliged to make up for lost time by pulling his oar in too hard at the end of the stroke, and thus exhibits the ungainly "Lady Margaret finish," as we may so call it, in a peculiarly exaggerated form. We observe that Green, his predecessor in the Four, has been out once or twice in the reserve Eight. We trust that this is only a preliminary to his being established in the University crew itself. He would be a valuable acquisition for a boat where so little hard work is going. Sandford must look to his laurels. He is not rowing so well as for the first few days after he was placed in the boat. The latter half of his stroke is everything that it should be. He is, indeed, the only man in the boat that finishes properly. But he does hardly any work behind the rigger,—a fault which, we must say, he is more guilty of while paddling than while rowing. All the same, it is a defect no old Blue ought to have, and, we hope he will shake off so bad a habit before long.

Of Jones we have already spoken. He and three are quite the worst oars in the boat. If Baillie is to be left at stroke, and the President does not wish to take a seat in the boat after the Tripos, we trust that an attempt will be made to procure another bow. If we might be allowed to make a suggestion, we should think that Wheeler, of Third Trinity, would be, to say the least of it, a great improvement on the present occupant of the place. In the scramble of two years ago, which ended in Jones getting a seat in the boat, Wheeler was one of those who tried, and he was considered by many to be fully as good as the man upon whom the choice finally fell.

On the whole we should think the crew, as now made up, distinctly below the average—slower even than the crew of last year or the year before, which were the two worst we have sent up since Goldie turned the tide of victory for us in 1870. This assertion we make in spite of the fast time the present crew has done over a lock-to-lock course. This apparent speed is, we have no doubt, to be accounted for by the favourable circumstances under which the course referred to was accomplished. The new tub-eight used was much lighter than the boats in which previous crews had practised, there was a rather strong stream and a favourable wind to help the pace, and last, but by no means least, the rate of stroke was about three to the minute faster than a University eight usually rows in its heavy ship. This we take to be the simple solution of the marvel that the present crew should actually do a quicker course than such splendid eights as those of 1876 and 1877. That a boat with so many defects should have done the fastest "lock-to-lock" on record is a fact which would prove too much, if it did not really prove nothing at all, for no one can sincerely believe this boat to be equal to those we have just mentioned.

We shall conclude our somewhat lengthy article by alluding to another possible reason for the inferiority of the present crew. It was suggested to us the other day by a friend who takes a keen interest in everything connected with the river, though himself quite a non-rowing man. His remark, we thought, had something in it, and we take the liberty of repeating it here, though it may be open to the objection of imputing unfairness where, we feel certain, none exists. If the eight continues unchanged, no less than six men out of the Jesus first boat of last May will have rowed in the University crews of the two consecutive years. Now there is nothing to be said against drafting into a University eight a large contingent from a thoroughly good crew, which has proved itself indisputably the fastest on the river. But in the present case the Jesus boat was decidedly inferior to the Lady Margaret boat, and was not more than equal to the First Trinity boat, though the latter carried much more than its fair share of "luggage." Even Caius, with the disadvantages of a bad stroke and an untrained man at bow, were only a hair's breadth slower than Jesus. "Surely," our friend remarked, "there is something a little odd in this. I am not much of a judge of rowing, but it seems to me that a boat with four Blues in esse and two in posse for the following year, to say nothing of a trial-eight man, ought to be able to show a clean pair of heels to any other crew on the river." Of course our friend does not understand the reasons which may influence a captain's choice of men, but for all that, we agree with him that "there is something a little odd in all this." In fact, though the idea is not our own, we take leave to adopt it, and express our opinion that there is a mistake somewhere. It shows, we think, that Mr. Prest has not been very happy in picking out the strength of the best crews which rowed last May. How is it there are no Caius men at all in the Eight? How is it that the First Trinity Boat, which would have been much faster than the Jesus Crew, if it had not been burdened by some conspicuously weak oars, who were also among the heaviest men in the crew, is only represented in the Eight by one Blue who won his colours last year? (We might point out in passing that Nimmo was one of the few who worked hard in this boat, and must therefore be of more use than he is thought by Mr. Prest and his advisers). How is it that Third Trinity and Trinity Hall send no contribution to the Eight? We do not ask these questions as insinuating that Mr. Prest has wittingly favoured his own College in making up the University Boat. We simply ask for an explanation of the phenomenon that a crew, which, if the present Light Blue Eight is composed as it should be, ought to have walked away from everything behind it, should be only the second-best on the river, and share even that praise with one, if not with two others. The Lady Margaret boat cannot, we think, complain. Prior, their bow, was, we understand, offered the same place in the University Eight, but could not accept it, and Green, the only other member of the crew who could fairly aspire to a Blue has been unable to row so far, though it appears not unlikely now that his services may be obtained. It is the other boats which we believe to have been unduly neglected, and we hope the President will re-consider his position even thus late in the day, and endeavour to strengthen his boat by introducing into it some of the good material which he might before have found by looking more carefully outside his own College crew.

The continuous high winds and rain during the past week have been sufficient to tax the strength of most crews practising for the Lent races, and the tempers of most coaches under whose charge these crews have been; but we were glad that the inclement state of the weather has not in any way stopped the vigour with which practice has been carried on this term.

The new regulations respecting the number of boats to be added to the 3rd Division lately made by the C. U. B. C., in which it is possible that should enough boats start there will be three put on the river, has given an additional stimulus to colleges wishing to get their 2nd, 3rd, or 4th boats on. Several Clubs have even gone so far as to attempt to get up two boats to compete in their time races, noticeable among whom are Clare, who have shown great energy this term, and got two very fair boats in practice, and doubtless will do well.

Emmanuel, too, have a very fair second boat, which they are striving hard to make as good as possible, and which will, we think, succeed, if only they persevere, and are as energetic as at present they seem.

The rowing in the second division does not seem to be quite up to the standard of former years, and though the men are bigger and the crews seem heavier than formerly, still they are on the whole very rough, and not a bit together.

Jesus 2 should keep their place as head of the division, and become holders of the Granta Cup, but they will have to improve and get together, and pay more attention to the time.

Third Trinity 2nd are very weak in the bows, and row short; they have, however, improved during the past week, but they must drop that bucket and get a more regular swing in the boat before they can come up to the mark.

St. Catharine are not a bit together; they have made some change in their crew during the last week, which does not seem to improve the go of the boat. They too, have to cover their blades, a great fault also in the Trinity Hall 2nd boat, which, though the best together in the division, still row light. They have, however, improved much in the last week, and are rowing much longer than they were, and should they continue in the same way will run Jesus close for the head place in the division.

King's have a better boat than usual; they should keep their place if they continue to take the same amount of pains they are doing at present.

First Trinity are very short, and very rough; the men seem too to be smaller than the other crews; their boat sadly lacks dash.

Pembroke have got a very fair boat; so have Sidney, who have improved steadily during this term.

Christ's are a very strong lot of men, though very rough indeed. Were they neater and better together they would do well.

Caius are very rough indeed.

In the Third Division the boat which commends itself most to notice is undoubtedly Cavendish, who did so well last year when they were allowed to put a boat on the river; they take great pains, are fairly well together, and were they a bit stronger in the bows of the boat, and if they did not hang so they would be a good boat. The other boats seem very rough, but there is ample time for them to improve. Trinity Hall 3 are a boat which send their ship through the water at a good pace, and we expect that were they to take more trouble about their swing, and try and do their work at the beginning of the stroke and not at the end, they might do well. They are a dangerous boat, though, and will improve with plenty of work.

We have noticed in the Cavendish boat mentioned above that which many crews might imitate with great advantage to themselves: they thoroughly row themselves out at the end of a course. We have stood at the railway bridge and seen crews easy there as fresh as paint, after "keeping a course." All the good of a course is to see what a crew really can do. When rowing their hardest they can never improve if they come in pretty nearly as fresh as when they started, and how will they feel in the races when hard pressed up the Long Reach if they are not used to doing their very utmost while in practice.

OXFORD LETTER.

Considerable changes have been made in the Eight since my last letter. First of all Brown, who was three, changed places with Hargreaves, seven. This did not remain long, however, and H. R. Poole, of Brasenose, one of the reserve men, was put bow: Wharton went to seven, and Brown returned to the front of the boat, but not to his old place. He took the seat of Capron, at two, who retired from the scene. The weather has been so very rough since these changes that it is difficult to say what the effect has been, but it is hoped that the time will be better, and the boat steadier, as soon as it gets a chance. The floods came down in two or three days and are now all over the meadows and tow path. The barges cannot be reached dry shod, and everything is in its usual torpid trim in these respects—which, considering we have not had the water out ever since the abnormal floods of last summer, we were really beginning to be very anxious about; the idea of running with the Torpids along a dry towing path would have been really too awful.

The said Torpids begin on Thursday. They have been coached under difficulties. The Hartford Torpid is the only one that has gone down this week: the casualty happened on Friday, when a hurricane was blowing, and when Disney (O.U.B.C.) was coaching from the stern—some people hint this coincidence was not one of those that can be proved to be altogether independent of causation.

Last Monday and Tuesday St. John's had their sports. The wind was terrific on Monday, but rather better on the second day.

The other day a grand coup was made in the Market. Mr. Faussett of Christ's Church, and Mr. Ogle, of Trinity, the Clerks of the Market (Clerici Mercatûs), made a swoop down upon some 85 pounds of butter, which was being sold under weight. In virtue of the ancient jurisdiction of the University in those matters they seized the whole, and divided the spoil between the Radcliffe Infirmary, in Oxford, and another hospital at Heddington.

The Hertford Scholarship for this year has been awarded to J. W. Macknaill, of Balliol. Five others were mentioned by the Examiners, namely:—J. Cookson, Corpus; E. C. E. Owen, Balliol; E. W. Watson, St. John's; R. E. Mitcheson, St. John's; F. J. Haverfield, New.

At Brazenose, the following have been elected to open Classical Scholarships:—W. H. Stephenson, B.N.C.; G. R. Asquith, Marlborough; and G. Bellews, King's Coll., London: C. J. Reade, All Hallows Grammar School, Honiton, to a Mathematical.

Professor Richmond gave two lectures last week, on Thursday and Friday, at 2 o'clock, on the Arena Chapel of Giotto.

The Professor of Poetry will give two lectures this week in the Theatre of the Museum, on Thursday and Friday. The first on "The Spiritual side of Poetry;" the second, "A Study of Milton's Lycidas"; it is not stated why he no longer lectures in Balliol Hall, as he did at the first, and which is a much more convenient place as far as position is concerned, but one cannot help remembering what no one here has yet forgotten—how sadly his criticisms on Shelley wounded the susceptible feelings of an audience not unaccustomed to admire that poet. Since which time, in fact, we have heard him alluded to as "the blasphemer," in more than one circle of Oxford Society.

The Brampton lectures began in St. Mary's, on Sunday. The Lecturer this year is the Rev. E. Hatch, of St. Mary's Hall; the subject: "The Organisation of the Christian Church," These Lectures, I may remind you, were founded by the Rev. J. Bampton, M.A., Trinity College, Canon of Salisbury. They are eight in number, preached on Sunday mornings in full term, between the commencement of the last month in Lent term and the end of the third week in Act term, on any of the following subjects:—to confirm and establish the Christian Faith, and to confute all Heretics and Schismatics—upon the authority of the writings of the primitive Fathers, as to the faith and practice of the Primitive Church—upon the Divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ—upon the Divinity of the Holy Ghost—upon the Articles of the Christian Faith, as comprehended in the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds. The lecturer must be an M.A. of Oxford or Cambridge, and is chosen by the Heads of Houses.

Last Saturday evening, at the entertainment given by the members of Christ Church, in the Town Hall; upwards of eleven hundred people are said to have been present; represented by nearly five pounds worth of pennies. They were regaled with instrumental and vocal quartetts and solos. Choruses from "Pinafore" Recitations and Readings, and a short address from Canon King, in the middle; with which programme, considering that it was almost impossible to get standing room in the Hall from the moment it began till the time it left off—they appear to have been fairly well satisfied.

HIGHER SCHOOLS IN GERMANY.

II.

I must preface this paper with the hope that the printer will deal more humanely with it than with the first. The only misprint that it is now worth while to correct is on p. 28, ii. 6, which should read—"but numbers such as those mentioned by Mr. Hardcastle," &c.

Let us now turn to the matter of discipline. It is maintained, in the schools we are speaking of, if not without, yet with a sparing use, of corporal punishment. This is in Saxony prohibited by law; in Prussia striking with the hand is forbidden, but the cane is sometimes used as a punishment intended by its grave and exceptional character to fill a hardened young offender with awe and repentance. In practice, probably few masters would hesitate at their own risk to give a boy a box on the ear, such treatment however being always regarded as marking wilful and exceptional misconduct. Corporal punishment is never administered to the older boys, and it is on the whole regarded both by masters and boys with a sensitive seriousness that would have rather puzzled Dr. Arnold and amused his lower form boys. Somewhat the same may be said of the other usual punishments, detention, detention involving absence from a family meal, confinement for an hour or two in the school Carcer, a written censure in the journal of the class or in the pupil's conduct book, &c. Discipline is not difficult to maintain among German boys; they are less irrepressible, have less of the self-governing instinct, are more ready to fall in with an order imposed upon them, than English boys. The school, too, as part of the state-system, has a more commanding hold upon the pupil's imagination and sense of self-interest, than any but the old public schools with us. He very soon learns to recognise that the abuse of his privileges, bringing disgrace or failure at school, means self-exclusion from any higher career, and probably in a great measure failure in life.

German boys are protected against some of the dangers and evils of our public schools, but they have not such a free and joyous life as English schoolboys. They are more ruled and ordered, more closely kept within the limits of a strict routine, which absorbs their energies and restrains their youthful elasticity. An unfavourable influence in this direction has undoubtedly been exercised by that strict military drill and discipline to which the Prussians ascribe their rise to greatness, but which, extending into every department of national life, is threatening to extinguish both in this and in individual character much of what an Englishman has learnt most to prize. German boys are treated for the most part not harshly, but with too much of repression and drill, and too little of generous confidence; they have not enough of freedom and scope for the development of the robuster virtues, of self-reliance and self-determination. This naturally tells upon the national character, and I think it is not a harsh or ungenerous judgment, that a sensitive regard to strict truth and honour, manly straightforwardness and fearless independence are less characteristic of German than of English "gentlemen,"—I might say generally, of the Germans than of the English.

I do not think German boys are originally and by nature indifferent to play. They have not indeed the boisterous animal spirits of English boys, and they often show at a very early age some of the tendencies of the German character, which is more subjective, more meditative and sentimental, less practical and outward in its impulses than the English. But I have seen little German boys playing in the Pause in a diminutive school-yard with a zest that showed a sufficient love of play, if only freedom and scope were given for its development. But play is not encouraged, both time and opportunity are lacking, and a false tradition is a barrier not easily overcome. When the notion has once gained ground that play is childish, and that to sport a cigar or lounge in a beerhouse or café is more typical of manhood than athletic skill, there is no force left to break through the material difficulties that often lie in the way of any pursuit of out-door sports. Higher ideals of manhood are by no means wanting, but they are generally more connected with studious pursuits than with sports, and take more of an inward and personal than an actively outward direction. And yet that the youth of Germany are by no means incapable of excelling in bodily exercises is shown by the way in which, with only the preparation given by their school gymnastics, they go through their period of military service, to which they seem for the most part to submit with willingness and a real appreciation of its value, both as physical training and as a salutary if somewhat rough discipline for life.

Mr. Hardcastle seems to have been somewhat unfortunate in his experience of German masters. He has found them to be mere officials, not only lacking in refinement, but rude and repellent, even coarse, in their treatment of their pupils, with whom they have no intercourse out of school, so that any attachment to them on the part of the latter is impossible. We may admit, but also accord some indulgence to, that deficiency in social refinement which we know to be more or less characteristic even of the educated classes in Germany. We know also what is its main reason, the same that explains a similar union of intellectual culture with unrefined manners, still often to be found in Scotland. The lack of a fair degree of material prosperity is the ultimate and sufficient ground of much that strikes us disagreeably in German life, of much that has tempted popular writers into somewhat ungenerous caricature. Again, as regards the tone of social intercourse, some allowance should be made for a national temperament very different from our own. The Germans are less reserved and self-contained, more demonstrative, even vehement in manner, less restrained in their bearing towards one another by a sense of personal dignity, than the English. Gemüthlichkeit is to them more than blameless propriety of manners. It is hard to unite antithetic virtues, and the average German is certainly more accessible and sociable, less impregnably neutral, or "buttoned up" than the more proper and conventional Englishman.

Admitting a tendency to officialism to be a very common German trait, not likely to be absent in schoolmasters, I do not think that the masters in German schools are generally chargeable with treating their pupils as though they cared nothing for them, or so as to incur their ill-will. It must be remembered that almost all the German public schools are day schools, and that there are no sports for masters and boys to share. They probably have as much and as cordial intercourse with each other out of school, as the masters and boys, e.g., of the City of London School, or of most provincial day schools in England. Walks and botanising excursions voluntarily taken together by boys and masters, and a number of unmistakeable proofs of the attachment of boys to their master, have fallen under my own personal observation. And it is only just to say that the school course of German boys—of the less quite as much as of the more promising ones—is as a rule watched over by their masters with a marked degree of conscientious care. This could not fail to impress anyone who has been present at one of the masters' conferences, which are frequently held, or has been the guest of the Ordinarius of a class, and seen the tax upon his time and energies to which he submits as a part of his duty, communicating with parents and receiving their visits.

While speaking of the surroundings which act upon the character of masters and boys, Mr. Hardcastle has ventured the surprising statement that "Germans have no home," "the mighty influence of family life is altogether wanting." An acquaintance with German literature, little as this reflects, compared with English literature, the family life of the people, should yet have been sufficient to cancel this impression, which is otherwise not unnatural in a foreigner acquainted only with the outside of German daily life. What is true in it, and what soon strikes an English observer, is the small amount of social intercourse between families, and of hospitality. He finds it difficult, even with good introductions, to gain entrance into family circles, and any hospitality shown to him is generally confined to a few set occasions. His situation is to some extent shared by unmarried Germans living away from the family home. The chief reason of this is again want of means, which greatly restricts sociability involving hospitable entertainment. Even the keeping up of a household that will not be put out by an unexpected guest is not easy on narrow incomes. How far the frequenting of places of public resort, corresponding to the English clubs, even by men who are members of families, is a further cause, or a result, of this lack of intercourse between families, might be difficult to say. But to the existence of a large measure of family life, and of the most important home influences, any one can testify who has been admitted into their privacy, who has heard their family-talk, shared their frugal evening meal and the reading aloud or the singing that has followed, who has seen the boy at his lessons in a corner of his father's study, the girl just come home full of school gossip, or the family party preparing for a Sunday walk. The Germans are far from being as domesticated a nation as we are, especially in their larger towns, but to say that they have no family life is a misrepresentation they would deeply and with justice resent.

We come to our last point, the question how far it is in the first place feasible, and in the second advisable, to send English boys to German public schools. Almost all that Mr. Hardcastle has said with regard to the peculiar advantages offered to foreigners, and the indulgence extended to English boys, in the schools of Stuttgart, must be confined to that town, and perhaps one or two others, where the presence of a large number of foreign residents has led to the admission of foreign boys into the schools under special conditions. The Germans are as far from inviting foreigners into their public schools as we are, and certainly have no idea of allowing them to be used as a convenience for English boys spending two or three years in the country to learn the language. They are liberal enough to admit foreigners on the same terms as Germans; they must be so far master of German as to be able to join in the ordinary work of the class, without obstructing it, or requiring special attention or indulgence, and they must come up in general attainments to the standard of the class they wish to enter. I say the Germans are liberal enough to admit foreigners on the same terms as natives, for it must be remembered that school fees cover but a part of the expense of the education given, and that in receiving foreigners they are rarely training their own future officials and citizens, for whom the state and other endowments were intended.

Why should English boys be sent to German schools? To get a good education, not procurable at home; or paying its full cost, still to get it cheaper? To a parent capable of putting such a slur upon his own country, it would hardly weigh much that such a course would involve a length of absence that must make a boy a stranger to his native land. But in truth these reasons neither require, nor are likely to receive much serious consideration, and are here suggested chiefly for the sake of the hint lying in them, which need not be lost upon us; it may serve to quicken the desire for a time when it shall not be true that a high-class education is the expensive privilege of a few, and that a first-rate intellectual education is the privilege of a fortunate few out of the few.

Looking at the question from an educational point of view, and weighing advantages against disadvantages, I cannot think it desirable to send English boys—at least those who are to be educated "on the first plane"—for a part of their education to Germany, or in general to foreign schools. The chief reasons that might at present be urged for it imply dissatisfaction with the educational system—or want of system—at home, and would disappear under a reform which should place our secondary education generally upon a level with that of Germany. There is, indeed, not much danger of denationalising an English boy by sending him for two or three years to a foreign school, though he loses a substantial portion of the influences and experiences of English school life, which are surely the best mould for the Englishman, but the unity and continuity of his school-course are broken, his time and power are wasted in needless change, and in fiting together or dismissing, at a formative period, heterogeneous impressions and habitudes. A change at such a period in the instrument of thought, of mental development, and of the acquisition of knowledge, cannot be regarded, from the point of view of a scientific Pädagogik, as other than a drawback.

The advantages supposed to counterbalance the drawbacks are chiefly two. They may be expressed in Mr. Hardcastle's words: a grand language is well-mastered, insular prejudices to some extent removed, and the sympathies enlarged. To the first of these there are qualifications not to be forgotten. The German language, as taught in German schools, receives but little of that analytical and grammatical treatment which is essential for the thorough and permanent acquirement of a foreign language. It is well known that a language "picked up" in a country without such training, is easily lost after the country is left; the language is seldom spoken, and, to turn to metaphor, the swimmer is no longer supported by the surrounding element. Nor is the private instruction received from a German who has not trained himself to teach his language to foreigners likely in any great degree to supply what is wanting. Again, a person can only "master a language" within his own mental range and up to the point of his own development. A boy of 15 or 16, who returns home speaking like a German boy of that age, will still have a good deal of the same work with the language, and still more with the "grand literature," that he would have had if he had learned only at home. His chief gain, certainly no slight one, is that he has a much higher degree of that familiar sense of the language as a living thing, instinct with idea and feeling, which even under the best teaching can be only partially acquired at home. But this can be obtained in a very fair degree by vacation visits, and a moderate length of residence abroad, after the school-course is finished. The latter, too, would bring with it at the most favourable point those widening and de-insularising influences which are undoubtedly a most salutary element in the education of an Englishman.

English people residing in Germany will of course be glad to avail themselves of the educational opportunities it offers. Parents of boys intended to go early to business, and requiring a "practical" knowledge of German, may send them for a residence in the country, but these will hardly be likely—except in the few places above noticed—to be received as qualified into the public schools we have been speaking of, until their aim is half accomplished. And parents able to secure for their sons a thorough and rational school education at home can hardly be advised, in view of the above considerations, to send them before its completion for a residence abroad. Had space allowed, I should have been glad to touch upon the advantages that might accrue from a semester or two at a German University.

IS MALLOCK WORTH READING?

In all literary and political discussions, a natural prominence is given to the more striking peculiarities of representative thinkers, and sometimes even to details not apparently connected with public concerns. These inquiries, when kept within reasonable limits, possess an interest considerably more significant than is vulgarly assigned to them. The intellectual or moral ascendancy of any man, whether merited or otherwise, is much more than a merely personal question. It implies remarkable qualities in those whom it controls as well as in the individual who exercises it; and no sufficient account of personal influence is possible without a parallel account of the human nature which both assists its development and fixes its limits. These discussions are all the more likely to be instructive when there is reason to suppose that the notoriety is misplaced. For the admiration of weakness and absurdity points to the existence of similar defects in ourselves, while it would hardly be safe to lay down an analogous proposition regarding the admiration of wisdom and goodness. These considerations may supply some answer to those who think Mr. Mallock a wholly unprofitable study because he may be set down as overrated and superficial. The abstract irrationality of certain prejudices and superstitions is irrelevant to their importance, regarded as signs of national character.

The directness of Mr. Mallock's attack is in striking, and, to some, refreshing contrast with the current "reconciliations" of science and theology. It is necessarily attractive to the many who regret the irresolution of orthodox apologists, without venturing for themselves on a more pronounced resistance. His aim is simply to increase the existing hostility by ridiculing the pretensions of science itself, as well as by personal invective against its professors. And his success in this more important respect has been at least such as to efface whatever adverse feeling may have been provoked by his unorthodox defence of the Romish Church. This results, however, not so much from any special ability in Mr. Mallock, as from the peculiar position of scientific writers in this country. It is not long since the generality of scientific men were denounced by Comte as "indifferent" to questions of social and ethical importance; and their apathy was doubtless inferred from the concentration which the pursuit of science necessarily implies. But whatever justice these strictures may have once contained, they are now at least altogether inappropriate. We can hardly open one of the more serious reviews without noticing contributions to social speculation by eminent authorities in physical research. No disagreement respecting the intrinsic value of these essays can affect their ample disproof of the usual Positivist objections to the "specialism" and spiritual "nihilism" of science. The writings of Mr. Mallock form a continuous protest against what he regards as intrusion on the part of scientific men. He represents them as having made "astonishing conquests in the physical world," as thence proceeding "by a kind of coup d'état" to "take possession of the spiritual world," and as thus acquiring a "false prestige" which it is his object to dispel. Opinions will differ as to the probable issue of the circumstances which Mr. Mallock describes in these extravagant terms. The popular respect for science is naturally great at a time when the results of investigation have taken a peculiarly visible form. It may be increased in certain minds by the now familiar evidence of an intimate relation between the physical and mental worlds. But the more common sentiment is still probably one of considerable suspicion and incredulity. The knowledge and methods which by some are valued as adding to human working power and comfort are, by others, regarded as inducements to selfish ease, or as hostile to all chivalrous and poetic aspects. And this class of readers (ably represented in a recent sermon by the Dean of Peterborough) will find in Mr. Mallock's pages abundant acquiescence and consolation. It may indeed be argued that the standard of excellence in the subjects which he discusses needs raising through a more accurate appreciation of their difficulty. And it may further be suggested that this task is especially appropriate to a body of men who are already professionally accustomed to find mysteries and problems for solution in familiar things. But Mr. Mallock evidently imagines that inquiries into the "value of life" involve no serious learning and labour—that, being of universal moment, they require no sort of special preparation. This is one symptom of an inordinate presumption which appears on nearly every page of his writings, and especially in the passages which are most obviously intended to exemplify a modest self-depreciation. His dedication to Mr. Ruskin of a recent volume will sufficiently explain our meaning. The utmost deficiency there admitted is the having "unduly emphasized some points and not put enough emphasis on others," while the omission of important considerations, the inclusion of trivial ones, or the misinterpretation of either, is apparently not contemplated as possible. Mr. Mallock believes that here and there a few "verbal inconsistencies" may be detected; but that, on the whole, his "tribute" is "possibly" more blessed for himself to give than for Mr. Ruskin to receive. In language which only a narrow interval distinguishes from an offensive parody, he refers those who, "coming after" him, will be "preferred before him;" and the parallel thus suggested, whether consciously or otherwise, is the best illustration of the extent and vulgarity of his self-conceit.

There are circumstances which explain much of Mr. Mallock's popularity, apart from the proverbial fortune of a bold self-estimate. And one of these is the general love of personal satire and caricature. His writings are simply the application to philosophical questions of the "society" journalism which has attained extraordinary dimensions in our day. He has done his best to undermine scientific authority by making scientific men appear ridiculous. He seldom opposes an argument without directing attention to the personal light in which it presents its advocates. The parallel holds still further. There is the same mean conception of social principle, the same absence of moral elevation, the same epigrammatic devices for securing the public favour. This appears most prominently in the parables and analogies by which Mr. Mallock enforces his arguments, and which are, for the most part, either coarse or puerile. This is especially the case when the point to be illustrated is some variety of human happiness or aspiration. We may generally be sure of some distasteful reference, some almost prurient quotation. The aspiration will be the vulgar desire of Bill or James the tourist, and the pleasure will hardly admit of specific description.

The common feature which these defects imply is the want of reverence. It is to this that Mr. Mallock is indebted for his sudden and temporary success, and it is this which condemns his success to be no more than temporary. The tastes which are the easiest to satisfy are the love of novelty or of personal details connected with current topics, or the disinclination for continuous intellectual effort. They are necessarily more common than the genuine appreciation of work which affects deeper and therefore more hidden interests. And precisely because they are the easiest to satisfy, they are also the first to satiate. In more serious literary production there is a less extensive competition, and one in which the element of novelty is comparatively unimportant. Now, while the want of reverence is almost indispensable in the former class of writings, it is generally a fatal disqualification for the latter. Those who are impressed by the greater achievements of mankind will leave the record of this reverence on their own performances. They will aim, to the extent of their own powers, at the solidity of acquirement and care in execution which distinguish every variety of permanent excellence. But this solidity and care are, for the most part, fatal to success in satisfying the more transient humours of daily life. It is only in the most exceptional cases that those who are penetrated with the importance of deeper interests can occupy themselves successfully with the lighter and more superficial. In the present case, the want of reverence is manifested in its most offensive and presumptuous forms. Thus we find attributed to Miss Harriet Martineau a "grotesque over-estimate of her own social and intellectual importance," which "a little knowledge of the world would have taken from her." This is the woman whom Mr. Morley describes, with bare justice, as accustomed to "the most neutral self-judgment," and whose estimate of her own powers Mr. Greg declares to have been "rather below the truth, not to say wide of it." In the same work, we are told that "the feebleness and vacillation of Dr. Tyndall's whole views of things" are "typical of the entire positive thought of the day;" and a similar judgment is passed on Mr. Leslie Stephen, as exemplifying "the solemn imbecility of his school." This school is elsewhere alleged to consist of "men whose province of knowledge is an extremely small and limited one, who outside that province are enlightened but by the merest smattering of an education, and whose thinking on general subjects is that rather of a bewildered woman than a keen and collected man." There is, however, a subsequent admission that none of the writers thus stigmatised are personally known to their assailant: and there is reason to prefer this to the other statement of the case. Among them are George Eliot, J. S. Mill, Herbert Spencer, and Professor Huxley. It must not be supposed, however, that these civilities are entirely reserved for those whom Mr. Mallock incongruously classes as "Positivists." Even Mr. Carlyle's known repugnance for certain aspects of scientific teaching, to say nothing of the greatness of his name, has no weight with Mr. Mallock. He talks as easily of Carlyle's "shallow rhetoric," as of Mill's "characteristic falsehood."

It is not often that we feel tempted by Mr. Mallock's example, but we cannot refrain from following it in the present instance. It may be excusable for once to imitate him in that association of literary with private characteristics which is open to such general objection. Whatever may be the precise value of the claims which he derides, they are, in every case, the result of an arduous life-time. There can be no doubt respecting the actual achievements on which they are based. And now, some ill-informed reader may naturally inquire, what are the achievements of Mr. Mallock? Who is it that thus rates and scolds the most eminent of his time, like some angry schoolmaster?

He is a young man who describes himself as "an outsider in philosophy, in literature, and in theology," and whose Oxford career terminated (not very brilliantly) about half-a-dozen years ago.

The reverence for greatness is fortunately a common habit in youth, wherever a genuine intellectual interest can be found. It owes much of its predominating force to more than one of the teachers we have mentioned. It supplies in many cases the only corrective to an excessive speculative presumption. And we may be sure that it will never come, if not at this impressionable and sympathetic season. As might be expected, Mr. Mallock has too small a respect for the finer examples of humanity to have any respect at all for its average specimens. The object of his writings is to show that its permanent excellence and happiness are supplied by beliefs which he rejects in explicit terms. He proclaims himself a "complete outsider," a "literal sceptic," while urging the extinction of scepticism by an operation not of intellect but of "will." Here, as usual, he is absurdly inconsistent. In one passage he tells us that "not to affirm is a very different thing from to deny"; in another, that "absolute doubt...is practically equivalent to absolute denial." This may perhaps be accounted for by the fact that he has not the remotest idea of the real connection between utility and truth. Thus he alludes to the harm occasionally done by the unreflecting disclosure of particular truths, and asks triumphantly whether a "chattering nurse" who "betrays his danger to a sick man", has made a very sacred and glorious announcement. As if the proposition that truth is useful were equivalent to the proposition that it is useful to everybody, without qualification as to time, place, and circumstance. Mr. Mallock ignores the only material point, which is that there is no truth which somebody may not usefully know—as (to use his own illustration) the sick man's relatives or doctors.

We shall not attribute to this confusion the various misstatements and inconsistencies into which Mr. Mallock has fallen, in his inquiry into truth as he conceives it. Of these, perhaps, the most remarkable occur in his defence of Catholicism, in which the position of Protestant religion is completely misrepresented. We may fitly compare the statement that Protestantism is rapidly losing both its "religious" and "practical" elements with the previous conclusions regarding the moral atmosphere from which these elements have disappeared. The superior standard of societies which accept the more definite and practical system is not precisely self-evident. This is hardly the sort of reasoning which might be expected of an "intellectual housemaid," who aims at "sorting and dusting" the scattered thoughts "which every man has at his elbow." But although this comparison does not correctly represent Mr. Mallock's intellectual method, it admirably illustrates his moral deficiencies. It never occurs to him that this is not a perfectly creditable task—that there can be any harm in preserving and organising the whole unsavoury "litter," instead of selecting the thoughts which are deserving. He is quite ready to drag forth and make definite the vague dislike of science, the inward tendencies to persecution, the secret liking for trivial and unseemly details. It is an early lesson in childhood that there are certain mysterious uses belonging to the most insignificant or apparently noxious creations. But it may be questioned whether a "life" thus occupied can be so far "worth living" as to justify this a priori assumption.

ARTHUR STRACHEY.

A valuable collection of pieces of sculpture, and of pictures by the most eminent masters, has lately been presented to Charterhouse School by an Old Carthusian, Mr. G. Allen, of Torquay. He has also presented to the School Library 1000 volumes originally belonging to his father, formerly Bishop of Ely.

THE PAPER-KNIFE.

More's Utopia. The English Translation thereof, by Raphe Robynson (sometime Fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford), printed from the Second Edition, 1556. To which is prefixed The Life of Sir Thos. More, written by his son-in-law, William Roper, reprinted from Hearne's Edition, 1716. Edited with Introduction, Notes, Glossary and Index of Names, by J. Rawson Lumby, D.D., Fellow of St. Catharine's College, Norrisian Professor of Divinity. Cambridge, at the University Press. Pitt Press Series.

To enthusiasts in history matters, who are not content with mere facts, but like to pursue their investigations behind the scenes, as it were, Professor Rawson Lumby has in the work now before us produced a most acceptable contribution to the now constantly increasing store of illustrative reading. The period of Tudor dynasty is one in which our attention is centred on the sovereign, and we are too apt to neglect the condition of the lower classes and to forget how much it cost the country for him to be aggrandized. But in books such as this, our minds are called back to the real state of things; we see with the eyes of one who was not able against his conviction to cover the inner defects with a veneer of outward splendour.

Mr. Lumby has pointed all this out most ably in his introduction, where he sketches the general state of the country as gathered from the contemporary literature, and more especially from More's own work.

We have the author's life too, in full, adding to the interest as pointing out the circumstances under which the Utopia was written, in no agitatory spirit, for More's friendship was courted by the King, but in a pure desire of benefiting his fellow creatures.

Mr. Lumby has also exerted himself in the elucidation of some of the more difficult grammatical phenomena of the translation, so that we are enabled to appreciate the quaintness of the style.

Many of the notes are interesting, embodying as they do an encyclopædical investigation into all the details of the book. We are sure that the reader, after a careful perusal of these notes could wish for no further information on any subject connected with the text. Hythlodaye, Amaurote, Anyder, for instance, would no doubt prove an obstacle to many, were we not informed that More with the quiet humour that pervades the book, and makes him even apologize for his ignorance of the Utopian alphabet, had derived those names from the Greek, as an evidence of the fictitious nature of the narrrative.

The text is published as a reprint of the second edition of 1556, and includes a facsimile of the original title page.

MR. STEVENSON BLACKWOOD'S ADDRESS.

On Sunday evening, Feb. 15, at 8.30, the Guildhall was filled with undergraduates to hear an address of which the following is an abstract:

"The Winning Side."

In this world in which we live, a continual conflict is going on, heat against cold, light against darkness, life against death. God has chosen that this order of things shall be ruled by conflict. The contest between fire and water produces the steam to which we owe so much, and all our labour, our study, our commerce, owe their being to the conflict between life and death. But it will not always be so; there will be a winning side. Life shall conquer Death, Light Darkness, and Right Wrong.

Everyone of us has been conscious of a conflict in our own hearts as long as we can remember—good impulses striving against bad, and bad against good—the field of which is our own personality, the field of which is our own heart. The words which Shakespeare puts into the mouth of King John's mouth.

"Nay, in the body of this fleshly land,
This kingdom, this confine of blood and breath, Hostility and civil tumult reigns!"

are only the expression of the truth of which every one is conscious.

But God knows how to bring good out of evil, and those who will some day be the saints in His Heaven are having their characters stablished, strengthened, settled, by this struggle. Everyone knows that those who have to struggle for their bread or for any great object in this world become strengthened in a way which those who live in the lap of luxury know nothing of. The fight will be a hard one, you will often be sore pressed, and forced down like Christian by Apollyon in the wonderful allegory. But cheer up, there will come a moment when you will stand on the shore of the sea of glass mingled with fire—cheer up, for though you are down, you are on the winning side if only you are trusting in CHRIST. That moment will come, sooner perhaps than we think, when we shall sing "Hallelujah, for the LORD GOD Omnipotent reigneth."

On all sides we see this hand to hand fight raging in the moral world, in the nations, cities, villages, parliaments, the men of the world against the men of God, and as the world grows older, the fight grows hotter. But thanks be to God, there is a winning side, the victory must be to God. Though we cannot see through the maze of the sin and battle of this world we shall one day see what is written in that glorious Psalm "O sing unto the Lord a new song, for he hath done marvellous things, with His own right hand and with His holy arm hath he gotten Himself the victory." He hath already won it.

Now everyone of us is on one side or other, we cannot be neutral. There are two sides and a middle to this hall, but there is no middle to this fight. We may sit unconcerned about the fighting between Chili and Peru, but if England were invaded you could not be neutral then, unless indeed you were a traitor, but a traitor would be on the enemy's side. You have already no doubt enlisted, for I am assuming that everyone here is already professedly by at least a Christian—though I fear there may be some whose professsion is as hollow as mine was for the first half of my life, when I sank into as deep a pit of worldliness and sin as man ever did—I want you to remember some of the characteristics of this side.

First, then, it is the side of a despised minority. Brother, you must put up with being laughed at, and sneered at and called names. Don't think that if you set yourself to fight on God's side like a man you will be patted on the back all the time. No. "All that will live Godly in CHRIST JESUS shall suffer persecution." This is the law laid down by God Himself. You will be sneered at as a 'saint,' 'methodist,' 'new light,' or 'one that sets up to be better than other people.' We know all the while this is not true, for really we feel and confess we are 'vile,' as we have just been singing.

We are not put to the rack now, but to some this derision is even harder to bear than torture. But never mind all this. Isn't it worth while to get some scar. Now's the time, and very little time too, to win this honour. There will be no chance of winning it in heaven, where all will be peace and joy; now's the time to win scars in the King's battle. So make up your mind now, brother, to be on the winning side. I am not speaking as a novice in this matter; I have gone through it, and I remember well how, when I first was led to break with my old worldly companions, the mock-courteous remarks they made when I met them.

But this is the law of our Christian life. Trees would grow up soft without the wintry blasts of the north wind to make them sturdy; so a Christian without persecution would have but little strength—and we must make up our minds to be always here a despised minority. But, blessed be God, it will not always be a despised minority, but "a great multitude which no man could number, of all nations and kindreds and tongues," and will you be the less happy then, when you walk the streets of the heavenly city, that you have been on the side of the despised Crucified One, and sharing His reproach for a little while, fought like a good soldier at His side?

Again, it is the side now of apparent defeat—apparent, but only apparent; the angels are tuning their harps already for the song of victory. But it did seem like defeat when He, the embodiment of love, was cast out of the world He had made, and sealed down in the tomb, so that they might keep Him out of sight. But the hour of defeat was the hour of Coronation. Those words "to-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise," spoken to one who but just before was reviling Him as his enemy, prove that even in the act of dying, He was beating Satan on his own ground, while apparently he was so hoplessly conquered. Yes, it is here in weakness and apparent defeat that the victory must be won, though there it will be fully enjoyed. Isn't it worth while to be on the winning side? We all have an instinctive desire to be on the winning side in whatever battle we are engaged—an innocent desire,—without which indeed we should scarcely be men. In your life here, whether in athletics, or boat-races, or the great struggles in the schools, you all naturally wish to win. For look at the other side, which must be the losing side. 'Man of the world,' what does that mean? Rather a grand thing to be, as many men count it, and plume themselves upon it—does it not mean an enemy of God, and so one who must be on the losing side. Oh suffer me in the face of these tremendous realities to press this question upon you. Think what it would be to be on the losing side in that great day, if you should be unable to "trace your genealogy" as a child of God then. I beseech you, brother, think of this. My words are soon to die away, but these facts will never die, and one day you must stand on one side or the other, and then you will have your reward. Even in that day, if you have not here accepted your Saviour you will then be in one sense on the winning side—but what a victory that would be! A victory over the love and the Blood of your Lord who gave His life for you—the victory of the suicide, who conquers his life with his own hand. Yes, every one who is lost is a suicide; "thou hast destroyed thyself."

You will think over it, will you not? Indeed, I see by your attention that you will. But perhaps you say you have not quite made up your mind yet, you mean to decide soon, but you want to enjoy yourself a little first, and you can't enjoy life when you give up the world and become a true Christian—"a Christian can't enjoy life," that's the Devil's lie red hot from Hell—just what the devils in the maniac of Gadara said to our Lord—"art thou come to torment us?" as if He who came down and gave His life and death to make us happy, could possibly come to torment you! Every time you allow that thought, you are flinging an insult into the face of your God. "These things have I spoken unto you," saith He, "that your joy might be full." Ask the Christian men you know, whether they are not happy. I know which has been the happiest half of my own life—the first part, the half-lived part of wordly pleasure, or the last twenty-five years since my eyes were opened. Oh he loves to make people happy, He's a happy God. If the devil says he can make you happy by lust, or sin, or wordly delights, he deceives you. So do not be cheated by this cry, face the question now, and make up your mind to come straight to Him, and offer yourself to be His soldier as long as you live. He will accept you as you are, He will ask no questions as to your past life, he knows it already. Thank God, when a man takes the Queen's shilling as a recruit, no questions are asked as to character, in most regiments, at any rate, if only certain conditions are fulfilled, and he is of the standard required. God's standard is a six foot one. And the six feet are six letters—S-I-N-N-E-R,—blessed be His name, He will take you just as you are, and clothe you, and more—go with you to the fight. He is infinite in love, hear what he says, "Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

May it be through His infinite mercy that those of you who have come in here perhaps just from curiosity, may now, as we kneel in prayer, or when you come to kneel by your bed-side to-night, give yourselves up wholly to your loving gracious Master, the Mighty Captain of Salvation, who will lead you through the battle of this life, to serve Him for ever in the golden streets with all the enlarged capabilities we shall then have.

Oh brother, be on the winning side, for Christ "must reign till He hath put all enemies under His feet."

My heart's desire for you—nay, I need not talk of my desire—it is His desire for you that you may make this choice now. "Believe on the LORD JESUS CHRIST and thou shalt be saved."

After a short prayer by the Rev. J. Barton, M.A., Rector of Holy Trinity, a bright hymn—"Stand up, stand up, for Jesus," was heartily sung by the immense body of University men, who had listened with rapt attention for an hour.

We are happy to be able to state that Mr. Blackwood has, at our request, sent down pamphlets written by him, for gratuitous distribution among members of the University, which can be had by application to Mr. Johnson, Trinity Street.

CAMBRIDGE ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY.

At the General Meeting of this Society on Monday, 16th of February, 1880, Professor HUGHES (President) in the Chair,

Mr. W. W. CORDEAUX exhibited three British coins lately found near Caistor in North Lincolnshire. Of these the first was of base silver and of the Channel Island type; the second of bronze, and struck by the Brigantes; the third was of the "horseman" type of Constantius, and is a barbarian copy of the Roman coin.

In the absence of Dr. W. R. GROVE, Mr. LEWIS exhibited and commented on a bronze figure of Mercury 2½ inches long, found about four years ago in a field between Fenstanton and Conington; and probably of Gallic or even of Romano-British workmanship.

Dr. GROVE contributed also a small terra-cotta head dug up last year on Mr. Osborn Daintree's land at Fenstanton.

Prof. HUGHES and Mr. JENKINSON offered a preliminary report on some recent explorations at Great Chesterford, and exhibited a few of the specimens discovered. Some workmen employed in the gravel pit near the mill at Great Chesterford, about the commencement of last Long Vacation, came upon what appears to have been a kiln.

The top had been broken away at an early period, and the burnt plaster and stones lay at various levels among the other rubbish that filled the chamber. This showed that it had been used as a refuse pit for bones, broken pottery, and used up household things of various kinds during the Roman period.

The writers added:—

The great interest of the discovery lies in this, that we had an opportunity of investigating for ourselves all the objects associated together in one refuse pit, and so probably referable to one period, and obviously belonging to one locality. We are apt to lose sight of the fact that the Roman occupation of this country extended over several centuries, and that therefore we may look for many changes in the fashion of the objects of every day life, but we are not aware of any systematic investigations having been carried on with a view to illustrate this point. Opportunities such as will probably not recur have been allowed to pass away. We have, however, got sufficient evidence to show that this line of enquiry promises well.

The Roman bricks built into the walls show that the pit is not pre-Roman, and the rubbish cannot have been thrown into it earlier than the dates of the latest of the following coins, of which the first two were found by Mr. Jenkinson, the third by Mr. Digues la Touche, and the fourth by one of the workmen in our presence.

1. 2nd brass of Magnentius (A.D. 303—353).
2. 3rd brass of Valentinianus (A.D. 364—375).
2. Victorinus (A.D. 265).
4. A 1st brass, with a Roman head, legend worn out.

Among the bones we recognised the following animals:—

Ox (Bos longifrons). It is interesting to note that among the large number of bones of ox which have been found with Roman remains in the neighbourhood of Cambridge, we have yet found no evidence of Bos primigenius, although it occurred commonly in the fens in neolithic times. The horn cores show considerable variation, beyond what might be attributed to difference of age and sex, and would suggest domestication. How easily the horn core is modified will be understood by those who remember that the Galloway polled cattle dropped their horns in obedience to artificial selection in about half a century, the core going first. Horse. The bones of the horse are broken, and occur scattered among the other bones, as if it had been used for food. It is a small breed. Possibly the ass is also represented. Sheep. A small breed with horns like Welsh ewes. Whether the rams had curled horns we have no evidence. Red deer. We have no evidence of the red deer having been used for food. We have recognised only portions of the antler, some of which seem to have been fashioned into instruments of various kinds. Pig. Of various sizes, and probably all domesticated. Dog. There are two breeds, which fairly represent forms pictured in relief on some Roman ware. A small strongish-jawed animal like a fox terrier, and a larger animal with a jaw between that of a wolf and a greyhound, but considerably smaller. There were also some bones of puppies or fox-cubs. Cat. We have found the remains of two cats, but Prof. Boyd Dawkins has not been able to tells us whether wild or domestic. The domestic cat, well known in Egypt, is said to have been long kept by the Romans, but I believe there is no clear evidence of its introduction by them into this country. Of the marten cat we have never found any trace with Roman remains. Poultry. The common fowl, often with spurs, as we have found in many other Roman rubbish pits. Duck. Rare.

The pottery may be grouped under many heads, but a full description of it and of the potter's marks we reserve for a future occasion. There was a large coarse ware including amphoras and a multitude of smaller vessels, and a large thick-rimmed open-mouthed vessel often ornamented with fine lines. We have never seen an ornamented amphora. There was a great variety of rough red or black or grey vessels, plain or with horizontal lines on the shoulder, probably a local ware. Fragments of a fine close-textured black or grey ware were found, sometimes ornamented with lines traced on the unbaked clay. Perhaps this may have been imported from Upchurch, or imitated from Upchurch ware. Very beautiful specimens of Durobrivian pottery occurred all through with floral devices and hunting scenes in relief. Drinking cups with pinched-in sides and sometimes a metallic lustre and sometimes a pattern in relief were not uncommon. There were several mortaria, some of them with the potter's mark clearly stamped on the rim. The Samian was unfortunately very fragmentary, but we succeeded in restoring some interesting pieces. There is a great variety of form and ornamentation, exhibiting hunting scenes, vine leaves, and the common romanesque kind of line and loop band. We have many shewing the potter's mark. Some fragments of yellow ware with coloured bands and lines suggest commerce with the islands of the Mediterranean.

Bricks and tiles. There were fragments of Roman bricks and flanged tiles built into the walls of the kilns or rarely scattered through the earth in the kiln and other pits at Chesterford. These would not form part of ordinary household rubbish; but it seemed to be the custom to cover the layers of bones and rejected portions of animals with earth and sand, and some of the curious and unexpected objects which occurred in the kiln may have been thrown in with this earth. We learn, however, that the debris of destroyed houses were lying about; whether they pulled down old buildings and erected better, or whether fire or sword had swept through the Romanized village, who can now tell? It seems probable that the village was extending in the direction of the kiln, for we found a human jaw thrown in with one of the layers of earth. This we explain on the supposition that the pits and kiln were dug on ground where at an earlier period interments had taken place.

Among the miscellaneous objects found we may enumerate a bone comb; a bronze object resembling a surgeon's probe; a bronze bracelet; perforated discs of lead and of pottery, formed by chipping round fragments of the flatter portions of broken vessels; unperforated discs of pottery; bone pins, perhaps for fastening the dress or hair, or perhaps for ornamenting the pottery; hones; a roughly cut chalk box; fragments of glass, some highly ornamented; a spindle-whorl; nails and charred wood, and many small objects of unknown use.

A fuller report, with illustrations of the pottery and various objects found in this and other Roman stations in the neighbourhood of Cambridge, is promised for some future occasion.

The first of the series of Wednesday Popular Concerts was given last Wednesday, February 18. We are glad to see a good promise of attendance, as the limited space of the small room at the Guildhall was occupied to the utmost. The first piece was Mozart's Trio in E flat for pianoforte, clarinet and viola, played by Messrs. C. V. Stanford, Galpin, and Crichton. The trio was was well rendered throughout, and we must especially compliment Mr. Crichton on his rendering of the viola part, which, particularly in the trio, is far from easy. His tone was excellent throughout, and we must congratulate the musical society on a new acquisition. Mr. Wing next sang two of Brahm's "Romanzen aus Magelne," Nos. IV and V, and subsequently Handel's song "Droop not young lover." Brahm's songs are both very difficult, but were rendered by Mr. Wing with much spirit, though we are of opinion that his voice is heard to more advantage in the graver style of Handel. The song 'Droop not,' we presume from one of the operas, is a fine song, and seemed to be a favourite with the audience.

Mr. Stanford played as pièce de résistance Bach's Suite Anglaise in G minor, which contains the well-known Gavotte with its Musette trio to be found nearly in every book of popular selections from Bach's piano works. We could only wish that the whole work were as well-known; the Sarabande especially being full of grace and melody.

The interest of the evening naturally centred on Mr. Stanford's Three Intermezzi, (M.S.S.) for clarinet and piano, which were played for the first time. The first is andante espressivo, varied by a scherzo interlude, and pleased us better than either of the other two; the melody is beautiful, and very cleverly varied with the other motion, the close in slow time echoing the quicker movement very gracefully. The second (allegro agitato) did not strike us so much, but the third (allegretto scherzando) shows again to great advantage Mr. Stanford's power of melody. The arpeggio chords forming the second subject contrast well with the first part, and are skilfully accompanied by the clarinet. We need not say that the new work had an efficient rendering in the hands of Mr. Galpin and the composer. In the low register, particularly at the end of the second of the three pieces Mr. Galpin's tone seemed to us remarkably good, and all through he mastered well the difficulties of his part, which must be considerable. The next concert, which is to take place this evening, is to be the occasion of the first appearance of Herr Gompertz, the new violinist, who will play Brahm's Sonata in G major for pianoforte and violin, and other violin solos.

POETRY.

WITH THEIR OWN WEAPONS.

"Dactylics call'st thou them? God help thee, silly one!" Canning.

Muses—O list! of the isle that is set like a pearl in the ocean;
White in a circlet of blue; list, native Muses of England,
Whether on fell or in field, by mere or in valley rejoicing,
Or on the crest of a star-kiss'd hill in the bosom of Heaven
Most ye delight to be found: no tribute of melody bring I
Fit to be laid at your feet; but a groaning tortured language,
Feet with spondees bound, and chafing in dactylic hand-cuffs.
Was't not enough that our bards, from Caedmon to Chaucer and onwards,
Leaving the trumpet of Vergil alone, and the thunder of Homer,
Sang of a land as dear to the Nine and to Freedom as Hellas,— Sang in their own free-tongue;—not enough that Spenser and Milton
Caught up the chimes of the Past, with the Present in harmony blending,
Chimes of the old old times, ringing over the fogs of the ages,
Muffled and broken chimes,—like Echo to Echo replying,
Rolling away in the distant hills, and dreamily dying:—
Was't not enough?—but of poets a pitiless race hath arisen,
Heavily learnéd, a race undaunted by failure of others,
Loosing the reins of their souls in a riot of fanciful numbers,—
Know ye yourselves trick'd out, like a modern young lady of fashion
Dress'd in an ancient chiton hunation buckle and top-knot?
Nor had they failed of success, if success could attend such an effort:
Longfellow, Kingsley has tried,—what measure has Longfellow not tried?—
Kingsley of Andromade, of Evangeline Longfellow singing:
Pretty the tale, pretty poetry too, fresh flow'ry oases
Sweetly relieving the eye; but, alas! for the versification, Drearily creaking along like a wagon that wanted a wheel greased.
Cease we further to moan:—not the heedless laugh of a stranger
Startling the streets of the dead;—not mirth at a funeral gathering
Better assorts with still sad death, and the tears of the mourners
Mourning the lost;—not the slipper of her who nightly her ashes
Changed for the arms of a prince, fit better the feet of her sisters
Cruelly reckless of heels and of toes, than such rhythm to English.

THE UNIVERSITY PULPIT:

SUPPLEMENT TO

The Cambridge Review.

No. 13. WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1880.

Sermon by the Rev. J. B. MAYOR, M.A., St. John's College.
Sunday, Feb. 22, 1880.

1 Cor. ix. 25 "Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible."

The results we arrived at last Sunday were as follows:—Self-denial to a certain extent is a practical necessity. We cannot live without it. It is a main part of education, and is forced upon us by every day's experience. If we are not content with this, but seek further to know the reasons for our actions, and to learn from philosophy the limits within which we should practice self-denial, we have one philosophy telling us that the end of life is to make the most of it from a subjective point of view, to energize to the full, to educate and develop to their highest pitch our sensibilities and our active powers, and to keep them in constant and various exercise. Whatever self-denial is needful for this end is good, whatever is opposed to it is bad. Another philosophy makes our aim objective, the production of the greatest amount of happiness to mankind in general, and bids us subordinate our own private pleasure to this end. A third bids us put aside the thought of pleasure or happiness altogether, as things which are either unworthy the attention of a reasonable being, or else are unattainable, so that to pursue them could be productive only of disappointment and unrest. It tells us that the one end of life is to act in accordance with the dictates of reason, and that the necessary means to this is absolute self-mastery and detachment from external things.

While pointing out what appeared to me defects in these several views of life, I said that we might learn from the first that man's nature was given him not to stunt or crush, but to develop; from the second that self-denial must be regarded as a means to an end, not as in itself an end, and that the end should have reference to men in general, not to ourselves alone; but that there was something which seemed to appeal to a higher part of our nature in the language of the third, when it bid us discard the thought of pleasure altogether, and aim at a single-hearted obedience to the call of duty.

Perhaps the following sketch of the results of a liberal education, drawn by one of the greatest teachers of our age, may be taken as embodying the best that philosophy can offer in this matter, provided that we add to it a more distinct recognition of the Utilitarian and Stoic doctrine, that the highest work of the individual is to promote the happiness and the improvement of mankind in general. 'That man,' we are told, 'is rightly educated who has been so trained in youth that his body is the ready servant of his will, and does with ease and pleasure all the work that, as a mechanism, it is capable of; whose intellect is a clear cold logic-engine, with all its parts of equal strength and in full working order; whose mind is stored with a knowledge of the great and fundamental truths of nature and of the laws of her operations (understanding by nature not merely things and their forces, but men and their ways); one who, no stunted ascetic, is full of life and fire, but whose passions are trained to come to heel by a vigorous will, the servant of a tender conscience; who has learnt to love all beauty, whether of nature or art, to hate all vileness, and to respect others as himself.' Truly a noble ideal of education, one that teachers of all classes may well take to heart; yet still we may ask 'is it complete?' We need not, of course, assume that it is irreligious, because it makes no distinct mention of religion, any more than we need assume that the philosophic systems, which we considered, must of necessity be antagonistic to religion. Such systems may be combined in larger or smaller proportions with almost any form of religion; but they may also be, and, as a matter of fact, they frequently are opposed to religion. And what I wish to do now is to compare together the effects on self-denial of the Christian religion on one side, and of the best non-religious systems on the other.

If we take, as the essence of the religious view of life, the belief that the universe is directed by a perfectly good and wise Being, who has placed man upon this earth for a few short years, in order to train him for a higher immortal life hereafter; then the essence of the opposite or non-religious view will be contained in the belief, that all existence is merely a bubble on the ocean of eternal nothingness, the individual man a smaller and frailer bubble, but the existence of a nation of humanity itself, of this earth, of the universe as a whole, a bubble also, larger and more durable it is true, but still only a bubble, doomed after a while to disappear like the rest. Or if, instead of the ocean of eternal nothingness, we substitute a seething sea of atoms, which give rise to all the phenomena of the universe by their accidental combinations; we do little more than change our metaphor, as long as, in dealing with the fashionable entities of modern scholasticism, struggle for existence, natural selection, and the rest, we guard against the tacit introduction of the anthropomorphic idea of an infinite reason, planning all things from the beginning, and conducting all things to the best end.

Let us consider, then, what difference it would make to one who really believed that there was no future life and no God, or to one who believed that it was impossible to arrive at any certain conclusions on these points, and then, by a strange inconsistency, argued that therefore he was justified in acting as though atheism were certainly true—let us consider, I say, what difference it would make, if such an one became convinced that this life is only a lower preparatory stage of existence, which cannot be fully understood any more than other preparatory stages, until we reach the higher stage for which it is a preparation; that the feelings and ideas which are connected in our minds with the terms 'good,' 'just,' 'right,' are not merely the prejudices or instincts of a particular species of animal, analogous to the instincts which others have for choosing and catching their prey, for building their nests, for hibernation or migration, but that they are the ideas which actuate and guide the infinite power which we must confess to be outside of us; that, when we with pain strive to do what we believe to be just, to control resentment or passion, we are not merely preferring a weaker animal instinct to a stronger, but are acting in accordance with the law of the moral universe, which is elsewhere obeyed perfectly even now, and will hereafter be obeyed universally; that no good effort is wasted, that no struggle for right can ever be ultimately defeated, whether in the individual soul or in the world at large, because God inspires it, God will use it, God will reward it, both here and hereafter.

Let us think a little how such a change of view will alter the inducements to self-denial. We saw last Sunday that the philosophies of pleasure, of utility, of right, all demanded a certain amount of self-denial from their disciples, but that the great difficulty with all was the want of hope and of stirring power. "You bid me strive to develop my whole nature so as to experience every variety of consciousness, and this you tell me is the life best worth living. But I find the training exceedingly irksome; I see pleasures within my reach, which you tell me I must forego for some fine transcendental pleasures, for which I am not sure that I have any capacity, and the attainment of which requires a combination of fortunate circumstances which may never fall to my lot. You do not pretend that I am under any positive obligation to seek these high ecstasies of superior souls; I shall therefore use my right as a free man, and select the lower and nearer gratifications which I understand and of which I can make sure." Such is the answer which ordinary human nature makes to the appeal of the philosophy of pleasure. And the answer to the utilitarian appeal will be in many respects the same, in so far as utilitarianism makes the attainment of our own individual pleasure the inducement to aim at the general happiness. But the better sort of utilitarianism appeals to higher motives. It calls out the generous and sympathetic part of our nature, and bids each man act for the happiness of others, as being intrinsically good, without any thought of the happiness resulting to the agent. But here another difficulty arises. If this life is all, what certainty have I that my action will contribute to the general happiness, except in so far as I abstain from positive unkindness? And is the general happiness which I can conceive practicable here, an end for which it is possible to feel any strong enthusiasm? Perhaps some far-off future may realise some higher ideal of life, such as would scare away the pessimistic fancies which haunt us now. But what security is there for a continued advance? Why may not the social and political changes of modern days be to our present civilization what the incursion of the barbarians was to the ancient? Or if growing science still continues to advance material civilization, is that any guarantee for the increase of individual intelligence and virtue, and consequent happiness? Even if there is a continual advance in the highest qualities, what is it all to end in? Before the progress is complete the human race may have become extinct, or in any case it must one day become extinct, and the result of all this long laborious upstriving be lost for ever to the universe.

Then consider, lastly, the philosophy of right, which calls upon us to act up to our ideal, and to strive to ennoble human nature. I have said that, though the demand is more exacting, yet the appeal here is probably more powerful than in the former cases. Nevertheless all earnest experience bears witness to the words, 'the good that I would I do not; the evil that I would not, that I do.' The more sublime the aspiration, the more painful is the consciousness of falling below it. If a man has only himself to depend upon, and only the few short years of life on earth to work in, he must have but a poor ideal, and small insight into his own heart, who can be sanguine and hopeful as to the issue. The reflexion that 'it will be all the same a hundred years hence' has probably often contributed to a Stoic endurance of suffering and disappointment, but it is equally efficacious in checking any disposition to undergo protracted and self-denying toil for the sake of a distant and uncertain result. But let the horizon be widened from time to eternity, from earth to heaven; let a man once feel that this is but the earliest rudimentary stage of an endless progress, endless for the individual as well for the race; that he is here but, as it were, an embryo with an embryo's vague fore-feelings of a higher life to come, fore-feelings which he is not to check and discourage as mere idle fancies, but to encourage and develop to the utmost, as that which belongs most truly to his permanent nature; that, according to the great words of Aristotle, though in a sense higher than Aristotle gave to them, it is not man's duty θνητὸν ὄντα θνητὰ φρονεῖν, to limit himself within the range of this mortal existence, but as far as possible ἀθανατίζειν, to think and feel as an immortal —if man becomes conscious that this is his birthright, what a light and glory it sheds over the dark places of life, what courage, what power, what strength against temptation, when we know that each trial bravely endured, each difficulty and temptation overcome, is a step gained in an eternal ascent, not so much of suffering abstracted from the brief possibilities of happiness offered to us in our three score years and ten!

What I have just said has reference to the motive of hope, but no one who has thought seriously about life, or has any real knowledge of human nature, can ever dream that hope will do all. Deterrents are needed as well as encouragements; and if in this life only we have fear, what is to deter men from a course of decent selfishness? 'Every man,' you say, 'has finer emotions.' True, but every man has strong temptations to stifle these; and fear of punishment, i.e. of the evil consequences which attend misconduct, is often a necessary, and always a useful, ally to these better emotions. If the evil consequences are limited to this life, the more palpable of these, judicial punishment, bodily disease, general adverse opinion, may be warded off by prudence, while the higher and more impalpable, such as the serving of the conscience, the hardening of the heart, the loss of sympathetic power,—these are liable to be disregarded in moments of passion, and are indeed hardly understood by the coarser natures. How different is the deterrent force, if every act, word, and thought are open to the gaze of an all-wise and all-just ruler, by whose ordinance it comes, not only that misconduct is followed by suffering here, but that vice is in itself misery, and will be recognized as such by all in the clearer light of the life to come; that misery therefore must continue as long as vice itself continues, and even afterwards, in so far as the once diseased soul must continue to bear about with it the marks and scars of its previous condition!

That the motives of hope and fear are immensely strengthened by religion, is universally acknowledged, though the true nature of religious hopes and fears has been constantly misrepresented and misunderstood both by religious and by non-religious writers. But it is an entire mistake to speak as if these were the only, or the chief, motives made use of by religion. Infinitely stronger than any fear of consequences, stronger than hope, though inseparably combined with it, is the motive of love with its attendant emotions, gratitude, reverence, loyalty, desire to please, fear to grieve or pain the great object of a Christian's love, the universal Father, whose presence fills all nature, and who has manifested himself more fully in the person of His Son, the head and crown of our race, living and dying on earth for us, and now dwelling within the heart of each by His Holy Spirit. Subordinate to this, yet of no small power to comfort and to encourage is the thought of the great cloud of witnesses, whose sympathising eyes are turned upon those who seek to follow in their steps, and fight the good fight of faith, more especially the dear memory of those whom we have ourselves loved and lost, the father, the mother, the friend, the wife, the child, safe gathered from the storms of this troublesome world, and watching with an anxious longing for our reunion above.

Yet even this is not all. Strong as these motives are, Christianity offers to man a help beyond all motives, a help which is indeed the root and foundation of them all, the indwelling power of the Holy Spirit. Bacon has well said that God is to man, what man is to the dog, a melior natura, whose companionship inspires him with a generosity and courage above his own; and it is on this ground especially that he condemns atheism, because it deprives human nature of the means to exalt itself above human frailty. And yet this is only a small part of what Christians mean by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. We mean by it to express our belief in the fact of a higher spiritual presence within us, warning, reproving, guiding, comforting, purifying; suggesting holy thoughts, kindling a fire of holy love, and therefore it is we pray, 'cleanse the thoughts of our hearts by the inspiration of thy Holy Spirit,' and ask that 'by His holy inspiration we may think those things that be good.'

We may take it then as an undoubted fact that Christianity does make a vast difference as regards self-denial, by strengthening and multiplying the motives which dispose us to submit to it, and by infusing into each man a higher nature, offering a divine help which tends to make self-denial easy and delightful. Atheistic philosophy is always oscillating between a one-sided optimism and a one-sided pessimism. It begins by condemning religion as harsh and gloomy and austere, and represents happiness and virtue as things easily attainable by all, so easily indeed that they would be universal even now, were it not for the sinister influence of bad laws. Then comes the stage of disillusion; first as to happiness, it is confessed that, if this is ever to be attained, it can only be by the self-sacrifice of the elect of the earth, who are to labour disinterestedly for the elevation of the race; then, in the next stage of disillusion, comes the doubt as to the possibility of such high-pitched resolution, the conviction that, even in the best, there are moments of weakness, or rather that their weakness is a constant, their strength a variable element; that they cannot trust to themselves to struggle for ever without hope, that here the grounds for hope are wanting, that human life and the world are a hopeless enigma. Christianity alone is able to dispense with illusions and to look facts in the face. Christianity alone can view with steadfast gaze the physical and moral evils of the present, because it views them in the light of the future. The world is evil as you say, man is as weak as you say, life is as hopeless as you say, if the world and men are left to themselves, if there is nothing beyond and nothing above. But to us Christians that which is beyond and above is the great reality, which, though it does not clear away every shadow from life, opens to us infinite possibilities for hope, because we believe that the universe is under the dominion of Him who is infinite love, and that the time will come when every enemy shall be put down, and God shall be all in all.

But does Christianity, which so much increases our power to endure self-denial, make any alteration in our conception of the nature of self-denial? Does it turn it from a means into an end, or condemn pleasure as being in itself evil?

Before answering this I will advert for a moment to another consideration, which distinguishes the self-denial of the believer from that of the unbeliever. Men submit to self-denial either deliberately, on grounds of reason, because they think it right or expedient, or else impulsively, because the motive to indulgence is driven out and swept away by a stronger antagonistic motive. If the sphere of duty is enlarged, the sphere of self-denial is enlarged also; if the end of life is changed, there will be a change also in the means by which it is to be attained. I have already spoken of the difference of the ends, respectively set before themselves by the Agnostic and by the Christian. The effect which this difference must have upon their lives in shown in such words as these: "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven,' 'here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come,' 'I beseech you as strangers and pilgrims, abstain from fleshly lusts which war against the soul.' Again, while the Agnostic recognizes a comparatively superficial duty to man alone, the Christian recognises besides a paramount and exhaustless duty to God. 'Whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God,' 'thou shalt love the Lord with all thy heart and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength.' And the Gospel, while it represents the fulfilment of this duty as the highest perfection and happiness of man, never puts it forward as a matter of easy attainment. On the contrary, the strongest forms of speech are used to give us an idea of its difficulty. We are to 'strive to enter in at the strait gate,' we are to 'take up our cross and follow Christ,' to 'die to sin and rise again to righteousness.' Let us look at this more in detail. The secret of the Christian's strength is faith, the sight of Him who is invisible. But to maintain this faith in vigour, much self-denial is required. With the Christian, as with other men, what is out of sight is in danger of being out of mind: and strong resolution and steady perseverance are needed to overcome this tendency. It is here we shall find the chief difference between the self-denial of the Christian and that even of the most philanthropic of Agnostics. Every Christian holds himself bound to devote a portion of his time to deepen in his mind the consciousness of the relation in which he stands to God and to his fellow-men. Whether it is easy or difficult, whether his heart rises naturally upwards, or seems to him to cling heavily to the earth, he holds it equally his duty to bring his joys and his sorrows, his hopes and his fears, his plans, his thoughts, and his wishes, all that is bad in him and all that is good in him, and spread them out in the sight of God, that so viewing them in the light of heaven, he may himself come to see them as God sees them; that he may learn patience, resignation, hope, fulness, charity, hatred of sin, desire of holiness, that thus by constant communion he may grow in the knowledge and love of God, and may become more sensitive to the signs of the Divine presence in the world around him, and to the whispers of the still small voice in his own heart. Then again, besides the self-denial which is thus deliberately chosen, there is the self-denial which is impulsive. It was no thought either of duty or of expediency, which prompted David's refusal to drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem, when his soldiers brought it to him at the hazard of their lives. So it was neither duty nor expediency, which caused St. Paul to rejoice that he was allowed to share in the sufferings of Christians: it was that delight to which none of us can be entirely strangers, the delight of sacrificing something for a friend, and so giving a deeper utterance to our affection and as it were realizing it to ourselves.

I return now to the question which I asked before: Must not a change like this, in the scope of self-denial necessitate a change also in our conception of self-denial? Can we still attach any value to the conclusions we arrived at in viewing the question from the moral side exclusively? If this world is of such little worth, as compared with the next, if its pleasures are like snares in the path which leads to the better world, if our affections are to be set on things above, if we are to crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts, does it not seem as if man's nature and the world around, existed only to be renounced and eradicated, and were altogether incapable of receiving the Divine blessing? It cannot be denied that ascetic views of this kind have prevailed among Christians as among the followers of other religions. The pillar-saints and Flagellants, the monks and hermits of Christendom, have rivalled the fakirs and dervishes of the East in their insane austerities, partly, no doubt, from a wish to make themselves conspicuous, to impress the crowd with admiration of their superior holiness; but partly also from religious motives, from a hatred of sin in themselves, and a desire to punish and weaken the flesh, which they regarded as the sect of the sinful principle, and from a belief that self-torture was in itself meritorious, and would help to procure them a higher place in heaven. Similarly, among Protestants, the puritanical spirit, while disclaiming any idea of merit attaching to self-denial, asserts, in the strongest terms, the total depravity of human nature, and condemns all the common enjoyments of life as worldly and ungodly. Even among ourselves at the present day we find traces of both these forms of asceticism. On the one hand there is the tendency, gradually disappearing it is true, but still widely influential, and influential in unsuspected ways, to look with suspicion upon all amusements, and on all but a very limited class of activities. On the other hand, there is the sentimental revival of mediæval practices, the exaltation of the ecclesiastical 'counsels of perfection,' chastity, poverty, and obedience, as they are technically understood, into a higher class of virtues. In both ways Christianity is discredited with the world at large, and set in opposition to a wider view of human nature, such as we find, for instance, in Shakespeare. The question then is, which is the truer form of Christianity, ascetic Christianity in either of its developments, puritanic or monastic, or, what we may call, Shakesperian Christianity? Which is most in accordance with the general teaching of the Bible? And first, as to the relation in which man and nature stand to God, we read 'in the beginning God created the heaven and the earth,' 'God created man in His own image,' 'God saw that all was very good.' Nor is the divine image represented as lost in the fall, for after the fall we find it stated, as a reason for the sacredness of human life, that "in the image of God made he man," and St. Paul even appeals to it as a ground for determining the details of Christian worship, "the man, he says, "should be uncovered, because he is the image and glory of God." And though all nature is, as the same apostle tells us, groaning and travailing together for the coming redemption, yet our Lord Himself, unlike the ordinary Jewish teachers, loved to dwell upon the various aspects of nature in his parables, and bade his disciples note and ponder the wonders and beauties of creation: and St. Paul repeats again and again the exultant words of the Psalmist, "the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof," using them with express reference to the asceticism of his own time.

Perhaps we may sum up the teaching of the Bible as to asceticism under four heads. In the first place, whilst it is everywhere asserted that the Christian life is a warfare, that we must be sober and vigilant, that, "if the eye offends, we must pluck it out and cast it from us, because it is profitable for us that one of our members should perish, rather than that our whole body should be cast into hell," that is to say, because moral purity is more to be valued than aesthetic perfection, if we are compelled to make our choice between the two,—yet it is no where hinted that such a mutilation of our nature is in itself good, or other than what may perhaps be a necessary, though painful, means of obtaining a higher end. We never find the ascetic disposition reckoned among the fruits of the Spirit, nor do ascetic practices form a prominent portion of the Christian's armour. The virtues and duties upon which our Lord and His apostles lay stress are the virtues and duties of every-day life, which are supposed indeed to have their root in the inner Christian life, but which are continually contrasted with claims to merit, based on strict religious orthodoxy or obedience to rule. Thus the publican is accepted before the pharisee; thus our Lord warns men that "not every one that saith unto me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven," and makes the final division between the sheep and the goats, depend on the performance or omission of acts of kindness and compassion; and St. Paul exhorts the genuine feeling of kindness beyond any amount of self-denial or spiritual attainment, "though I speak with the tongues of men and angels, though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing." Secondly, the Bible gives very distinct warning against the dangers of asceticism, as St. Paul in the epistle to the Colossians, against their ἐθελοθρησκεία and ἀφείδεια σώματος, "why are ye subject to ordinances, touch not, taste not, handle not;" and in the first epistle to Timothy, where forbidding to marry and commanding to abstain from meats, "which God has appointed to be received with thanksgiving," are condemned as doctrines of devils. On the other hand the Gospel is described as "the perfect law of liberty"; the Galatians are bidden to "stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made them free," and again in the first epistle to Timothy, we are told that "every creature is good, if received with thanksgiving," and that "God has given us all things richly to enjoy." So we have the contrast between the fastings thrice in the week, the strict observance of the sabbath, and the other heavy burdens imposed by the scribes, and the easy burden and light yoke to which Christ calls his disciples, the principles which He has laid down, that the sabbath is made for man and not man for the sabbath, that it is only when the bridegroom is taken away, that the children of the bride-chamber should mourn. Thirdly, while it is broadly stated that "wisdom is justified of all her children," that is, that Christianity allows scope and room for every variety of dispposition and character, and indeed needs this variety in order that "the whole body of the church may be fitly joined together by that which every joint supplieth"; while, therefore, we are not required to force ourselves into an unnatural mould, but rather to develop each man his own special nature, and use to the best his special faculties, in dependence upon Him who gave them; and while it is fully granted that there are characters and circumstances, to which the severer discipline is appropriate, yet it is important to bear in mind, that when the common life and the ascetic life are contrasted in the Gospel, it is the Son of Man who comes eating and drinking, sharing in the marriage feast, accused by his enemies of being a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber; while of the great ascetic it is said that the least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he. Lastly, though we hear much of the uses of affliction, as the chastisement and correction of a loving Father, teaching sympathy and weaning us from too great love of the present world, though we are told to take up our cross and even to rejoice in tribulation, yet we are never told to make our cross for ourselves, or to expose ourselves unnecessarily to tribulation. In this, as in all else, our Lord Himself is our example. Tribulation, when it comes, is the cup which our Father has given us to drink, but before it comes we may pray, as nature directs, that, if it be possible, the cup may pass from us.

Such I believe to be a fair statement of the general teaching of Scripture on this subject: but there are undoubtedly isolated passages which seem to favour more the ascetic view, as that "the whole world lieth in wickedness," "behold I was shapen in inquity," "we are by nature the children of wrath." And such pasages have sometimes been allowed to obscure the more hopeful view which pervades the Bible as a whole. It is an unfortunate legacy which has come down to us from the scholasticism of the Middle Ages, that the passionate expression of highly-wrought feeling, which is so common in the Bible, has been treated, as if it were meant for so many logical definitions, and been stiffened accordingly, into precise formularies of doctrine. Thus, in the article on "Works before Justification," it is said, that such works are not pleasant to God, but have the nature of sin; and in the Catechism we are taught to say, that "we are born in sin and children of wrath." No doubt there is a truth which underlies these words. It is true that something beyond impulse is wanted for virtue, that the instinctive human nature, if unchecked, runs of itself into sin; and it is true that every good action done by man is done in and by the Spirit of Christ working in him, and therefore it is verbally accurate to say, that "no action done before the grace of Christ and the inspiration of His Spirit is pleasing to God." But what the language of these formularies naturally suggests is, that new-born infants are objects of aversion to Him who made them, and that none but baptized—some would add, converted—christians, have ever acted so as to please Him,—doctrines which are not only opposed to common sense and common morality, but to the plain teaching of the Bible, as the Baptismal Service reminds us, how our Saviour Christ declared his good-will toward children and exhorteth all men to follow their innocency, and as in the Acts we are taught that "in every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted by Him," and in the epistle to the Romans that, among the Gentiles which have not the law, there are some who "do by nature the thing contained in the law," and that "glory, honour and peace, will be rendered to every man that worketh good, to the Jew first and also to the Gentile."

But it is time for me to close. I have slightly departed from my main subject, the consideration of the practical effect of Christianity, as compared with non-religious systems, in stimulating and strengthening the moral nature, in order to notice certain erroneous views which have grown up around the true Christian belief, and impeded or distorted its natural action. These erroneous views may be classed together under the name asceticism, if we define that as the system which regards acts of non-moral self-denial, as being either generally obligatory, or meritorious. If the ascetic only claims for himself and for others the right to practise self-denial, beyond what is of directly moral import, as something which experience has shown to be in certain cases expedient and useful, but neither essential nor meritorious; then such a teacher may be wise or unwise, he may have grounds for his opinion or he may not; but he is not guilty of asceticism in the bad sense. The great mischief of wrong ascetism is that it confounds men's ideas of right and wrong, and shuts them up in a little ecclesiastical world of their own, where vice and virtue are thrust into the background by a crowd of imaginary sins and imaginary virtues. Of such a system it may be said, that Christianity has had few more dangerous enemies, whether we regard it in its effect on those who have accepted it or on those who have been repelled by it. Its fundamental ideas of the total corruption of human nature, and the hopeless future of the majority of the human race, have perverted education, poisoned the chief sources of innocent pleasure, fostered a bitter hard pharisaic spirit, estranged its adherents from art and science and philosophy, from all that belongs to human progress as commonly understood, caused them to look with suspicion on any sign of good in the unregenerate world, and with something not unlike a gloomy satisfaction on any facts which tended to prove the impossibility of morality, apart from the profession of their own peculiar doctrines. Take even the noblest representatives of asceticism in its gentler aspects; read the lives of Romish or Mediæval saints, read even such admirable books as the Imitatio Christi or Law's Serious Call; and mixed with much that is beautiful and elevating, what a morbid tone do we find there, what a want of hopefulness and large-mindedness, what a contrast to the teaching of our Lord and of St. Paul! While such is the influence of the system on the minds of its adherents, those who are repelled by it either lose all faith in Christianity, which they identity with it; or else, as happened in England on the overthrow of the Commonwealth, they are in danger of running into the opposite extreme of indulgence and forgetting that watchfulness and self-denial are essential to the Christian life. The majority perhaps consists of those who are alternately attracted and repelled, at one time ready, in their admiration of the spirituality and unworldliness of the ascetics, to surrender up to them their own judgment, to submit to their discipline, and accept blindly their view of life; while at another time, occupied in the performance of active duties, they seem to themselves to be returning to the region of common sense, and throw aside their ascetic fancies as an idle dream. Thus they move in an endless zig-zag with double mind, never able to arrive at a clear harmonious view as a whole. Surely it is not necessary that the vital forces of Christianity should be thus frittered away. It is possible surely for us to combine common sense with religious fervour; in St. Paul's words 'to pray with the Spirit and pray with the understanding also';] it is possible to feel the sacredness of common life, no less than of the religious life; to feel that the work of the student, the actor, the magistrate, the manufacturer, the farmer, may be as much work done for God, as the work of the parish priest or the sister of mercy; that, in a word, whatever work is necessary to carry on the life of the world, is work ordained by the Author and Governor of the world, work in which we may expect God's blessing and show forth His glory. If each of Christians would set ourselves thus to apply to our own lives the faith which we profess, if we would endeavour thus to utilize the talent entrusted to us in the possession of all those motives of which I have spoken, if we would let the light of the glorious Gospel of Christianity thus shine through us, there would be no need to seek anxiously for fresh evidences to confute the doubter. Our lives would be God's epistle, a continued revelation of His nature, known and read to all men. The great evidence of the truth of Christianity is each man's experience of its power in his own heart, just as the evidence for the existence of the sun is our own perception of its warmth and brightness; but as we may sometimes see the reflexion of the sunrise on the western mountains, before he himself appears above the horizon, so the effects of Christianity on the hearts and lives of believers may afford conclusive proof of the reality and power of Christianity, to those who have not yet experienced them for themselves. But the fact is we Christians are too often like misers who live the lives of paupers, with priceless treasures buried in their vaults. It is our failure to use what we profess, which makes scepticism possible. Make your Christianity what it ought to be; let it be felt that each Christian is actuated by a spirit of straightforward honesty, of wide and ready sympathy, of fairness in acting and judging, of gentleness, earnestness, hopefulness, cheerfulness, of faith in God and man; and then, agnosticism having served the purpose for which it was sent, its worse elements will wither away, and die out of themselves, its better elements, which we now repel through our narrowness or lukewarmness, will be drawn again to Christ, their true and natural centre. May this Lent deepen in each of us the conviction of our Christian calling, to be the salt of the earth, the light of the world! May we strive and pray, that in our sphere, whatever it may be, our light may so shine before men that they may see our good works and glorify our Father in heaven!

The Cambridge Review:

A JOURNAL OF UNIVERSITY LIFE AND THOUGHT.

No. 14.] WEDNESDAY, MARCH 3, 1880. [PRICE SIXPENCE.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

The Vice-Chancellor has published a letter received by him from Mr. R. C. Winthrop, Chairman of the Centennial Committee of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, inviting the company of one or more delegates from this University at the celebration by the Academy of its 100th anniversary, on May 26th.

It would seem that the objectors to the proposed union of King's and St. Catharine's are gradually being persuaded to withdraw their opposition. St. Catharine's being a daughter college of King's would do well to acquiesce in setting an example of amalgamation that, once initiated might be followed with advantage by other of the smaller colleges; and we should have the general picturesqueness of Cambridge enhanced by the magnificent frontage that King's, St. Catharine's, and perhaps something in a transition style on the site of the Bull (so as not to make the contrast too startling), would present to the "Railway Traveller" in his "walk through Cambridge."

During the last week a memorial to the Vice-Chancellor has been put into circulation by Mrs. Aldis, dealing with the Higher Education of Women. It claims that recent successes on the part of lady-students "shew that many women desire sound training in higher learning, and also desire to have the results of that training authoritatively tested and certified." It is added that the present system "is unsatisfactory as regards the University, and is liable to cause disappointment to candidates who may be refused admission to Examinations for which they have been working."

This petition is sure to obtain a large number of signatures, but it is not the general opinion that it is wise or opportune. The working of our Tripos system is not so good that it can be put forward as a standard of education suitable to both sexes, and it would be much to be regretted if, for instance, Newnham students should be compelled to adhere strictly to the University course. Again, competition for place produces some very ill effects, and we may hope that it is gradually being abandoned. Any direct participation of women in it is hardly desirable. The question of degrees is less important; probably as they are granted by London they will sooner or later be thrown open by Cambridge also, especially if Cambridge students are found to go to London to obtain them. But this point may safely be left to time.

The two material points are the recognised admission of women to the examinations, and consequent on this, the publishing of their names in an official class-list, or the granting of certificates to them. A memorial to this effect might conciliate a large number of signatures, and would be more likely to have some definite result.

The class list of the Semitic Languages Tripos been published, and contains one well-known name in the first-class. Although this Tripos invites but little competition, it is now some years since it has dropped through, and we believe there are two candidates reading for next year.

It has been decided that the memorial to the late Professor Clerk Maxwell shall consist of (1) a bust, and (2) a collected edition of the Professor's scientific papers. It is also hoped that a portrait in oil may be executed by some approved artist. The names of subscribers will be received by Mr. W. D. Niven, M.A., Trinity, and Mr. W. Garnett, M.A., St. John's. Subscriptions may either be paid to them, or at Messrs. Mortlock and Co's. bank, to the account of the Clerk Maxwell Memorial Fund.

A meeting of the C.U.B.C. was held at the Hoop Hotel, on Friday last. Mr. Prest, Jesus, was re-elected President; and Mr. R. D. Davis, Trinity, secretary. The first night of the May races was fixed for Wednesday, May 19.

The University Athletic Handicaps were run last Thursday and Friday. The performances of Mr. W. W. Hough, of Corpus, have been exceptionally good; and we may hope, next year, if not this, to see Cambridge bearing the palm in the three mile contest.

The Inter-University Rugby Football Match fully realised the expectations formed about it. The teams were unusually strong and well matched, the victory resting with Cambridge by two goals to one.

In consequence of the meeting at the Guildhall in favour of Local Option being held last night, the debate at the Union Society has been postponed to this evening (Wednesday).

Every undergraduate knows amongst the other elementary facts of History that there was once a retired Emperor who spent the last years of his life in endeavouring to reconcile the movement of a number of watches one to another, and that he finally gave up the attempt in despair. But in these days of more advanced science and improved machinery, we think that something might be done to effect a greater unanimity amongst the clocks of the various Colleges. At present it is possible to start from one end of the town at five minutes to a given hour and arrive at the other end at seven minutes to the same given hour, walking at a moderate pace. This phenomenon can hardly, we think, be accounted for in the manner that some one has ingeniously suggested, namely, by the difference of longitude, for the Colleges lie relatively more North and South than East and West. Besides, no formula can be fixed by which to make due allowances for the difference, as it is subject to "diurnal variation."

It is said that an eight-oar race and a cricket match have been arranged for the Long Vacation between the College servants of this University and those of Oxford.

THE CAMBRIDGE REVIEW IN 1824.

It was announced the other day that the theatre of Pompeii would re-open under entirely new management, after being unavoidably closed for eighteen hundred years. Such a notice, absurd as it was, at least paid due recognition to the labours of the dead, and kept alive their memory; but in the title of this Review, this theatre of our world at Cambridge—the work of a former generation may seem unduly passed over.

Any one who consults a certain small volume in the Catalogue of the University Library, will find that the Cambridge Review, xx. 7, 23, already reposes with its faded pages in a crowded and gloomy corner of that haven, among Proceedings of foreign societies and collections of Stuart tracts. Then, too, there is a combined "Cambridge and Oxford Review," but that we need not consider just now. Certainly it may seem a strong ground of complaint against the present journal that it should thus usurp the name of an elder sister; ill-natured people say, it either shows how little Cambridge men know of their annals, or in what straits they were for a name. On the other hand, it can be justly asked in the spirit of the law of Mortmain, why should any such useful thing be appropriated for ever by the act of one man? The original possessors have long since passed away, and in fact the full titles are sufficiently different. There is no attempt to superscribe this one "Commenced in 1824," as old established University tea shops say, nor is there any real danger of confounding it with the old "Cambridge Quarterly Review and Academical Register" of that date.

In looking through these periodicals of a bygone time it is deeply interesting to note the changes time has made in the tone of thought and expression. All is altered since 1824, and few are the names of those who have seen both the building of Ridley, and of the hall of King's College.

A short account of the old "Review" may not be untimely. It is needless to say the plan of the work was different: it forms a very substantial volume, to which the first number contributed 182 pages, not to speak of the Register in a sort of appendix. A grave, Tory, Church and King tone runs throughout, it is the Quarterly written at Cambridge with some little spirit and a good deal of learning. Many of the articles are still most attractive. How could it be otherwise at such a period? Fancy having to give an account in the first six months of new books by Southey, Blunt, Praed, "the great unknown author of Waverley," as he is called, Lord Byron, and J. Montgomery, and of papers read by Whewell, Herschel, and Prof. Sedgwick! What topics they had in the recent Revolution in Greece, the voyage of the Hecla, the doings of Edward Irving, the first institution of the Classical Tripos, and the building at King's, Emmanuel, and the Pitt Press! Then, too, one of the cleverest sets of men Cambridge ever had were just ending their course here. Lord Macaulay and G. B. Airy were that year elected fellows of Trinity, Chief Justice Cockburn took his first class, and Sir T. Watson his M.D., while Lubbock, De Morgan, Baron Cleasby, Dr Kennedy, Maurice, the Archbishop of Armagh, and a score more were among the undergraduate members. There was plenty of matter to write on, and of men to write. It would be strange if they turned out dull papers, when the great reforms which have made this country what it is, were being thought out and discussed. In reading these essays, one is struck by the intense bitterness of party feeling, and what seems the narrowness of their criticisms running through the most scholarly work. Are we less earnest, or less capable of forming clear decided judgments to-day, now that we can talk and write without the personalities and odium Theologicum which for ever crop up in old Cambridge life? Or is the change simply owing to the introduction of railways and the abolition of tests, by which we are made part of a far wider world than formerly?

The Review commenced with an examination of Southey's Book of the Church, which is highly praised at the expense of Dunstan and other "Gothic personages." The article on St. Ronan's Well, then lately published, was written solely for the reading men to give them in a short form the story which as usual every one anxiously looked for. The reviewer transcribes passage after passage with great delight, but feels it necessary for his own dignity at last to talk sternly about the "foolish prating" and false grammar of the tale.

People to-day often feel at a loss to understand fully the life and character of Edward Irving The founder of a powerful though now decreasing sect, and yet a man who raved in a barbarous dialect, he had the strange power of converting the wealthy classes, and of making them believe one of the most extraordinary gospels ever laid before Englishmen. We find here an amusing account of his fervid and eccentric discourses, as they were called. He had been arraigned on seven counts of a sham trial in the court of Common Sense by one of the authors of Rejected Addresses, and our reviewer, after confessing the raw Scotch dominie was a man of no ordinary talent, justified the deprecatory criticism of the author:—"We have read of a bishop in the olden time, who played at shuttlecock in the pulpit in order to fix all eyes upon him: Mr. Irving would do the same if there were no other way of gathering a host around him." Trial, p. 47.

The first volume of the Transactions of the Philosophical Society furnished material for an interesting but very solid paper. The writer began by recalling the Cambridge of a few years before, when they had neither the Fitzwilliam, the Little-go, the Classical Tripos, nor the Philosophical Society. The changes were great, and it was felt that a new future was opening to the University. Already the Philosophical Society had to mourn the loss of one of their founders, Dr. E. D. Clarke, whose life is the subject of a memoir in a subsequent number. He was the first lecturer on Mineralogy in Cambridge, the University Librarian, the inventor of the so-called gas blow-pipe, and a great European traveller.

But to hasten forwards, Godwin's "History of the Commonwealth" comes in for a storm of Tory criticism, which reaches its height which the author relates with gusto the purification of the University by Cromwell. "The Murdered Monarch" and "the Piety of the Clergy" are thrown at the unfortunate Godwin in every other sentence, he is even snubbed for suggesting that Coke was one of the founders of The Commonwealth, by his noble conduct in the case of Peacham. The next paper is on Byron, whose greatness, wickedness, and careless metre, seem to surpass everyone else the reviewer knew of; but the poet died just then, and we are therefore treated to an elegy in postscript. A clever critique on a wretched poet of the neighbourhood is amusing throughout. The following is a sample of his verses:—

> Oh let me stray the hills anear,
> Where once our Shakespeare dwelt;
> Inspire me with the fine ideas
> The bard of Avon felt.

"The Studies of the University" shows the interest taken in the new Tripos, and praises a set of examination papers which the successor of Porson had just published as a guide to intending students. As yet it was an experiment, and previous honours in Mathematics were required from all candidates, a restriction that proved fatal to Macaulay. The question of training Divinity students gives rise to a plea for the establishment of diocesan Theological Colleges for graduates, which has since been carried out to an extent then unexpected. Blaquière's Greek Revolution produced a clear short narrative of the war of freedom, and Captain Parry's journal in the Fury could not fail to be interesting, but the Captain's yarns are prodigious, and seem to stir up the reviewer to rivalry. An etymological connection is suggested between the oyez of the English courts and the oo-yee-oo-yee of the Esquimaux, and their filthy ice huts are compared to the fairy dwellings in Kubla Khan. Still when we are told by the Captain, with tabular statistics, what an average Esquimaux can swallow at once, it is clear the reviewer is distanced.

The second volume shows fewer good subjects; perhaps the best paper is a history of "Metrical Versions of the Psalms," with reference to Maud's translation. A collection of all the choice Psalms from each version, including King James', Addison's, Sternhold's, and the recent ones was said to be needed, and, indeed, a very choice collection might be made. Unfortunately, polemical matter follows in subsequent papers, and the stream soon dried up altogether. Meanwhile a real effort had been made and a thoroughly readable 'Review' turned out, but, like most other Cambridge journals, the changing tide of men left it high and dry on the sands. It seems to me that its success and final decay are not unworthy of consideration at the present time by a new generation.

SPECIALISATION AT CAMBRIDGE.

Specialisation is a word which has already become familiar even to the popular reader of science. To the scientific student it is of the utmost significance, since he sees the necessity of its existence as a product of that evolution which modern research more and more impresses upon him as being of a universal character. Nevertheless, we have it in our power to decide to what extent in our studies we shall specialise. What then is specialisation? It is the direction of our energies in one particular channel to the exclusion of all others—at all events to any considerable extent. Now it is a question of considerable moment how far this narrowing of our energies is desirable in a seat of learning such as this University. It is said, and with much plausibility, that a man comes up here with the object of general education, with the intent of so training his mental faculties as to make them of use to him in future life. Admitting this, how is it best attained? Is it to be attained by limiting his studies to one particular branch of knowledge to which he applies himself to the exclusion of others, or is it to be looked for in a general culture and a training of what talents he may possess? Specialisation undoubtedly has the advantage of giving certain faculties that strict training which enables them to exert a strong grasp on whatever is submitted to them. It is also true that the range of subjects is now so great that it is impossible to gain eminent distinction in more than one or two. Yet is it advisable to cultivate some faculties at the expense of making others sterile, for you most certainly cannot have the strong differentiation which specialisation produces, increasing the power of one faculty without lessening that of others? It is not, I think, desirable for the mind whilst in that plastic condition in which it is at the age usually spent at the University to form itself too much in one mould. It is rather to be desired that it should develop all round while it has the power of rapid growth. A narrowing of the sphere of work will always be possible, and in fact invariably comes sooner or later, even against the will, as the mind becomes older. It cannot be denied that specialisation at Cambridge is in very many cases forced. I mean that it arises not as a natural taste, but from a consciousness that it is necessary for future success, whether that success be looked at from a high or a low point of view. What, I think, is to be contended against is the doctrine that specialisation has any binding force on the ordinary man at Cambridge. We should rebut the dogma that it is the duty of every man to find a hobby and make it his life-work, or his life-plaything as the case may be. For a man to enter on such a course is to force his powers in a direction which will probably most often be the opposite to that which his more matured faculties would choose. Intellectual Cambridge at the present time is strictly monotheistic and its god is Tripos. Almost its sole aim is centred on the Triposes: the energies of each man are brought to a focus on some particular Tripos, and he thinks that if successful in that it is of little consequence what tastes he may have engendered, or to what culture he may have aspired during his three or four years at the university. And this, too, when Cambridge ignores the study of his native tongue, and makes no provision for instruction in modern languages. Assuredly this tends in a wrong direction, for during these years the mind of the man is in such a condition as to be more susceptible of all that has a cultivating effect upon it than at any other period of his life. It is now that the intellect is most impressed, sees in everything which is met something more or less new, striking, and full of interest. To shut the mind up now in a narrow sphere is to cut it off from many influences which would powerfully affect it for life. I believe it will be found that all great men owe a powerful bent or a strong taste to impressions received during this critical period to which I am alluding. Instance Lord Beaconsfield's admiration of Byron's genius, the deep religious emotion of Mr. Gladstone as a result of the Oxford revival, the keen critical acumen of Gibbon, the sacrifice for literature of Hume, or the scientific taste of Faraday when Sir Humphrey Davy's assistant . . . . . Regard the Triposes for a moment, and it is at a glance evident that any one of them alone leaves most important faculties altogether uncultivated. In the Mathematical you have dry bones, possessing an enormous latent force it is true, yet alone thrusting the mind into a most narrow groove, and depriving it of any of that culture which has its spring in literature and language. In the Classical you have high culture, inasmuch as the mind is brought in contact with, and moreover forced to dwell upon a rich and varied literature; but it fails to educate the reasoning faculties. Morals alone leave the mind too much in the abstract. History, which in theory would probably supply the best educating means if only one were at our disposal, yet in practice is little more than a synopsis of details such as its fellow the Law. Natural Science gives a very necessary education, inasmuch as it impresses on the mind, more especially in its concrete study, the immutability of law, yet alone leaves the mind unevenly balanced, in a state of unstable equilibrium, and almost destitute of that influence of literature which the Classical tripos largely supplies to the exclusion training as important, if not more so.

It then appears that specialisation is the rule at Cambridge, although the mind is not yet, evolution would tell us, in a condition to specialise, at all events to that extent which it has now reached under the hot-house development of examinations. The moral is obvious. Those who are not forced by the external pressure of domestic life to specialise closely, should fight against the immediate allurements of mere Tripos success, and endeavour to cultivate to the fullest extent within their power the ensemble of their faculties, so that when the mature time for specialisation arrives, as of necessity it will arrive, they may find themselves in a position to follow their speciality with a mind of even tenour, a judgment unwarped by a continuous running in one particular channel, and the capability of seeing its true relations to other branches of knowledge.

PHILOSOPHY AND UMBRELLAS.

Every one must acknowledge that an umbrella, besides being what Mr. Wemmick would call "a piece of portable property," is an absolute necessity of life in our Noachian climate, and so, when I discovered some ominous rents in my best Sunday-go-to-meeting "Paragon," my first impulse was naturally to get another. Now, to the ordinary mind of members of this University, whether mathematical, natural scientific, moral, or the reverse, the natural proceeding would have seemed to be to go to a shop where such articles are sold, select one which suited one's fancy, and, after settling the price by the "higgling of the market" (for which see Aristotle, Nic. Ethics, Bk. V., chap. — I don't know which, now that that too enthralling work has been so cut up, that its own mother wouldn't know it), have it put down in one's tutor's bill, unless one had started the ready-money system, deposit account, and so forth, for which see Prospectuses.

But not so to me,—I was a candidate for the last Classical Tripos, and I determined to avail myself of the stores of philosophical learning which I then acquired. "How can I tell," I said to myself, "that the shopman may not be a philosopher, and perhaps ask me to define an umbrella, and then, through my inability to cope with him in the art of dialectic, I may be compelled to go away with a dozen collars or a hat-box? No, I will set about the matter methodically, and when I have arrived at the true knowledge of what an umbrella is, I shall be able so completely to crush him, that, perhaps, he may be even induced not to charge me more than twice what I should have to give for the same thing in London or elsewhere.

Now there are, I think we may safely say, three umbrellas:—the ideal umbrella in heaven, phenomenal umbrellas on earth, and, thirdly, painted pictures of the latter, chiefly by Willing and Co. The last class would clearly be of no use to me, and the first I am not likely to obtain, so, by the exhaustive process, I must direct my attention to the second class; but even of phenomenal umbrellas one can get no real knowledge, without grasping the ideal to a certain extent, for of course umbrellas are umbrellas, only so far as they participate in umbrellotês. Now there is a method called synagôgê or "collection," (which must have been invented by some god), which enables you by comparing a number of individual phenomena to work up to the original, and then, as far as I remember, you work down again by some back way—but it is such a time since the Tripos. Now, it hardly requires a practical syllogism to suggest that if you require a "collection" of umbrellas, the Union is the place to go for it. ... ... But I hadn't got farther back than the swing-gate, with my collection under my arm, when two or three men rushed after me, and, seizing the phenomena, made some disparaging remarks as to my knowledge of the eighth commandment. I explained my intention, when one of them, I am afraid, called me a fool; however, I didn't mind, I thought of my great master Sokratês, and reasoned with myself:—"I am a fool, and I know it; you are ditto, ditto, and don't know it; so it's fifteen love after all." However, I didn't say this out loud, as another syllogism was stealing into my mind like "footsteps upon wool," relative to the inadvisability of calling a man six foot high a fool.

But evidently in this money-grubbing age the method of collection breaks down, and I was almost in despair, when suddenly a light seemed to break in upon me, and, ejaculating the one word "dihaeresis," I rushed off to my rooms. For the benefit of those few members of the University, who have not attended certain crowded lectures during the last year or so, I may state that the method of dihaeresis is this:—You select some sufficiently large class or "hen," which contains the thing you want to define, and then divide it into two sub-classes, one of which shall include, and the other exclude the thing in question, and then sub-divide the sub-class, and so on, till you get to the definition required,—in fact, first catch your "hen," and then dichotomize her. Now, after mature deliberation, I fixed on everything that exists, as a good all-round "hen" to begin with, and was just going triumphantly to divide it into umbrellas and non-umbrellas, when an awful thought struck me,—I had been guilty of the heinous sin of jumping at once from the one to the many, and I know where people will go who do that sort of thing; I thought of Ardiæus and his thorn-bushes and trembled. No, we must start again, and why not divide everything into manufactured and unmanufactured things? Umbrellas (omitting skiapods, as they say in Arithmetic,) evidently belong to the first class. Good; again, manufactured things may be divided into useful and ornamental; umbrella (normally) belongs to the first class again. Once more, things useful may be divided into useful for offence and useful for defence; after some hesitation I choose the second division for a change. Then defence may be sub-divided into defence against the weather, and defence against other animals (fine Graecism, critical papers "please copy"). We're getting on, but our definition would still include the Tower of Babel, if that interesting relic still remains to gladden the heart of some orthodox explorer, to say nothing of Adam's original costume, and Nevile's Court during a shower; so suppose we divide defences against the weather into those which shut up like a telescope, and those that don't. At last we have come to the definition of our word, that is, unless it still includes express trains. So off I went to the shop.

"Good morning; oh, if you please, I want a manufactured thing, said thing to be useful, said use to be for defence, said defence to be against the weather, and said thing must shut up like a telescope; and please put it down in my tutor's bill." By the way, oughtn't I to dichotomize my tutor too? but no, the result showed that the shopkeeper was no philosopher. He stared at me for a moment, and then, muttering, "I've got it," (I believe he thought I was asking conundrums)—dived under the counter, and produced—a Gibus hat.

I left that shop, and on my way home made a new dichotomy of everything into philosophy and common sense, and determined to restrict the former, for the future, to examination purposes.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE UNIVERSITY EIGHT.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Sirs,—Your correspondent "Argo," finds much fault with the President of the University Crew for his choice of some of the men, and severely criticizes their rowing. But as an "old Blue," I must say, that, having seen them (about ten days ago), I thought (considering the early stage of their practice,) that they were "well on," both as to time, steadiness, and pace, and provided they reach well forward, catch the beginning and make a good end of the stroke, and also study to feather high enough for the Thames, as I feel sure they will do, they will win, even though Oxford may bring a good crew against them.

Surely it is unfair to blame the President for having men of his own College in the crew. For he is responsible more than any one for the result, and must know whether they are fit or not. But if he has made such great mistakes, it would be better for "Argo" to try and have him superseded, or get a better crew himself, than anonymously find fault with a man who has acted as every one knows honestly, and as most men think, judiciously in the matter.

Yours truly,
"Argonaut."

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Sirs,—Having read the article on "The University Eight," which appeared in your issue of last week, I should feel much obliged if you would allow me to say a few words in reply to it.

Of the criticism bestowed on the several members of the crew I will say nothing, as every one has a right to his own ideas on the subject of rowing; I will only remark that it was the general opinion of boating men that the crew showed a marked improvement after the departure of the two heavy men. It is with the latter part of your article that I would especially deal, as, if left unchallenged, it might lead your readers to suppose that Mr. Prest had been guilty of unfair partiality in his selection of a crew. It is asked how it was that a boat with four 'blues' in esse and two in posse, proved itself (according to your correspondent) inferior to some, and at least only equal to other, boats in the last May races. Now it must be remembered that since last May term, sufficient time has elapsed for men to alter considerably in their rowing; and also that it does not follow because one boat is better together than another, and therefore goes faster, that therefore the individuals composing the crew are better oarsmen, or would prove more useful men over the Putney course. From what I saw, too, of the May races, I should certainly say that the 'Lady Margaret' boat was the only one that anything like equalled the 'Jesus' boat in pace; though it is quite true (as your correspondent intimates) that 'First Trinity' might have been faster had they had no bad men in the boat; but under those circumstances so might have been any other boat. Why again, it is asked, is there only one representative of 'First Trinity' and none of 'Caius,' 'Trinity Hall,' and 'Third Trinity' boat clubs in the University boat? The answer is simply that there is not room for more than eight men in a boat; and that though men from each of these clubs, except 'Third Trinity,' were picked up in the 'trial eight' crews last term, they have all, after a sufficient trial, been discarded in favour of others who were by competent judges considered to be better; while Pilkington, the only eligible man in 'Third Trinity,' has been tried at stroke, and though he is perhaps a neater oar than Baillie, I believe it is generally considered that the President was right in not subjecting so light a man to so severe a strain; especially as Baillie before his illness had been giving general satisfaction.

The boat this year, though somewhat rough, is acknowledged, on all hands, to be fast; and your correspondent is bound to admit that they have done the course from Lock to Lock in very fast time; this he tries to account for by the fact of wind and stream being favourable; but if he has ever rowed he will probably acknowledge that wind, in whichever direction it may blow, and especially on a course which winds about as ours does, is not conducive to pace; while the stream, with the exception of one or two days, has been no higher than on other years, the crew having rowed over the course in fast time on several days.

In conclusion I may say that perhaps the strongest proof of the general approval of Mr. Prest's choice, lies in the fact that at a meeting of the 'University Boat Club' held last Friday, he was unanimously re-elected president, by the captains of the various college boat clubs, who may fairly be considered the best judges in such matters; and who would no doubt have proposed some one else as President, had they the slightest suspicion that Mr. Prest was actuated by any but the fairest motives in choosing the crew.

Apologising for the length of my letter,

I remain, yours truly,

FAIR PLAY.

THE "POLL" MEN.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—The last paragraph of Mr. Torry's letter on the "Poll Degree" in last week's Review, (p. 54), hits the nail on the head very accurately. If the non-students are clearly "visitors" for a certain number of terms, why should they be allowed degrees implying scholarly attainments, giving a most real cause for the look askance which London graduates are apt to cast on the M.A. of Oxford or Cambridge? A social "training" without training to any hard work is necessarily a training to clever pretence and to vice.

If, however, we compare "the general and ready submission to discipline, the order and good manners" alleged to be "the rule here," by Mr. Torry, with the reports of many entertainments interrupted by riots and disorder in Cambridge, and with the indecent and unmannerly language frequently used by gownsmen, we cannot but question whether Cambridge is the place where "Poll" men can gain most advantage.

G. T. BETTANY.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—From your account of the case Lane v. Muncey, in the Rolls Court, one word has, I think, dropped out, possibly in the printer's hands. As the omission makes a very important difference, may I be allowed to supply it? You say that though the cheque in question was ordered to be given up, the Master of the Rolls added that "the defendant was free to bring his action for his money"—it should have been "for his money lent." Muncey affirmed that Mr. Lane owed him money which had been properly advanced, as well as the money lost at gambling. The latter could not be recovered of course, and the defendant's only claim to the cheque, was that part of it represented a just debt. But as part even was for an illegal purpose the claim on the cheque as a whole was bad, and the cheque was therefore given up and destroyed. This decision did not prevent Muncey bringing his action for the money he had lawfully lent if he could prove the loan.

Lincoln's Inn. Yours, &c.,

The terminal meeting was held on Friday evening last, at which the officers resigned as usual. Mr. Prest, on resigning, called the attention of the meeting to recent attacks which had been made upon him for unfairness, and implored the captains not to re-elect him if they gave any credence to them. Mr. Nimmo (1st Trinity) proposed, and Mr. Brooksbank (Trinity Hall) seconded, the re-election of the officers. This was carried unanimously with applause.

The May races were fixed to begin on Wednesday, May 19,

LOCAL OPTION MEETING.

A meeting under the auspices of the United Kingdom Alliance for the consideration of the above subject was held last night.

Professor STUART opened the meeting, apologising for the absence of Mr. Rodwell, who had been expected to take the chair, and sent word that he "found he had mistaken the character of the meeting."

Canon HOPKINS, who was received with loud cheering, proposed 'that efficient means should be placed in the hands of the public for restricting the sale of alcoholic liquors,' and appealed to the evidence brought before the Lords' Committee.

The motion was seconded by the Rev. GEORGE HALE.

Sir WILFRID LAWSON supported the resolution. The hon. Baronet, who was received with loud cheering and cries of "Order," regretted that there had been a misunderstanding on the part of Mr. Rodwell, and thought that if he had come to the meeting he would have understood something about its object. He knew a Cambridge audience always gave a young man from the country fair play. Mr. Rodwell said he had not come because he thought we should be all on one side. He did not know there would be two men making a noise. He, himself, liked opposition. He came to convert people. [Laughter.] Next Friday he had to convert the House of Commons; a most difficult task. Mr. Rodwell would have met many of his friends. Sir Wilfrid read from a Cambridge newspaper that a meeting was held in Cambridge [A voice: "Was it?"—"Yes it was;"] two or three days ago a meeting of brewers and publicans who came to a useful and rational conclusion, viz.: They had resolved to attend the Local Option meeting and hear in silence. That proved that the three men with red faces at the back had nothing to do with the publicans and brewers, who are men of their word, and besides who took a solemn oath they would hear in silence. At a meeting in London the brewers had issued an invitation to the trade to bring themselves and their customers, and curious customers they were. They were like the three men with red faces. They were drunk and roared and dressed in rags. The publicans are the appointed guardians of the public virtue. Why was a publican obliged to have a licence any more than a tailor or baker? It was because there was a danger of their selling too much. Did they ever hear a wife say that her husband had been to the baker's shop and made himself a brute by buying too much bread. [Considerable interruption.] Sir Wilfrid was very glad to meet such merry minded gentlemen, but he understood it was the custom of the place. Sir Wilfrid was obliged to leave to speak in the House of Commons, and therefore must leave the explanation of his policy to the other speakers. He thought their policy was to protect themselves to prevent the spread of drinkshops and all their attendant evils being forced upon them; but he saw they had only come to have a jolly good evening to shout and to sing, and therefore he had the pleasure to wish them all a very good evening.

The disorder now became so great that it was proposed to end the meeting, but at length some order having been restored, it was attempted to resume the proceedings. But Cardinal Manning and Canon Wilberforce who were to have addressed the meeting felt themselves so aggrieved by the noisy interruptions during Sir Wilfrid Lawson's speech, that they were disinclined to address the meeting.

The CHAIRMAN consequently declared the meeting terminated, and amidst considerable cheering and noise the speakers left the platform.

It is much to be regretted that the opponents of Sir Wilfrid's Bill should have had the disgraceful unfairness to resort to an organized attempt to interrupt the proceedings. The publicans of Cambridge have apparently yet to learn that the day has passed when might is superior to right, and that the delusive measure of forcing a public meeting can recommend their cause to thinking Englishmen.

Members of the University were present in great number; and it is scarcely creditable that many of them not only made no efforts to promote order, but on the contrary thought it consistent with fairness and their characters as gentlemen to add to the noise made by the roughs, and when the speakers had left the Hall to vent their disappointment at the breaking up of the meeting by the creation of the greatest possible amount of disturbance.

CAMBRIDGE ENTOMOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

The Entomological Society, now that the winter has ended, have elected Mr. J. Brown, of St. John's, President, and will hold their first meeting on Friday, March 5th. Their first excursion in search of the phenomena of nature will be to Icklingham, on March 16th. Students in other branches of Natural History, non-members, can accompany these excursions by sending in their names to the Secretary, A. E. Hunter, of Jesus, or to Mr. Brown, 5, King's Parade.

CAMBRIDGE PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY.

At the Meeting on Monday, Feb. 23rd, the following amongst other communications was read:—

On the transport of mud and vegetable matter by conferva, by Prof. T. McK. Hughes.

It has, I dare say, been observed that often in warm summer weather rivers, like the Cam above Cambridge for instance, or the Lea near Hertford, run quite turbid, though generally bright and clear. If we examine the bottom of such a stream we may notice patches of velvety growth on the mud, and when the sun shines the oxygen given off by these plants is seen in sparkling bubbles tangled in the fibres. If we watch we see one mass after another slowly disengage itself from the mud and rise to the surface of the water, sometimes coming up edge-wise when the little gas-floats are more numerous on one side than another. Gas, probably carburetted hydrogen, sometimes appears to be let out from the mud below, on the removal of the covering mat of conferva. The fine mud lifted with the root end of the plant leaves it gradually as it ascends, and when the process has been going on for some time, the water appears so muddy that it might be supposed that cattle, or ducks, or men, had been disturbing it higher up. The masses of conferva float down the stream till the gas bubbles have escaped, then sink again, and so in bright rainless weather the work of denudation and the seaward transport of solid matter goes on.

Another curious phenomenon of a similar kind may be observed in the autumn in the meres of Shropshire, where it is known as the Breaking of the Water. The water first assumes a brownish tint, which becomes more yellow, then more green. The green then rises and forms a scum on the surface. Some of this is blown by the wind and stranded on the shore, or caught among the reeds along the margin of the lake. The rest sinks to the bottom and disappears. The water then becomes perfectly clear again.

During the earlier stages the water gives off a very offenives smell and is quite unfit for household purposes. Mr. Salusbury Mainwaring, of Oteley, to whom I am indebted for much of the information I have collected on the subject, informed me that the phenomenon occurs regularly every autumn in Ellesmere, so that arrangements have to be made with a view to supplying the house with water from other sources for the few weeks during which the water of the mere is breaking.

I collected some of the green filmy mass that had gathered along the leeward margin of Ellesmere last September, and gave some of it to Mr. Shepheard, of the Chester National Science Society. He examined it under the microscope and found that it consisted of a mass of small faggots of a very minute freshwater alga, and thought that on the whole it most resembled conferva echinulata described and figured by Sowerby, English Botany (edn. 1805), p. and tab. 1378.

The phenomenon is mentioned in "Mountain Meadow and Mere," by G. C. Davies, p. 16, and more fully described by the Rev. W. A. Leighton, in the Report of the Severn Valley Naturalists, Field Club, published in the "Midland Naturalist," Vol. 1, 1878, p. 258.

The explanation of the changes in the water would, therefore, seem to be that, first, the alga lies in the fine mud till the period of reproduction in August and September, when expanding it rises towards the surface, itself a dark object, and carrying with it some mud—hence the brown and yellow colours—that then some of the old plants suffer decomposition, and perhaps a little carburetted hydrogen is disengaged from the mud below—hence the smell. That next a bright green filamentous growth is developed; and the plants break up, and that which is to be developed into next year's growth now sinks to hibernate, and the rest perishes on the shore or in the water.

In this minute but ceaseless way the mud is being unsettled, lifted, and drifted, now further out, now nearer shore, to be left at rest only when it has dropped into water too deep, or on a spot otherwise unsuitable for the little alga.

C. U. M. S.

Last Wednesday was the occasion of the first appearance of Herr Gompertz, the new violinist, at the Wednesday Popular Concert. It would be needless for us to eulogise that gentleman's playing; his tone is very fine, and his execution magnificent, indeed, in the solos that he played in every style his mastery over the instrument was complete.

The concert began with Brahms' Sonata in G minor for pianoforte and violin, his latest published work, in the performance of which Mr. Stanford was associated with Herr Gompertz. It would be impossible to give any detailed notice of so difficult a work, with only one hearing, but we especially appreciated the slow movement, in which the double stops of the violin are used with great effect.

Mrs. Stanford next sang two songs of the same composer, Brahms, Nachklang, Op. 89. No. 4. the theme of which is employed as the ground-work of the violin sonata played before it, and a Lullaby Sandmännchen. Both songs were charmingly sung, the latter with its burden, "Schlaf' du mein Kindelein" especially taking the fancy of the audience.

Later on in the evening Mrs. Stanford sang Arne's "Where the bee sucks." In a concert composed for the most part of novelties, it was extremely pleasant to hear such an old favourite; indeed, the audience seemed to desire its repetition. There seems to be some doubt in the words of this song, as we have always heard it sung before

"Where the bee sucks, there lurk I"
And again, "On the bat's back do I fly,"
"After sunset merrily."

However, on reference to our Shakespeare we find that the edition as printed in the programme is undoubtedly correct. Perhaps some correspondent can enlighten us on this point of reading, but we were glad to see a return to the correct words.

The principal piece in the programme was a sonata for piano duet by Hermann Goetz, which was "performed for the first time in England." It was rendered by Messrs. C. V. Stanford and R. C. Rowe with great precision and spirit.

Again we cannot pretend to give any idea of so novel and difficult a work after a single hearing, but the first and last movements appeared to us a little diffuse. The slow movement with a peculiar halting rhythm was the most noticeable feature of the work.

The last item of the programme was three violin solos by Herr Gompertz, Adagio Op. 55 (Spohr); Allegro Op. 70 (Kiel), and Nocturne Op. 27 (Chopin). The Allegro was very difficult, and contained curious pizzicato effects. All these three pieces were played entirely without music, and in a manner which gave no opportunity for criticism.

COLLEGE CORRESPONDENCE.

ST. PETER'S

Our first boat has had during the past week the great advantage of Green's coaching, and is, as might be expected, showing unmistakeable signs of improvement. Its final arrangement is—bow, W. New; 2, B. Smith; 3, H. A. Watson; 4, E. G. Peirson; 5, W. O. Parish; 6, H. Bott; 7, H. G. Fuller; stroke, E. T. Littlewood. The second boat, which we mean to try to get on the river, has been made up as follows:—Bow, F. A. Brettingham; 2, A. A. Jolley; 3, M. C. Potter; 4, H. W. Lee; 5, J. H. Smith; 6, W. C. Sample; 7, J. J. Dickenson; stroke, G. Bird.

On Saturday H. A Watson called upon the Sexcentenary Club to "sympathise with the Russian Nihilists," but the motion was lost by a considerable majority.

CLARE.

The boats which we intend to try for places on the river are at present constituted thus:—Second boat: Bow, Marshall, 2, Wilson, 3, Wardale, 4, Sharp, 5, Wayte, 6, Banks, 7, Ridley, stroke, Lawson, cox, Tatham. Third boat: Bow, Jerwood, 2, Riley, sen., 3, Noble, 4, Riley, jun., 5, Elder, 6, Ormerod, 7, Laughlin, stroke, Biddell, cox, Froom. Both the boats have been doing hard work, and are progressing well.

At a meeting of the Debating Society held last Friday, J. H. Darlow proposed "That this house condemns the proposal to erect in Westminster Abbey a monument to the late Prince Imperial." G. P. H. Frost opposed with success, converting some who had determined to support the motion, and inducing the House to reject it by 18 votes to 12.

PEMBROKE.

Both of our boats have done several fair courses during the week. The crews are finally made up as follows: Second boat, Haviland (bow), Cobbold, Carter, Rundall, Morton, Elrington, Taylor (stroke), Bullock (cox). Third boat: Grindrod (bow), Ashwin, Firminger, Miles, Simpson, Wright, Phipps, Torkington (stroke), Hebbert (cox).

The Reading Prize was competed for on Tuesday, the 23rd, and after a prolonged struggle was awarded to H. F. Simpson. E. Lambert and J. W. Rundall being also considered worthy of honourable mention.

On Saturday A. H. Leahy drew the attention of the Debating Society to the wrongs of Ireland, urging them to support him in his opinion "that the treatment of Ireland by Englishmen has been such as to warrant the feeling existing in that country at present." If assertion and denial tend to make a debate lively, this debate was indeed so. The House finally decided against the motion, the numbers being for the motion 12 against 17.

GONVILLE AND CAIUS.

Our weekly cycle of Societies commenced on Monday with W. G. Whittam's paper on the Phlogistic theory, at the Scientific Society. The essay was one of special merit and was followed up by some discussion.

At the Debating Society, on Wednesday, E. Francis (Vice-President), in a very diverting oration, moved the "Abolition of Actions for Breach of Promise of Marriage. W. M. Japp, in a short and pithy harangue, defended this great stronghold of the weaker sex, which, however, was overthrown by 18 votes to 15.

The Science and Art Society had an intellectual treat on Thursday, in the shape of an essay on Charles Lamb's Essays of Elia, from the pen of G. Niven. The Essayist was in thorough sympathy throughout with his subject, save on the single point of Lamb's dislike of Caledonians, which his patriotism constrained him to assault.

On Saturday selections from Charles Lamb and Burnand were read respectively by G. Niven and M. J. Thackeray.

Later on the Shakespere Society wandered through the storm with Lear and his fool, and finished reading the great tragedy.

There have been several changes in the third boat. 3 and 5 have changed places. Clarkson retired from 4, in favour of J. Caldwell. Some immaterial changes have taken place in the fourth boat, Whittam's place being filled by Clarkson.

TRINITY HALL.

The crews in practice on the river remain practically unchanged. On Saturday the boats went down to Clayhithe. The second boat travelled in long stages of alternate rowing and paddling, but owing to an accident to bow's rigger, at the willows, on the return journey, his services had to be dispensed with. The third boat was going well; Henn, who for a couple of years has rowed in the second, has taken a seat at No. 2, and consequently the boat has a pretty strong leaven of second-boat men in her. The Ellis Pairs have been fixed for the last days of the term, after the Lent Races; as yet, however, we have seen very few pairs in practice for them.

CORPUS CHRISTI.

After numerous changes the boats seem at length to have become fairly settled, and should no unforseen circumstance occur, the present crews will probably represent us in the races. We propose, however, to defer giving the names till next week. Both crews went down to Clayhithe on Saturday, and seem to have profited by it.

In the Lawn Tennis Club the first round of the double ties has been played off.

On Saturday evening, 23th ult., the Debating Society met for the discussion of an interesting motion proposed by E. L. Richardson, who contended that "Man's happiness is independent of external circumstances." J. T. Halland opposed this ethical dogma, which was eventually carried by 11 votes to 6.

KING'S.

On Friday last the Debating Society by a large majority decided against "conscription." At the next meeting J. K. Stephen will move "That this House would welcome the extension of capital punishment to crimes other than murder." He will be opposed by W. T. Whitley.

The football matches arranged beforehand have been put off, so the record for the week is blank.

Our boats have been in steady practice, and the second eight will compete for a place on the river next Friday. Its composition is as follows:—Bow, Clarkson; 2, J. R. Harmer; 3, W. A. Walker; 4, W. Harvey; 5, R. A. Coleridge; 6, W. Heaton; 7, H. R. Brooke; stroke, A. R. Stokes; cox, W. J. Constable.

QUEENS'.

The Old St. Bernard Society had a lively time of it on Saturday last. Capital songs were given by Statham and Rooker, and of the readings, that of J. Kidd came in for a well-deserved share of the applause.

We believe a movement is on foot to establish a practice-ground for cricket in the Grove: nets will be put up on the old Lawn Tennis ground, which we hear is to be replaced by a cinder court in the adjoining field, and members of the club will be able to have good practice in batting and bowling. This arrangement will, we feel sure, prove a great benefit to our cricket team, who sadly want some good ground nearer and more convenient than Parker's Piece.

ST. CATHARINE'S.

Our first boat is at present composed as follows;—Bow, Taylor; 2, Vicars; 3, Senior; 4, Elliott; 5, Woolcott; 6, Hubbersty; 7, Davies; stroke, Coulton; cox, Chisman. Both it and the 2nd boat have done some hard work lately, but regular practice has been somewhat interfered with by the Tripos, which has been dividing the attentions of two of the eight.

JESUS.

At a College meeting, held on Saturday evening, it was decided to start a College Reading Room and a College Debating Society, in connection with each other. Mr. A. Grey kindly consented to act as President; the other officers elected were:—Vice-President, F. Gelderd; Secretary and Treasurer, R. V. Wilson. The Societies will be managed by these officers, with the help of a Committee of nine, three being chosen from each year. A Lecture Room will be utilised for the Reading Room, which will be open from noon to midnight; the debates will be held, we believe, on Saturday nights, time not fixed. No doubt these institutions will be eminently successful.

On the river the third boat has been obliged to change its stroke, Richardson retiring under his doctor's orders; this, at this late period, is a bad thing for the boat, which was none too good before. The fourth boat is sanguine about getting on the river.

Hockey has been started on the Close, and seems very popular: a match has been arranged for Saturday against Old Marlburians.

CHRIST'S.

C. C. D. C.—On Saturday, February 28th, Mr. Parkyn proposed a motion to the effect that the "Equalization of the Franchise was desirable." Mr. J. M. Brown opposed the motion. The motion was lost by 22 to 20.

C. C. C. C.—The annual meeting for the election of officers was held on February 27th. The following officers were elected:—President, Mr. J. A. Sharkey; Secretary, Mr. A. St. H. Gibbons; Vice-Captain, G. H. Macmillan. Last year's season was far from what could have been desired. There seems to be better prospects for the ensuing year, although the want of a ground considerably handicaps the College cricket.

ST. JOHN'S.

Football is now all but over, as the last two college matches fell through. The lovers of the game have been amusing themselves with scratch sixes, the final tie of which has not yet been played.

The Debating Society on Saturday discussed the question of "Breach of Promise of Marriage," and carried a motion brought forward by J. Russell condemning the present system. Next Saturday is the last meeting of the term, and afterwards the oratory of the society will remain dormant till the October term, when no doubt it will awake to increased vitality and vigour.

On Sunday morning a sermon was preached in the chapel by Rev. W. D. Bushell, one of the Harrow Masters, and formerly Fellow of the college.

MAGDALENE.

On Monday last the eight went into training. They have been down the river every day, but have not done any excessive work at present. On Saturday, however, they did a course.

The Q. D. V. Musical Society had a successful meeting on Saturday evening. This was due to the kind assistance lent by members of other Colleges.

EMMANUEL.

The second boat has been slowly improving during the week; but now that they have been sometime in training we should like to see more work done over the course than at present. Browne has been substituted for Machell at 2.

The Boat Club Committee have ordered a new light ship from Winter, for the races next May. The subscription list for the new boat and the payment of the standing debt has progressed rapidly. About £30 is still wanting; but as many have not yet subscribed we hope this amount will soon be made up.

At the meeting of the debating Society, next Saturday, D. Adamson will move: "That this House sympathises with the present Nihilistic movement in Russia."

Crew of the boat trying to get on the river:—Bow, Walters; 2, Browne; 3, Dunicliff; 4, Jukes; 5, Chataway; 6, Filmore; 7, Thornton; stroke, Freeth: Cox., Hewetson; Captain, E. Hopkinson.

SIDNEY.

Our Lent boat has remained unchanged, and is steadily improving under the vigorous coaching of the two Captains.

At the usual debate on Saturday, H. C. Robson brought forward the following motion: "That this House reveres the memory of Oliver Cromwell." The question was discussed for some time; but, as Cromwell was himself a Sidney man, in the end it was, not unnaturally, decided in the affirmative.

TRINITY.

We regret to announce the death of M. H. Morley, in his rooms in the New Court. For the last fortnight bulletins have been anxiously waited for, and the announcement of his death on Sunday night has cast a gloom over the College.

The M. and S. met on Friday last at 10 p.m. The following were elected members:—M. C. Gibb, A. F. Ford, H. S. Oriel, R. A. Herman, J. Wilkie, A. H. Thompson, A. Champion.

F. L. Lucas proposed "That it is the duty of every able-bodied male British subject, not otherwise engaged in Her Majesty's service, to be a thoroughly efficient volunteer." C. L. Davies opposed the motion, which was lost by a majority of 17: 29 members voted.—I am told by one whose information is generally to be relied upon that the E and F. companies of the C.U.R.V.C. are going into mourning.

Last Thursday the "Irregulars" discussed the motion "That this House considers that the liberty of the English Press should be under the power of restriction." After a spirited debate the motion was lost by a majority of one. At their next meeting they will consider the question of Capital Punishment.

The T.B.C. have had a series of disappointments during the week. Several of their men will be from various causes unable to row in their Lent boats this year. They are obliged to look about for a new stroke for the 4th boat as Mr. Sing, who has filled that position throughout the term, has received doctor's orders to give up rowing.

It is now decided not to try to put an extra boat on the river, owing to the difficulties mentioned above.

T. A. F. C.—Scratch Sixes: Second Ties: C. P. Harvey (captain), A. F. Faithful, S. P. Potter, M. Firth (absent), J. S. Oxley, and J. S. C. Wood v. C. A. E. Pollock (captain), A. C. Child, A. L. Holman, J. C. Royle, C. H. Williams, and J. W. Liddell. This match, which proved a tie on Monday, was resumed last Wednesday, and after a hard fought game ended in favour of Harvey's team by three goals to two. Harvey's team again had to play without Firth, but matters were in some way equalized by Liddell being absent from the other side during the first part of the game. Potter kicked the first goal for Harvey's side up the hill, but this was quickly responded to by a goal for the other side by Child. After half-time Harvey made a good run up the side, and passing it well to Wood, the latter kicked it through, and very shortly afterwards these two repeated their performance with a similar result. After these losses Pollock's team tried hard to retrieve their fortunes, and shortly before time Royle kicked a goal for them, but this was their final effort, and time was called, leaving the other side victors by three goals to two. Besides the above-mentioned, Faithful did good service for his side, while Child, Royle and Liddell tried hard to avert defeat.—Third and Final Tie: C. P. Harvey (captain), A. E. Green-Price, W. H. Whitfeld. J. Wilkinson, J. S. Oxley, and H. C. Pelly (substitute goal) v, J. S. C. Wood (capt.), H. H. Barker, E. J. Wilson, S. P. Potter, A. F. Faithful and M. Easton. Before beginning, Wood's team were the favourites, but expectation proved wrong, and Harvey finally won by two to one. Harvey won the toss and kicked off up the hill: after each goal had been threatened, Whitfeld made a good run and middled it to Harvey, who kicked the first goal for his side. After this reverse, Wood, Wilson, and Faithful played up well together, and brought the ball down to the opposite goal, through which Wood sent it by a splendid screw kick; one goal all. The ball had not been started, however, more than three minutes, when Harvey after a good run up the field scored the last goal of the match just before half time. After changing Woods' side played up very hard but Green-Price proved impassable, and at call of time Harvey's side were hailed winners of the scratch sixes after a hard fight for it.

DOWNING.

It would be more satisfactory if the printer would abstain from using his discretion about the motions brought before our Debating Society. The subject announced was "the independence of our 'constitutional colonies;" not the "constitutional independence of our colonies," as he would have it. This debate did not, however, come off, owing to the indisposition of the opener. Our gallant secretary, J. E. Viney, kindly brought forward a motion instead, so as to give C. Alison an extra week's time. The motion discussed on Saturday, February 26, was "That in the opinion of this House all so-called spiritualistic phenomena can be referred to material causes." The chief feature of the evening was the presence of the fair sex. It is generally supposed that they stimulate the other sex to all that is good; they certainly helped to call forth much oratorical skill. The Downing Society can strongly recommend other college societies to take the same step. The eloquent appeals of several professed spiritualists were naturally not sufficient to cause the motion to be rejected.

The Shakspeare Society met on Thursday and were thrilled by the impassioned utterances of Romeo and Juliet.

Our first boat is a fairly good one and will, we hope, go up. It is composed as follows: Bow, Robson; 2, Beaumont, J. H.; 3, Yetts; 4, Hickson; 5, Bradshaw; 6, Schreiner; 7, Logan; stroke, Brinton.

The second eight which was to have tried to get on to the river, has come to an untimely end, owing to the indisposition of some of the members of its crew.

NON-COLLEGIATE.

We understand there is a movement afoot to establish a Lawn Tennis Club. We wish the promoters every success.

On Thursday evening, in the Library, W. E. Peach introduced a motion in favour of "Trade Unions." His following was small and consisted only of J. B. Hyde, Stephens, and C. H. Maggs. The opposition, led by Wauton, was overwhelming. These oppositionists were Norton, Inglis, Graham, Farthing, Morgan, Clemson, Fisher, Thompson, and Austin. Of the 19 present, 15 were against and 4 for the motion. It was therefore lost.

We regret to announce the death of George Richardson Bonfellow, who died on the 21st ult. He came up in the October term, 1878, and applied himself closely to reading for the "Previous." He passed both parts in June, last year. At the end of the "Long" he took to his bed, from which he never more arose. His medical advisers attribute his death to study.

UNIVERSITY INTELLIGENCE.

The Council of the Senate, in acknowledging the communication made by the University Commissioners of their proposed statutes, have forwarded a representation of an important character. It criticizes most of the important points in the proposals of the Commissioners, and advocates changes in the amount to be levied on the Colleges as a contribution to the University, in the method of apportioning the Quota to the different Colleges, and in the stages by which the total payment is to be reached. It also deals with the proposed changes in the Professoriate, and suggests in a schedule the assimilation of the stipends of the Professors, as far as may be, to a common standard. While expressing their willingness to create Readers, the Council state as their opinion that the proposed number is too large, and they further object to the restrictions imposed in the choice of subjects. It is also recommended that no specific number should be fixed in the case of the University lecturers, and that it should not be essential that they should be also college lecturers. A capitation tax on persons in statu pupillari is also recommended. There are other criticisms of less important details in the Commissioners' scheme. Representations have also been made to the Commissioners by the Boards of Natural Science Studies and of Historical Studies, criticising adversely the assistance afforded by the proposed statutes to students in these departments of learning.

The Library and the Museums and Lecture Rooms Syndicates have also appealed to the Commissioners for further assistance and support.

The Slade Professor (Mr. Colvin) gives notice of the following change in the programme of his lectures for this term; it will now run as follows, viz.:—March 5th, Practical lesson in the methods of painting, by Prof. Legros (Univ. College, London). March 9th, General laws of painting. March 12th, General laws of Poetry.

The Clothworkers' Company offer an exhibition of £52 10s. a year, to be awarded for proficiency in Physical Science, and tenable for three years, either by a Non-Collegiate student of this University, or by an Unattached student of the University of Oxford.

In the Final Examination for the Degree of Doctor of Music there were no candidates.

In the Semitic Languages Tripos, Hon. I. G. N. Keith-Falconer, B.A., Trinity College, was placed in the first class. There was no other candidate. Mr. Keith-Falconer was educated at Harrow, where he distinguished himself by gaining several prizes. In 1874, he entered Trinity College, and in 1876 he gained the University Jeremie prize. He has taken a first class in the Theological Tripos and gained the University prize for Hebrew. He is, however, more widely known for his feats in the bicycling world, having been Vice-President of the C.U.B.C. during nearly the whole of his University career. He has won several University and Inter-University races, amongst which may be mentioned especially the two amateur professional races of 1878-79, at Cambridge, in both of which races he accomplished the fastest time on record. Mr. Keith-Falconer is a great advocate of the system of Phonetic spelling, as well as a great expert in its use for shorthand purposes.

DEGREES.

At the Congregation on Thursday last, the Vice-Chancellor (Rev. Dr. Perowne) presiding, the following degrees were conferred:—

Master of Arts (Honoris Causa).—M. M. P. Muir, Caius.

Masters of Arts.—F. Willcox, St. John's; J. A. Coghlan, St. Peter's; J. A. Whitelock, Pembroke.

Bachelor of Medicine.—F. J. Waldo, St. John's.

Bachelors of Arts.—Hon. A. L. Orde-Powlett, Trinity; M. Jaques, St. John's; J. E. Browne, and R. J. Roddam, Clare; C. H. Cook, and R. F. De Salis, Trinity Hall; G. E. Hetherington, Emmanuel.

CAMBRIDGE ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY.

At a meeting held on Monday evening, the 1st of March, at half past eight, Professor McK. Hughes presiding, the following Communications were made to the Society:—

I.—By Mr. LATHAM: an "Extract from the MS., known as "Warren's Book," belonging to Trinity Hall, giving a description of some Roman remains discovered on Dam Hill, between Cambridge and Trumpington." This was a most interesting paper, and led to a discussion on the Roman roads into Cambridge and on the position which their military station occupied.

II.—By Professor HUGHES; "On Roman and Mediæval remains discovered during recent excavations in the garden of Trinity Hall." These remains, which were exhibited, included several vessels of the Elizabethan and Cromwellian period, besides other articles of perhaps an earlier date. There were also several undoubtedly Roman remains, which had been found in a lower stratum during the excavations for the new house at Trinity Hall. These latter caused a renewal of the discussion of the Roman occupation of Cambridge, in the course of which Professor Babington brought forward some most valuable information on the subject of the causeway and bridge on the site of what is now Bridge Street and Magdalen Bridge.

III.—By Mr. WALKER; "Exhibition and description of some South American antiquities from Culenca (province of Ecuador)." This paper was read by Dr. Walker, who, after stating that he was no relation of the writer, proceeded to extract the most important passages from the communication, there not being sufficient time to read the whole. The articles in question were exhibited. They were from the tombs of the Incas, and from the history of the country the writer asserted that the date could be approximately fixed at from 1450—1520. They comprised several jugs and a curiously shaped vessel that the President supposed might be in some way intended as a filter. Some vessels from Cyprus were also shown in order that a comparison might be drawn with those from South America. One of the most remarkable of these jugs was considered by some of the members present to be a musical instrument, and after the meeting had risen, a noise was produced after some experiment.

IV.—By Mr. WORTHAM; "Notes on an Inventory of Church Furniture, Vestments, &c., at Bassingbourne (A.D. 1498)." The inventory itself was exhibited. Mr. Wortham's paper consisted of remarks on the names of different vestments and Church accessories, included in the inventory, and then went on to touch on the interesting record that the book contained, of the relations of wages and rents at the time of its use. The paper concluded with a hope that such a venerable and authentic memorial of our fathers should not be allowed to decay, which hope was acquiesced in by Professor Babington, who then occupied the chair.

Before these papers were read some Roman and early British weapons were exhibited at Walton-on-Thames and in the Fen country. Also some millstones and the remains of a 'bos primogenus.'

MORAL SCIENCE CLUB.

The ordinary weekly meeting was held on Saturday evening in the rooms of Mr. G. Parker (St. John's), 67 Sidney Street, when a paper was read by Mr. J. B. Whitehead, St. John's, on the "Notion of Justice." An animated discussion followed, touching on several subjects, the connexion of which with the paper was not obvious.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY SOCIETY FOR THE PROMOTION OF RELIGIOUS EQUALITY.

A numerously attended meeting of this Society was held on Friday evening, Feb. 20, in Mr. Harris' rooms, Clare College, Mr. Neville Goodman, of Peterhouse, President of the Society, occupying the chair.

Several members were elected, as also Sir R. K. Wilson, Bart., M.A. and M.L., Reader of the Laws of India, to the office of Vice-President.

Mr. Herbert Burrows, late non-collegiate student, Hon. Sec. of the Working Men's Social and Educational League, was then called upon for his paper on "The Divinity Degrees." The chief points brought forward were that the present restrictions on Divinity degrees are harmful to the interests of Theology, and should therefore be abolished; that the study of Theology at the University ought to be scientific; that the present custom of granting Honorary D.D. degrees is objectionable, and that the true interests of Theology would be best furthered by establishing a chair of Comparative Theology in the University. The subject was discussed at considerable length, and with much fervour, and the meeting terminated with according Mr. Burrows a cordial vote of thanks for his able paper.

THE RIVER.

THE UNIVERSITY EIGHT.

The first part of the practice is now over, and the crew have begun their work on foreign waters. Whatever opinions have been formed up to this time can only be approximate ones; and it is only after both crews have been over the Putney course that any decisive result can be arrived at. Looking back at past years we find it a general rule that the heavier crew is also the winning one. In this respect the Oxford boat has the advantage over us A light boat is undeniably good over a short course; but when the distance to be covered is over four miles, then the weight must tell. Of course weight must not include "lumber," but then it is generally supposed that the men chosen to form a University crew do not carry much flesh that cannot be turned to account before the day of the race.

The prestige of our last year's victory caused us to be named as the favourites. This opinion was endorsed when reports arrived of the backwardness of our opponents. Since then, however, the home crew have not made very much progress, while the Oxford men have come on very rapidly.

Various opinions have been expressed as to the advisability of putting Baillie stroke; and not a few still doubt his staying powers. On this ground there should be no fear; as he has already, by his performances over the Ely course, proved that he could last over a three and a half mile course in a heavy boat. With the exception of bow, who, in spite of hurrying the finish, is never sufficiently forward to get in comfortably with the rest of the men, each man seems to have a fair claim to his place; and yet as a whole the combination is not satisfactory.

The first thing to strike any one looking at the boat, is the painful fact that they are not 'together.' Each man seems to be rowing for himself, and as yet no marked improvement has taken place. As a crew they have not the neatness which generally characterizes a University boat, and if they cannot to some extent overcome their differences of style, and learn to row together, they cannot hope to repeat the victory of last year.

While there is time, there is hope; and we have known many instances in which an apparently hopeless crew have tumbled together at the last.

There is much consolation in the fact that Oxford seems to fail in exactly the same manner, and it will be interesting to watch which improves most in this respect.

Most of our men are strong, and seem to stand the work well; but work, if not applied at the same time throughout, fails to get a boat along.

It is not too late for the President to take a seat in the boat; and few would regret to see him rowing in the same place as he did last year.

On Thursday last the crew did their "Lock-to-Lock." The pace at times was good, the improvement in this respect being quite astonishing; but there was neither enough work, nor was it kept up evenly. Perhaps the best piece of rowing was down the Long Reach, when the men appeared to settle down to it for a short time. The President and Mr. Close then took the crew home by easy stages, and the day's work was brought to a close by Mr. Close, who took out stroke and seven in a tub.

On Friday nothing of importance happened. Mr. Close took the crew to Baitsbite and back, rain falling most of the time.

On Saturday a sharp piece of rowing was done from Baitsbite to the Horse-grind. The crew then left for Kingston, where they arrived late in the evening.

At present the betting is against us; and has again fallen away a point—proving nothing conclusively, but indicating that the improvement has not been so great as was expected. By the time both crews have been over the Putney course, the betting becomes a very good test of the relative merits of the two boats; and the layers of odds immediately before the race have never been known to lose, except in one instance, when the Cambridge boat sank.

Digitized by Google

We should not be at all surprised if the betting were to veer round again when both crews show themselves on London waters—and should it do so, those who cannot see the crews and judge for themselves, may safely rely on it as a sure indication of the state of affairs at Putney. A.

The following are the latest names and weights; taken after the day's work:

During the past week we have noticed a considerable improvement in the rowing of the Second and Third divisions. Training is beginning to tell, and several very rough crews are at last shaking together.

The boats trying for the additional places in the Third Division are also hard at work; and as usual, the best ones are decidedly better than many already in the division. The scheme for increasing the number of boats has proved a distinct success, as there seems every likelihood of a large entry. First Trinity, Pembroke, King's, Clare, Caius, Emmanuel, Jesus, Christ's, Peterhouse, Trinity Hall and Downing have crews in training; and Caius, Clare, Emmanuel and Jesus look like business. The Emmanuel boat, however, has not the pace its appearance warrants. The Hall boat has come on rapidly during the last few days, and should the improvement continue it should show up well. Both the Clare boats are taking to look at, and one at least should be in at the finish.

In the Second Division, Queens' will most probably descend, as they seem at a loss without the two men who are rowing in the University boat. If Trinity Hall 2 make this bump, they will then have a good chance of displacing Ca'h.'s, and some good racing should ensue for the headship of the division. At present Jesus 2 are good enough to keep away from Third Trinity 2; but the Third Trinity boats have a happy knack of making it very hot for those in front of them.

King's have a much better boat than last year, and something may be sent down to them. Caius 3 should go up, and Christ's at least keep their place. Pembroke 2 is as usual a fair boat, but not as good as in former years, and it is not unlikely that Peterhouse may give both First Trinity 5 and Pembroke some trouble. In the Third Division the rowing is very rough, and none of the boats call for special comment except Sidney 2, Trinity Hall 3, and Cavendish. Sidney 2 look a strong lot of men, and Hall 3 row a dashing stroke which ought to pay in a bumping race. Cavendish is the best boat in the Division, and should continue its successes of last year. Corpus 2 will inevitably fall a prey to the boats that get on.

The boats will start on the 10th in the following order:—

Second Division.	Third Division.
Jesus 2	Peterhouse
Third Trinity 2	First Trinity 6
Catharine 1	Sidney 2
Queens'	Trinity Hall 3
Trinity Hall 2	Third Trinity 3
King's	Jesus 3

Downing	Cavendish
First Trinity 4	L.M.B.C 4
Magdalene	Caius 4

With reference to the article on 'The River' last week, we much regret that it has been understood to imply partiality on the part of the President of the C.U.B.C. We have the authority of the writer to disclaim emphatically any such suggestion.

THE OXFORD UNIVERSITY CREW.

The Oxford Eight had to confine themselves for the first three days of the week to the Upper River between Medley Lock and Godstow, which distance they rowed three times each day. The boat went much better as soon as the men got used to the new seven, Wharton at that post being a great improvement on Hargreaves, who was certainly the worst man in the boat for that important seat.

On Thursday the crew again made their appearance on the Lower River, the floods having sufficiently subsided. Burne was able to coach below Sandford Lock, and the crew started off to row the long course at a lively stroke of about 34 to 35. The rowing shewed some improvement and the crew certainly got very fair pace on the boat and are reported to have done exceptionally fast time. After reaching Abingdon Lasher they turned and paddled all the way back to Sandford at one stretch, and after passing the two locks did a fair piece of rowing over the Home Course, finishing up at the Barge about 4.45 after a row of over 15 miles. On Friday the crew intended to go over the long course again, and had secured a steam launch to carry Messrs. Burne and Darbishire, but before they reached Iffley the screw of the launch got broken and so they had to give up their original intention and confine themselves to the Iffley course, which they rowed twice, the men being tubbed between journeys. On Saturday the crew again went below locks and rowed the usual trial eight course from Sandford to Nuneham Bridge. The time and swing in this row was a good deal better and there was good pace on the boat most of the way. They turned at the Bridge and did a long piece of paddling back to Sandford, whence they came home by easy stages, Messrs. Woodgate and Burne being the coaches.

The crew are still in rather a rough state, but the men on the whole are a promising lot and ought to improve considerably in the next three weeks, now that they have at last settled into their places. The time and feather is still very far from being good, Nos. 2, 3, 5 and 6 being the worst offenders against time. Looking at the boat end on it appears rather ragged, as the feather is uneven and the men turn their oars at different times. The names and latest weights are:

		st.	lbs.
Bow,	H. R. Poole (B.N.C.) ...	10	13
2.	D. E. Brown (Hertford) ...	12	4
3.	F. M. Hargreaves (Keble)	12	3
4.	H. B. Southwell (Pembroke)	12	11
5.	R. S. Kindersley (Exeter)	12	11
6.	G. D. Rowe (Univ.) ...	12	4
7.	H. T. Wharton (Magd.) ...	11	10
	Cox, C. W. Hunt (Corpus)	7	3

Poole is in good condition, and a hard worker, though he is rather slow with his hands and offends with his elbows. Brown rows long and hard, but has a very cramped finish, is also slow with his hands, and often late. Hargreaves has very little form of any sort, he does not swing well, and often feathers under water very badly. However, he will be useful if he can be got to make the most of his strength. Southwell rows as hard as ever, but swings short. He would probably make a better six than Rowe. Kindersley is a very taking oar, and ought to make a splendid man next year, when he reaches his full strength. He hurries on seven. Rowe rows in very good form, but bends his arms too soon, and his time is not perfect. Wharton is a great improvement on Hargreaves at seven, as he keeps good time, and rows well with stroke, but would do better by not rowing so deep. West is a very pretty oar, though rather light for stroke of a heavy crew,—and sets a good lively stroke. He rows rather light at the beginning of his stroke, and has a tendency to get short.

The crew leave here on Wednesday to stay a few days with our former President, Mr. Grenfell, at Taplow Court.

THE OXFORD TORPIDS.

The Torpids began on Thursday, and started in the following order:—

Pembroke)	Christ Church)	Oriel
Trinity)	New I.)	Lincoln)
Keble I.	Keble II.)	Merton)
B.N.C. I.	Magdalen)	St. Catharine's)
Exeter	University	New II.)
Balliol I.	St. John's	B.N.C. II.
Queens'	Corpus)	Hertford
	Worcester)	Balliol II.

The brackets denote the bumps on the first night. On Friday Christ Church succumbed to Magdalen, Keble II. to University, John's to Worcester, Corpus to Oriel, Lincoln to New II., St. Catharine's to B. N. C.

On Saturday Keble I. bumped Pembroke, and New I. did the same to Queen's; Worcester had the good fortune to make two bumps, becoming Sandwich boat in the first race, their victims being Keble II. and University. Oriel caught St. John's, New II. caught Merton, while Lincoln and St. Catharine's fell respectively to B. N. C. II, and Hertford.

The beginning of the practice for the Torpids was so much interfered with by the frost, and then by the floods, that on the whole the crews are rather below the average. Among the upper boats Trinity and Keble I. are good, and Trinity will have to do its best to keep the headship from Keble. Worcester are a very fair crew, as they have shown by making four bumps in three nights, and of the lower boats New II. seem to get the best pace on. Keble II. are very slow, and of St. Catharine's and Lincoln the less said the better.

On Monday New, Magdalene, Worcester, Oriel, Corpus, Brasenose II., Hertford, Balliol II. bumped Balliol, Queens', Christ Church, Keble II., St. John's, Merton, Lincoln, and the Unattached, respectively. No change in the five head boats.

THE UNIVERSITY HANDICAPS.

The University Handicap Meeting was held on Thursday and Friday, Feb. 26th and 27th. The new mode of running with the right hand inside, as at Lillie Bridge, was adopted for the first time: an important change, as hitherto Cambridge men have always been at a disadvantage when competing against Oxford. The most noticeable feature of the Meeting was the running of W. W. Hough, in the three mile handicap; starting from scratch he won easily in the capital time of 15 min. 20⅕ secs. which makes it probable that Cambridge may at length win the 3 miles at Lillie Bridge. None of the "standards" were accomplished, but the weather must be chiefly answerable for this. Results:

FIRST DAY.

RUGBY UNION FOOTBALL.

OXFORD v CAMBRIDGE.

This annual match was played at Kennington Oval, on Wednesday, Feb. 25. Phillips losing the toss kicked off from the gasometer goal, Cambridge electing to play with the wind and sun at their backs for the first half time. For some time the play was in the centre and was chiefly confined to the forwards. The Cambridge men being somewhat heavier than their opponents began to press them back, and Chapman made a short run into the Oxford half, Shearman retaliated with a long run, but lost the ball about 25 yards from the goal line, and Wrigley made a fine run down the ground finishing up with a long drop well into the Oxford quarters. A good drop by McLachlan made matters more equal, and the Oxford forwards, well led by Phillips and Branfoot, carried the ball into the Cambridge half. A punt by Tudor took it near the Cambridge goal, and Knight had a splendid chance of securing a try, but foolishly preferred to try to drop an impossible goal, and Cambridge touched down. A fine drop out by Taylor was met by Tudor, who was tackled before he returned the ball. A rush by the Cambridge forwards, aided by two nice runs from Storey, took the ball under the Oxford posts and soon Finch dropped a very neat goal for the light blues. Nettled by this reverse the Oxford forwards played up splendidly and for the rest of the first half time kept the ball in the Cambridge half of the ground. The Oxford backs, however, were quite out of form, and though Tudor had plenty of chances of a drop at goal, he always preferred to run right into the ruck of the Cambridge men. Finch and Chapman on the other hand were a continual source of anxiety to the Oxford men, though neither of them made very long runs. Branfoot, Phillips, Coates, Cox, and Smith, were the most prominent for their respective sides. Cambridge were forced to touch down once more before half time. On change of ends, the game again began in the centre. Branfoot was first to distinguish himself by two very neat dribbles, and then two runs by Walker took the ball into the Cambridge quarters. Taylor, however, made a good run to the centre, and Smith, Fuller, and Coates, by some good forward play menaced the Oxford lines. A scrummage was formed 3 yards from the goal line, and in the rush that ensued Cox succeeded in securing a try near touch at goal. Smith, however, was equal to the occasion and placed a splendid goal. With two goals to nil against them, the prospects of Oxford did not look bright, but still they strove hard to turn the tables on their adversaries. The Cambridge forwards were, however, now playing well together, and Cox made several neat runs. A long drop by Tudor sent the ball into touch near the Cambridge 25 yards, and Knight was beginning to look dangerous when he was finely attacked by Finch. Still Oxford were slowly gaining ground, and a fine dribble by Phillips raised the hopes of the dark blues, but Finch by a very neat run took the ball away from his quarters. Again Phillips ran it back, and Watkins got to within 5 yards of the Cambridge goal, but when tackled he passed wildly to Chapman who carried the ball out of danger. Jacob, now waking up, made some strong runs and Cambridge had all their work cut out to keep their line clear. Payne once got away to the centre, but the ball was gradually worked back, and an indiscreet kick from one of the Cambridge backs sent the ball to McLachlan, who dropped a splendid goal for Oxford. With only eight minutes more play Oxford worked hard to equalize matters. Hirst made some good runs but the tackling of Taylor was too sure to allow anyone to get past. Walker made a fine run to the Cambridge 25 yards, and it seemed as though Oxford would make a draw of it after all, but just before no side Coates made a short run and some quick passing between the Cambridge men, carried the ball to the centre of the ground, where it remained till the end. Cambridge thus won by 2 goals to 1. Forward, the teams were very evenly matched, Cambridge being the heavier, Oxford the faster. Coates, Smith and Cox, did a lot of good work for Cambridge, while Phillips, Branfoot, and Walker were most prominent for Oxford. Behind the scrummage Cambridge was decidedly the better team, Finch played splendidly and he was well backed up by Chapman. Storey showed fine pace during the first half, but was hors de combat for the second. Wrigley and Taylor both played extremely well. McLachlan

OXFORD LETTER.

Some time ago you were given to understand that the drama in Oxford was about to be renovated—not that we ever expected Mr. Burnand or the Prince of Wales to honour the professional performances at the Victoria theatre, but we did think that something better than Cooper's Female Christys, the Miss Bensford's (Music Hall) Troupe, the Wonderful Fay Family, Mirth, Magic, and Melody, and the Inimitable were going to follow Our Boys. Comment is needless.

The Rev. R. Linklater, of S. Peter's, London Docks, addressed a very full meeting at New College, on Sunday night. He gave a very interesting account of the attempts that are being made to humanise the river-side population of that apparently hopeless district. The difficulties are at both ends. First, to get the people to attend to anything that is told them; and last, to cope with their utterly impressible and frequently very inconvenient gratitude. I take the liberty of passing on his invitation to you. Any 'Varsity man who is living in London and will spare one night a week to teach A B C in night schools, he says is an invaluable assistance—gentlemen absolutely necessary, no one else can do it.

The Senior Mathematical Scholarship has been awarded to Mr. Bowman, of Corpus, the Junior to Mr. Sampson, of Balliol.

The 'Varsity came back last week from the Upper River, where they had been practising, and have been going on steadily. There is some uneasiness as to whether they may not be a little over-trained by the time of the race: both West and Kindersley are young oars.

The Oxford Association team played the Old Carthusians on Saturday—the latter hardly up to their full strength. Oxford got two goals to none. Heygate (Keble), played well, and also King (Hertford), and French (Merton), as backs. For the Old Carthusians, Prinsep, half back, was very good indeed, while Parry at times was exceedingly useful down the side. The Rugby Union was represented by the 'Varsity against Marlborough Nomads—one goal and two tries being scored for us. The goal was a very difficult one, and excellently placed by Newton (B.N.C.) The Nomads were strong behind, but their forwards lacked the weight and pace of the Oxonians. For Oxford, Hirst (Balliol), and Collins (King's), at three quarters and full back respectively, played well. Forwards, Vassal (Hertford), and Jacobs (Oriel), of which the latter was seldom off the ball.

We have noticed with apprehensive admiration the splendid run of Hough, C.U.A.C., and fear that for the first time we shall have to yield the three miles—there is no one in Oxford who can do it under 15 minutes 40 seconds, Hills, of University, and Hamilton of Queens' being hors de combat.

A domestic tragedy is reported to have occurred at Christ Church. The new cook, lately introduced by the Dons, in an attempt to reform the kitchen, has had an "attempt on his life" after the most approved fashion of continental courts. Such a dose of oxalic acid was put into a cup of tea he was taking in the kitchen that he was unable, luckily, to swallow even the first mouthful. No trace of the culinary Nihilist propaganda has as yet been discovered. Thus we see how even the least romantic avocation is capable of being surrounded with a halo of sentimental interest, and that there are branches of the public service other than the naval and military in which a man may be called upon to risk his life in the execution of his duty.

"INTEREST" V. HONOUR.

It has been customary of late for supporters of the present ministry to insist that their opponents care nothing for the greatness of England, that they regard her empire merely as an encumbrance, and her external power as a matter of indifference. It has, however, we believe, never been maintained that the most abject criminal has ever been so perverse as to act otherwise than in accordance with his own interests, even when by so doing he has been betrayed into acting rightly. And assuming that Mr. Gladstone and his followers are as incapable of appreciating noble motives as Conservative orators and so-called statesmen believe, or find it convenient to pretend to believe, it does not appear what personal interest they serve by adopting the course attributed to them. The object of the present article is, however, not to bandy the missiles of party vituperation, but to discuss the Foreign Policy of the present ministry with that seriousness which readers of the Review have a right to expect. We therefore put out of sight such political absurdity as we have referred to, and assume what every sane politician knows perfectly well, that Liberals are every whit as careful for the honour and true interests of their country, and as determined to maintain her Empire, as are the most enthusiastic supporters of the Earl of Beaconsfield. The subject of disagreement between the followers of Mr. Gladstone and the followers of the Earl of Beaconsfield on the question of Foreign Policy must be looked for in a direction far different from this, but it is not hard to find.

We Liberals believe in a national life. We know that men are bound together by far firmer bonds than the ties of mere commercial necessity or selfish interest. Men are bound together by ties of language and religion; and, deeper still, they are bound together in a communion essential to their very nature by the great bond of race,—of nationality. And it is just because every individual Liberal feels within himself the pulsation of this national life, that he feels most deeply and insists most strongly that since the nation possesses power which can be exerted by its government in its name, since, that is, the nation can act, the moral law must be the sole criterion by which the worth of its acts and of the principles which assume to guide them must be judged. And we believe that it is only by a recognition of this great fact that a righteous intervention in Foreign affairs can be made, or even that Patriotism is possible.

But we go further even than this. The existence of a national life not only subjects the nation to the moral law, but also imposes on it duties. England has a national mission in the world. When, however, we speak of a national mission we must guard against a possible misconception of our meaning. We know that hardly one of the wars which have desolated Europe during the past half-century has been made except under the pretext of a national mission. We advocate no such "bloody meddlesomeness" as it has been well called. But as there is a national life, so there must be a national character, that is, every nation must have a special aptitude for some particular kind of well doing, and that particular well doing it is the mission of each nation to achieve. And just as an individual man may find it actually his duty to take the life of another, so, and perhaps not much more often, cases may arise in which it is the duty of a nation not to shrink from the terrible ordeal of war in the carrying out of its special mission. For to quote Mazzini "The consciousness of a special aim and of special aptitudes for its achievement, and for furthering through it the general progress towards that common aim which is the ideal of Humanity constitutes a people into a nation.

Digitized by Google

When no such consciousness exists there is no nation, but simply a certain fraction of population destined sooner or later to be agglomerated with some other fractions."

It is in the vividness with which a nation perceives its mission, its special aim, and in its ability to achieve that aim that its greatness lies, and not merely in the area of the territory it rules, or merely in the numbers of the populations that are its subjects—for then would Russia be the greatest of Empires, and the hosts of Xerxes, and not the handful of Athenian citizens, ought to be the object of our admiration.

What then, let us ask, are the special aptitudes, possessed by England, for well doing among the nations. The States of Continental Europe bordering upon each other, and separated by no distinct or impassable natural barrier, are liable to clashing interests, and are disturbed by jealousies and fears of each other's power. But England, from her natural position, is free from the curse of a border interest, and cannot be suspected of self-seeking when she intervenes in Continental affairs. This, until within the last three years, has given her a moral position in Europe, unrivalled by any other power—when she has spoken she has been obeyed, because it has been well known that she possesses no interest by the satisfaction of which she can be bribed, or by the threatening of which she can be intimidated.

And this same isolation of her position has prevented any serious external interference with the development of her people's freedom, which has been furthered internally by an extraordinary series of happy accidents. No sooner had her aristocracy triumphed in their early struggle with the crown, and gained for themselves and the commons a charter of liberties, than they set to work to destroy their own power by a civil war. The power of both crown and aristocracy thus becoming again nearly equal, and both of them being weakened in relation to the commons, the latter were courted by both, and thus gained personal liberty and constitutional government centuries earlier than the rest of Europe. Thus, schooled in freedom herself, England has been the great teacher of the lesson to the world, and has become the "Mother of Parliaments." And so from the days when under Elizabeth, the hearts of English mariners, whose destiny drove them "westward ho," burned within them at the tales of cruelty inflicted by their Spanish rivals on the native races of America,—from the days when under the great Protector, the word of England availed to stay the massacre of the Albigenses, down to our own times, when the names of Portugal, of Greece, of Belgium, of Hungary, of Italy, cannot be mentioned without recalling often the material, always the moral support of her government, and invariably the enthusiastic sympathy of her people freely given to help them in their struggles to be free, the one consistent, constant principle of her foreign policy has been as Lord Palmerston has said: "that it is her only safe as it is her only righteous interest, to be the friend of the weak and the oppressed all over the world."

England has thus possessed an unique authority, and has recognised and carried out her national mission in well doing. The present Ministry have destroyed the one, and betrayed the other. It is, however, not the imbecility but the immorality of their policy which is our present subject. Neglecting, therefore, the incomprehensible folly of creating Continental interests, the existence of which must cast doubts on our impartiality in any future intervention, and of voluntarily hampering our future action by treaty engagements, we shall at once pass on to consider how far the traditional freedom-loving policy of England has been carried out.

Five years ago the inhabitants of the Herzegovina rose in revolt against the intolerable oppression of Turkish rule, and naturally the sympathy of the English people was from the first with them. After the failure from essential inadequacy of the Andrassy note, an attempt was made by the Berlin Memorandum to unite the Powers on a basis of action. To this the Ministry refused their consent, and then began the new regime. Her traditional policy had led England twenty years before to curb the aggression of Russian despotism, and so incidentally to uphold the Turkish Empire. This incident was magnified into a principle, and became the pretext for inaction. At the Conference of Constantinople, held at the indignant demand of the English people, to put an end to Turkish terrorism in Bulgaria, the schemes of reform were reduced to a minimum, with the consent of the Ministry, and when even this small modicum was refused, they marked their approval by sending, as Ambassador to the Porte, the most Turkophile diplomatist in the service, and accepted without comment the official thanks of the Sultan for this mark of good will. Then followed the Russo-Turkish war; Greece threatened to shorten it by attacking Turkey, but was bought off by a promise of the Ministry that her interests should be guarded by England. By incessant provocation of the Russian Government and people, the well-being of the subject populations of Turkey was ingeniously confused with the aggrandisement of the Russian Empire, and the mind of this country was assiduously prepared for sympathising with an attempt to resist the inevitable freedom of Bulgaria. And what was the excuse made for this policy to the more thinking portion of the community? It was said that England had certain interests in Eastern Europe which must be guarded at all hazards. And in his first despatch after he had taken the seals of the foreign office, Lord Salisbury specified five points as inadmissible—these were: the annexation of Bessarabia by Russia, the extension of Bulgaria to the shores of the Black Sea, the acquisition by Russia of Batoum, the stronghold of Armenia, and territory in Kurdistan. For the sake of these five points, and in assertion of the principle that the disposition of Eastern Europe must be settled openly and above board by all the Powers, England was brought to the very verge of war. It seems almost incredible as we write the words, but it is the simple fact, that this ministry foxing as the champion of open dealing in opposition to the secret diplomacy of Russia, engaged by a secret treaty with Russia to support the four most important of her five inadmissible claims in return for a nominal submission of them to the congress. The Congress was held and the solemn promises to Greece were simply broken. Our representatives returned, and boasted that with the influence of England they had limited somewhat the area of freedom,—that in the name of the "Mother of Parliaments," they had perpetuated the semblance when they could not perpetuate the reality of a desolating and decrepit despotism. And now, even in the "profit and loss philosophy" of the present Ministry, let us ask what have they gained by straying from the straight and narrow path of honour into the wide and wandering ways of "interest?" They have acquired Cyprus and they have prevented Russia from acquiring certain territory in Kurdistan. This is absolutely all; nay more: Russia would never have been in a position to claim this territory at all, if, in accordance with England's traditional policy, and as the Liberals repeatedly demanded, they had checkmated her at the outset by espousing the cause of the subject populations of Turkey. But on the other hand, what has England lost by the policy to which she has been committed? She has lost the reputation for a disinterested love of freedom; she has lost the goodwill of Greece; she has lost the chance of rearing as a rampart against Russian aggression a free and strong nation, knit to her interests by the bonds of everlasting gratitude, and she has cast over the glaring cruelty of Russian despotism the cloak of an apparent championship of the oppressed.

But not only have the present ministry neglected the national duties, and betrayed the national mission of their country, they have not even submitted her national action to the Moral Law. On the very day on which Lord Derby, as Foreign Minister, in a dispatch from which his former colleagues will scarcely even now dissent, accused Russia of territorial aggrandisement in undertaking war against Turkey, England annexed the Transvaal, a territory ten times as large as all Bulgaria. The Transvaal Republic had been founded by Boers who left the dominion of England that they might be free to enslave the Kafirs, and the pretext for the annexation was the danger to British interests caused by the fact that they were in a state of chronic war with surrounding tribes whom their cruelty had roused and whom they had not the energy to defeat. No nation which enslaves and oppresses a numerically greater population has a right to complain on moral grounds if a beneficent outsider destroys its nationality for the sake of freeing its subjects; and from this point of view we sympathised, at the time, with the annexation. But the Government appear to have appropriated the policy as well as the territory of the Dutch farmers. A certain tract of land had been stolen by the latter from the Zulus. It might have been supposed from the pretext for the annexation that the first act of the British Government would have been to restore it. But the High Commissioner, "a thoughtful religious man," who seems to have deliberately determined from the first on a war of subjugation if not of extermination, postponed the settlement by referring the question to a commission exclusively composed of British subjects, by whose decision Cetewayo engaged to abide. Sir B. Frere was employing this delay in obtaining large military reinforcements from home under pretext of enforcing the decision of the commission, when to his astonishment the commission reported unreservedly in favour of the Zulu claims. Sir B. Frere remonstrated, the commission persisted, and finally Sir B. Frere lawlessly gave his award against their decision, and suddenly changing the pretext of his policy, accused Cetewayo of cruelty to his subjects, of which no previous mention had been made, and demanded the disbanding of the whole Zulu army and the complete destruction of their national system, which had been growing up during more half than a century, "within fifteen days." It may, however, be said, and doubtless with truth that the present Ministry is not responsible for initiating this policy. But we answer they accepted the responsibility of it afterwards before Parliament, and only rebuked the High Commissioner to the extent of expressing a mild regret—not that he had cynically repudiated the most elementary principles of right and wrong, not that he had trampled upon every principle of justice, but that "the necessity for immediate action should have appeared to him so imperative as to preclude him from incurring the delay which would have been involved in consulting Her Majesty's Government upon a subject of so much importance, as the terms which Cetewayo should be required to accept before these terms were actually presented to the Zulu King." At any rate the Ministry are directly responsible for the next step in this unsavory story, which was that troops were marched into Zululand, and under pretext of delivering the inhabitants from the tyranny of a cruel king, their villages were burnt and they themselves were massacred.

These particulars of "Imperial" policy which we have so far considered are, however, past and done with, we must now consider a policy the end to whose evils no man can see. We have seen how the red streak of blood has followed the course of the policy of the present ministry in Europe and Africa, it now remains to observe in Asia this characteristic mark of their touch.

At the time of Mr. Gladstone's political tour in Scotland, the Standard stated that foreign affairs formed no topic of discussion in Scotch political circles; and sarcastically remarked that the Scotch people deserved the credit of not talking about what they did not understand. We must allow the existence of a similar ingenuousness in the members of the present Ministry. From first to last we can remember no single instance in which morality has been referred to as affecting any one of their projects. It was no member of the Ministry, but a Bishop of the Established Church, who made the one solitary attempt to reconcile their policy with morality, and he was not particularly successful. He advocated the Afghan War on the ground that it would further the propagation of the Gospel; he proposed that we should "wade through slaughter to a pulpit," thence to preach the creed of brotherly love. The Prime Minister has made no such mistake; he does not "talk about what he does not understand." At the Guildhall dinner in 1878, at which he first explained the Afghan policy of his Ministry, he said, "Her Majesty's Government are by no means apprehensive of any invasion of India by our North Western frontier. . . . But our North Western frontier is a haphazard and not a scientific frontier. . . . With this view we have made arrangements by which, when completed, in all probability at no distant date, all anxiety respecting the North Western frontier of India will be removed." Those "arrangements" were the Afghan war.

The object of the present article has been to point out the immorality of the policy of the Ministry. In the face, then, of this open avowal it is unnecessary to enter into the much vexed question of our past relations with Afghanistan. Here the Prime Minister has stated in effect that the Afghans possessed something which he wanted, he therefore took it, and as the possessors resisted, slew certain of them. In what respect, we should like to know, is not this a piece of pure theft aggravated by murder? When sufficient had been slain, the theft was agreed to, and the troops retired within the "scientific frontier," which, however, was not so far "scientific" but that an embassy must be left at Cabul. The Afghans, observing that wherever an English resident came the country was shortly annexed, rose in revolt, and massacred the members of the embassy. Troops were again marched into the country, and during a second winter Afganistan was given over to the scourge of War. At last the country lies bleeding at the feet of the invaders. What will be the next step?

"Ah," Lord Beaconsfield is reported to have exclaimed in a London drawing room to a friend who quoted Tancred, "I see you have been reading Tancred. It is a work I refer to more and more as I grow older, less for amusement than for instruction." The latest reports as to the next step in his Indian policy adds one to the many points which seem to bear out the truth of this assertion. "The only way to manage the Afghans is by Persia and the Arabs," says the Emir Fakredeen. It is reported that Persia is invited to take Herat, by force if necessary; that India is to "retain" certain territory; that Afghanistan is to be split up into four principalities; and that British residents are to be scattered all over the country. Very shrewd, and doubtless pleasant for the self-complacency of our immoral politician. But let us ask of any Englishmen who may be our readers,—even if they feel none of that sympathy which transforms egoism itself into altruism; even if their hearts do not burn within them at the massacres called war perpetrated in the name of their country; even if they feel no thrill of pity for those homeless women and starving children driven from their burning villages to wander and to perish among the winter snows of the Afghan hills; even if they feel no pang of remorse at the spectacle of Justice outraged by the national action of England herself, yet as a matter of reasonable probability, are they not convinced that the hatred of the race intervening between the Empires of England and Russia must be a danger to "British Interests" which no paper guarantee or treaty disposition can for an instant outweigh? And can they believe that those who have suffered these things will forget, simply because they are Afghans? "God hath made of one blood all nations of men," and, depend upon it, the present Ministry have filled all Afghanistan, from Kabul to Candahar, with a race ready to throw itself into the arms of any power possessing the one qualification of hatred to England, just as they have filled all Turkey, from Sophia to Stamboul, with a population which believes that Russia has been their benefactor, and which will welcome her in her future march to the "City of the Czar."

We have endeavoured by tracing the history of the foreign relations of the present Ministry to point out the danger to British Interests involved in a policy which does not even pretend to be moral. We are aware that a bigoted partisanship calls this unpatriotic. But we are persuaded that it is the very consciousness of a national life in which we participate, that alone compels us to feel shame at the immorality of a policy initiated and carried out by the Earl of Beaconsfield. And while we have no fear of the physical force of military despotisms we do dread that if England sanctions the carelessness for the rights of others, the cynical callousness to the horrors of war, the denial that right and wrong have anything to do with national action, which characterise the policy at present being carried on in her name, she will be taught by bitter disaster that "Morality is only another name for the nature of things."

A GUIDE TO MODERN ENGLISH HISTORY.*

The study of history has not of late times been carried on with so much vigour here as at Oxford, and therefore any historical work from the hand of a Cambridge man should be received by us with the greater pleasure. Mr. Cory, better known under his former name as a late Fellow of King's, and for long one of the most distinguished of Eton masters, tells us in his preface that "this book has grown out of an attempt made some years ago to give some account of English politics to a foreign guest who was at the time reading history for an Examination at one of the Inns of Court: this guest was not a Christian nor an European." Mr. Cory has abandoned his plan of "adapting statements to so remote a mind," but the manner of the book has nevertheless been greatly influenced by this its original source. The condensation of facts into generalizations is useful both as an aid to memory and as a saving of laborious repetition; but that which should be only our servant is too likely to become our master. A great writer reaches a generalization, and smaller men who use it after him, but forget the analysis of it, either make it cover more or less ground than it should properly do. The confusion hence arising is in political matters much increased by the way in which empiric party-men play fast and loose with words in order to make them serve their own purposes, in the presence of audiences to whose ignorance they trust for immunity from exposure. Hence the value of writers who from time to time put generalizations altogether aside, and, looking facts straight in the face, unweave the knots which others tangle. The endeavour to impart instruction to one who was neither a Christian nor an European would certainly be a most excellent training for such a task. He who should try to explain to a Chinaman the meaning of such words as liberty or autonomy would probably be taught himself the humiliating lesson of how much his own ideas were wanting in exactitude.

Mr. Cory's work, so far as it has yet appeared, covers the period from 1815 to 1830. It is less a connected history of that time than a series of essays upon it, and might, therefore, be more likely to perplex than to guide "a remote mind" which had no other cicerone to the study. This period is that of the decline and fall of the long-lived Tory domination which was founded by Pitt and George III. The Tory power had received great confirmation from the struggle against the Revolutionary propaganda of France, and had afterwards mainly lived upon the necessity of warring down Napoleon. One great reason for its existence was removed by the pacification of 1815, and the Whigs—or rather the new Liberal party into which they had been transmuted by adversity—could no longer be considered as unpatriotic, and therefore as out of the lists of constitutional conflict. Still, in the unreformed constitution, the very fact of its existence gave immense stability to any government in esse, and the Tories had a further lease of power for fifteen years. As Mr. Cory remarks, there were two large interests in the House of Commons on whom Lord Liverpool could use the motive of fear—the gentlemen holding land and slaves in the sugar colonies, who had to be protected from the Abolitionists, and the corn-growing squires, against whom he could at any time let loose the growing force of the Economists. We have been taught by the most widely read authors of that time, particularly by Byron and Shelley, to regard the chief Tory Ministers almost as wandering fragments of the infernal regions; Mr. Cory takes a more lenient view. To him the government of Liverpool and Castlereagh is not indeed one of an intellectual kind, but still fairly honest and well-meaning. Their attitude with regard to foreign affairs was that of a "tough and wary national attorney," they conducted them in a business-like manner from the point of view of English interests, and were not inclined to act on any general principles, either in the spirit of Metternich or in that of Canning. They would not lend any positive assistance to the designs of the Holy Alliance, but neither did they wish to implicate England in any of the different insurrectionary movements of Europe. It was Canning who first clearly seized the leading tendency of the age—the movement towards the independence and unity of races. At home the Government made the serious mistake of interfering systematically with the food market in order to keep up the old war-prices. The peace was followed by several years of great distress. For while the employment which the war had given to an immense amount of labour was suddenly withdrawn, the heavy drafts which it had made on the productive capital of the country had not yet been replaced. To the discontent which distress naturally engenders, good points of attack were given, both by the corn-legislation and by the condition of parliamentary representation. The Government during these years was hard and repressive, and the language of the popular leaders fierce and aggressive, but, as Mr. Cory shows, both the severity of the Government and the revolutionary spirit of the people have been probably much exaggerated. Mr. Cory gives a good account of the manner in which the Duke of Wellington conceded the Catholic claims, not on the philosophical grounds which a Benthamite would have urged, nor even for the general political reasons which a Whig might have alleged, but because he saw that his choice lay between concession and an Irish rebellion, and as a practical statesman he chose the former. It is certainly unjust to accuse the Duke and Peel of granting the Catholic claims merely by way of stealing a march upon the Liberals; whether men who have once opposed a measure must necessarily resign the honour of carrying it through to their opponents is a question of political morality not yet settled.

It is to be hoped that Mr. Cory will soon give us the second part of his book. The style is one of singular force and purity, rising often into true beauty, as in the short chapter devoted to the memory of the Princess Charlotte. A certain epigrammatic and Tacitean character is at first sight somewhat startling to one accustomed to the usual flow of historical writing. Here is a passage describing the habits of the ordinary Methodist family:

"These families, which were the strongholds of scruple and benevolence, had few enjoyments. They shrank from games of chance, from horse-races, and from the coarser pleasures of the aristocracy; their music was timid, their gardening was not enlivened by emulation, they read theological poetry dutifully." It is an amusing picture of the Methodist, not only bounded in his musical ambition by hymn-tunes, but also clinging timidly to the conventional pink and tulip, unwilling to venture forth into the uncertain seas of grafting and variations.

POETRY.

TO * * *

O thou that lately wert at grips with Death
In the black waters, teach me, if thou may'st,
The haunting horror never-to-be effaced
Of that grim strife, whereat the crowd held breath
Speechless. How slight the gulf that sundereth
The quick and dead! With what a headlong haste
We overpass and enter the void waste
That lies beyond, all limitless! God saith
'Come,' and we go, or haply ''Tis not yet
Thine hour: a work I have that waits thy hand:
Take back thy life.' I deem that through the press
Of joys and cares such souls may ne'er forget
What glimpse they gathered of that lonely land,
Its half-seen shapes and sombre shadowiness.

Memorials of Cambridge, by the late C. H. Cooper, F.S.A. Macmillan and Co.

Messrs. Macmillan announce a re-issue of Mr. Cooper's great work in 38 monthly parts, with the addition of etchings by Farren. The value of the letter-press need not be dwelt on; Professor Mayor, than whom no better authority on Cambridge antiquities could be found, prophecies that "200 years hence Mr. Cooper's works will be more often cited than any other Cambridge book of our time." A full history of each college, its buildings, and its eminent men of the past, cannot fail to be of interest to every Cambridge man. The illustrations, while not all that can be desired, yet rise considerably above mediocrity, and Mr. Farren's etching of Trumpington Street, with Peterhouse in the foreground, looking towards the Pitt Press, is particularly happy. Whether as a book of reference for the antiquarian, or a "memorial of Cambridge" for the ordinary undergraduate, subscribers to this work will be well repaid.

The Academics of Cicero. Translated by James S. Reid, Fellow and Assistant Tutor of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge. Macmillan.

Mr. Reid earned the gratitude of all students of the Academica when, six years ago, he brought out the Latin text with a commentary and introduction. The present translation will ultimately be included in the same volume with a revised edition of that work. It here appears in a separate form for the use of candidates for the Classical Tripos of this year.

A difficult book like the Academica needs every kind of elucidation available. The notes of the former edition left little doubt how every important passage was to be taken; but the present is none the less a valuable contribution to the right understanding of the author. The rendering is close and accurate; occasionally too much perhaps, of explanation, as when qualitas, that is, ποιότης, is rendered "a substance endowed with quality." One distinguishing feature is a happy consistency in the use of technical terms. A word like visum may be variously translated by "sensation," "impression," "perception," "representation," "appearance." In his commentary Mr. Reid chose "sensation;" now he invariably adopts "appearance." Thus he is able to reserve "perceive" and "apprehend," for percipere and comprehendere. If this does not remove all difficulties it certainly tends to clear up the confusion into which beginners are apt to fall when they suppose that by nulla visa percipi posse is meant that "no perceptions can be perceived." The introduction and notes, though brief, are admirably clear, and contain one or two striking suggestions: i.e., as to the difference between the sceptical doctrines held by Arcesilas and Carneades, and the story about Albinus and Carneades.

But the main difficulties of the Posterior Academics are not such as a translation, however excellent, can remove. Although still defending Cicero's trustworthiness as an expositor of Greek doctrine, Mr. Reid admits a large share of blunders for which Antiochus was responsible. The general view of Physics assigned to the Old Academy he distinctly affirms to be Stoic. In the note on I, § 27, he still thinks there might be justification in Aristotle's wavering and contradictory language for the doctrine there laid down as to the derivation of the intellect (in § 39 the senses also) from the fifth element. For more information on these points and some others, as to the account of the Ideal Theory in I. §§ 30, 31, we shall look with interest to the forthcoming edition.

THE UNIVERSITY PULPIT:

SUPPLEMENT TO

The Cambridge Review.

No. 14. WEDNESDAY, MARCH 3, 1880.

Sunday, Feb. 29, 1880.

Sermon by the Rev. E. THRING, M.A., Head Master of Uppingham Grammar School.

"Thou, when thou fastest, anoint thy head, and wash thy face, that thou appear not unto men to fast."—St. Matthew vi. 17, 18.

This is a command. And it is of the very nature of a command to be short and simple. Nothing comes more direct from the inner life than a command. Life touches life at once; straight comes the power out, straight it goes to its mark. A command is life power more condensed, more unmixed, more driven home than anything else. 'March,' says the commander, and a hundred thousand men move to the field of death. 'Charge,' he cries, and with one mighty rush the torrent of life bursts forth to conquer or to die. For all understand, all feel, the grand resistless simplicity of a true authority in its commands. God in His highest work commands. God said, "Let there be light," and there was light; and Christ commands, the Gospels are commands, or simple statements akin to command, or example, which is command in a living energy. And Christ's commands come to us as the most direct communication of God to man, the simplest touch of divine life, the most disencumbered of all earthly mediums. The Master speaks—who will obey? The Master calls—who will follow? And no call to follow Him has ever reached man in a purer form than this command, this call, to do all hard things easily for His sake. No nobler words than these which tell us when we fast to be as those who feast, ever decided the great question of what to do and how to do it. The Master calls, it is for us to come. The Master commands, it is for us to obey.

It is unnecessary, I suppose, to show that in the kingdom of life fasting means all self-denial. Words are as dead as the ink that prints them, unless the true life-meaning is taken. The letter killeth. Fasting is an expression for that self-mastery, which begins by self-mastery in food; for no one who is the slave of his body is free to act; but freedom is the end in view. Life moving, life powerful, life able to do or bear at any true command is fasting as interpreted by life; and a weary man coming back from breathing the air of close rooms, as tried by sedentary work, who forces himself to eat in spite of no appetite and repugnance, obedient to the command, "Thou shalt not kill,"—thyself any more than another,—as truly fasts by eating, as the robust open air worker does by abstaining from food. The self-denial in this can be greater, the life-meaning of self-mastery more perfect, as real life interprets the command, and turns the dead letter into a living reality. Be not deceived; each man knows truth only so far as he has lived it. The letter is dead, never more dead than when grasped by the keen intellect without the feeling, without the interpreting life. This then is the command of Christ. His men must not let their trials be seen. They must do all hard things with a genial pleasant face like men at a feast, easily and lovingly. And they must not be acting a part in this; it must be real. That is, this is the ideal of manhood towards which all effort must tend; in the spirit of which all beginnings must be made. The character aimed at must be a cheerful festival spirit, and the outcome of that character must be a joyous face and look, not different in any respect from the worldly man, in his look of enjoyment. We must set before ourselves as a pattern a genial mastery of hardship, a real delight in the deeds of the brave and the strong, a real joy of the conqueror in the happy face, a real power of life in the easy performance. Life and its spirit must be matched against the pain in this, as it is in lower things. What man who runs a race does not exult in the active powers, though the strain may be severe, and the power gained by much of pain? What man who rows does not exult in the mighty swing of the trained arms and the speed, though the skill and the strength involve pain? It is true, then, that a lesser pain may underlie a great joy, and indeed produce it. It is true, then, that Christ's command to look joyous whilst doing painful or different things is in accordance with man's nature, and there is no unreality in bidding us "climb the steep ascent of heaven" with the natural buoyant spring of heavenly life, with the elastic step of the born mountaineer, and not the heavy plodding drag of the day-labourer. And if so, then it follows that our look and behaviour and dress and bearing, as we are doing nothing uncommon, shall not be uncommon either. This is Christ's command. His men are to look to the world just like men of the world in their festival hours; no one is to know by their look what they are doing in their trials. The trials are part of the true life, a matter-of-course part of it, and as such, are not matters out of the way, or specialties to be marked. This is exactly the command that was given in a very inferior degree by the great duke in the Peninsular war, when he issued as the order of the day, "that there should be no more volunteering for forlorn hopes or storming parties, it was the soldier's duty, and the regiments should take it in turn as such;" there are to be no "forlorn hopes" in the kingdom and army of Christ. This appears to be the first plain meaning of the command, no ticketing of ourselves as doing something extraordinary, it is the soldier's duty, and the best soldier is he who makes least fuss, and does his work most easily. Nay, but Christ commands more. He commands the men of His army to have the joyous face of men at ease, to do their work, their forlorn hope work, so easily, so lovingly, that none shall know they are doing it. This is indeed a hero's ideal, a great demand, but it is command of Christ to all His men, His command that the life shall be joyfully matched against the pain, and nothing uncommon be thought about it, no ticket saying "look at me" be set upon the doing, no work against grain to win praise be done. No praise, no dreams of triumph,—what we are, not what is thought of us, must be the heart motive. Work to win praise is indeed hypocrisy, an acting an unreal part for the gain of it, and what did the Pharisee do more? He was unreal for the gain of it, that was all, but if there is any truth, if there is any life, then growth in truth and growth in life is all in all, not the work done nor the praise won, whatever men think. The true measure of greatness is not the shadow cast along the earth for men to see, the image lengthened out by the low glare of lamps held up by man, that glory that lies flat on earth, and cannot leave the ground on which it rests, and without touch of which it has no being; no—true life has a being of its own, most true when Heaven's full light shines straight down on it; it works not to cast its shadow, it cares not for what is thought of it, for the growing in heaven's light is its joy in itself. He who fasts in Christ's Kingdom simply tastes the joy of life, he fasts because Christ's life is higher, and better and sweeter than aught else, worth all the pain, even in the pain worth it. There is no acting a part in his happy face though the task may be hard, and the pain great; neither praise drags him, nor fear to do what he would not otherwise do, to act a part, to be other than his true self. Look to your motives. Christ commands that the works of life, however hard, shall be done in a holiday spirit easily; lovingly for their own sake, with the look of a guest enjoying himself at a pleasant dinner party. The thing is simple enough; there is to be a quiet natural inward life, a joy in living, without reference to any outward gain or outward competition. Truth rejoices in itself, and does not want to be told that other men see it. Truth rejoices in itself and moves amongst the temptations of the world glad to leave them, glad to feel above them, and does not long for what it dare not touch, but would touch it if it dared, like a felon afraid of the prison. This is the ideal set before us, the character to aim at, an ideal of life within, of a complete perfect internal power, which whether it acts or suffers, moves or is still, meets every outward force with a natural spiritual strength to which by degrees everything becomes easy. In a word it is life as contrasted with all outward manifestations or results. It is curious in this world of sense to see how the idolatry of strength in some shape or another takes possession of most minds, and men are called great (the very word reflects the idolatry) because of actions done or works of mind produced that take large shapes amongst mankind, whilst the secret unknown silent endurance, the unconquerable inner life that can be patient when doing nothing, that bears whatever comes, be it shame or be it praise, that needs no strength, but can anoint the head and wash the face, and smile and look happy whilst the strong oppress it, is not thought of. A kind of animated machine, a human embodiment of wide reaching thought or sword-like power is glorious, and inventive skill a god; mankind worship the Titans still, but the faintest breath of inward life divine both can and has matched itself with a calm superiority to bear, and by bearing to set at nought all the giant troubles or giant divinities of the idol-loving world. Christ's heroes hear Christ's command and mean to live a life within in very truth, and easily, lovingly, as at a feast, to take the hardships of life as a joyous training. What matters the strength of others if they in their weakness can be trained to bear cheerfully all that the strong can do? Mark, too, this command can be obeyed by all; and surely if it were otherwise, there is no want of courage in England's young men. Yet it is not courage that is asked for; a dog can be courageous; more than courage is commanded, but a thing that all can be. All can be trained to the quiet resolution which bears what the hour brings, unconquered; all can aim at the splendid patience that waits or works with equal energy of inward power, content to meet the message of each day with perfect obedience; all can strive for the peaceful hardihood which penetrates a thousand nameless nooks of untold misery with stores of secret blessing, like some clear rivulet, seeking no reward; all can catch something of the prophet heart which being in its own truthful circle can see truth in the world outside, and Christ the King being crucified there, and seeing this does not, as fools do, seek for justice, or expect its rights, knowing well that in the kingdoms of the blind, the one-eyed man is hung as a traitor for daring to see. All can win at length that omnipotent silence which in the clutch of evil power cannot be made to utter words of useless self-defence, that omnipotent silence which persecuted, reviled, in the midst of triumphant wrong, checks the fierce fire of the burning tongue, and will not put the spark to the dry wood, but dies mute and voiceless, self-restrained even unto death, rather than overthrow wrong by kindling fiercer wrong. All can do these things, for they require nothing but a spirit of quiet endurance, no strength is needed but this. This power of living alone within the heart sanctuary, even as we die alone, that world-wide bit of teaching that every man can see, which sends us all into our inner chambers to live as we must die without any companion but life itself, this can be learnt by all. And all this must be done easily, that is the command, easily, lovingly; the only thing out of the common permitted is an unusual cheerfulness. Brethren, this is to be a hero. A hero does hard things easily, so easily that no one sees them to be hard, so easily that he himself as life goes on has learnt to forget the hardness, and to rejoice in the manly joy of matching life against self-indulgence or pain. Surely what a power there would be in this place if this was the ideal of life. What a power there is in this place; only let this fountain of knowledge become also a fountain of life, only let life—life—be the one aim, and clumsy idolatries of strength and praise come to an end. And, as all can have Christian heroism, so it can begin always, nothing is too small for a beginning, nothing too great for the end, since it is a true growth in life. And it is the positive command of Christ that we all strive to attain this easy self-mastery which does hard things in a common cheerful way. I am bid challenge you to-day in Christ's name to obey this His command, and challenge you, too, in a way which ought to come home to all here more than in any other place in the world. A very noble work is being done here by the Cambridge Old Schools and the Church of England Primary Schools generally. More than four thousand children are being educated, and it is easy to see that much help is needed for this great work to go on at all; a thousand pounds of voluntary subscriptions were needed last year, and almost any sum might be spent with advantage in meeting the demands of increasing population, and in making the work in other ways more effective. There is no doubt about the goodness of the work, and this University which lives by its endowments is also a great living endowment to hand on life from itself. Much true work, I understand, is given; noble subscriptions and donations I see are made by some, but we want no forlorn hopes in Christ's army, we want every man to have some touch of the hero, every man to be learning that quiet self-mastery which, by degrees, does the hardest things easily, with a smile on the face. This true heroic temper, which all can have, is always finding exercise in little things. Christ commands; to-day you are called on to obey. Those who believe the command of Christ will obey it, those who do not believe it won't. Not a word more shall be added; when a true authority says 'March,' no true soldier sits still.

By the late C. H. COOPER, F.S.A., author of "The Annals of Cambridge," and "Athenæ Cantabrigienses, greatly enlarged and re-written from the work of LE KEUX.

The work gives for each of the seventeen Colleges a history of the Foundation, with names of Founders and Benefactors, a list of Eminent Men educated in the College, the number of Fellowships and Scholarships, the Patronage, account of the Buildings, College Plate, &c. The lists of Eminent Men occupy 210 pages of the work, and contain a total of upwards of 4600 names. Besides these particulars relating to the Colleges, an account is given of all public Buildings belonging to the University and Town, of the Charities, of the Parish Churches, with the principal monumental tablets, and the names of eminent men buried in the churchyards.

Illustrated with 90 Woodcuts in the text; 152 plates on steel and copper by LE KEUX, Storer, &c., including about 20 etchings by ROBERT FARREN, author of "The Granta and the Cam."

Now in course of publication in monthly numbers.

The work will be completed in 3 Vols., Vol. I., containing Peterhouse, Clare, Pembroke, Caius, Trinity Hall, Corpus, King's, Queens', Catharine, Jesus, with 34 woodcuts, 50 engravings, by Le Keux, Storer, and 9 etchings by R. Farren, will be published in May.

The Cambridge Review:

A JOURNAL OF UNIVERSITY LIFE AND THOUGHT.

No. 15.] WEDNESDAY, MARCH 10, 1880. [PRICE SIXPENCE.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

An error in the University accounts has necessitated their complete republication in an amended form. The mistake appears to have been made in the common rents account, in the receipts from Burwell. The sum of £121 12s. 9d. unpaid arrears of rent, was first of all deducted from the increase for averages for 1878, and subsequently again deducted as a separate item. The University therefore is the richer by this amount, and the poorer by the cost of reprinting 36 pages of the Reporter.

The alterations in Pembroke are progressing as fast as can be expected. The new east end of the Chapel begins to rise from the ground. The old buildings facing Trumpington Street are entirely gutted, with a view to the readjustment of the rooms. The old Library and the rooms beyond this facing Pembroke Street have not as yet been begun, but will be very soon. Besides these alterations, the Tennis Court and houses adjoining it in Tennis Court Road and the houses in Pembroke Street beyond the Master's Lodge are fast being pulled down. It is proposed to erect on the site thus obtained a new court, to contain, it is hoped, about 30 sets of rooms.

A memorial, signed by upwards of 800 undergraduates, was hardly needed to shew that the immense majority of members of the University feel deeply the stigma of last Tuesday week's proceedings. We hear, however, that there will be no further town meeting, as the Mayor refuses the use of the Guildhall; and no University meeting, as the authorities of King's College decline to lend the Hall except at the request of the Church of England Temperance Association. This Association declines to take any part in a meeting at which a Unitarian minister speaks. A meeting at the Union has, therefore, been suggested.

The scene at the Local Option Meeting was repeated at Mr. Forbes' Lecture, on Thursday. It has been attempted by some apologists to fix the blame of the former on the town, but no such excuse can be forthcoming for the rowdyism which repeatedly interrupted and finally brought Mr. Forbes to an abrupt conclusion. "Gentlemen:—but I cannot call you gentlemen!"—Dr. Waraker is reported to have said, in endeavouring to quell the tumult, and no one, except perhaps those implicated, will do other than heartily endorse this outburst of honest indignation.

At the Fitzwilliam Museum last Friday, a practical demonstration in Painting by Professor Legros was substituted for the usual lecture by Professor Colvin. The Rev. R. Burn, of Trinity College, sat as "Model" and in a couple of hours Professor Legros produced a most excellent portrait of his "sitter," which, we believe, is still on view in the Library of the Museum.

To-morrow the Musical Society give their usual Lent Term Chamber concert. The performers will be Dr. Joachim, Messrs Ries, Zerbini, Hausmann, Gompertz, and Stanford—the music—Beethoven's Posthumous Quartet in E flat major, op. 127; Brahms' Quartet in B flat major, op. 67; Concerto for two violins (Bach); Sonata for Pianoforte and Violoncello (Boccherini); Violin Solos, Hungarian Dances, Nos. 4 and 10, (Brahms), and Caprice (Paganini). The violoncellist, Herr Hausmann, is professor at the High School of music, and has played Schumann's Violoncello Concerto lately with great success at the Crystal Palace. Frequenters of the Wednesday Popular Concerts will remember his playing Mr. Stanford's Violoncello Sonata last year. Messrs. Ries and Zerbini are the regular second violin and tenor from the St. James' Hall Concerts, and Herr Gompertz, our new violinist, is already, we hope, well known. He is going to play the duet concerto with Dr. Joachim. Last, but not least, comes the great violinist himself, who so readily gives his aid every year to this Easter concert, and deserves the thanks not only of the Musical Society but also of all Cambridge for his great kindness.

A meeting was held in Professor Stuart's rooms in Trinity last night to meet Mrs. E. A. Paterson, the Hon. Sec. of the Women's Protective and Provident League, who had been invited to read a paper on "The Wages and Conditions of Employment of Working Women."

A correspondence has been published between Mr. J. Orrell Lever, of the Thames and Channel Passenger Service, and the Presidents of the Boat Clubs at Cambridge and Oxford, on a proposal by the former that the Boat Race should be rowed on the ebb instead of the flow. This suggestion has been declined by Messrs. Prest and Rowe.

On Thursday Dr. J. Perkins, Bursar of Downing College, received a substantial recognition of his services to the Cambridgeshire Hunt, of which he has been Honorary Secretary for ten years. The testimonial consisted of an unique salver, of the date 1742, engraved with a hunting scene, and the names of four Downing covers at the corners, and a huge cup, which at the presentation was duly christened in champagne. The total value was a hundred and fifty guineas.

While out with the drag last Thursday, Mr. J. M. Paulton, of Trinity Hall, met with a serious accident, falling from his horse, which either fell on him or trampled upon him. Medical attendance was at once secured, and Mr. Paulton's condition was at first believed to be very critical; but we are glad to hear on good authority that the latest accounts are of a more encouraging character.

We are informed that the Mr. Lane who has been concerned in a recent action was not a member of St. John's College, and that Mr. F. G. A. Lane, who took his degree from that college in 1874, is at present resident in Ceylon.

"SMATTERINGS."

It is often the case that the use of a single word, if implying censure, or still more if ridicule, has more influence than many a long argument or much violent abuse. I believe the word which I have placed at the head of this article to have an ill effect of this kind, and desire to face it in its native ugliness and so to find what its terrors really are.

For we are all agreed that we must have nothing of it here. Thoroughness must be our motto; we are many, and can divide our forces: let a man find his natural tastes and follow them: if he is to read, he need not trouble to row: if he patronizes Fenner's, he may give up football: if he is an enthusiast in politics he may neglect pictures. Or two, perhaps three of these occupations may be combined by unusual energy: the most usual example being, as has often been remarked, the Rowing-and-Reading man. But this is dangerous work: and if still more is attempted, the result will be briefly "he has a smattering of everything, but can do nothing."

Now that ill-directed energy ends sometimes in so disappointing a way cannot be denied: "experience" may usually be trusted for facts, but her conclusions are often hasty. What appears to me to be overlooked is that many who attempt only one thing frequently fail in that, and that the personal taste which some would have us develope exclusively is in many cases not formed except as the result of a wide and varied education. In fact I believe that it is not the time which is given to attaining a slight knowledge of an interesting subject which is usually wasted, but that which is spent in abstruse investigations which very few are competent to pursue: and that "μηδὲν ἄγαν" is a caution more needed than "no smatterings." To shew that I attack no phantom, I will refer to an article on "Over Education," published last term in the Review, which expresses in a very clear and emphatic form the views to which I am diametrically opposed.

The present Classical Tripos occurs to me as the most natural illustration of my position. The results attained by candidates represent in almost all cases many years' continued work: no one who obtains a degree in it can fairly be called a "smatterer" in Classics. Yet he has probably given very little time to History, to Philology, to Philosophy, compared with the wide field these studies offer. He has a "smattering" of all, command over none. Yet few have regretted labour thus spent, or found the knowledge acquired slip from them. The new arrangements for this Tripos appear to me to alter details, but not to change this principle. The Candidates for Section C must have a smattering of Roman law: for Section E of Sanskrit and of Physiology. And in general knowledge of Classical Literature he will still be considered to be successful who knows something of all important authors: he who knows a great deal of one or two only has failed in the object set before him.

What then is the danger to be avoided, what is the "thoroughness" of work to be aimed at? I would suggest two tests. No one should attempt to learn what he cannot expect to remember or to return to again: and no subject should be taken up lightly which is not connected with other knowledge more familiar to the student. Thus a man reading for the Classical Tripos, should find out to the best of his power, what an author wrote and what he meant: but, unless he means to make Classics a life-study, should not trouble himself with what Paley thought was written or Schleiermacher thought was meant. I use two respected names to shew that my principle is quite general. So a student of Philology may well go into some details as to the physiology of the vocal organs, because they are connected with his subject, and he is likely to remember as well as use them.

Why should not this principle be acknowledged and carried further, till it comes to be considered a necessary part of liberal education that every one should have some slight knowledge of the outlines of all departments of knowledge? That practically such knowledge would be of the greatest value who can doubt, when many results gained by years of investigation can be learned and therefore used by a study of a few hours. We are inclined to smile at Bacon's boast of taking all knowledge to be his province: the sphere of science, we say, is extended: no one can grasp more than a small part of it. This is true of full and detailed knowledge, but it was equally true of that in Bacon's days: besides which we have the advantage of the clearing away of many useless and misleading theories, which should leave the groundwork the more easy to be grasped. Such knowledge would not be "thorough" in any one department: but I urge that it would be "thorough" as a knowledge of life, its conditions, its history, and its possibilities: and would contribute to that observation of the due proportion of attention which each specialist may claim which is at the present time so necessary.

This same principle I would apply to many other things besides knowledge as derived from books. I have merely used this as an example. Is there not a feeling—say, on the river—that it is no good a man rowing, unless he can make a decently good oar? It may be well for each man to choose that form of athletic exercise in which he is likely to find the greatest pleasure: but the athletic world might have its honours less grudged, were the place of those who cannot make any sport a chief object duly recognised. What secretary of a Debating Society has not heard the answer from those he wishes to get to speak that "they know they will never be orators?" Very likely not: but a very slight acquaintance with public speaking will make them the better men in many another way. Possibly an Editor of a University magazine might insist that the art of expressing opinions on paper was not so useless practically as to be altogether neglected in a University course. I venture to think that a speech of Perikles or an essay of Theophrastus would be better understood and more keenly enjoyed by the help of practical experience of the conditions and opportunities of speaking and writing, than by many a Latin or German essay with all its disquisitions and illustrations.

Travelling will be another example. The æsthetic critic turns with a sneer from the party which has travelled over the greater part of Italy in a month. What have they learnt of the antiquities of Italy? what of its art? what of the character of its present inhabitants? Little probably of each of these: but yet they may have learnt much more of Italy, and so of the world as a whole than those who have devoted themselves for months to the picture-galleries of Florence, or the forum of Pompeii. And the general knowledge will not be forgotten, and can hardly fail to be useful if only in the enlargement of interests and sympathies.

To return homewards, how does this principle affect the value of our Ordinary Degree? It may imply but a limited knowledge of Greek and Latin, of Mathematics, and of the holder's own special subject: it does not follow that combined with the training implied in three years' residence here, it does not vouch, roughly speaking for a liberal education. Examination can only test one side of education: and I believe the "social" value which all allow to be attached to a Cambridge degree to be amply sufficient proof that it is not a mere name. Of course this does not imply that the proposed changes would not make the training better: but that the tests should be made more severe I see no reason to believe. Rather it appears to me to be the task of teachers still further to simplify and systematise the subjects they would have understood: and those who have lately been attending some most interesting and suggestive lectures on this subject will long since have recognised that great part of the things taught even in elementary schools are either ridiculous or superfluous.

I have gone somewhat over the same ground as the writer of the article on "Specialisation" in last week's number. I must plead in excuse that the greater part of this was written before I had read that article, and that "Waste not, want not" must be for the present the motto of the Review with respect to its articles. And now I must go buy some primers.

THREE CAMBRIDGE CHARITIES.

It is not the least boast of an University that its sons scattered far and wide are ever amongst the foremost in acts of philanthropy and beneficence. And each Cambridge man who comes back, whether after disappointment or success, seeks to tell his story here expecting sympathy and help. So not three only, or even thirty, would be the Cambridge Charities if counted thus. The three selected are distinctively Cambridge Charities, both in their local limitation and in their original conception. In other places such as the Metropolis and the large manufacturing centres new philanthropies spring up, or old ones take new shapes, mostly under the irresistible pressure of untoward circumstances; the evils inseparable from one system to day being corrected as well as may be by the experiment of another system to morrow. The Universities, as centres of thought, should from time to time evolve new ideas, plan new schemes, and, though on a small scale, put them to a practical test. This principle will be found to some extent exemplified in the origin and work of the Charities to which the following sketches refer.

I. At a public meeting on December 6, 1847, the promoters of the Cambridge Industrial School propounded what was then an entirely original scheme for instructing and elevating that troublesome and too often criminal class of lads, too old for the National School, who through misfortune or their own fault are left to loiter in idleness or in mischief about the streets. We are now so accustomed to hear of the Industrial Schools which serve as Reformatories of young convicted criminals that we with some difficulty realise the fact that only thirty years ago this institution had to be regarded as an untried experiment in consequence of its novel character, and that the committee had to think out ab initio all the details of its management, because they knew of no similar undertaking from whose experience they could gain any information to guide them.

The brand of a criminal conviction has never been required as a passport to this, as to the Reformatories, but neither has it been a bar to admission. To save its pupils from falling into evil courses has been its main office, whilst the welcome it has given to offenders, and the success which has attended its efforts to reclaim them has entitled it also to something of the character of a "Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society."

After the passing of the Reformatories Act in 1854 it was thought possible that the usefulness of the school might be extended by obtaining Government recognition, and stability given to it by Government help being added to the precarious support of voluntary contributions. An Inspector of H.M. Prisons, however, gave his decided opinion that to do so would very much injure the working of the school, and the idea was abandoned. The principle of compulsion or constraint has never been introduced into the school. The lads come voluntarily, they seek admission as a privilege, they remain of their own free will.

No description can compare with an afternoon's visit for conveying a true insight into the working of the school. In its main characteristics it remains now as it was designed by its founders.

In Victoria Road, New Chesterton, close to St. Luke's Church, the visitor will find standing in the midst of a well-kept garden, the school, house and workshops, with some acres of farm behind, still under the charge of the same genial master, Mr. R. Boning, as when the first scholars were admitted, thirty years ago. Additions have been made, a few dormitories over the workshop, more land taken into the farm, and necessary buildings erected. One addition recalls an incident worth mention, if it was not actually the result of it. Dinner has always been given, and cases were met with sometimes of boys who came fasting in the early morning, with barely strength to endure until dinner time; one boy had been known to faint at his work, and it was found that his companions frequently saved their own crusts to give him during the morning's work. For many years an early breakfast has been given to boys who are strictly punctual.

Little need be said of the daily routine. It includes school work, farm or garden work, and practice at some trade, that of the tailor being most in request. Strict economy is practised in working up the presents of cast-off clothes sent by the supporters of the school; when these fail, an inferior substitute has to be found in repairing one another's garments. It would occupy too much space to trace the history of any of the scholars. One may be mentioned in connection with the shop as illustrating the free adaptation to special circumstances of which the institution is capable. An application for admission was received from a man who had served in the Crimea, was just discharged from the hospital, and unfit for hard work. The village parochial authorities agreed to take care of his wife and children whilst the man came to the school and was taught in the tailor's shop, with the hope of being able to keep himself and his family from ending their days together in the workhouse. Many affecting incidents might be recorded; they will be omitted with less regret, because the early ones have been better related in the second volume (1860) of "Macmillan's Magazine" by the present Bishop of Carlisle, with the warm appreciation of one who, as Secretary of the Committee, had watched intently the progress of the movement during the first ten years of its existence. An esprit de corps, akin to the public school spirit, has grown up around the Industrial School, to an extent gratifying to observe. Seldom does one of the old boys return to Cambridge without paying an early visit to his old master, whilst from every quarter of the globe letters come from time to time to tell of gratitude or to keep the Master informed of his former scholar's life and doings. The former of these remarks is true also of many of the former patrons of the school, and evidences the kind remembrance in which they still hold it. Of yet more interest is it to see how the school has drawn together individuals from these two classes at first so widely separated. Bishop McDougall singled out the leader of a little gang of boys on the farm to be his schoolmaster and catechist in Borneo. Archdeacon Mackenzie, afterwards Bishop of Central Africa, selected one to accompany him to Natal. A third clergyman obtained here a groom or gardener to follow his fortunes from one living to another. These fine fellows, whose better qualities have been developed by the excellent discipline of the place, stand out the more conspicuously by contrast with the degradation from which they were raised. Necessarily there have been many cases of disappointment, but in spite of them the opinion of those who have done most for the school will be that they have had an ample reward for any anxiety, or time, or money they have expended, and that the original design of the promoters was wisely and nobly conceived.

II.—Before "Charity Organization" in the Metropolis and elsewhere was conducted on its present systematic plan, the Cambridge Mendicity Society was striving to check indiscriminate almsgiving and cut off the rewards of what is too often mendacity as well as mendicity, and instead to render substantial help to the really indigent. The Society had a house near the Abbey Church, on the Newmarket Road, one purpose of which was to afford a night's lodging to honest but homeless wayfarers. It is to be feared it was frequently the resort of idle and wortbless vagrants. The main purpose of the Society was to make careful enquiry into each case of alleged distress before administering relief. The work was often useful, though fitful and always circumscribed. Much prejudice had to be encountered. and not least from that class of kindly but weak minded people who cannot resist the appeal of the most flagrant impostor. All the easy selfishness of human nature is enlisted on the beggar's side, though better judgment tells us the gift is probably worse than wasted, and reason urges that the command "never turn thy face from any poor man" is miserably perverted if taken to mean "give him sixpence and get him out of sight the quicker." An example may be cited of what may sometimes be done by a resolute individual. A merchant annoyed by the persistent appeals of an impostor at length told him either to go away or accompany him to the Police Court. "If your story is true I give you half a crown, if not I give you in charge." The man protested his willingness to submit to any enquiry. When they came to the more crowded streets in the centre of the town he shewed signs of a desire to escape, but was met by the threat: "If you try to get away I'll knock you down." In vain he then begged for mercy, he had misjudged his man, and had to take the threatened consequences. This incident appears to illustrate fairly the work of Charity Organization Societies, to choke off impostors and give the more substantial assistance to the truly necessitous. Few men have the power, even when they have sufficient resolution, to act thus for themselves. But a Society can frequently succeed where an individual must almost certainly fail.

The old Society is now superseded by another bearing the same name, but under different management. The old house has been given up, and with it the practice of granting lodgings to casual wayfarers; and the offices have been removed to Post Office Terrace. The use of Investigation Tickets is continued as before. These tickets ensure for the bearer, in every case, careful enquiry, and as far as possible suitable attention. They are supplied in sheets to subscribers, and also gratuitously to others who apply for them at the office. The Society desires to act in complete concert with public charities, and is prepared to aid, by its opportunities for enquiry, to give proper direction to acts of private beneficence. It appeals earnestly to the public never to give direct relief to unknown applicants but to offer one of its "Investigation Tickets" instead, and to communicate with the Society in order that it may be able to grant adequate relief in the case of the deserving few. Could its aims be realized to any considerable extent much would be done to sweep away from this neighbourhood the vicious system of modern vagrancy.

III. The aim of the other charity, the Cambridge Female Mission, is sufficiently indicated by its title. Twenty-five years ago it was originated by an undergraduate, a Fellow Commoner of Trinity College. Sensible of the impropriety and danger of attempting to touch the evil directly, he and those associated with him were not content to leave every means untried, and agreed to attempt by an agent what they were unable to do themselves.

There already existed a Home or Refuge, adjoining Christ Church, for the reception of the rescued, and around that and the Mission have since gathered various voluntary agents, clergy and laity, not the least active of whom have been ladies. To maintain the constant services of an agent has been looked upon, since the foundation of the Mission, as the peculiar work of members of the University, who seek thereby to raise some protest on behalf of social purity, and, if possible, to restore some who have fallen from it.

The past year has witnessed a decided advance in the work of the Mission. The active woman now employed as agent expressed her desire to live in the midst of her work, and to have her own house made available for a mission house. Last year a house was found which seems to satisfy all the required conditions. The Industrial Dwellings Company ejected from a "rookery" which they had acquired some tenants of ill fame. One of these houses, thoroughly cleansed and furnished at considerable expense, has now become the mission house of the society. To quote from one of the papers of the society, "If the proctors or police wish to find temporary shelter for a houseless or runaway girl, she can be taken there, instead of being left to be ensnared by those who would trade upon her ruin." The agent also herself can now at once invite to her own home any one whom she hopes or has begun to influence. Encouragement of this mission may well go hand in hand with the promotion of "social purity," advocated last term in the pages of the Cambridge Review. It appears to have before it a hopeful no less than a beneficial work.

A. F. TORRY.

SOCIETY FOR THE PROMOTION OF MANUAL DEXTERITY.

At a meeting of this Society, held in the Assembly Rooms, Seven Dials, Mr. FAGIN in the chair, a paper was read by Mr. C. ADGER, "On some recent Investigations into the condition of the Yuhnivers' City of Kaymbritch, and the abundant opportunities of extending the Operations of the Society in that direction." The paper was a most interesting one, and recounted how that Mr. C. Adger, having thought it advisable to direct his energies to the discovery of new sources of wealth, owing to the want of tolerance shewn by the Bawbees, the natives of those localities which he had last visited—(groans)—this said want of tolerance having even for a time cost him his liberty—(sympathetic demonstrations)—had, on the recommendation of a friend made an expedition to Kaymbritch. He had here found the inhabitants divided into two distinct classes, the Thoune-Smên and the Ghoune-smên, of whom the latter inhabited the part called the Yuhnivers' City, each class with its separate government, and, he had heard, sometimes engaged in the most violent party strife against each other. As far as he could see the Thoune-smên did not differ in any great respect from the Counterje-Umpers of those parts with which most of his hearers were acquainted, but the Ghoune-smên were in many ways distinct from other people. He thought that the Ghoune-Smên were the original inhabitants, and that the Thoune-Smên must have been a later settlement attracted there by the many openings afforded by the presence of the Ghoune-Smên. Who knew but what they might not have once formed an earlier fraternity such as that which he now had the honour of addressing? What inclined him to entertain this idea was the fact of the Thoune-Smên acknowledging the tutelary influence of their patron Zwyndel. But it was of the Ghoune-Smên that he wished most particularly to treat. Of their manners and customs he would say little, only as far as regarded one of the main objects of the Society, namely, the advancement of the Philosophy of Appropriation. He found that there were certain times for public meals, and games, and also certain ceremonies called Lektiores, at which the Ghoune-Smên were required to attend, and here an ample field was afforded to the investigator for the maintenance of that mystery which formed so important an item in the proper fulfiment of the mission of the Society.

The character of the Ghoune-Smên was of a very innocent type. They were evidently very much behind the age. Having implicit trust in each other, they appeared not to have realised the existence of an exterior and more experienced world. Some there were, however, who studied books, and perhaps this was the reason that they guarded their goods as jealously as many of the people of Ken-Syngton and other places of that sort, but he had remarked as a curious fact that those who exercised the greatest caution were those that had least to lose. They had a curious custom called "Spohrting." This was a most curious phenomenon, and he thought that it might afford an opening for some interesting discussion amongst after-speakers on the advantages accruing to such Fraternities as theirs from the proportionate distribution of prudence and money. This would be more strongly exemplified by what he was going to say of the other class of Ghoune-Smên. He had found that those who did not read books, but devoted themselves to exercise in the games, as a rule did not take any precautions against intrusion when called away from their dwellings, but left them open. Here he thought traces could be marked of the assumption of the attributes of the ancient Nemesis by their patron Zwindel. They did not even leave any direction to the servants to guard their property. He would relate an instance of this that had occurred to himself. Walking among the buildings of that part of the town called the Yuhnivers' City he saw in at the window of a dwelling-house that the rooms on the ground floor were vacant. His instinct as an explorer told him to enter, and he found himself close by a door in a passage. He opened this door, and saw a gold watch and five gold coins lying on the table. Rejoicing in the success of his investigations, his next movement was of course to convey these to his receptacle for specimens, designing them for an offering to the common bond of relationship of the tribe, their uncle, according to the rules of the Fraternity. He then left the house without being observed, and here were the articles. (Applause.) He thought facts spoke for themselves; but it was now getting late, and as there were probably other members who would like to speak, he would end. (Great applause, amidst which the gentleman resumed his seat.)

Mr. FAGIN, having returned thanks in the name of the Society to the reader, proceeded to make a few remarks on what they had just heard. He said that it was evident that a great field lay open for the advancement of their views of the Theory Meum and Tuum, in the locality from which Mr. C. ADGER, has just returned. And in the present state of affairs in their old fields of investigation which the bigotry of the Japees, Baubees—(hisses)—and others was fast closing to their efforts, such a discovery as that recorded in the paper just read was most valuable. The general world was becoming much too much on the defensive—(a Voice: Rather so) —and did not make allowance for the doctrines of a large fraternity, whose pride forbade them to think of degrading themselves to the condition of beasts of labour. (Cheers.) But here they had just heard of a region where primitive innocence apparently was still in its full vigour, and where even the first beginner might safely try his skill. Dexterity should not fail, and though the hand of the Society might be against every one, and vice versa, yet it would never be crushed. (Great cheering, and cries of "We won't be crushed.")

Mr. W. SYKES then proposed a vote of mutual confidence among the members of the Society, and recommended that no time should be lost in profiting by these recent discoveries. The vote was carried unanimously.

Refreshments were then handed round, and after the usuasl festive demonstrations the meeting dispersed in various conditions of mental fervour.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE UNIVERSITY LIBRARY.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—It appears to me there is some necessity for reform in the admission of undergraduates to the above splendid Library. I think the rules as to the wearing of cap and gown are too stringent, and great convenience would be caused by removal of the necessity of presenting oneself at the Library in full academical costume. It certainly is not agreeable to a person living say in Downing Street, to go down to the Library and back for his private hat in an afternoon. This inconvenience might be alleviated, if not entirely stopped, by allowing persons to enter on showing their cards, (for nearly all University men have the names of their colleges on their cards), and I do not see it could make any difference to the authorities.

Your obedient servant,

"BOOKWORM."

THE WHEWELL SCHOLARSHIPS.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIR,—The Pentateuch teaches us the immorality of seething a kid in its mother's milk. Probably the want of civilization which prevailed in the time of Moses prevented him from contemplating the possibility of a mother being speared on the horns of her kid.

Nevertheless, some such idea cannot fail to present itself to the minds of those who have read Mr. Scrutton's letter in your last number—a letter evidently prompted by a truly filial desire for the welfare of the foundation of which he is so distinguished an ornament.

Mr. Scrutton urges that the examination for the Whewell Scholarships is calculated to encourage "cramming," and to discourage "originality" and "intelligent study of the subject." Perhaps a reference to the list of scholars would be a good answer, as far as it went, to these allegations, but it seems to me that Mr. Scrutton's propositions are by no means borne out by the facts he quotes.

He gives the first paper set last year in full, or nearly so, and urges that nearly the same questions have been set in every one of the preceding five years. But an examination of the questions themselves affords a ready answer to this plausible objection. It seems to me that the twelve questions quoted by Mr. Scrutton cover very nearly the whole ground of International Law. This being so, and this being the principle on which the examiners work, it necessarily follows that the questions of one year should very closely resemble those of others. Mr. Scrutton appends parenthetical inferences to most of the questions he quotes. Put together these inferences read as follows: "It pays to get up the plan and principles of Grotius. Private International Law pays. Blockade pays. Contraband pays. Extradition pays." And he might have added, though it is partly included in Blockade and Contraband, "Prize Courts pay."

I think these inferences might be summarised thus: "It pays to get up Grotius and be familiar with the law determining the relations between belligerents and neutrals." Now the work of Grotius is the recognised standard book upon the subject of International Law, and is, I believe, always specifically announced as a subject for examination in these scholarships. Whether I am right in this or not (and I have not the means of reference by me), it will hardly be denied that it is a book which the student of International Law may fairly be expected to read, and that a vague question upon its scope and method gives room for a considerable display of acquaintance with the subject, and even of intelligent study and originality. For the rest, it appears to me that Private International Law, together with the law of the Prize Courts in its widest sense, forms not only a very large part of treatises upon International Law, but an extremely interesting part, and the only part which comes fitly and naturally within the field of jurisprudence.

If the examiners take this view it is natural that they should not lay stress upon such subjects as Recognition of Independence, and what amounts to a casus belli, which are in truth questions not of jurisprudence but of politics, or upon the Rights of Ambassadors, which are nothing more than matters of etiquette, and of which the study for other persons than attachés to embassies is in the highest degree unprofitable.

That examinations encourage cramming is a very frequent complaint, but if cramming means a complete study of all that is most important in the subject to be examined upon, I can see no harm in it.

I entirely agree with Mr. Scrutton that the three essays in International Law set last year were more adapted to test memory and fast writing than originality. I would remark upon this that the claims of originality are considered in the general essay paper with which Mr. Scrutton finds no fault; that memory is an excellent thing; and that even fast writing has its uses.

Your obedient servant,

HERBERT STEPHEN.

SIRS,—Is it generally known in the University that one of the more beautiful specimens of mediæval architecture in this town is about to be destroyed? I am told that the timbered houses at the bottom of Petty Cury are to be pulled down at once. They are said to be the birth-place of Jeremy Taylor, but whether this be true or no, it is a great disgrace to the town to improve off these redeeming features in its general ugliness. Can nothing be done to save real antiquities while we are spending thousands in putting up imitation ones?

THE UNIVERSITY EIGHT.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—I should be obliged if you would permit me to answer some of the criticisms which my article of two weeks back has called forth. Before doing so, however, I wish to repudiate most emphatically the charge that I intended to impute unfairness and favouritism to Mr. Prest. I had thought it sufficient to disclaim any such intention in the article itself, but, in spite of this, the expressions used seem to have been construed in a sense I never imagined they could bear. I had no thought of doing more than questioning the soundness of Mr. Prest's judgment in regard to the selection and placing of the crew. In justice to myself I ought to point out that most of what I said has been corroborated by the opinion of at least a good many of the rowing critics who have examined the crew at Kingston. This is especially true with regard to my remarks about stroke, seven, and bow. The most that has been said so far of the first two is that the next two weeks will probably make them fit for their places, rather a poor consolation at this stage of the practice,—and respecting bow, it seems to be agreed on all hands that he ought not to be in the Eight at all. Baillie's fault of irregularity in the stroke, which, as I declared at the beginning of the present term, would almost certainly prevent the crew from getting together behind him, has become even more glaring on the Thames, and has had exactly the effect predicted. Even now, I am sure our chances would improve wonderfully, if Davis was moved to stroke, and whatever the result of the race may be, I shall adhere to my opinion that the boat would have been a better one, if he had been left this year in his old place.

There are two letters in last week's Review, the writers of which seem to assume that I do accuse Mr. Prest of unfairness. Having already stated that they are wrong in this assumption, I should like to say a few words about their other criticisms on my article. "Argonaut" says he thought the crew "well on" in time, steadiness, and pace, when he saw them. It is always interesting to have the opinion of an "Old Blue" about a University eight, and doubtless he will find some to agree with him in this judgment, but I cannot help observing that, as far as I have heard, time and steadiness are the points in which the crew is generally deemed particularly defective, though it certainly is said, in answer to all objections, that it has a fair amount of pace. My critic, however, then proceeds to qualify his panegyric in terms which really neutralize its whole effect. "Provided they reach well forward, catch the beginning, and make a good end of the stroke, they will win." What else is this but saying that, if the crew possessed the most essential qualities of good oarsmen, they would be a strong boat? "Old Blue" thus virtually admits that they did not possess those qualities, when he saw them, and, as he has answered himself so effectively I need not myself bring any more arguments against him. "Fair Play" confines his remarks to the last paragraph of my article, and takes exception to my arguments in proof of the President's want of judgment in not having considered more carefully the results of last May's races. He says that since then there has been time enough for some men to improve. Of course, no one would deny this, but surely the presumption is at least as much in favour of other boats as of the Jesus crew, and for that reason such an argument is simply worthless. "Fair Play" should also remember, too, that new oarsmen would in any case be certain to improve more than one with so long an experience as, let us say, the present bow of the Eight. His next argument is that "it does not follow, because one boat is better together than another, and therefore goes faster, that the individuals composing the crew are better oarsmen." I answer that, as the Jesus boat was at least as well together as any crew on the river, except perhaps Third Trinity, this consideration, if it proves anything, is really a strong point in support of my plea. "Fair Play" then states the Lady Margaret boat was the only one which equalled the Jesus boat in pace. This is not correct, as everyone who saw the races ought to know. It was quite plain that the First Trinity boat was as nearly as possible exactly equal to the Jesus boat, which was itself distinctly inferior to the Lady Margaret boat. "Fair Play" misrepresents my point about the First Trinity boat. It is unfortunately true that almost every crew is burdened with what is expressively termed. "luggage," but what I said was that the boat in question had "more than its fair share of it," a very important difference.

This mistake, taken together with the former, is enough to make one suspect that "what 'Fair Play' saw of the races" was really nothing at all. My critic then says that representatives of the crews I thought unduly neglected, in comparison with the Jesus boat, are not seen in the Eight, chiefly because they were found wanting in the Trial Eights last term. This argument assumes that the Trial Eights were well selected, an assumption which I dispute in toto, and which is shown to be wrong, if by nothing else, at least by the way the Reserve Eight has usually been made up. "Fair Play," in disputing the soundness of my reasonings to account for the apparently abnormal speed of the University Eight, starts the strange doctrine that a wind behind a boat does not increase its pace. He says that, "if I had ever rowed," I should know this, but I suspect that rowing men will be more ready, after his enunciating so strange a theory, to apply the hypothesis to himself than to me. Briefly, I may say, that, over the ordinary University course, I have found that a fairly strong wind (not of course a gale) makes a difference of 10 to 15 seconds in the pace of a boat. A simple argument à fortiori will now enable my readers to estimate the value of "Fair Play's" objection, especially as I gave a faster stream and a quicker stroke than usual, part of the credit for the speed. I maintain that, under these circumstances, a weak crew might easily show to much greater advantage than one which was really far better.

I am reminded that I have omitted to notice what is by some considered the strongest reason of all for putting so many Jesus men in the boat, viz., their having won the Grand Challenge Cup at Henley. I confess I do not see that this alters the case at all. If the Jesus boat, which was slower up here than Lady Margaret, and only equal to First Trinity, was able to win that prize by taking in two good men, surely the same success would have been just as possible for other crews, if they had been fortunate enough to have obtained a similar increase of strength. In fact, such an argument simply amounts to this,—that everyone who rows in a winning Grand Challenge Eight has a primâ facie right to a place in a University Eight; for if the present crew remains unchanged, all the Jesus boat which rowed at Henley will have obtained their "blues." Such a claim cannot, I believe, be justly made, and I am sure most rowing men will agree with me. Besides the Grand Challenge crews of last year were weaker than usual, and this makes the claim still less tenable. I appeal with confidence, on this point at least, to the common sense of anyone who has the slightest knowledge of the subject. I am, sirs, yours truly,

ARGO.

THE FITZWILLIAM MUSEUM.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—The engraving stands at the Fitzwilliam Museum now display, amongst the works of art, three drawings by Mdlle de Merian, from the Vansittart collection. Why should the printed inscription at the base of each give the artist's name as Marian Sibylla Meriam? In a folio edition of her famous work on the "Insects and Plants of Surinam," in my possession, she gives her name in the preface as Marie Sibylle de Merian, though on the three title pages—manifestly however, reprints, with modifications, of each other—she is described as Marie Sybille de Merian. Under any circumstances the Vansittart description of the artist would appear to be erroneous.

Yours truly,

W. H.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

DEAR SIRS,—Much difference of opinion exists as to who invaded and stopped the Local Option Meeting last week. Some members of the University strive to prove that it was entirely the publicans' fault, the Cambridge Chronicle with less reason and less confidence tries to shift most of the blame on the University; while there are some who say the Conservative party was at the bottom of it all, that Mr. Hunter Rodwell would have endangered his seat had he been Chairman, that the Tory Mayor purposely sent only six policemen to guard the whole Hall, and that the Conservative Proctors smiled and rejoiced over a tumult, in which they feigned to believe the undergraduates took no part. Without siding with the Chronicle, which seeks to exonerate the "Trade," or with the "ranting Radicals" who put all evil down to "those Tories," I must in these columns raise a protest against those members of the University who lay all the blame on the publicans.

The Rev. J. T. Lawrence, in writing to the Daily News (March 6) assumes "that there could not have been many undergraduates concerned in forcing the doors," because a few minutes before the opening of the doors he was passing by and observed "that there were few University-men among the rough crowd already assembled." I suppose that after Mr. Lawrence had passed by many more undergraduates came up, for in the first crowd which broke down the door, overturned forms, and took possession of reserved seats, according to all other people's accounts, very many undergraduates were to be seen. This crowd, of which no one can exactly say how many were undergraduates and how many publicans and friends, occupying seats for which they had not paid, and for which they knew others had paid, drove out the rightful owners into the gangways; and it was this filling up of the gangways which prevented any attempt being made by the Proctors and others to suppress the disorderly. In fact a message was sent by the Senior Proctor to the stewards, that he could not move about and overawe the undergraduates, unless the passages were made clear. And who caused this overcrowding? The undergraduates themselves in great part who came in without tickets; for it seems that the publican party had been able to secure tickets—though not for reserved seats, which they and some undergraduates, following them, invaded. Of course the majority of the University men were orderly, as were also the majority of the townsmen! Only a few—perhaps fifty—undergraduates followed the distinguished lead of a professional pugilist with his fifty, or so, friends, and cheered his little eccentricities. But such few "black sheep" have for several years past controlled meetings of various sorts in the town of Cambridge—which they may not know existed many years before the University came and "made" it, and so many ladies are kept from attending meetings in the Guildhall, for fear of a riot. The University permits inane cries and childish proceedings in the Senate House; but the Town will not much longer endure the same in its Assembly Room. If the Proctors have any desire (I speak of no individual Proctors, for it has been the same for many years) to keep up their office, they had better punish men for creating disorder. How often does a member of the University receive a more severe punishment, than an order to "go home"? If once the offence were understood to deserve a term's rustication, or more, the offenders would rapidly diminish.

Another "Local Option" meeting will shortly be held by the Town, at which greater precautions will be taken to exclude the disorderly; and members of the University will, of course, be admitted. Will there be found any more, on that occasion, to side with the "scum" of Cambridge.

Trinity College,
March 6, 1880.

I am, &c.
GEORGE W. JOHNSON.

The subjoined letter appears in the Cambridge Papers of Saturday:—

LOCAL OPTION MEETING.

SIR,—The uproar at the Guildhall this evening made it impossible to obtain a hearing, or I had hoped to lay before the meeting a passage from Meadley's Life of Paley (Sunderland, 1809), p. 131, which shows that Local Option would have secured in the Cambridge of 1770 the support of the foremost man of the University, a Senior Wrangler, whose text-books rank as English classics, and who afterwards graduated in the wider competition of the world as a reformer and philanthropist of the highest class. The passage is as follows:—

"Being of opinion that habits of intemperance, the bad effects of which he had strongly exposed in his Moral Philosophy (book iv., chapter 2), were much increased and encouraged by the unnecessary accumulation of taverns, public-houses, and dram-shops, Dr. Paley attempted not only to diminish the magnitude of the evil in his own neighbourhood by a greater discrimination in granting licenses, but more earnestly addressed the bench of justices on the subject, at the quarter sessions, but, being feebly supported by the other magistrates, and actually discountenanced by the community, his efforts were ineffectual, though originating in the most virtuous motives, and unquestionably directed to the public good."

Paley's sagacity laid his finger on the sore, but the patient then refused to be cured. Now, it is believed, the patient has learnt wisdom. Drunkards, we are assured, and drunkard's wives and children, pray us not to lead them into temptation. If so, Paley's difficulty has vanished. Let any sober man stroll through the Seven-dials and its neighbourhood at night, and he must think, "Were I a drunkard, I could bate the dram-shop."

If I could hope to be heard, I would entreat the advocates of temperance to spare the persons of brewers and publicans. In the Alliance News of 31st January, p. 69, is a letter from the antipodes, signed by Sir William Fox, in which, outdoing the Pharisee in the parable, he proposes to "put an end to the confusion between the sheep and the goats, which in some quarters appears to exist." Unfortunately, this "confusion" must exist, till an Omniscient Judge decides who are His. But I appeal to all lovers of fair play, to all who would enlist the sympathies and exertions of licensed victuallers in favour of temperance, to calm such wild blasts of fanaticism whenever they rage.

Prof. Hughes (he will pardon my naming him) once told me that for ten years (when engaged on the Geological Survey) he lived in country public-houses, and found them almost universally orderly and respectable.

My experience is very limited, but it would lead me to the same conclusion with respect to publicans in villages. And it must be remembered that the publican who keeps a quiet house does what we dare not do in our own rooms, that is, he warns his guests to cease drinking when they have had enough.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
St. John's, March 2nd, 1880.
JOHN E. B. MAYOR.

COLLEGE CORRESPONDENCE.

CLARE.

On Friday the motion of A. E. Campbell, "that smoking was conducive to greatness in the nation and in the individual," was rejected by 21 votes to 17. B. Macleod opposed.

The first two rounds of our Association scratch sixes were played off last week. There were 30 entries. The following teams are in for the final:—Allison, Armstrong, Bagnall, Colville, Gaskell, Weston; Browning, M'cConnel, Macdonnell, Murcott, Roberson, Smith.

PEMBROKE.

If our second boat is tend to go up, they must certainly try and put more life into their rowing.

Our Association Football team have played two matches during the past week: on Thursday against the Old Wykehamists, who defeated us by one goal; on Friday against Newmarket, which resulted in a draw, neither side obtaining a goal.

On Thursday the Benedick Society met to read 'Twelfth Night,' and it being the last meeting of the term, as usual the evening was finished up with music and songs.

On Saturday, before the Debating Society, J. W. Willink moved "that in the opinion of this house early marriages are most undesirable." The house differed from the honourable opener, and the motion was lost by a considerable majority.

The P.C.M.S. gave on Monday, the 1st inst., the last of their musical evenings for this term; in which they were kindly assisted by friends from other colleges; there was a large and appreciative audience. The society has now been in existence one term and the College may be congratulated on possessing such a strong and enthusiastic musical element.

GONVILLE AND CAIUS.

The Scientific Society heard a paper read by C. S. Bayley, on "the vocal organs." The essayist dwelt especially on the mode in which musical sounds are produced by the human voice.

The debate this week was on a novel topic. E. Sympson moved "that in the opinion of the society poll men should not be allowed to proceed to the M.A. degree.;' The motion was opposed by Weldon, and lost by 17 to 7.

At the Science and Art, J. W. Welsford, on "Robert Burns."

On Saturday night at the Once a Week, the readings were "Tam o' Shanter," by J. W. Welsford; "My wife's cousin," by Lacey; "Old graf Brõm," from Kottabos, by W. Ridgway; and Lambe's "Poor Relations," by A. G. Schneider.

The Shakespere Society read the first three acts of the "Merry Wives of Windsor."

TRINITY HALL.

Our second boat, after having gone very unsatisfactorily for some days, has began to pick up a little; there is hardly sufficient improvement, however, considering the proximity of the races. The third boat is going well and strongly, and appears to clear a very fair amount of water. There is no change in either of the crews.

CORPUS CHRISTI.

On the eve of the Lent races we shall not venture to offer any remarks on the chances of our two boats, and thus forbear to indulge in predictions which might very possibly be falsified by the event. The crews are constituted as last week, and those who receive their first boat colours are J. R. Burgess, 4; J. G. Allen, 2; and A. H. Butt, bow.

The Musical Society has, we understand, displayed unflagging interest during the past term in their weekly practices, in view of the May concert, which has been provisionally fixed for Wednesday, May 26th.

The discussion at the meeting of the Debating Society, on Saturday, 6th instant, was of a very interesting character, when the President, A. Paice, sought to convince his audience that "Individuals are responsible only to a very limited degree, for their beliefs and opinions." P. Williams led the opposition in a speech of considerable energy, and after speeches from the Secretary, and several others, one of the best-sustained debates of the term concluded in the motion being rejected by 9 votes to 10.

KING'S.

On Friday last a meeting of the Cricket Club was held for the purpose of appointing officers for next term. A. J. F. Ford was elected Captain. R. H. Macaulay, Secretary, and H. Thynne, Lawn Tennis Secretary.

The Debating Society met directly afterwards, when J. R. Stephen moved "the extension of Capital Punishment." The motion was rejected. Next Friday C. H. Reynolds will advocate "Local Option."

QUEENS'.

In the second round of the Fives tournament, Temperley and Giles "scratched," as also did Haynes and Higham. Bolton and Rowlands beat Ellis and Manley with ease, both 'love' games. The final tie was played on Saturday, March 5th, Bolton and Rowlands v. Rix and Dummelow. The first game was even throughout, Bolton and Rowlands gaining three points on game-ball-all and winning by 15 to 12. The second game was a walk-over for Rix and Dummelow, the other pair only scoring six points. In the third and final game, '4-love' was called in favour of Bolton and Rowland. The scoring ran up evenly: 7—3, 11—7; game ball, 10. A good sprint and three or four hot rounds gave Bolton and Rowlands the victory, 15—12.

ST. CATHARINE'S.

Our first boat remains the same as it was last week, except that Harries and Vidal have taken the places of Vicars and Woolcott, at 2 and 5 respectively.

We have been very unfortunate in losing the services of four or five valuable oars within the last ten days, either through illness or accident. This has necessitated the rowing of several untrained men in the second boat.

We are to have a debate to-morrow, "on the advisability of attempting to restrain intemperance by legislation."

JESUS.

The Debating Society held its first general meeting on Saturday, and decided "that deviations from the truth were sometimes justifiable"; a very comforting doctrine.

Our boats have been unlucky: the fourth failed to get on, and the third, after changing stroke unavoidably twice, have just lost their seven, Rhodes. The second boat is going well.

CHRIST'S.

At the Debating Club, on Saturday, March 6th, W. Hewitt proposed "the Abolition of Capital Punishment." J. H. Dove opposed. The motion was lost by 40—21.

Many and deep are the rejoicings at the success of our second boat. We hope that our position on the river will now be more worthy of the College.

ST. JOHN'S.

The Debating Society on Saturday discussed the question of "Trade Unions," and by a small majority decided that they were not "detrimental to the commercial prosperity of the country." After the debate the following officers were elected for the October term:—President, F. H. Colson; Vice-President, A. Williams; Treasurer, G. C. M. Smith; Secretary, O. Rigby. The Treasurer's report, which showed a considerable balance in hand, was also adopted.

In the recently established Hare and Hounds Club we are glad to note that the Johnians have been prominent, J. S. Yeo, C. P. Cory, J. S. Sandys, and R. Hall, having been generally among the first flight of Hares or Hounds, and we hope they may do something in the University Sports.

Football has at length died a natural death, and Cricket or Lawn Tennis have not yet begun, so there is nothing to chronicle in these departments.

MAGDALENE.

The crew has remained the same during training. Since the beginning of the term they have made considerable improvement, thanks to the able coaching of Roden and Ritchie. We can only hope that good luck will attend them in the coming races.

On Saturday last the Musical Society supplied an excellent programme: several members of the C.U.M.S. were kind enough to lend their assistance. The programme opened with a Quintett from Mendelssohn; and after various solos and songs concluded with the overture to Zampa. This was a great success and thoroughly deserved the applause which it won.

TRINITY.

The T.B.C. Freshmen's Eights were rowed on Saturday, the 6th inst., over the usual course. Four crews had been practising diligently, but owing to unavoidable drafts into the Lent boats only three boats came to the scratch. Down the Long Reach not much difference between the boats was observable in the pace; at the bridge the crews, coached by Gubbins and Hitchcock, quickened well, and from that point to the finish White's boat was not in it. Gubbins' boat won by three seconds.

The M. and S. met on March 5th, to discuss the motion: "That ordinary degrees ought to be abolished." B. Keightley brought forward the motion: C. A. E. Pollock opposed: and the House threw it out by 24 to 3. The following gentlemen were elected members:—M. Hildyard, F. F. Cox, W. Windley.

On Thursday, March 4th, the motion before the "Irregulars" was: "That this House considers that Capital Punishment should be abolished." The motion was lost by a large majority. At their next meeting they will discuss the engrossing question of the "mental, physical, and domestic training of women."

EMMANUEL.

Our second boat is again on the river after being displaced for two years. The wind up the course on Monday was not in our favour, as the boat is above the average in weight; otherwise we might have obtained a better place. As only one man of the First boat of last May has gone down, we ought to have plenty of material for the First boat this year.

At the meeting of the Debating Society on Saturday, D. Adamson moved that "this House sympathizes with the present Nihilistic movement in Russia." The voting on the motion was even, and the chairman declined to give his casting vote.

SIDNEY.

The usual meeting for debate on Saturday was devoted to the consideration of the Law of Entail. E. L. Thomas moved "that in the opinion of the House the laws of Entail require immediate revision." The motion was not regularly opposed, but three members spoke against it. Several members however, left the House during the discussion, and when the motion was put, six votes were given in its favour, while only one opponent was left to vote against it.

DOWNING.

There is not much College news to chronicle this week except the meeting of the Debating Society, on Saturday, March 6th, in I. S. Cox's rooms, at which C. Alison moved "That the time is approaching for the separation of the constitutional colonies from Great Britain, and that this society would approve of such separation." After an animated debate the motion was lost by one vote. The society will meet once more on the 15th inst., for an extempore debate, and to transact private business.

At the annual dinner of the Cambridgeshire Hunt on Thursday, March 4th, a handsome testimonial was presented to Dr. Perkins, Secretary to the Hunt, "from about 150 friends, for services rendered, and foxes preserved." It consists of a large silver salver and a loving cup. A silver horn and sandwich case are to follow.

NON-COLLEGIATE.

At a meeting of the promoters of the Lawn Tennis Club, W. P Buncombe was unanimously chosen as Secretary and Treasurer.

The Shakespeare Club held their meeting on Saturday evening. The readings, which were from the plays of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and "Henry the Fifth," were very enjoyable.

A. V. Bernays will act as Captain of the Cricket Club, vice Gray, resigned. The second captain will be W. B. Challenor, and W. E. Peach is elected to the vacancy on the Committee.

On the evening of the 4th March, the Debating Society met at the Library, Trumpington Street, when the following motion was discussed:—"It is the opinion of this House that the policy of the present government has been highly prejudicial to the country, and it would strongly recommend the return of the Liberal party to power." The debate was opened in the affirmative by Mr. Graham in a speech of 45 minutes; and it was opposed by Mr. Maggs. Messrs. Hyde and Stephens supported, and Messrs. Thompson and Wanton opposed the motion. Mr. Graham having replied, the House divided, when the motion was carried, 10 voting for, and 9 against.

UNIVERSITY INTELLIGENCE.

From the annual report of the Examiners to the Senate, it appears that in the Special Examination Theology is the favourite subject for it mustered last year 165 candidates; from this the number of candidates in the other subjects diminishes and grows beautifully less, the rear being brought up by Moral Philosophy with one man. Cambridge would seem to agree with Aristotle that young men are "unfit to hear Moral Philosophy." Geology and Zoology are likewise despised and rejected of men in for their special, for the former numbers only three candidates, and the latter two.

In the General Examination, at Easter, 66 candidates out of 241 failed, and at Michaelmas 27 out of 148. In the Little Go at Easter 458 candidates went in for Part I, but for 122 of them, it was so far from being even a little go, that it was no go at all. For Part II 478 went in; 174 were rejected; and out of 219 there were 125 who thirsted in vain for honours. At Michaelmas the numbers were in Part I. 572, failures 167; in Part II. 758, failures 234; in additional subjects 456, failures 151. The Examiners report that in the General the candidates were especially good on Heat, being (we must suppose) "viri calidi."

In view of two Memorials respecting the Additional Subjects in the Previous Examination, the Board recommend that the successful candidates in the additional subjects should be arranged in two classes.

An election to a scholarship of about £30, offered by the Leathersellers' Company, will take place in London on May 5th.

Professor Macfarren will give four lectures during the May Term, on "The Growth of the Overture."

C. U. M. S.

The programme of last Wednesday's popular concert was, we think, the best we have had this term. It included Schumann's Trio in D minor, violoncello solos, and Brahms' second set of 'Liebeslieder' waltzes. The trio was performed by Messrs. Stanford, M. Mackenzie and Herr Gompertz. The violoncellist, Mr. Mackenzie, was new to the audience, and his playing was excellent. His tone in the trio and his own solos was throughout everything that could be desired, and his execution of a gavotte by Rameau, which he played subsequently, extremely good. The gavotte is very difficult, as it requires rapid use of harmonics, but they scarcely ever failed to come out clearly. Herr Gompertz' playing was also excellent, and Mr. Stanford is too well known to call for eulogy. The trio is one of Schumann's most melodious works, the second movement, 'Lebhaft doch nicht zu rasch,' being full of the most genial writing, The second item on the programme was two duets, 'Wenn ich ein Vögelein wär' by Schumann, and 'Licht und Liebe,' by Schubert, for soprano and tenor, sung by Mrs. Stanford and Mr. A. D. Coleridge. The duets were both rendered with spirit, but the tenor was at times a little too powerful for the soprano, and did not always use his voice with judgment. We thought Mrs. Stanford in still better voice than last week, and her powers were shown to great advantage in the difficulties of the 'Liebeslieder.' The only fault which we have to find with the duets is that the voices did not seem to combine enough, although in the solo parts the singing was admirable. Brahms' waltzes brought the programme to a close. They are too well known to all frequenters of the St. James's Hall concerts to require remark as to their matter. We need only say that they were wonderfully well sung, considering the little practice that could have been possible together. The quartet in No. 7, 'Vom Gebirge Well auf Well,' and the soprano solo in No. 11, 'Alles, alles in den Wind,' were, in our opinion, best sung. The coda, too, 'Nun ihr Musen genug,' was well sung by the quartet. The duet piano, which, although nominally the most important part, sinks naturally into the background, was played by Messrs. Stanford and R. C. Rowe, and was all that could be desired. We have to thank the Musical Society for a very enjoyable concert; indeed all the concerts of this term have showed that great efforts are being made to give the audience the chance of hearing really good music, really well played and sung

ASSOCIATION FOOTBALL.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY v. OLD HARROVIANS.

This annual match was played on Parker's Piece last Saturday, the ground being in capital condition and making the play lively throughout. Lancashire kicked off for the University, who for the first few minutes pressed their adversaries backwards, until they were relieved by a good run by Murray, Des Graz, and Rowe. In return Whitfeld and Maclean took the the ball well along the left side, and about twenty minutes after the start Maclean kicked the first goal from a throw in. After this the University had several attempts to gain another score, Goodhart being most conspicuous, especially with his head, but were unsuccessful until half time was called. After the change of ends the University seemed better together, and Harvey, indefatigable as usual, made one or two incursions into the Harrovians' quarters, after one of which he middled the ball to Whitfeld who sent it between the posts. The goal was disallowed, however, on the plea of off side. Meanwhile the Harrovians had been far from idle, Smith and Rowe proving very troublesome with their neat passing. After a spell of pretty even play Chevallier came in good style to the front and passed the ball to Whitfeld who secured a second goal for Cambridge. The third and last goal was obtained not long afterwards by Wood, the University thus winning by three goals to none. Although they obtained this satisfactory result, we cannot say that the general play of the team was up to the high standard it ought to have been. As has been the case in most of their matches this season, they were not all together at the beginning, and though they improved as the game proceeded, yet the co-operation of the forwards was at no time what we could wish to see. The backs on the whole work energetically; but the forwards are deficient in dash, and do not rush in on their opponents backs, to frustrate their kicks. But above all they must be more unselfish in their passing, and work more harmoniously as a body. If they do not pay attention to these points, they may have to repent it when they play Oxford next Saturday at the Oval.

Cambridge: C. F. Poole (goal), H. H. Calvert, C. W. Foley (backs), E. H. Topham, O. P. Lancashire, Capt. (half-backs), E. D. L. Harvey, J. C. B. Chevallier, H. Goodhart, A. H. S. Wood, H. Whitfeld, J. H. R. Maclean.

Old Harrovians: R. de C. Welch, P. J. T. Henery (backs), Rev. W. Law, G. Macan (half-backs), Rev. R. M. Norman (goal), J. O. F. Murray, P. Fowler, A. H. Davidson, C. L. Des Graz, G. M. Smith, F. C. C. Rowe.

C. U. GOLF CLUB.

The Competition for the "Linskill" Cup, "Pirie" Medal, &c., was held on Thursday, March 4th, on Coldham Common. The following was the result:—

	Strokes.	Handicap.	Total.
1. W. Welsh (Jesus), winner of "Linskill" Cup	95	scratch	95
2. F. G. Pattison (Pembroke) winner of "Pirie" Medal ...	97	scratch	97
3. P. R. Don (Trinity)	108	8	100
4. G. M. Brown-Westhead(Trinity)	129	25	104
5. R. C. Priestley (Trinity) ...	118	10	108
6. R. C. Faithfull (Trinity)	110	scratch	110
7. P. L. Coether (Jesus)	142	27	115
8. W. Gell (Pembroke)	131	15	116

W. T. Linskill (Jesus) and J. T. Taylor (Pembroke) did not show up their cards.

The play of Messrs. Welsh and Pattison was excellent, a considerable amount of form being displayed.

The Inter-University Golf Match will be played at Wimbledon, over the "London Scottish" Links; on Thursday, March 11th. The teams will consist of six a side. The following being our probable representatives:—

W. Welsh (Jesus); F. G. Pattison (Pembroke); W. L. Linskill (Jesus), Captain; R. C. Faithfull (Trinity); C. H. Spence (Trinity); R. C. Priestley (Trinity).

C. U. HARE AND HOUNDS CLUB.

A meet of the above club was held on Friday, the 5th, at the Hat and Feathers, Barton road. The hares, W. M. Harvey, Christ's, and R. M. H. Mortimer, Corpus, started at 3.10, and after a long run round Coton, Barton, and Grantchester, they reached home at 4.28. The hounds arrived in the following order:—C. P. Cory, St. John's, 4.43; G. S. Smart, Trinity, 4.44; R. Hall, St. John's, 4.45; J. G. Bradshaw, Jesus, 4.46; W. H. Shield, Jesus, 4.48; J. W. Walker, Pembroke, 4.50; E. H. Ellison, St. John's; U. V. Garland, St. John's; C. W. C. U. R. V.

It has been decided that a Company of the University Rifle Corps, to be attached to the 23rd Middlesex (Inns of Court) R.V. will be sent to Brighton for the Easter Monday Review.

The names of about 35 rank and file and nine officers have been received, but although some officers and sergeants are willing to go as privates the number is too small to represent fitly the University Rifles.

It is hoped that any member of the Corps, who will be able to attend the Review will send his name as soon as possible to the officer commanding his company. All necessary information will be given by the latter.

VICTORIA (PHILOSOPHICAL) INSTITUTE.

A full meeting of this society took place Monday, 1st inst., at its house, 7, Adelphi Terrace, when a paper upon the tendency of "Recent Science and Research," was read by Professor Stokes, F.R.S., of Cambridge. After reviewing the progress made by science in its various departments, he concluded by saying, that whilst the progress of science continually extended our ideas of the operation of law, and referred observed phenomena to causes more remote, it at the same time left barriers which gave no indication of our ever being able to pass over; he added, that to the Christian philosopher (who rightly recognised Science and Revelation as coming in different ways from the Author of our being) familiarity with the idea of the reign of law in the physical world prepared the mind for a no less order in the moral world. After the discussion, it was announced that Professor Hughes, F.R.S., of Cambridge, would read the next paper.—Independent Press.

THE RIVER.

Boisterous weather greeted the Cantabs on their arrival at Kingston last week—weather so boisterous that it militated somewhat seriously against their work. The stream was running strong on Monday, when the Cambridge crew made their first appearance on the Thames, and the wind blew in strong gusts off the towpath shore. This combination of elements made the change from sluggish to lively waters all the more apparent, and though the crew did a fair amount of work they did not seem to settle down to it at all comfortably. This with a crew for the most part unaccustomed to rapid waters is in itself no proof of incapacity, and we have often seen crews who have eventually shewn themselves able representatives of their University, presenting very much the appearance of fish out of water, in their first attempts on the Thames. On Tuesday a perfect hurricane was blowing, and a drizzling rain at times set in. Mr. Rhodes in the morning indulged all the crew except Armytage, who was unfortunately hors de combat with a bad cold and swelled face, with tub-pair exercise, and it was decided in the afternoon that all things considered it was better for the eight not to go out, and so those who were whole and sound of the crew went for a tug grind instead. Wednesday found Armytage very little if at all better, and as the spare man, Knaggs, had not arrived at Kingston, Mr. Rhodes supplied the former's place at 5, and the crew went out in the morning for steady rows and paddles. The day off did not seem to have improved the rowing, for there was much irregularity and persistent feathering under water almost throughout the boat. In the afternoon, Knaggs, having arrived on the scene, was installed at 5, and the crew did some steady work, at a rather slower stroke. On Thursday Armytage was back again, but did not look at all strong or well, and his work in the boat was decidedly weak. The crew did some heavy work in the morning, and showed to much better advantage than we have at present seen them. Seven was in more perfect time with stroke, and thus gave the crew throughout a better swing and general appearance. In the afternoon the crew put in an appearance at about three to try the new ship, which had arrived from Swaddle and Winship, accompanied by the latter half of the firm. They went out for a trial trip, but soon returned to alter stretchers, file rowlocks, &c., and re-launching their ship soon after four went up stream and turned a few hundred yards below Hampton Court. Coming away down stream with a steady stroke of 34 they found a scratch eight of the K.R.C. stroked by Hastie (T.R.C.) waiting for them at the top of the Waterworks. The scratch took a lead of three-quarters of a length clear and rowing 37 to the Cantabs 34 held their own without much effort till Messengers' island was passed. Here the scratch slackened a few strokes to allow the University crew to get on equal terms, but through a mistake in steering on Clarke's part it was still some little time before this result was effected. When the boats were alongside Baillie quickened to 37 and though the scratch did all they knew they could not again shake off the trained crew, and the two boats shooting the bridge exactly together there eased. After a rest the two crews paddled for a short distance side by side when the scratch eased and the Cantabs went on by themselves and finished with a stray bit of rowing to the locks, and turning here paddled quietly home. The advisability of racing so early against a scratch has been questioned by some and denounced by others, but to our mind there can be no harm in it when a crew rows to orders as the Cambridge crew were rowing, and if the scratch will also row to orders as Hastie rowed on Thursday there may be a great deal of good to be got from it. It accustoms the crew to row alongside of another boat without having their attention diverted from their own rowing by the sight and sound so near to them—"Oh, but it flurries the men"—better surely to let them get flurried once or twice in practice than to leave this for the race. Of course it is impossible to draw any line from the performance of the Cantabs against the scratch, when the former were only rowing 34, for any scratch would find it easy to hold a picked crew rowing no faster than this. When, however, Baillie quickened they held the scratch firmly. On Friday the crew went by launch to Teddington Locks, and there got into their boat which had been rowed down for them from Kingston. From Teddington they went by long, steady pieces to Barnes, and doing a very fair bit of rowing on the ebb from Barnes to Hammersmith reached Putney about noon. They lunched at Putney, and returning after lunch to Kingston did some more practice there late in the afternoon. On Saturday the crew trained it early to Mortlake, and embarking there made a start from a fixed skiff for a row through to Putney. They went off at 34, and going pretty well together reached Barnes Bridge in 2.57 from the start, but after shooting the bridge did not shew off to much advantage. The men began to hurry the stroke, behind Baillie, and this had the effect of making them all clip their finish and rush forward with bent arms and irregular swing. Added to this the wind struck aslant and for a bit they were all abroad. However, after a bit of advice, they settled themselves and doing another fair bit of rowing past Chiswick Eyot, reached Hammersmith Bridge in 11 min. 37 sec. from the start. Here they fell terribly to pieces, owing again to their hurrying the finish, and rushing forward before straightening their arms, and to make things worse as they rounded the Soap Works, the wind, which was here blowing a dead noser, raised a nasty surf, and considerably stayed their progress. They struggled on, however, and picking up the stroke a bit off the boathouses, reached the Aqueduct in 20 min 25 sec from the start—not at all a bad performance, all things considered, for they were till the last few hundred yards rowing a comparatively slow stroke, and though the wind was a favourable one for an ebb course the stream was not running so strongly as often is the case at this time of the year. To-day (Monday) hard work was again the order of the day. Dropping down from the Boat Houses below the Bridge the crew came away at a steady stroke of 34 a minute and rowed right through to Barnes in one piece; and from here they went on to Kew. They rowed a longer stroke, did not hurry so much in their finish and swing, and altogether showed a vast improvement in form.

The crew, as a crew, have made undoubted progress during the week in getting together—owing no doubt chiefly to the rough weather they have experienced. They now swing very fairly together, though at times there is a discrepancy in the time the oars touch and leave the water. What they lack chiefly is still smartness both at the beginning and end of the stroke. If they can learn during this next week to catch the water at the beginning sharper, to finish sharper without feathering under water, and to send the hands off the chest sharper, they will prove themselves dangerous rivals of Oxford crew. And above all things they must remember to finish out one stroke well before they think of beginning the next. It is the scrambling finish and as a result the rushing forward of the bodies before the arms are straight, which makes them fall to pieces after rowing some little way, and which does more to tire and exhaust them than a good deal of extra pressure on the stretcher. Their sliding is throughout good—as the sliding of all Cambridge crews has been since the time that Mr. James Close took the crews of 1876 in hand.

Taking the men individually, stroke has acquired a little more sharpness, but he still wants improvement in this respect. He must be very careful not to make the men hurry him by getting out of and into the water before him. It is difficult, we know, not to give way, but the whole go of the boat depends upon a stroke being able to keep the stroke and swing long even when hurried on by the men behind him. Seven has improved as much as anyone lately, he still wants to sit up more, and be sharper with the finish. He is rowing much more with stroke than he was. Six is also rowing longer and better. At times he is all that can be desired. He shows to much better advantage at six than he did at stroke some weeks ago. Five has been a good deal pulled down with his indisposition, and so hardly gives one a fair chance to judge of him. Four is rowing longer but is still stiff in swing, finish, and recovery. Three improves but slowly, and seems to find the work quite hard enough. Two is much the same as ever, excepting that he does not look out of the boat quite so much as he did. Bow is rowing better than he was, but looks weak. The crew are altogether quite fine enough at present. With judicious management and alternations of easy days and long work, they ought to come to the post very fit. The following are the weights:—

The Oxford Crew were expected to be at Putney yesterday or to-day.

Apropos of the Steam Boat Company, the Pall Mall of this afternoon (March 8th) should by all means be read. The writer puts the case very concisely.

The competition for the additional places in the Third Division produced the best racing we have seen for some time.

On Friday the heats were drawn as follows:—

First Heat.	Second Heat.	Third Heat.
Clare 2	King's 2	Emmanuel 2
Jesus 4	Trinity Hall 4	Christ's 2
Pembroke 3	Peterhouse 2	Clare 3
Caius 5

First Heat: Clare got well away in Post Reach, and at the Plough Jesus began to come up hand over hand. An exciting race up the Long Reach followed, Clare just managing to come in first, beating Jesus by a second, the other two boats being some distance behind. Time, 7 min. 57 secs. (100 yards shorter than others.)

Secod Heat: King's started away at once, the Hall boat being somewhat unsteady, and gained ground rapidly up the Reach. Coming round the corners, the Hall made up its distance, and at Ditton seemed to be slightly ahead. At the Willows, however, the two boats were level, and in spite of the Hall's quick stroke, King's came in first by about two seconds, Peterhouse being considerably in the rear. Time, 8 min. 34 secs.

Third Heat: The wind now began to freshen; and when Clare made its appearance at Ditton, the light crew began to feel the effects of it. Christ's rowing a slow stroke, were second and Emmanuel third. Up the Long Reach, the wind knocked Clare to pieces; and Emmanuel gained rapidly on Christ's, the latter seeming to be unable to quicken, and after a good race Emmanuel won by four seconds; Clare coming in a few seconds after Christ's. Time, 8 min 26 secs (wind gusty—less stream).

The weaker boats having been weeded out, the racing on Saturday produced in the first heat a dead heat between Clare 2 and Emmanuel, the former coming in contact with the bank at First Post Corner; the Hall, with hind station tried in vain to quicken up the Long Reach, and came in third by a few seconds. Time, 8 min. 19 secs.

In the second heat, Christ's, rowing steadily, and much better than on Friday, came up hand over hand and won by about nine seconds, being greatly assisted by their coxswain. For second place there was a desperate struggle; Jesus, urged on by Christ's, got over the ground in a way peculiar to itself; and King's, failing to keep the pace up, gradually lost their lead, and in the end only obtained the second place by the fraction of a second. Some thought that there was a dead heat: but the judge decided, as was generally expected, in favour of King's. Time, 8 min. 6½ secs. (wind gusty—less stream, wind fell during second heat.)

In consequence of the very close competition in the preliminary heats, great things were expected in the final, and indeed Monday was productive of a really splendid race. The four boats left in were all about the average, and their previous times indicated that the result would be a pretty open one. They were drawn in the following order:—(1), Christ's 2; (2), Clare 2; (3), Emmanuel 2; (4) King's 2.

When the word was given, Clare and King's immediately got under weigh; while Christ's floundered a good deal, five catching a crab and throwing four's oar out of the rowlock. This enabled Clare to gain about fifteen yards before Christ's recovered themselves. Going round Grassy, the King's boat succeeded in lessening the distance between it and Emmanuel; but in the Plough the latter again drew ahead. In the Long Reach, Christ's quickened up to 36, the example being followed by Clare. At the Willows it was still anybody's race. Here Christ's again made a spurt, while Clare fell off a little, just allowing their opponents to get in first by three quarters of a second, the Emmanuel pistol going off one second later, immediately followed by the King's one. The latter boat, therefore, only failed to get on the river by about half a dozen yards, four seconds covering all four boats. Time 7 min. 27 secs. (say fine, stream moderate.)

The rowing was exceptionally good, and fully bears out our opinion of last week, as to the wisdom of enlarging the Third Division.

There is little to say about the boats in the Second and Third Divisions, after our last week's report.

Queens', however, have made a marked improvement, and Trinity Hall 2 have rather fallen off.

In the Third Division, Caius 4 should bump Lady Margaret 4, while Cavendish will probably make very short work of Catharine 2; the latter being at a loss for eight men to put into their boat.

Corpus 2, long moribund, seems determined to die game; but in spite of this determination, it seems probable that it will successively fall a prey to the boats below it.

UNIVERSITY SPORTS.

The first two days of the University Sports are over, and so far the performances have been quite up to the average: but the performances in the Oxford Sports have also been very good, and it is almost impossible as yet to predict which will get the "odd event;" for even should Jarvis come up and win the Hurdles again for us, yet if Story is unable to run the Quarter Mile will most probably fall to Oxford's share, and they seem likely to win the Mile, the Long Jump, and the Hammer, while we cannot make sure of all the other events. But as yet it is impossible to predict anything with any certainty.

FIRST DAY.

100 Yards—First heat: W E Bayley, Trinity, 1; R H Macaulay, King's, 2: A G Steel, Trinity Hall, 0; J W Gregory, Pembroke, 0; J H A Law, Trinity, 0. Bayley won easily: Steel was beaten by a foot. Time 10 2-5 secs. Second heat: E L Lucas, Jesus, 1; H P Hodson, Magdalen, 2; G E Sheddon, Clare, 0: H Smith, St. John's, 0. Time 10 1-5 secs. Lucas won easily: Hodson finished a yard in front of Sheddon.

Putting the Weight—A H East, St. John's, 36 ft. 5 in., 1; L Bury, Trinity, 35 ft. 11 in., 2. East ought to put a good deal further than this when he is in good form, 120 Yards Handicap—First heat: G E Sheddon, Clare, 6 yards, 1; W W Robinson, Cavendish, 6 yards, 2; N Campbell, Trinity, 8 yards, 0; C E Poughton-Leigh, Trinity, 10 yards, 0. Time 11 4-5 secs. Two heats were run together; in the final on Wednesday, C N Bedford, introduced, 5 yards, and C P C Lawrence, O.U.A.C., 2 yards, will run against Sheddon and Robinson.

120 Yards Hurdle Race—First heat: H C Eden, Pembroke, 1; C L Des Graz, Trinity, 2; P W Atkins, Jesus, 0; W G Elliott, Trinity, 0. Won by a yard. Elliot fell near the beginning. Time 17 3-5 secs. Second heat: W E Bayley, Trinity, 1; H H Birley, Jesus, 2; W H Whitfeld, Trinity, 0. Time 18 4-5 secs. Won very easily. Whitfeld fell at the third and ninth flights.

One Mile—W W Hough, Corpus, 1; J G Bradshaw, Jesus, 2; T L Shann, Trinity, 3; J W Walker, Pembroke, 4. Thirteen started; Hough took the lead in the second lap and won by 15 yards. Time 4 mins. 33 2-5 secs.

SECOND DAY.

100 Yards—Final heat: E L Lucas, Jesus, 1; W E Bayley, Trinity, 2; H P Hodson, Magdalen, 0; R H Macaulay, King's, 0. Time 10 secs. Both Lucas and Bayley seemed to get off before the pistol, which would account for the time given, but no doubt the best man won.

Half Mile—J G Bradshaw, Jesus, 1; W M Harvey, Christ's, 2; W H K Ward, Trinity, 0. Time 2 mins. 2 secs. Though the entries were poor the race was good and the time very creditable.

High Jump—R H Macaulay, King's, 5 ft. 9 it., 1; H R Cooke, Trinity, 5 ft 7 in. 2: A E Sorby, Trinity Hall, 0. Sorby, whose leg was strained, failed at 5 ft 6 in.

120 Yards Hurdle Race—Final heat: W E Bayley, Trinity, 1; C L Des Graz, Trinity, 2; H C Eden, Pembroke, 0; H H Birley, Jesus, 0. Time 17 2-5 secs. Bayley won by about a foot.

Throwing the Hammer—A H East, St. John's, 112 ft. 10 in., 1; L Bury, Trinity, 100 ft. 10 in., 2; N. Campbell, Trinity, 95 ft. 4 in., 0.

One Third Mile Handicap—H N L Smith, Trinity, 42 yards, 1; W H Murphy, Trinity Hall, 35 yards, 2. Time 1 min. 12 2-5 secs. Nine started. Smith won pretty easily.

The programme for to-day (Wednesday) is:

120 Yards Handicap (Final Heat).
Long Jump.
Quarter Mile.
Three Miles Race.
Consolation Race.

OXFORD LETTER.

We saw the last of the Oxford eight on their own water on Tuesday. On Monday the crew did two journeys over the home course, with plenty of tubbing between rows. The time seemed better, and the rowing is certainly clean and lively though rather short. On Tuesday they had intended to go the long course, but as there was a perfect hurricane of wind blowing the president changed his mind and turned his crew at Sandford. They afterwards did a smart piece of rowing over the Iffley course. No. 3 seems to be rowing rather better both as regards time and swing; there are, however, still many faults in time to be noticed throughout the boat and No. 2 misses the beginning. Looking at the crew in the boat they appear a very strong lot and as they certainly get good pace on their boat they ought to prove rather a formidable foe.

The Torpids were continued in very stormy weather on Monday, March 1st. In the second division Oriel bumped Keble 2; Corpus, St. John's; B.N.C. 2, Merton; Hertford, Lincoln; Balliol 2 bumped St. Catharine's. In the first division Worcester caught Christ Church; Magdalen, Queens'; New 1, Balliol 1. On Tuesday in the second division Oriel caught University, thus becoming sandwich boat; Corpus, Keble 2; New 2, St. John's; Hertford, Merton. In the first division B.N.C. 1 caught Pembroke; New 1, Exeter; Magdalen, Balliol 1; Worcester, Queens'. Oriel followed up their success in the second division by making a second bump, Christ Church being the victims this time. On the last night the boats left off in the following order, those who made a bump that night being marked *

Trinity	Magdalen	*Corpus	Hertford
Keble 1	*Worcester	University	Merton
B.N.C. 1	Balliol 1	*New 2	Lincoln
*New 1	*Oriel	Keble 2	Balliol 2
Pembroke	Queens'	*B.N.C. 2	St. Cath.
Exeter	Ch. Ch.	St. John's

One of the chief features in the Torpid races this year was the extraordinary number of bumps which were made, namely 43. Trinity went head first night and then kept their place without any great difficulty. Worcester was the most successful boat as they went up seven places in six nights. Oriel gained six places and New College five with each boat. Magdalen and B.N.C. 2 four each, Hertford three, Among the unfortunates, Keble 2 lost six places, St. John's five, Pembroke, Queens,' Christ Church, Lincoln, St. Catharine's four each.

A great feature in the last night's racing was the plucky struggle of Hertford with Merton. No. 2 in the Hertford boat broke his oar the first stroke, but nevertheless with seven oars and No. 2 sitting in the boat the whole time they kept away over the entire course, although Merton were within a yard for about the last quarter of a mile. Although Merton were a bad boat this is no ordinary feat, and the stroke of the Hertford eight deserves the greatest credit for his plucky rowing.

"'INTEREST' V. HONOUR": A WORD IN REPLY.

It was with brilliant hope, no doubt, that many of us began to read an article on politics in the last number of this Review. We had of late heard so much about our want of party spirit that we naturally looked for a temperate and philosophical discussion of political difficulties. Such an expectation was possibly heightened when we read that the writer's object was not "to bandy the missiles of party vituperation." But those who read through the article in question will admit that the hope was scarcely realized. For there was throughout no attempt to understand the position of the other side, there was no faltering in the proud belief that morality and even wisdom itself must infallibly be as they seemed to the writer himself. One who calmly states that he assumes the "imbecility" while discussing the "immorality" of our present policy is, in truth, not our ideal political philosopher: we must even look with caution to his interpretation of facts.

Freely admitting that too much has been said about Liberal want of patriotism we may allow him to put this charge out of sight, as indeed he seemed anxious to do. But, on the other hand, we must quarrel with his ascription to the Government of consistently perverse motives. And if he considers that his interpretation of facts warrants his making such a charge, is it not equally open to a humbler Conservative likewise to interpret facts, and on that ground charge the Opposition with acting from party motives? In common fairness the one charge should be put out of sight with the other.

But considerations of this kind have apparently little weight with so rhetorical a writer. Yet even he makes some pretence of owning a philosophic standpoint. And this political philosophy—which he places in the forefront of the battle—is of so peculiar a kind as to merit criticism. "We Liberals (he says) believe in a national life." We thus learn that the labours of many historians and the eloquence of many statesmen have not been wholly without result: Liberals have come to believe what Conservatives knew all along. But the truth can scarcely be as yet received by them in its full proportions, or we should see an alteration in their home policy. The position of Conservatives with regard to domestic reforms is founded on their belief in it. They contend that all reform must be carried on with reference to this very national life: seeing that there is in it a continuity which expresses itself in national institutions, they fear the results of rapid change: with so delicate an organisation gradual modification is the better course to adopt. We may with patience wait until this truth becomes the basis of Liberal home, as well as foreign. policy.

But the philosophy of the writer, however satisfactory in its origin, is somewhat hastily developed. The use of analogies is, as we know, misleading: "national life" is a notion very different from individual life, and as used by historians is probably more analogous to the life possessed by a plant. And so to some it may seem inconsequent to say that because the nation has a national life and can act, the moral law is the sole criterion of its acts. The life can scarcely be held identical in kind: morality (as we know it) is a guide to the circumstances of individual life, and until the circumstances of national are proved similar to those of individual life, we cannot assume the same morality to govern both. But, noticing the possible criticism, we may admit that morality is one of the criteria by which to test national action. But just as with individuals there are other tests which may apply where morality is not concerned, so we must admit others in the case of nations. Morality is, as we know, no absolute guide to conduct. Each of us has felt that it is not easy to guide ourselves by moral laws: at times, one of them seems to conflict with another, and the way becomes dark before us: in addition to this there are actions into which morality cannot enter. In the case of nations the questions for solution are more complex in kind: the effect of wider circumstances and more varied forces is to bring different moral laws into keener conflict, or responsibilities may have been accepted in the past from which it would be immoral to shrink in the present. It is not always possible to say what the moral course may be. If we treat foreign affairs as lightly and airily as many do, it may be easy to say what course we should adopt. But those who realize the complexity of international relations find it by no means an easy task.

And if morality, thus taken as a guide within limits fixed by circumstances, at times fails us, whither are we to turn? "Utility," we are told, "may be an index to the law of God," and where sense of right cannot decide, expediency must come in. This is no offence against morality: it is merely to take another guide where higher laws are of no avail.

In such cases we are forced to act for our own interests, which are by no means associated with "borders." The very idea of a national mission would alone necessitate such conduct. For that purpose, a nation must use all the power it possesses. The mission must fail, if the power to accomplish it be lost. And further, as a man has moral duties to himself, and even to his descendants, so has a nation: she may not suffer others to wrongfully prosper at her expense (for she knows not what wider interests are involved): least of all should the Ministry—the trustees of the national interest—suggest such a course: morality itself must bind them to preserve the material power and prosperity of the nation. The assertion that such a course is morally wrong would require a previous proof that the interests of England had been opposed to those of the rest of mankind. Yet the inference from history is surely opposed to this. To turn to the special case of the present Ministry, the discharge of this duty is made a charge against them. And yet it cannot be denied that their policy has been accepted by the Parliament and endorsed by the nation. No attempt (however dexterous) at appropriating the entire national consciousness can avoid this fact.

But it may not be amiss to point out the true meaning of "British Interests," as used in the Eastern Question. They did not mean merely commercial, they could not mean "border" interests. England had more than once accepted the responsibility of guarding national independence in Europe. She had done so against the advance of Russia, believing it opposed to the interests of mankind in general. As an individual becomes morally bound by his pledged word of honour, and limited in his future action by his conduct in the past, so England, acting partly for the subject people of Turkey, partly for Europe at large, and only partly for herself, had become, for good or for evil, mixed up with the Eastern Question. This complex relation to it was denoted by the term "British interests." They were British, not as relating to Britain only, they were British as forced upon her by her old position in the van of European civilization, and by her attitude as the guardian of the security needed for the growth of that civilization in the future.

It would be misleading to attempt in short an account of the Eastern Question. Yet a few criticisms are needed on the account previously given. The references to Greece read oddly in the light of recent disclosures. They might possibly have drawn cheers from a favourable audience even so late as last summer, but they would scarcely now do even that. The formation of two states instead of one—insisted upon by England—was due to care for the future of Greece. The assumption that Conservatives cared little for the freedom of Bulgaria is one we can disregard, but we can make nothing of the statement that "the mind of this country was assiduously prepared for sympathizing with an attempt to resist the inevitable freedom of Bulgaria." There is no proof given for such a statement: one scarcely could be given.

Conservatives claim for the government policy that it was the one which best regarded all the various elements of the question, our existing responsibilities, the welfare of the Turkish provinces (not best secured by complete independence), and the interests of Europe, and which, at the same time, gave the best basis for the future of civilization. The prophecies of its failure, we may further notice, have scarcely been fulfilled. The policy (darkly hinted at as the one "repeatedly demanded" by Liberals, yet scarcely, we imagine, by all, overlooked at least two of these factors. Its advocate himself neglects the first: he says that England's "traditional policy had led her twenty years before to curb the aggression of Russian despotism, and so incidently to uphold the Turkish Empire. This incident was magnified into a principle." It is a fact that the incident was amplified into many years and many passages of diplomacy. And oddly enough he censures the "incomprehensible folly of creating continental interests." This he lays to the fault of the present Ministry, and yet Lord Palmerston (whom he quotes as well as Mazzini) knew something of these very interests he so condemns. But indeed the whole view taken of previous history is novel, if not forcible. That England was, until the last three years, always obeyed "when she has spoken" is a fact which does not lie on the surface of affairs, unless, indeed, there be an ironical emphasis on the words: "when she has spoken." And foreign Powers are scarcely less disposed to hear England at present than they were in the halcyon days of Liberal rule.

Again the statement that Lord Salisbury specified five points as inadmissible is scarcely borne out by reference to his circular. He gave them as instances which made it necessary for a Congress to discuss the whole affair, and he expressly stated that arguments might be shewn to make them desirable. For the Government to have bound themselves to completely oppose all Russian demands would have made a Congress impossible: any previous arrangements between the Powers were simply preliminaries which made it possible, and were not opposed to the principle upheld—that the final arrangements must, according to treaty, precedent and common sense, be laid before the whole of Europe.

Equally unexpected is the view taken of the Afghan question. The whole of it is made to hinge on three sentences and two omissions from a speech of Lord Beaconsfield's. As we read the moral—"those 'arrangements' were the Afghan war"—a horrible fear assailed us. Is it possible that the writer never read a state-paper, and so does not know that "arrangements" invariably refer to negotiations. Lord Beaconsfield probably alluded to the negotiations which preceded, accompanied and followed the Afghan war. This misunderstanding is made the excuse (welcome no doubt to a Liberal) for not entering on the necessary but much-vexed question of our past relations with Afghanistan. We commend the brief account of the Cabul Massacre to the attention of all who are not "bigoted partisans." The pathos—which awakes for the opponents of England—slumbers when her sons are barbarously slain. We value the writer's pathetic laments: we still more appreciate his self-control.

We trust the readers of the Review will not think us departing from the "seriousness they have a right to expect" if we shew how this article explained to us one feature of modern Liberalism. Some of us have often wondered at the dogmatism of Liberal speakers, and at their denial of any reason to their opponents. The fact that they felt themselves to have on their side Justice, the Moral Law, and indeed everything else in the shape of capitals seemed scarcely enough to justify such behaviour. But now the riddle is answered. It is (as the writer assured us it was with him) the consciousness of a national life which prompts this course of conduct. We know few more touching spectacles than these Liberals of modern days—the salt of the nation—filled with this consciousness in which those differing from them do not (we suppose) participate. Their utterances may at times seem exaggerated and unreasonable, or reminiscences of logic may haunt us as we read, but these are trifles which fade away before those pulsations which "every Liberal feels within himself." It is not for us—to whom such a lot is presumably denied—to speak of self-conceit, or hint at immoderate use of bitter words. We cannot call it self-conceit when we are assured that it is merely the exuberance of national life. As for us, we may be humbly permitted to toil along our weary way, occasionally trusting to facts instead of theories, avoiding (as unprophetic mortals strive to do) misrepresentations of facts or imputations of motives, never letting an over-weening consciousness bridge over the connection between premise and conclusion. At times, however, we may lift our eyebrows at what we deem extravagances of more gifted souls, and sometimes we may feel that moral indignation is not a pleasing sight where accompanied by no apparently sufficient cause. But on turning to the article which has thus solaced us for a while we shall remember that the fact has been explained, and we shall give up the modern Liberal writer or speaker as a superior being whose nature we dimly know, but may not pretend to fully understand.

TRUTH IN ART.

It has been asserted that the fundamental principle of all art is Truth, that without Truth no production can be a work of art at all, but rather a work of non-art, a monstrosity, and, rightly considered, an eyesore. This, at any rate, is the guiding opinion of one great school of artists. On the other hand a much larger number of men generally known as artists, considering themselves to be such, and yearly giving forth some acres of painted canvas, paper, and other substances capable of retaining colour more or less successfully, which go by the name of pictures, loudly deny that Truth is of any consequence whatever to art, and adopt as their watchwords Beauty and the Ideal. Now between these two sets of men lies a whole world. They form the two extreme parties. No division between advanced Left and reactionary Right was ever more decided; and if the one opinion is right, then the other is entirely wrong. It is not the object of this article to enter into a discussion of the points of difference involved, or to advance arguments in favour of this or the other view; but it is intended to explain shortly what is meant by Truth in art, that the reader may be in a position to see what we maintain when we affirm that the mainspring of all great art is Truth.

In order then to clear the way it must be remembered that, in every production of an artist, there are two points to be considered—the subject matter, and the manner of the execution. Now it is quite possible, especially in the childhood of a race, that the artist should be striving ignorantly and feebly to express a great and glorious truth; his subject will then be great but his execution poor. On the other hand at the time of the central power of a full grown nation, or generally somewhat later, a man may be possessed of the most perfect power of execution, and yet he may have very little to express thereby of any intrinsic value. Bearing in mind then this two-sidedness of all real works of art it is affirmed that all great work must be true in sentiment and true in execution. We need hardly discuss the former of these requirements. Every man with a healthy mind will at once recognise falsity there and be instinctively repelled by it; and it is the worst condemnation of much of the so called art of our own day that it is degradingly attractive to the lowest parts of the nature of the least admirable classes.

But the question of truth in execution is one which cannot be so easily passed over. By it is meant briefly that whatever is put down must be as like the thing it represents, as the power of the artist is capable of making it. Thus clouds must be as like real clouds, rivers as like real rivers, trees as like real trees, as it is possible that they can be. The dancing spray of the waterfall, the boughs almost waving in the wind, the light playing through the leaves, the flowers nestling in the grass should in a really great picture be so almost deceptively like nature, to a spectator who knows what nature is like, as to make him, as he looks, begin to desire to see, not any more the picture, but the reality, of which at best it can but be the shadow. The greatest picture then will be the one which is forgotten in the reality which it brings so near. It is quite conceivable that, if you had only seen a man once, a portrait of him would seem sufficiently exact, which after all would be nothing but a very superficial likeness.

If on the other hand that man was your friend, if you had known him for years, and had watched the growth and workings of the mind in him, if you had seen him struggling with difficulties, external or moral, watched the victorious contest waged with opposing error, if, besides, he was the man you admired more than all other men, so that he was your ideal of a man, then it seems probable that you would require in a portrait that it should express something of all this. You would not be satisfied with a merely general likeness; but you would require that the man's mind should be shown visibly at work under the face of him. You would demand of your portrait painter that his work should show that he too saw to some extent into the heart of the man, and drew him not without affectionate admiration. And it is just this that lovers of nature—and no one else we would hope in a proper state of society would care to purchase landscape paintings—demand of painters of to-day. They ask that first and foremost the painting shall recall to them their old friends, the hills and the woods, as they know them. They ask for truth in representation, rather than for any amount of idealisation which they neither understand nor appreciate.

But here it is that the difficulty is encountered and must be faced if good work is to be done. Once for all it must be confessed that no man, how skilful soever he may be, can put down all, or even almost all that he sees. The eye of the body takes in much more than the eye of the mind receives. You see the hairs on a man's head, the leaves on a tree, the blades of grass at your feet, but to paint all these is impossible. Could it be done the picture would be all the better for the added details. But it cannot; and the impossibility must and ought to be frankly and visibly admitted. Leave out then whatever you will; omit the leaves from yon trees, the hairs from the old man's beard, but you must still draw the masses of foliage and the grey locks with absolute correctness. If a tree trunk has to be drawn, you may, if you will, pass over the cracks in the bark and the mosses that climb about its foot; but even if it is only the outline that you retain, then that must be drawn with absolute truth. There is no escape any where. The principle that has been enunciated demands once and for all that every touch of pencil or burin shall have some one definite meaning, shall represent some single fact, and shall represent that with absolute fidelity. There is no freedom allowed on the ground of effect. If you want the colour only of a sunset and don't care about the shapes of the western hills, then the colour must be real colour so far as pigments can render it; we shan't ask you for the hills so you give us the colour; we should like to have the hills too if we could, but we will be satisfied with less, if what we get is only true.

Of recent years, since the "Play-ground" of England has been in part transferred to Switzerland, and our national love of the country has tended to centre itself about the snow-draped hills, there has been an ever increasing production of Alpine pictures. And the complaint which those of us, who have made an intimate acquaintance with the mountains, have been giving vent to is, that these pictures seldom represent the mountains that we know. They give us peaks which we cannot recognise, surrounded by clouds of gorgeous colours which we never saw, the snowy summits themselves shaped in a manner which could never stand a gale of wind, and already tottering to an ignominious fall. And the reason of this is that the painters knew nothing about what they were painting. They had never walked on snow where it is drifted among rocks, or climbed over the craggy teeth that range themselves along the ice-curtained ridges, which they fondly thought they were "idealising" when they made them overhang at impossible angles. What we always said was, that if painters would only draw their outlines correctly and leave out clouds till they knew something more about the body of the thing they were so foolishly dressing up, then they would enlist our memories on their side; and, instead of employing them on correcting their mistakes, we would leave them free to contemplate what was omitted, and even to add a glory of light and colour which would always be beyond their reach. This some of them have at last consented to do, and the paintings which they now send forth are among the best of the water colour productions of our day.

The old Alpine paintings no doubt were thought beautiful enough by the ordinary tourist, but they were not good, because they were not like the Alps to those who knew what the Alps were like. And that was why those words were put in emphasised italics, because the ultimate opinion as to goodness or badness can only be pronounced by those who know in what likeness consists. Now it is not too much to say that not one man in a hundred knows what any object, which he sees in his every day walk, is like. If a painter drew a lily with nine petals, or a sandstone house in a granite country, or frost-broken rocks in the middle of the desert of Sahara, there are few people whose sense of fitness would be in the least shocked, simply beause they don't know what either a lily, or a granite hill, or a rock split by the frost is like.

And therefore, lastly, Truthful Art involves that not only the painters, but the public should be truthful observers of nature. And here we enter on a subject much too wide to be treated in this article at all. The works of art of any day are the outcome, not of any school of artists, but of a national school of thought. The question to be asked is, not only who the painter was, but for whom he painted, and the latter is always the most important factor. The perfect artist comes only among men who have a sympathy and a love for the world around them. The true and deep feelings of man have ever been able to find their expression in her outward changes. The returning spring has been imbued to him with the joy of life renewed, and has attached to itself all that is noble and right in the hope of a resurrection of the dead and a life to come. The full brightness of summer has been happily symbolic of the strength of perfect life, and the joy of all truly earned reward. The chill decay of autumn has found its counterpart in the fading of earthly hopes and the shadow of declining powers of body, or the failure of the still more vital forces of the mind. And winter with its curtains of sleep and its blanched countenance of frost has been year by year full of acknowledged teaching that all life shall find its end in the grim portal that leads one knows not where, were it not for the hope of a renewed activity in the unknown days to come. And not only has this so often been the influence upon the minds of men of the grand recurring changes which write themselves so gradually and unceasingly upon the open face of nature, but her minor changes also have none the less found their counterparts in the ever-varying emotions of the heart. There can be felt a sympathy with the howling of the storm, a terrible brotherhood with the lightning flash, a worthy expression of the war within in the battle of the sea and the hurricane. With joy almost painful can the dark shadow of the coming thunder-cloud be watched, blotting out all the calm brightness from the sky and obliterating the soft outlines of the distant hills. The crashing avalanche, the roaring cataract, the all-enveloping flood—all the terrible things in nature are capable of sounding in wild concord with the inner emotions of the heart of man. And the nation that will finally produce the great school of landscape art, for which the world has been waiting, will be one that feels and acknowledges with childlike simplicity the motherhood of nature, and rushes to her for sympathy alike in joy and sorrow. And for us the question is, what is our depth of national love for a world undefiled? Are we brothers of the radiances, eagle-eyed, sun-pursuing? or brothers only of the mud-giants, mud-demons, wallowing in the swamps, mere "human beavers," earth-loving worms, whose aim is downwards, and ever into the deeper darkness? Only to the sunny children of the morning, the home of whose love is in the pureness of nature and in quiet, if it may be silent, obedience to Divine law, whose hope is not for rest and peace in the repose of labour done, but is contented doing that which the hand finds given to it to do—to these only is it granted that the work of their artists, nay more their own work, of whatsoever kind it be, shall evermore be beautiful, and a joy to all noble souls capable, and they only, of recognising signs of nobility in the works of others.

Simonides of Ceos. v.

Thrice happy their fortune, and noble their end
Who fell at Thermopylæ, Greece to defend!
Whose wailing is fame, and an altar their grave,
Where praise and not pity shall honour the brave.
Such glory enfolds them as ne'er with dull mould
Of time the destroyer shall fade, or grow old.
For to this gloomy chamber the bravest, the best,
The flower of Hellas, have gone to their rest.
Leonidas, witness: for here dost thou lie
A name for all ages, a hero for aye!

Archilochus. v. 2.

Full loth, on the field, did I leave my good shield,
Some Scian's trophy I wot.
But I saved my own skin, and so care not a pin,
There are plenty more shields to be got.

CHANGE.

From the German of Uhland.

On through a darksome land I ride,
Neither moon nor star shines out to guide,
And a cold wind moans around me:
Oft have I ridden the self-same way,
'Neath the cheerful eye of the golden day,
While breezes soft enwound me.

A sad wind rustles the darkened bowers,
The dead leaves fall, and the withered flowers
Sigh in the dreary weather:
Here we wandered in summer time,
When the roses bloomed, in love's sweet prime,
My dear one and I together.

Gone is the light of the golden sun,
Withered the roses every one,
And my love in the grave is lying:
I fold my mantle about my form,
And ride through the night and the wintry storm,
The dead leaves round me flying.

A MENU.

Sophy, when, the Lent Term ended,
Home from Girton you repair,
I've arranged you such a splendid
Bill of intellectual fare.

Ere the sky with morn is ruddy,
We'll begin by candle-light,
And we will protract our study
Far into the silent night.

First we'll torture old Lucretius,
Word by word and piece by piece,
Till we show that all his specious
Arguments are fallacies.

Plato next shall be our victim—
What a feast we'll make off him!
Never ceasing till we've picked him
All to pieces, limb from limb.

Till we've made it clear for ever,
How and Where and When and Why
He hit on that very clever
Theory of ἰδέαι.

'Ethics,' then we'll vex and harry,
Tooth and nail, nor be content
Till we've fathomed subtle Aristotle's subtlest argument.

Tackle texts, oh! what delight in Finding what they ought to be!
Whether Stallbaum's wrong or right in Dropping ἄν in section 3!

Then for smaller fry, Tibullus
(Lest our brains we over-tax),
Homer, Ovid and Catullus—
These shall be our 'yellow-backs.'

We have to record the death of Mr. George Boden, Q.C., Recorder of Derby, which occurred on Monday, Feb. 23rd, at his residence in Queen's-gardens, Hyde-park. The deceased gentleman, who had just completed his 64th year, was the youngest son of the late Mr. John Boden, of Ednaston-lodge, Derbyshire, and was born in January, 1816. He was educated at Rugby, and entered at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took his Bachelor's degree in 1841, and proceeded M.A. in due course. Called to the bar by the Honourable Society of the Inner Temple in Easter Term, 1841, he joined the Midland Circuit. In February, 1855, he was appointed Recorder of Stamford, the duties of which office he discharged down to June, 1859, when he was nominated to the Recordership of Derby. Mr. Boden received the honour of a silk gown in February, 1862, and was made a Bencher of his Inn in April of the same year. He was twice married—first, in 1845, to Catharine, daughter of Mr. John Perfect, of Pontefract, Yorkshire; and secondly, in 1863, to Louisa Augusta, daughter of the Rev. William Worsley, Rector of Bratoft, Lincolnshire.

THE PAPER-KNIFE.

La Psychologie Allemande Contemporaine, par Th. Ribot. Paris: Libraire Germer Baillière et Cie. 1879.

M. Ribot is already favourably known to the English public by a work on Heredity, and a reproduction of the views of the leading English psychologists for the benefit of the French public, which, under the title of "Contemporary English Psychology" has been translated into English in a rather slovenly way. He has now followed up this line of study by a reproduction for French readers of the views and researches of the leading psychologists of Germany. As in many other departments of science, so in psychology, no student can speak with any claim to authority who is not thoroughly acquainted with the researches of Lotze, Wundt, and Fechner. The present volume will enable those students who cannot read these authors in their original tongue to become acquainted with them at second-hand in a fairly accurate form. And with the exception of a French translation of Lotze's work, by M. Penjon, scattered notices in "Mind," "Nature," &c., the work by Bernstein, in the International scientific series, and some parts of G. H. Lewes' "Problems," these authors remained buried in the original German. M. Ribot supplies this want. In a volume of 400 pages he gives a fairly full and accurate account of the system of Herbart and his school; the researches of Lotze, Weber, Volkmann, Donders, Hering, and Helmholtz. Sixty pages are devoted to Fechner and Psychophysics, with the criticisms of Bernstein, Brentano, and Hering, and eighty pages to an exhaustive analysis of the work of Wundt.

M. Ribot's book meets a distinct want of many English students of psychology, who now regret the time they spent in their youth on the dead languages, while the live ones escaped them. It is to be hoped that it may, like its predecessor, be translated into English, and, unlike its predecessor, meet with a competent translator.

An Elementary Greek Grammar. By W. W. Goodwin, Professor of Greek Literature in Harvard College, Cambridge, Mass. U.S. London, Macmillan, 1879.

This is a much improved and enlarged edition of the author's earlier Grammar published in Boston—and in its present form deserves high commendation. It is fuller than Curtius's "Students' Greek Grammar," containing more matter in the page: the arrangement of the accidence is similar to Curtius', and there are eight classes of verbs, as with him: but some points are modified, not without reason given. The Paradigms are clear and distinct to the eye, which is a great point for a learner—and ordinary forms occurring in the Attic writers are fully noted, while Epic and Dialectic variations are comparatively lightly treated: this is probably no disadvantage in an elementary grammar.

There is a sufficient table of contents prefixed, but no index at the end: in this point Curtius' Grammar has the advantage; but the omission may be easily remedied in a future edition.

In some instances brevity has been studied perhaps unduly. In p. 66 adjectives of irregular comparison, mostly of ordinary occurrence, are given in the positive only, with a reference to the Lexicon. These forms ought to be known by heart, and it would be useful to print some of them, at least, in the page. Some forms of feminine Patronymics are not given. So also with the Prepositions in the Syntax; no doubt a grammar cannot supply the place of a Lexicon, but there seems no reason, for instance, why the common use of κατὰ to mark sequence and so agreement with an object should not be noticed—as in μέγαθος κατὰ συκέην or κατ' ἄνθρωπον φρονεῖν. So too ἐπί might with advantage be more fully illustrated. Again, the Poetic usage of the accusative to denote motion to a place is noticed p. 216, but the corresponding usage of the Genitive (as in Philoct. 613 and elsewhere), is not mentioned. The renderings of the examples in the Syntax are neat and accurate usually, though here and there the force of a tense has been overlooked: e.g., p. 212 at foot ἔσχε is rendered as if it had been εἶχε, and elsewhere ἦγεν as if ἤγαγεν. The arrangement of the sections is very simple and good; and the "miscellaneous examples" of Curtius' Syntax are avoided, which conduces to clearness, at any rate with young scholars. The Moods and Tenses of the verb are in fact an abstract of the larger work published in London in 1875, and well known to students. On the whole the Grammar seems very good, even as it stands, and adequate for the needs of the highest forms of any school.

THE UNIVERSITY PULPIT:

SUPPLEMENT TO

The Cambridge Review.

No. 15. WEDNESDAY, MARCH 10, 1880.

Sunday, March 7.

Sermon by the Rev. J. THRING, M.A., Head Master of Uppingham School.

"Cut it down. Why cumbereth it the ground?"—St. Luke xiii. 7.

Death, and after death the judgment; 'tis a fearful saying. Death, and all its visible horrors: the grave and corruption, the worm and the darkness, and all the long wail of lamentation from the heathen world, and all that evil conscience fears, and all the terrors of half-belief, and all the sorrow of the left behind, make the thought of death, when we think of it, a formless dread. Wherever they turn and strive to push it from their thoughts because it is so unwelcome,—and men would rather go on for the few years of life they know, or seem to know, undisturbed as far as possible, than admit into the midst of their movements that grim cold phantom which, whatever else it may do, closes utterly the scene before them,—yet, do what they will, the fatal hand is always writing judgment on the walls. Put it away as they can, yet it thrusts itself in in spite of them into all calculations, and all enterprises, and measures them all; and the soldier wins his honour according to the measure of the fear of death; and the young man's hopes, and the old man's gains, both alike agree in being bounded by the thought of death. And so it comes to pass that death is all powerful in estimating life and its results, whilst, strange contradiction, the living put the thought of it as far off as possible, and cut it away from themselves. And so, when the thought is forced upon them, as it must be sometimes, they will not, cannot calmly and quietly scan it and master it and set it at its true value, but still continue generation after generation to shrink with a shuddering loathing from a close acquaintance, and still continue to make death the king of terror, an appalling spectral unreality of a very real fear. And men ask, Are you fit to die? and men hold up death before the sinner's eyes, and men dwell in solemn warning on the world to come, and on far off images of death. But God asks, Are you fit to live?

The Lord of Life asks, "Where is your life? Where is your growth in life? Where is the fruit?" The Lord of Life says, "I have planted life in my garden; what business has death there?" The Lord of Life says, "I have come to my garden, to the pleasant ground I love, to the rich growth of the living, what is this dead-alive thing? cut it down, it is not fit to live." With what a strange contrast the two questions, man's question, "Are you fit to die?" and Christ's implied question, "Are you fit to live?" strike on the sense. How opposite the thought of man, the child of death, thinking of death, and asking about death; and of Christ, the Lord of Life, calling for life in His kingdom. What a mockery it seems to ask whether the living is fit to die, since fitness to die means being cast out of the kingdom of life, when living lips speak it. Fit to die—the condemned criminal is fit to die. The prison gang are fit for the hangman's hands. Let the felon think of his coming doom; but the living, the living praise Thee, O God. In the garden of the Lord of Life there is but one question, "Are you living? are you fit to live?" Would to God that all thought of death and of the world to come could be blotted out from the mind of man, if only life the eternal presence of life, the glory of being alive, and its present happiness could be put in its place. The felon heart must, I know, first be met with felon fears, but what have they to do with life. What has the gallows to do with us? The question is, "Are you fit to live?" Give your reasons for being alive. Show that the life blood in your veins is worth its nuture. Life, not death, is the watchword of the Lord of Life. In this garden of the Lord nothing dies that is ready to live His life. And His life knows no future which is not a present also. Are you then fit to live? Would to God that life, and the glory of being alive in Christ, the activity of the living spirit, the liberty of the strong heart, the fearless courage of faith, the happiness of true work, the freshness of ever new experience, the present moment, the very present moment, the now, the now, would utterly drive out the future, the thought of death, the far off world to come from the sight of man, by a great dawn of light and life and present joy, by a brightening into day at once for those who are planted in the garden of the Lord.

What then is life, if we have to answer the question "Are we fit to live?" We must seek for the answer where we find the question. The Lord of life has taken a fruit tree in a garden as the best example of the nature of life, both here and in the one great judgment type when He cursed the barren fig tree, and withered it, root and branch, to be for ever the emblem of the lost nation.

Life is an internal growth, that is the first great truth. The outer world comes to it in forces of all kinds, and it receives them all, draws them into its being, subdues them to itself, lives by and through them, but makes no stir itself, neither moves, nor utters sound, nor is violent, nor fills the world with the rush of impetuous strength. But planted by a master hand in its own place it stays there, drawing from common earth, and common air a growth and a beauty new and unknown to them by its own transforming power; and so it goes on, never losing a moment, making all things serve it in turn, be it rain or frost, or wind or sun; rain and frost and wind and sun touch it each with a power of their own, in love or hate, but no sooner do they touch it than the life within seizes on the power, masters it, changes it, gives it a new nature, makes it part of a new life, and to take strange new forms of bud and leaf and flower and fruit. This is the history of life, "true life waits on the day, and meets the day, and by always bearing what the day brings, and always doing what the day asks to have done, day by day lives, and grows in life, and changes all that comes into living power, by a natural growth in a true kingdom of life, a garden of the Lord. Life is an internal process unceasing, silent, prevailing; it is of the essence of life, as shown to us, to be in a world which always on every side is in busy action round about it, to be in this world as a receiving power able to turn all that comes to it into its own higher nature. The moment the life does not master the forces that come that moment it begins to lose its own vitality, and therefore silent mastery of an outward world is life. Then too as the fruit tree is planted with a purpose; so is man. The first life sign of the tree is the drawing in life for itself; so it is with man. Then culture and life energy in the tree next cover it with self-beauty of leaf and flower and make it fair to look on; so it is with man. And lastly comes the fruit. All the internal sap and outward glory is only to prepare the way for fruit, less fair to the eye oftentimes, but for all that the end of its life. So it is with man. And fruit is that which others live by, or, which being sown, hands on life. So the great question, "are you fit to live," takes this form; first, has all the digging and culture and money spent and time been honestly used? Has it ornamented you, and budded into a growth of leaves fair to look on? And secondly, is there a ripeness of life coming of such a nature as be the food for the living, and a seed of life for fresh planting? Look at the culture that life receives. It ought to give a return. First the child, planted in a world in which it has nothing of its own, endowed with a receptive power by which the help of others can reach it, and be turned into its life, then year after year, the money and time of others is spent every day upon it; and what is money but the stored up labour and life-work of someone or other? So all these years the life of others is in this way given to the young to use; they are cultivated by the lives of others, carefully gardened, as it were, by the heart-blood of parents, and by stored up life, having their own life to live and account for, and the lives of all those others by which they live, and whose blood they use, to account for. Tried by this test, are you fit to live? Where is the keen enthusiasm that not only has to use its own, but to pay the long debt of borrowed life by which for twenty or thirty years it has been tended in the garden of the Lord? And if self-culture has ornamented itself with leaves, as it ought to do first, and a goodly promise is there, a capacity for living true life, does it stop short in leafage, in selfish adornment? Where is the fruit, the doing good to others, the work by which others live? Where is the ceaseless inward power that transmutes all that reaches it into luxuriant growths of new and pleasant services, the silent sustained mastery, that come good come evil, takes it all, and changes it into crop after crop in due season of help for others, life by whichothers may live? Tried by this test are you fit to live?

What a strange contrast there is between this great example of the tree with life in itself, planted in an appointed place, drawing life in, and giving out life in food and seed, and the eager doers and workers, whom men call great. What a difference there is in kind between the restless heaping up of outside glitter and gain, and the steadfast still absorbing of that comes from without into an inward unity of productive energy. What an essential distinction there is between the regular untiring flow of sap ever acting, ever changing all that touches it into its own new living growth, and passing by secret channels upwards and outwards into an infinite multitude of little births, ten thousand gracious promises of truth to come, and the noise and spasmodic action and hammering and breaking, and outside operations of the great human machines whom the world delights to honour. Inward strength to end in good to others alone is life. The poor maniac may have a superhuman power to break fetters and chains, and no man may be able to bind him; if this is your ideal, oh! leave it amongst the tombs with the dead, with dead theories, and dead delusions, and come and sit at the feet of Christ, and learn His life, let the strength of the madman alone; the breaking power is not life but a disease. And think not of death, what have the living to do with death? The dread sentence "cut it down, why cumbereth it the the ground?" was not spoken to the living. Nay, even for the dead-alive the question is "Where is your life? It is a cry to leave death, and the deeds of death, and quicken into life. Would to God that one great rush of present life would fill you all, and swallow up utterly in its joyful activity all thoughts of the future. The living knows no future. An ever present immortality is theirs. Are you thus living? are you fit to live?

ARCHDEACON KIRKBY'S ADDRESS ON MISSIONARY WORK IN RUPERT'S LAND.

The large room of the Guildhall was crowded on Friday evening by a large and interested audience, who came to hear two missionary addresses from the Ven. Archdeacon Kirkby, lately returned from the Hudson's Bay Territory, and Rev. H. C. G. Moule, Fellow of Trinity College. Professor Lumby, in the absence of the Vice-Chancellor, due to a recent domestic bereavement, took the chair. The Archdeacon, whose complete selflessness and näive good humour gave an additional charm to his deeply interesting story, said that he had first gone out as a missionary of the Church Missionary Society to Rupert's Land in 1852, and had been labouring there, with a brief interval, ever since. When he first reached the shores of Hudson's Bay, he was warned by the Company's officers, of whose high character and friendly disposition towards the Indians, he spoke in terms of the highest praise, to be specially on his guard on two points, (1) not to preach against polygamy, and (2) to keep on good terms with the medicine men. These latter personages had great influence with the people, and were looked up to almost as deities, and they were supposed to have the power of life and death in their hands, being alone able to drive away evil spirits, which they professed to do by drumming and howling into the sick man's ear, and using various incantations. If the patient recovered they took to themselves all the credit, if they died they pretended that a large present had been given to some other medicine man to kill him. Archdeacon Kirkby soon found himself obliged to expose the tricks and false pretensions of the medicine men, and the result was that many of them became themselves converts to the Christian faith. After labouring for some years at Fort Simpson, on the Mackenzie River, 3,000 miles to the north of the Red River settlement, Archdeacon Kirkby made an expedition still further north, to the Youcon River, and there planted the standard of the Cross for the first time within the Arctic circle. He found the Indians on the west side of the Rocky Mountains even more accessible and more numerous than in Rupert's Land, but he could only stay with them a few months, and promise to send them another teacher, to reside among them permanently. This, through Bishop Mackray's assistance he was soon after able to do, and now there are more than 1400 Christians connected with that remote Mission station at Fort Macpherson, within the Arctic circle. He gave several striking examples of the genuineness of Indian Christianity, their carefulness to keep the Lord's day holy, often at much personal sacrifice, their truthfulness, sense of honour, and regard for religious ordinances. When he left the Hudson's Bay last year there was not one heathen left in the whole country, or one household in which there was not regular family prayer. The isolation of such a position was very great; the stations 200, 400, and even 500 miles from one another,—his Bishop, whose head quarters was at Fort Morse, at the South corner of the Bay, he had not seen for ten years, and if he wanted to write to, or to hear from him, their letters generally had to come round by England. For nine months of the year the whole country was ice-bound, letters could only be received from England three times a year, parcels and supplies only once, but there were many compensations; illness was almost unknown; their wants were few, and the converts were exempt from many temptations incidental to more civilized regions.

At the close of the Archdeacon's address, Mr. Moule added a few well-chosen words, urging the need the society had at the present moment of increased funds, and referring to the recent award of the five Episcopal referees on the matters in dispute between the Church Missionary Society and the Bishop of Colombo, the result of which had been to comprise almost every position which the Society had taken up, and to give to Missionaries practically the rights and status of English Incumbents.

THE CAMBRIDGE CREW.

We have received the following from a well-known old "Blue":

The Cambridge crew, following last year's precedent appeared at Kingston on Saturday evening for a few days practice on the upper reaches of the Thames before finally taking up their abode at Putney. There is, in our opinion, no doubt as to the wisdom of this plan. In the present shallow state of the Cam, the sooner the crew get off it the better, but three weeks at Putney must become very monotonous, and at the same time these tidal reaches of the Thames are so exposed that in very rough weather real useful practice is out of the question. This morning was not a favourable one for the first row on strange water. The wind was strong and gusty, and the stream swollen by late rains was running at a pace rather puzzling to those who have for the most part been accustomed only to the Cam. The rain had, however, cleared off, and the sun was shining brightly, and the appearance of things in general was cheerful. Mr. Prest, accompanied by Mr. Goldie, took his men with a few easies up stream to Hampton Court, where they stripped for a row right through the Teddington Locks. Baillie set them rather a faster stroke than they have at present been rowing in practice, and this may have accounted for a good deal of irregularity at first in time and feather more especially in the bows of the boat. However, after rowing for about half-a-mile they gradually slackened down to 33 and 34, and from here past the water works and the island did a very fair piece of rowing. They were abroad again for a few strokes as they neared the houses on the right bank of the river, but gradually settled as they went under the bridges, and maintained a fairly long stroke from here to the end of their course, finished up with a sharp burst of 36 to 37, as they neared the Locks. Here they easied and turning paddled home at a slow stroke. The trip, considering all the trying circumstances may be pronounced as fair. As regards individual rowing, stroke is much the same as ever, undeniable as to work, but wanting in dash and smartness. Seven is working hard, but raggedly and roughly, and is at times inclined to row too much on his own account. Six shows to much greater advantage at this thwart than he did this term at stroke. He is apt to be a bit short forward, but he sets an excellent swing and recovery to those behind him invaluable qualities in a six. Five has not improved since we saw him last, and much needs smartness and life. Four works well, but is very inelastic. Three is rough but has not so much polishing as the rest, so that we may hope to see him very different before another three weeks are over, he too is strong and willing. Two is much the same as last year, hardworking, ugly, irregular. Bow has improved a little, but must try and work with his body and legs, arms cannot be relied on for more than ten strokes. As a whole the crew is rough and not together. They have strength, and certainly will have the best of coaching from the President. We have never seen a crew of whom it could be said more truly that it depends entirely upon themselves whether they are made or remain unmade by the 20th of this month.

MR. ARCHIBALD FORBES' LECTURE.

Mr. Forbes was advertised to deliver a lecture on the Zulu War last Thursday evening, in the Guildhall, the small room of which was literally crammed. The audience was composed almost entirely of undergraduates. Before the lecturer had delivered half a dozen sentences, it was evident that he would not be allowed to proceed with his subject without interruption. A small body of the worst type of undergraduate had apparently come to the lecture for the sole purpose of insulting and abusing the lecturer. Mr. Forbes is not a man to be trifled with. At first he bore the "chaff" and "fun" with perfect good humour, but finding that some of his audience were determined not to give him a fair hearing, he was reluctantly compelled to leave the platform, remarking that 'he was not accustomed to be treated in such a manner.' It will hardly be believed that there were two proctors present in the room all the time, who apparently made no attempt to quell the disturbance. It is true that, before the lecturer commenced and before there was any real disorder, they found it their duty to eject two men from the room. But this energetic action seems to have been thought enough, and for the rest of the evening they made no further attempt to maintain order, but were passive spectators of one of the most disgraceful scenes that have recently occurred in Cambridge, although only a small part of the audience had any sympathy with the disorder. After Mr. Forbes had left the hall, a gentleman well-known and respected in the University, mounted the platform and in a spirited speech told the undergraduates that they ought to be ashamed of themselves, and asked them if they would promise to give the gallant lecturer a fair hearing, if he would kindly consent to return and finish the remainder of his lecture. It was further stated that Mr. Forbes had already left the hall for his hotel. But after an interval of ten minutes or a quarter of an hour he again entered the room and resumed his place on the platform amidst loud cheering. He gave a graphic description of the finding of the Prince Imperial's body, and a detailed account of the events just preceding the Battle of Ulundi, and of the battle itself. The lecturer brought his most interesting discourse to a close at half-past nine and as he quitted the hall was followed by tumultuous applause, as if those who had had no share in the disturbance were anxious to atone for the outrageous conduct of the rest.

Re-issue of the

MEMORIALS of CAMBRIDGE,

By the late C. H. COOPER, F.S.A., author of "The Annals of Cambridge," and "Athenæ Cantabrigienses, greatly enlarged and re-written from the work of LE KEUX.

The work gives for each of the seventeen Colleges a history of the Foundation, with names of Founders and Benefactors, a list of Eminent Men educated in the College, the number of Fellowships and Scholarships, the Patronage, account of the Buildings, College Plate, &c. The lists of Eminent Men occupy 210 pages of the work, and contain a total of upwards of 4600 names. Besides these particulars relating to the Colleges, an account is given of all public Buildings belonging to the University and Town, of the Charities, of the Parish Churches, with the principal monumental tablets, and the names of eminent men buried in the churchyards.

Illustrated with 90 Woodcuts in the text; 152 plates on steel and copper by LE KEUX, Storer, &c., including about 20 etchings by ROBERT FARREN, author of "The Granta and the Cam."

Now in course of publication in monthly numbers.

The work will be completed in 3 Vols., Vol. I., containing Peterhouse, Clare, Pembroke, Caius, Trinity Hall, Corpus, King's, Queens', Catharine, Jesus, with 34 woodcuts, 50 engravings, by Le Keux, Storer, and 9 etchings by R. Farren, will be published in May.

The Cambridge Review:

A JOURNAL OF UNIVERSITY LIFE AND THOUGHT.

No. 16.] WEDNESDAY, MARCH 17, 1880. [PRICE SIXPENCE.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

Still another memorial is in course of signature for presentation to the University Commissioners, this one urging them to do something to accelerate the completion of the College Statutes—necessarily postponed till the final formulation of the new University Statutes. The signatories point out the grave inconvenience of the possible postponement of the ratification of the statutes till 1882, and urge that to facilitate matters it would be advisable for the Commissioners to hold a series of meetings in Cambridge itself during the ensuing Easter Term.

Mr. Gladstone, having been asked to sign the memorial to the Vice-Chancellor in favour of granting degrees to women, has replied that while his rule is "strict against subscribing memorials to our authorities," yet having had a daughter for some years at Newnham, his sympathies were strongly in the direction of the memorialists. Mr. Gladstone adds that he leans to the opinion that "the absolute restriction of University and College endowments to men is, under existing circumstances, impolitic and unjust."

The endeavours of the Teachers' Training Syndicate to introduce the systematic study of the conditions and methods of successful teaching have awakened considerable interest: and the lectures now being given by an experienced Inspector of Schools attract an audience of considerably over a hundred persons, of whom about a third usually are members of the University. It is to be hoped that many others will offer themselves for examination next June, or at least take the list of books suggested by the Syndicate as a guide to their own reading. It is not a little strange that an art of such acknowledged difficulty as teaching should be thought to gain little or nothing from the experience of the past.

The Right Hon. S. H. Walpole and Mr. A. J. Beresford-Hope, the representatives of the University, have issued election addresses to their constituents. As no Liberal candidates have appeared, it may be taken as certain that these gentlemen will be returned without a contest.

In the Borough of Cambridge a severe struggle is expected to take place, as Mr. W. Fowler and Mr. Hugh Shield, Fellow of Jesus College, will contest the representation with the two Conservative Members, Mr. A. G. Marten, Q.C., and Mr. P. B. Smollett. Several members of the University are assisting Mr. Shield in his candidature, while Mr. G. F. Browne spoke at a Conservative meeting last week.

After having been occupied almost without an interval for four consecutive months by important examinations, the Senate House now has a period of rest. It re-opens on April 12th, with a contest of a lighter kind, that for the Winchester Reading Prizes: and intending candidates should not forget to send in their names before going down.

Professor Paget, M.D., has been appointed a delegate to represent the University at the International Congress to be held in London next year.

The death is announced of Mr. Clement Francis, solicitor to the University, at his private residence, Quy Hall, near Cambridge. The deceased was admitted as a solicitor in Trinity Term, 1838, and subsequently graduated at Trinity Hall, proceeding as M.A. in 1846. He was in his 65th year, and died from an acute attack of jaundice and pneumonia. The funeral took place on Thursday.

The Great Northern Railway runs a special express train to London every day this week, at 11.40 a.m., arriving at 1.0 p.m. The Great Eastern also has a special express at 12.0 noon, arriving at 1.20 p.m.

A well-attended meeting of Junior Liberals was held last Friday evening, under the presidency of Mr. W. Cockerell, at which addresses were delivered by the following:—Mr. Oscar Browning, M.A., (King's), the Hon. J. Wallop, (Trinity), Mr. T. E. Scrutton, B.A., (Trinity), Mr. E. J. C. Morton, (S. John's), Mr. A. W. W. Dale, B.A., (Trinity Hall), Mr. Shield, (Liberal candidate for the borough), and others.

We understand that the Church of England Temperance Society was never formally consulted with regard to taking the responsibility of a meeting on Local Option, to be held in the Hall of King's College; and that the fact that a Unitarian Minister would have been among the speakers was only one of the objections raised by the Secretary of the University Branch when consulted on the matter. The Society probably would not ask a Unitarian Minister to take part in one of their meetings, but would not object to joining in a meeting to which such a speaker had been invited. "Local Option" is not, of course, any part of the Society's programme. "Local Control" replaces it.

It was decided early last week to hold the proposed Local Option meeting in the debating room of the Union, by permission of that Society. A telegram has, however, been received from Sir Wilfrid Lawson, stating that, in consequence of the approaching dissolution, his attendance would be impossible. The meeting has therefore been abandoned.

Publication of the Review will be resumed on Wednesday, April 14th. The subscription for the term will be 4s., or 4s. 3d. with postage. Probably ten numbers will be published.

Subscribers will be understood to wish to continue their subscription unless they give notice to the contrary.

Subscriptions are received by the Publisher; by Mr. R. Clifford Poulter, 4. Middle Temple Lane, E.C., and by Messrs. Slatter and Rose, Oxford.

ROWING IN THE GREEK TRIREMES.

As one who, in his day, was allowed to know the right from the wrong end of an oar, I may be permitted to offer for the judgment of the Athletic and Classical members of my old University, the following remarks on the above subject. If their correctness be not admitted, they will, at least, provoke such discussion as may elicit the truth. The subject is one of which a mere Classic is no competent judge; and a mere Oarsman as little so. Practical experience has to be reconciled with classical authority, for which task none are so competent as University men; for Senior Wranglers and Senior Classics have carried off the palm of University oarsmanship.

When I was last at Athens, in 1874, for the purpose of again visiting the living Finlay, and the dead City, my attention was attracted on the Parthenon hill by a fragment of marble set up against the ruins of the Erechthæum, which had theretofore escaped my observation, and around which some native gentlemen were grouped. On my expressing my delight at the sight of this fragment in the original, (for it is depicted in Jal's work,) to the utterly illiterate guardian, I was asked to explain the nature of the fragment in the vernacular. This I did, somewhat to the astonishment of the guardian, who at once dubbed me Κύριε Καθηγητά, or Mr. Professor, and treated me, as an honorary member of the Society of Antiquaries of Athens, with becoming reverence.

I subsequently had a cast made of this fragment under my own superintendence, which matrix I brought to England, and forwarded casts from it to the two English Universities, the British Museum, and other public bodies. As it exists in the University Library it is needless to describe it further in this place.

According to local tradition there was another portion; but whether the fore or afterpart of the Trireme I could not ascertain; but simply, "that it had been stolen by an American traveller;" but, since its weight must have been considerable, this could not have been effected without the complicity of the guardians, who attach greater value to gold than to marble. It represents the midship portion of a trireme, and goes under the popular name of the Trireme of Archimedes. It evidently formed a portion of some frieze of a local temple. The number of the rowers must remain uncertain. The bas-relief shews nine; and, if it be assumed that this be one third of the entire length of the vessel, and that one half that number is deducted for the other two portions, on account of the tapering of the two extremities, the calculations would stand $3 \times 9 \times 2 = 54$, or 108 oars on both boards, so that there would not have been less than 100 oars in both, or 50 on each board; and, as it is an admitted classical fact that there was but one man to an oar, as appears also in the bas-relief, the minimum number of the rowers would be 100; adding to this, 50 for relief and casualties, makes up the total to 150. Now, if these men used their oars as we do, in an eight oared or other boat, at an obtuse angle to the water, the lower tier would have handled their oars without any difficulty; not so, the second tier; and for the upper tier the task would have been impossible by reason of the length required to clear the lower tiers.

This difficulty the bas-relief apparently solves, as I interpret it. The gallery was constructed very much in the likeness of a "monkey boat" called by bargemen a "Wusser," and to be seen on all canals, except that it was built up higher. The top sides were probably upright, on, but slightly "tumbled out", and carlins built into it at various distances above the water line, extending respectively two, three, and four feet beyond the sides. On these a gallery was constructed, extending, as stated, beyond the side, furnished with thwarts and stretchers, as in our boats; the rowlock, however, was not on the gunwale somewhat below the level of the elbow, as with us, but near the outside of the stretcher, so that the rower rather paddled than rowed; that is, he rowed perpendicularly, the consequence of which would necessarily be, that he would grasp his oar with the fingers on opposite sides of the handle, and by dropping the loom slightly inwards, would clear the oar of the water at the end of the stroke, and carry it forward for the next. The oars would increase in length in the successive tiers, but, the upper oars would not be longer than those of our eight-oared racing boats. Height would also be saved by so placing the thwart, (τοῖχος or ἑδώλιον),[1] that the head of the lower tiersman would come under the knees of the second tiersman, and so on. The lower oars would necessarily be very short, say 9, 12, and 15 feet respectively, thus allowing 3 feet for the loom, 18 inches between each tier, and 30 inches for immersion.

It will therefore be observed that the galleries could all be carried away if run aboard, which was the principal tactic in Greek naval warfare, without affecting the integrity of the hull. In fact, the galleries would be entirely out-rigged; and the whole hold of the vessel available for relief-men and stores. The soldiers were notoriously on deck, as well as the passengers; one of whom is seen lying at length in the bas-relief, on the quarter deck, as lay Ulysses on leaving Korkyra.

The upper tiersmen, termed θραμῖται, were of a more skilled class, the ζυγῖται came next, and the θαλαμῖται last, and were paid in proportion. The vessel was steered by a long oar, over or under the taffrail, and sometimes by or on either quarter; this πηδάλιον was not hung like our rudder, which word in Dutch means the same as κώπη, an oar; this device enabled the stern or πρύμνη to be rowed round. The oar was kept in its place by a thaul or pin, σκαλμὸς, to which a thong of raw hide was attached, called τρόπις or τροπωτήρ, and the oar must have had a shoulder, to prevent its running out; like the present oars of a Turkish caïk, which work more smoothly and pleasantly than our rowlocks.

The thramnites are described as occupying a more dangerous position, being exposed to the darts of the enemy, while, if the vessel got beaked, the thalamites were drowned. Archimedes of Syracuse is reported to have invented the trireme, and must therefore be considered as the first Greek naval architect.

The trireme seldom sailed but with a fair wind, but when in battle array no sails were used. There were two decks, καταστρώματα, the upper one wider than the lower by the width of the upper gallery, say 8 feet; the lower deck was within the hull of the vessel, and the upper deck would, by this calculation, be 9 feet above the line of floatation. We read of quinqueremes and even decaremes, but how these were arranged it is not clear, since, even by the above suggested contrivance, the upper tier oars would be of inordinate length. The merchant vessels στρύγγυλαι νῆες, on the contrary, seldom "swept," but always sailed, usually with a pretty fair wind, for it does not appear they "beat."

The crew of a trireme by this calculation, must have been nearly as follows:—

Rowers	100
Relief	50
Soldiers	100
Officers and Slaves	50
All told	300

At the average weight of 12 stone to a man, with his arms, this would give about 22 tons, to which adding 3 tons for provisions and water, would make a total of 25, though, it more probably amounted to 30 tons.

Digitized by Google

On entering into an engagement, they struck the masts and cleared the deck for action.

The two principal tactics were—one, to run alongside the enemies' vessel, at an angle, and cripple the oars on the one side, and board her by the soldiers; the other, to run into the enemy at right angles, and sink her by beaking, in which case they backed hard after the contact, for we learn that the Rhodian vessels, unable to effect this, were dragged down head first by the sinking vessels. There are many other manœuvres imaginable, which were doubtless called into requisition, such as running into a vessel's stern, &c. The attacking squadron was usually arranged in a wedge-like form, led by the Admiral Ναύαρχος or Ναυάρχου ναῦς and received by the enemy in an inverted wedge, so as to enable them to close round, and take their opponents in rear. Much depended on the πηδαλιοῦχος, who ranked as an officer; indeed, the word Pilot appears to have been another word for naval officer.

It will be observed in the frieze, that no two men sit to their work alike, and most of them in very bad form, with crooked backs, whence it may be inferred that the representation was taken from nature. It is well known to our university oarsmen, how difficult it is to get even eight men to sit in the same form, and row together, exerting their strength simultaneously; at all events I have never seen it effected in 50 years' experience; while any crew which could accomplish this would be certain of victory.

It will also be observed that the men used short stretchers, and sat with their knees well up, and that they rowed naked.

The Egyptians, according to their monuments, are for the most part represented as standing up to row in open boats.

It is not my intention to write a treatise on the rowing of the Greeks and Romans, which can be better done by one who is still in the full swing of classical study; but to draw attention to the possible solution of a problem which has puzzled scholars and oarsmen for many centuries, and which sums itself up in this; that the ancient Greeks did not row, but paddled their triremes; to which the action of a steamer's paddle-wheel bears the nearest mechanical resemblance.

THE FESTIVAL AT PUTNÆ.

After this I journeyed until I came to Putnæ, where there is a bridge built of wood, and at the end of the bridge is a temple, where is a priest, who is clothed in a long leather garment as to his chest, but behind he is as other men; and wearing on his head a black covering of cloth, such as is also worn by the bards of the race, he makes sacrifice in the open air from a small earthern censer which he bears in his mouth. Now it is his duty to collect the tribute of those of the Putnæans who wish to go into the great city, for this Putnæ is tributary to the great city, and is only separated from it by the river Tamys. But some (men) say that this place was once at a day's journey from the city, but I was not informed as to the manner in which the position has been changed. For my part it seems most likely that the Putnæans, having been at one time filled with too great insolence to the gods, the inhabitants of the great city, their jealousy having been inflamed by the gods, were afterwards permitted to conquer the Putnæans and to cause them to settle down in the south-western portion of their territory. For it hardly appears to me credible, as some might suppose, that it should have been by magic arts, or by some sudden disturbance of the earth, sent by the anger of the gods, that they should have been removed from one part to the other. But still, although the former explanation seems to me to be that which ought mostly to be believed, yet I myself am moreover strongly of the opinion that it was at the beginning arising from the wrath of the gods, because my judgment seems to be confirmed by the things that I was informed of by the priest, as happening at that place every year.

Now this is the manner of the yearly festival, as it was related to me by the priest. But I think that it must be kept very secret by them, for it is necessary that the god should be propitiated with an offering of silver before the priest is permitted to say these things openly. At a certain time of the year, therefore, about the ending of the cold season, great multitudes assemble from all parts at Putnæ, both of men and women, to celebrate the festival of the river god. And some of them indeed come very early, and the more early they begin to cry to the god, the more near are they allowed to approach to the sacrifice.

Now the manner of the sacrifice is thus: all the best of the youths of the country are sent in their first years of manhood to one of two places at a considerable distance from the great city, and there they are nurtured. And every year eighteen of the best of these are chosen, but whether by lot, or in what manner, I am not able to say, and they are made to fast, nor must they drink wine, but must live in the manner that is laid down by the laws of Traynynge. But whether this same Traynynge was a name of the river god himself, or only of some hero who had at a former time been a priest, I was not able to ascertain. And when they have fasted forty days they become very strong and are ready for the sacrifice. They therefore wait until by some power of the gods the river is made to flow in a contrary direction, and this is the sign that the time has come. Then taking poles in their hands, they enter into long narrow machines, which are not very unlike the chests in which they are accustomed to bury their dead. And there are long bars of iron fastened to the sides of these boxes, on which they rest the poles; and their feet are confined by straps, and each machine is made very light, in order, as is evident to me, that it may sink very easily. And all this I can confirm, for I myself was shown one of these machines, and I cannot believe that it was intended to be used as one of the boats in my country.

But when all things are ready they are conveyed into the middle stream of the river, which at this time usually rages furiously in a reverse direction to that which it is wont (to do), and at the signal they are pushed away by men who have hold of the extremities of the machines. And then all the people shout, and behind the youths come many of the monsters, such as I saw myself through the mist on the Tamys. For it is said that the inhabitants of the great city have great power over these monsters, and that they use them in these sacrifices, that they themselves may not be held as defiled by the death of the youths, and these (youths) meanwhile have to make all the speed they are able to avoid these monsters, and push themselves along strenuously with their poles for a distance of about thirty stades. Now if they are able to attain a mark at this distance, those that arrive first are free and treated for nine days with great honour, but those that are the least successful are eternally disgraced. But if, on the other hand, any of them are overtaken by the monsters, I know not what dreadful things may happen to them. And the whole duration of this voyage is about the ninth part of a watch.

Such was the tale which I heard from the priest, but he also told me many other things which I could not clearly understand, concerning the manner in which the multitudes are clothed at this festival. But this appears to me to be the less marvellous, when we consider the manner in which this people are wont to venerate the god Phation. But it is not improbable, too, that this manner of clothing may be part of the custom of the festival. For some, they say, all wear garments like to the sky in colour, and others like to the ocean. There is, too, at the end of the machines themselves a small flag of these colours, the one on this, the other on that. And from this I am almost inclined to think that the festival may in the beginning have also, besides what I have already said, been intended to celebrate the rivalry between the Ocean and the Sky, which appear to me (to be) the well-doing and hurtful gods of this country. Here, however, I am departing from the opinions of other men, and proceeding to deliver my own sentiments. If then, my judgment on these matters be right, it is good, but if not, I think that every man should be allowed to make his own opinion of the matter.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LOCAL OPTION MEETING.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Sirs,—As I am afraid a great deal of serious misapprehension with regard to the action of the C.E.T.S. in connection with the meeting proposed to be held in King's College Hall exists, may I, as one of those consulted about it, be allowed to make a few statements. Last Sunday (the 7th inst.) I was told that the authorities of King's College refused to lend their Hall unless the University branch took the responsibility of the meeting, and was asked whether our committee in that case would agree to take this responsibility. On consulting with another member of the committee it was thought (1) that the committee might object to asking a Unitarian Minister to speak on its platform (though it has no objection whatever to dissenters) and (2) that probably Cardinal Manning would not agree to speak under the auspices of the C.E.T.S.

On mentioning these two objections to the man who had spoken to me, he said he did not think it worth while to call our Committee to settle the point, as that would cause delay, and so there the matter dropped.

With regard to our Society's standpoint in connection with Dissenters and with other Temperance Societies, we ask but one question of our members and that is, if they are Christians; if they are, we do not ask them whether they belong to the Church or not; as a matter of fact we have many dissenters in our branch, and I see that at least one vice-president and one College Secretary are dissenters, very likely more for aught I know. This will, I think, shew your readers that we wish to avoid the mistake of exclusiveness. As the question has been raised by some whether we should have consented to have a joint meeting with the Alliance or any other Temperance Society, I may answer that I am sure we should have been glad to do so, but this was never proposed to us.

I should not have ventured to trouble you with this account only I feared that harm would result to our Society from the ideas that have got about; and having been on the committee nearly four years, and being intimately connected with the work of the branch throughout that time, I thought that I might speak with some confidence of its opinions and practice.

Yours truly,
H. A. Soames.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Dear Sirs,—Would you kindly give publicity to the following statements.

1. The Church of England Temperance Society was never formally consulted with reference to the Local Option Meeting.

2. If the University Branch had been so consulted, it would have been glad to do anything in its power to induce the authorities of King's College to lend their hall to the promoters of the Meeting.

3. That the Society could not take the whole responsibility of the meeting as desired by the King's College authorities, because it does not adopt the principle of Local Option, but that of Local Control.

Your obedient servant,
W. Barrett,
Hon. Sec. University Branch C.E.T.S.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Sirs,—The unfortunate results of the Local Option meeting, and the still more unfortuate issue of the attempt to secure a meeting in King's College Hall have naturally caused much regret; and the events connected with the latter meeting, assisted, unhappily, by the paragraph in last week's Review, have tended to place the C. E. T. S. in a somewhat false light. I do not think that the C. E. T. S. have acted wisely, but with your permission I should like to examine their conduct from the beginning.

In the first place a meeting had been convened by the Local Branch of the National Grand Alliance, and an illustrious deputation appointed to explain the principles of Local Option. Now Temperance Reform is one of the most important social subjects of the day. It is a subject in which all classes and creeds find a common meeting ground. How then is it that no effort was made by the C. E. T. S. to cooperate with the Alliance, and formally lend their support to the meeting? Apparently this had not been attempted, and I cannot conceive why. For I see in the list of local public men pledged to support the meeting, the names not only of nearly all the Nonconformist and Roman Catholic clergy of the town, but of four of the Church of England incumbents. Among the deputation was a leading member of the C. E. T. S. Parent Society, and the proposer of the resolution was the Treasurer of the Diocesan Society. In the face of all this it can hardly be an acceptable excuse that the C. E. T. S. does not support Local Option, but Local Control. For Local Control, as I gather from the Society's pamphlet "Licensing Amendment, 1880" is nothing but an actualisation of Local Option—in fact the abstract Local Option put into a definite particular shape.

Why could not the C. E. T. S. have utilised this pamphlet, and by distributing it to its members, endeavoured to educate them on this great question? Moreover, had the Society been associated with the original meeting, the difficulty on which the King's Hall meeting split would have been avoided.

Secondly, it appears that no formal application to the Society to countenance the meeting was ever made. It is a great pity that this was not done, and that its Committee were not given the opportunity of deciding whether it was or was not possible, in view of the importance of the subject, the anxiety and necessity of redeeming the insult which outsiders might suppose the University had put upon the deputation, the liability in case of refusal to misconstrue the principles of the Society, and finally as an emphatic protest against the habitual disturbers of public meetings in Cambridge, to assume the responsibility of organising the meeting. Only two or three out of some thirty committee men were consulted, and those members, however distinguished for their interest and zeal in the working of the Society, could not be supposed an adequate representation of the Society's sentiments on a point not entertained in its rules, and not even at issue with them.

It is probably too much to say that if union had existed among the local temperance societies the original meeting would have been a success; but at any rate much of the odium and misconstruction which have necessarily fallen upon the Church of England Temperance Society might have been averted.

It is deeply to be regretted that a hasty decision, based on an informal application, should have had the result of creating so wide a misunderstanding, and causing so much mischief.

Yours obediently,
Alfred N. Disney.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Sirs,—You will, I hope, allow me to remove a false impression very likely to be caused by some words that occur in the "Summary of News" in your last number. In the third paragraph you say "We hear, however, that there will be ... ... no University meeting (on the question of Local Option) as the authorities of King's College decline to lend the Hall except at the request of the Church of England Temperance Association." The authorities of King's College did no such thing. When they were requested to lend the Hall, they naturally looked about for some competent committee or body of persons to whom the Hall might be entrusted. It was suggested that the Church of England Temperance Association would undertake the management of the meeting, and, as it was never supposed that they would refuse, it was resolved to lend the Hall to them for the purpose. Into their reasons for refusing I have no desire to enter: I merely wish to point out that the authorities of the College are not to blame, for they would have been equally willing to lend the Hall to any other competent body that might have been suggested. After the refusal of the Association the matter did not again come before the College. It is perhaps hardly worth while to notice the curious assumption in your "Summary" that the Hall of King's College is the only place in which a University Meeting can be held.

I am, Sirs, your obedient servant, G. W. P.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Dear Sirs.—Mr. G. W. Johnson in your last number blames the proctors for not punishing severely undergraduates who disturb public meetings. He is perhaps not aware that an undergraduate of St. John's was sent down a fortnight ago for disturbing the Local Option Meeting. But surely no one can wish this extreme penalty to be required except when absolutely necessary.

Yours truly,
A. V. Q.

A WANT FOR SCHOOLS.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Dear Sirs,—I am a schoolmaster afflicted with the difficulty of finding my form some new, easy, and interesting Greek and Latin prose for translation—but especially Greek; and I am writing to your Review in the fond hope that perhaps I may catch the eye of some graduate who has either leisure or desire to help us schoolmasters. When I suggested the other day to my form with desperate cheerfulness that we should have the pleasure of reading Cæsar and Xenophon next term, I was met with "O sir, we are so sick of parasangs, so tired of Ariovistus!" And I mentally endorsed the complaint. The trivial round, the common task, is by no means all we need to ask. Far be it from me to underrate the interest of Cæsar or the value of Xenophon, but then, of course, the teacher and taught read it with different eyes. Now what I want to know is whether there are not other authors susceptible of being converted into school-boooks, either by selection or otherwise. Are there not such writers as Plutarch, Athenæus, Theophrastus, Polybius, Pliny the Elder, Varro, Seneca, &c., &c.? Their Greek and Latin are quite good enough for us. Now surely there is some enterprising B.A. or M.A. who could spend a useful term in preparing annotated selections from one or other of these authors. What we want is a small book of 100 pages—no more—(boys soon get tired of the look of their lesson-book, and change is necessary), with explanations adapted for a lowish form. I am aware that the Pitt Press has done and is doing something in this line. But their publications are too much confined to the old and time-honoured curriculum.

I believe the venture would be a remunerative one, and I know that it would be a charitable one, at any rate to

Your obedient servant, FETTES.

COLLEGE CORRESPONDENCE.

ST. PETER'S.

Our boat has not been so fortunate as we hoped, and can now row in the May races only by taking advantage of the lately passed U.B.C. Rule, and challenging the lowest boat in the second division.

The Sexcentenary Club on Saturday carried a motion in favour of Local Option, brought forward by W. New. The following officers were elected for next term:—President, H. A. Watson; Secretary, J. Eccles; Treasurer, J. M. Dodds.

At the final boat-meeting of term the officers of the present term were re-elected for next:—Captain, W. O. Parish; Secretary, W. New; Treasurer, H. Bott. The scratch fours were put off until next term.

CLARE.

The Association Scratch Sixes were won easily by the following team:—Browning, McConnell, Macdonnell, Murcott, Roberson, Smith.

The last debate of the term was, as usual, an impromptu one. Among the more amusing motions were the following: "That in the opinion of this house Charon, Esq., would be the best representative in Parliament of the University of Cambridge." "That this house would recommend the utilization of the four squares of turf in this court as a drying ground, with a view to each member of the college doing his own washing." All the motions were put to the vote together, when there voted, for 14, against 12.

A meeting of the Cricket Club was held on Wednesday night for the election of officers: Captain, J. B. Maul; secretary, C. F. Weston; committee (for cricket), H. J. Ford, E. O. Ormerod; (for Lawn Tennis), J. A. Sidgwick.

A meeting of the Boat Club, of a somewhat boisterous character, was held on Saturday night, when the officers were elected for the May term. President, Rev. W. Raynes; secretary, J. T. Lilburne; first captain, H. Roberson; second captain, W. Keess; third captain, W. D. Ridley; committee, F. Marshall, W. J. Lawson, S. J. S. Banks. The meeting closed with hearty cheers for the officers and the second boat.

The Clayton Sculls were rowed for on Monday morning, and won by A. E. Campbell; Ibbetson being second. H. R. Elder also went in for them. The Scratch Fours were also rowed off. There were nine boats in. The following boat won:—Bow, J. Jerwood; 2, Jones-Bateman; 3, Ridley; Stroke, Ormerod; Cox., Garbutt.

The Bump Supper took place on Monday night. About sixty men were present, and a very cheerful evening was spent.

PEMBROKE.

At a meeting of the Boat Club, held last week, it was decided that the Pairs which were to have been rowed this term should be postponed till after the May races. The Scratch Fours postponed from the end of last term, on account of the state of the river at that time, came off on Monday. There were only eight boats in, a very small entry compared with those of previous years. The winning crew was as follows: Phipps (bow), Hewett, Morton, Stock (stroke), Hitchcock (cox.).

Men began to go down on Saturday, and since then Hall has been gradually getting thinner and thinner.

The newly elected officers of the Debating Society, for the May and October term, are: F. C. Searle, President; H. F. M. Simpson, Secretary; E. Lambert, Librarian; H. C. Eden, Treasurer; G. A. Haggard, additional member.

The officers of the Musical Society for next term are: J. W. Willink, President; J. V. Bostock, Secretary; G. M. A. Hewett, Treasurer.

CORPUS CHRISTI.

There is a very general satisfaction at the success of our two boats during the recent races, a feeling which seems to have been shared in by the crew themselves, judging from "the rounds of revelry by night" which proceeded from the Old Court on Saturday evening. A general meeting of the Boat Club was held on Monday evening, 15th inst., at which R. Nicholson was unanimously re-elected first boat captain; H. Tugwell second boat captain; H. Everingham, re-elected lieutenant, and E. Smith, J. T. Fox, and F. S. Colman were appointed to serve on the Committee. A unanimous vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Sanders, of Caius, and to Mr. Gorton, of Emmanuel, to whose kind assistance in "coaching," we are in a great measure indebted for the success of our 1st and 2nd boats respectively.

For the information of members of the Cricket Club, we are glad to state that by the efforts of the officers the longstanding debt of the club has been materially reduced, and there is every prospect of its being entirely removed in the course of the ensuing season. They have secured the services of a new professional.

The last meeting for debate was held on Saturday, 12th inst., the subject for discussion being "Phrenology." The proceedings appear to have been characterized by a considerable amount of disorder, the rowing element being strongly represented on the occasion, and the particulars possess no features of interest. The debate was opened by Mr. Keating, who was opposed by B. Meade.

KING'S.

Lumbago, the C.U.A.F.C., and the attempt to put on a second boat proved somewhat fatal to our chances on the river; and had it not been for the gallant efforts of a veteran Master of Arts we could hardly have mustered eight men on the last day.

The King's Debating Society has ascertained the precise nature of Local Option; which it condemned as forcibly if not as obstreperously as the burgesses of Cambridge.

On Monday evening the King's College Musical Society gave its first concert. A rapt audience applauded its nascent efforts to the echo. Dr. Bull's well-known work was rendered with much spirit by Mr. Harmer, and a loyal and erect chorus. The concert took place in the College Hall: hardly a College and not a sex was unrepresented among the audience.

The accident with a fire-arm that has taken place, has caused great regret throughout the College.

QUEENS'.

At the terminal meeting of the Boat Club, held on Saturday, 13th, the following were elected officers for the ensuing term: 1st Captain, J. B. Wildman; 2nd Captain, E. A. Anderson; Hon. Sec., C. H. Thompson; Committee men, R. D. Prior and W. M. Warlow. The balance sheet showed the club to be in a satisfactory financial condition, there being a balance after paying all expenses. The new boat fund steadily increases.

The Cricket Club held a meeting on Thursday, 11th, when a code of rules, drawn up for the guidance of the club, by the Committee, was read and approved. The officers for the May term are:—1st Captain, J. B. Wildman; 2nd Captain and Treasurer, J. Rooker; Hon. Sec., G. J. Ashmall. It has been decided to adopt new cricket colours in the place of the present unsatisfactory ones, the decision of the Committee falling on a mixture of crimson, dark green and light blue.

The Fives and Lawn Tennis Club have also had their meeting, when they adopted some new regulations with regard to the use of the courts, &c. The election of officers resulted thus:—President, W. H. Bolton; Hon. Sec., J. Hind; Hon. Treas., T. Bates.

The terminal meeting of the St. Bernard Society will be held on Monday, 15th. An ordinary meeting of the same Society was held on Saturday, 13th; being the last of the term it was, as usual, very lively. A duet for piano and cornet, by Messrs. Morgan and Hind (H.M.S. Pinafore), and songs by Messrs. Rooker and Anderson provoked unlimited applause, with encores and boat-rattle accompaniment, ad lib.

The Choral Society elected its officers for next term, on Friday, 12th, as follows: Vice-President, J. W. Morgan; Precentor, J. Rooker; Hon. Sec., A. T. Hodgson.

ST. CATHARINE'S.

At a meeting of the Debating Society last Tuesday, Mr. Holderness proposed "that some further legislative action is advisable in order to check the evils of intemperance." The motion was carried by 18 votes to 5, after a debate of nearly an hour and a half.

BOAT CLUB.—The following were elected officers for next term at a general meeting held on the 8th, 1st boat captain, G. G. Coulton; 2nd boat captain, E. Senior; secretary, A. D. Davies; committee, C. C. S. Bland, E. W. Elliott, J. M. A. Stewart.

CHRIST'S.

The Boat Club has had considerable ground for rejoicing as it has at length succeeded in not only keeping its place in the Second Division, but has also succeeded in putting a second boat on. That the second boat did not make more bumps was due to misfortune, for the previous day's racing showed it to be just the best of an uncommonly good lot of boats. The first boat might have done better had they been better together, as they were a strong lot of men. Since the boat was in the First Division it has always gone down in the Lent until now, and the racing on the second and last nights showed much more pluck than has been seen in the boat for a long time. A bump supper was held in the hall on Saturday night.

Owing to the shortness of the term the Brundit Sculls have had to be put off and the Scratch Fours given up. The "blazer" of the first boat has been altered by the addition of a "duck."

On Saturday the experiment of trying a "Scratch" debate was made. The speakers seemed rather tried by the novelty but the House was gracious and inclined to be pleased. The topics varied from the most personal to the most public. The precedent was useful and entertaining, and it is to be hoped will not be allowed to sink into oblivion.

The Lawn Tennis Pairs and Handicaps are nearly finished, two pairs being left in, in the former, and four players in the latter.

ST. JOHN'S.

In the Races just over we have gained one place with our two boats, though we had one or two good tries for another. The third boat was hardly good enough to catch Magdalene, and the fourth boat missed Jesus 3rd on the last night and on two other nights was sandwiched between two bumps which destroyed our chances of increasing our success.

Rev. W. Moore Ede, M.A., of this college, First Class Moral Science 1871, and well known as an "University extension" lecturer in Sheffield and Nottingham, has been appointed Professor of Political Economy in the Newcastle College of Science.

Mr. A. G. Marten, the Conservative candidate for Cambridge Borough, is a late fellow of our Society, and Conservative Johnians consequently have an additional reason for wishing him success.

Monday and Tuesday in this week will see most men go down, though some no doubt will stay up till Friday calls them to Lillie Bridge or Putney; Tuesday our Annual Minor Scholarships and open Exhibitions examinations commence.

The day for coming up next term is Monday, April 5th, and lectures commence on the Wednesday.

TRINITY.

On March 11th the motion before the Irregulars was: "That this House considers that the early education of women as well as the higher education at Ladies' Colleges, and elsewhere, is at present prejudicial, unless assisted by great facilities for physical development, and in the latter case supplemented by the domesticating duties of home life." This motion was carried by a considerable majority.

T.B.C.—The Baines' Sculls and Doddington Pairs came off on Tuesday, the 16th. For the Sculls two started; J. L. White and F. G. A. Hitchcock. White gained from the beginning and eventually won by about forty yards. For the Pairs there were also two entries. Grant and Keyser gained from the start on Gubbins and Hammond, and though Keyser's slide broke loose in the Plough, and he was obliged to row on an uncomfortable seat without the advantage of a slide for the rest of the way, they won easily.

EMMANUEL.

As there were only sixteen entries, the scratch fours were converted into scratch pairs this term. They were rowed on Monday; Messrs. F. Freeth and E. Bate being the winning crew. The 1st Captain, B. P. Oakes, has already begun tubbing men for the first boat.

DOWNING.

All the interests of the week centres in the success of our boat on the river. This was celebrated in a becoming way by a Bump Supper, which came off on Saturday night, in the Hall. About 45 members of the College and friends sat down to the table, our President, Dr. Perkins, being at the head of the table. The proceedings were long and lively, and consisted of the toasts customary on such occasions, interspersed with well known songs. Everything went off well amid much enthusiasm.

On Monday afternoon, March 15th, the Boat Club held its last meeting for the term. W. P. Schreiner was elected Captain for the May term, and W. E. Beaumont was re-elected 2nd Captain. Dr. Perkins presided.

The last meeting of the Debating Society for this term was held on Monday night, March 15th, the order of the day being an extempore debate. The Chairman, W. E. Beaumont, called on N. C. Hardcastle to open on "the extension of the Household Suffrage to Counties and the Closing of Public Houses on Sundays." The opener advocated both these measures under certain qualifications, and this produced an interesting debate, in which diametrically opposed views were ventilated. Ultimately the motion was lost by two votes. The Secretaries of the Society, T. Robson and J. E. Viney, were re-elected, and other private business brought the meeting to a close.

TO COLLEGE CORRESPONDENTS.

The Editors of The Cambridge Review would be much obliged if any gentleman who has acted as correspondent in his College will kindly let them know as soon as possible if he will be unable to continue his services during next Term.

CAMBRIDGE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

A meeting was held in St. John's College on Thursday, March 11, at 8.30 p.m., the president, Professor Mayor, in the chair. Ten new members were elected, and three proposed. The report of the special committee was approved, and its recommendations adopted. A paper by the Rev. W. C. Green, of King's College, on the use of the word γνωσιμαχεῖν, was then read, in which it was contended that it stood for γνῶναι τὴν μάχην, not μάχεσθαι τῇ γνώσει. After a short discussion, Mr. Verrall, of Trinity College, read a paper on some passages of Æschylus, Eum. 441, Ag. 918 and 120, and Cho. 500.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY CHURCH SOCIETY.

At a meeting on March 10th, the Rev. G. H. Sing, of Corpus Christi College, read a paper on "Clergy and Politics," in which he maintained that: 1. A public interference in politics is most unwise and injurious to the character of a clergyman. 2. The great danger for the clergy lies in their tendency to take a one-sided and narrow view of politics by the subordination of questions directly social to more strictly imperial and political questions. The following gentlemen took part in the subsequent discussion:—S. G. Ponsonby, of Trinity College, Rev. F. Haslam, R. St. John Parry, of Trinity College.

CHAMBER CONCERT.

On Thursday last the Musical Society's annual Lent Concert of Chamber music took place in the large room at the Guildhall. The executants were Messrs. Joachim, Ries, Zerbini, Hausmann, Gompertz, and Stanford. The hall was, as might be expected, well filled, and the audience very appreciative.

The concert opened with Beethoven's Posthumous Quartet in E flat [op. 127], which was faultlessly played. The first movement, 'allegro,' varied by the occasional occurrence of a 'maestoso' passage, showed to great advantage Herr Hausmann's splendid cantabile tone, contrasted with the accompaniment formed out of the graceful phrase with which the allegro movement opens. The second movement, consisting of three portions, 'Adagio ma non troppo,' 'Andante con moto,' and 'Adagio molto espressivo,' was enthusiastically received by the audience, who, deep as the music is, could not help being attracted by the recurring strains of melody. The third movement, 'Scherzando Vivace,' with its 'Presto' interlude, and the Finale with its coda, did not present such attractive features to the ordinary hearer, but still were warmly received, the players receiving a recall at the end of the quartet. Next followed Bach's concerto for two violins in F minor, played by Messrs. Joachim and Gompertz, with Mr. Stanford accompanying. It is a great ordeal for a young violinist to have to play a work of this kind with the great master, and no more effectual method could be devised of showing forth his merits and demerits; but although we have heard Herr Joachim play works of the same kind with other of his young pupils, we have never heard a more successful result. Herr Gompertz played grandly, and we have no doubt that when he adds some of the experience of age to his ardour, his playing will be heard of in wider circles than those of Cambridge. No one who sees or hears him playing can fail to perceive how thoroughly he throws himself into his instrument, and although severe critics would, we think, find slight faults with his bowing wrist, yet we cannot help being caught by his enthusiasm. We hope that he intends to stay in Cambridge for some years, to give us the advantage of hearing his really admirable playing.

The first part of the programme concluded with Boccherini's sonata in A, played by Herr Hausmann. We think that any one who had the pleasure of hearing the concert would excuse us if we are somewhat enthusiastic in our praises of this gentleman's playing. His rendering of the music, difficult as it must be, was perfect, the tone both in the high and low passages like nothing that we have ever before heard extracted from the instrument, except, perhaps, in the hands of the great 'Piatti.' The audience was so excited that Herr Hausmann was obliged to appear twice on the platform, but he would not accept an encore. It is very seldom one hears any of Boccherini's music now; his greater compeer Haydn has outshone him, but this violoncello sonata, whatever it may be in the hands of the ordinary amateur, has proved under the hands of Herr Hausmann one of the finest exponents of the peculiar powers of the violoncello that we have ever heard.

The second part opened with Brahm's quartet in B flat, op 67. We are afraid that this quartet fell a little flat as it was played towards the end of a long evening, and is itself a lengthy work. The most interesting movements were the last two, "Agitato," and "Poco Allegretto con Variazione", one of the variations for the viola with pizzicato accompaniment and another for the first violin being very graceful. The effect of the "mutes" too in the third movement, with a frequently recurring viola solo, was very strange and beautiful.

The concert came to a close with three solos by Dr. Joachim, Hungarian dance, Nos. 4 and 10, and a caprice by Paganini. If the audience might be excused for being somewhat tired at the end of so long a concert, they certainly showed no signs of fatigue during the great violinist's solos. Paganini's caprice, a piece of great difficulty, with an opening passage in imitation of horns, was so warmly encored that it had to be repeated, and at the close of the concert before the audience left the room Herr Joachim had to appear in response to the continuous applause.

The whole concert was so good, that we do not wish to find fault, but we cannot help saying that it was perhaps a little long, and somewhat heavy for the audience. Far be it from us to express dissatisfaction at the quality of the programme, indeed we believe Dr. Joachim himself is responsible for choosing it: we think, however, that perhaps a somewhat lighter quartet might have been substituted for the Brahms. It is difficult to keep the attention concentrated all through a long concert, and therefore a Mozart or Schubert quartet would we think have proved more attractive in the latter part of the evening. At the same time, we are sure that everyone felt that everything that was done could not have been done better, and that the concert was highly satisfactory artistically, if it was somewhat fatiguing to the audience.

THE RIVER.

Tuesday saw an improvement in the weather, for which both the crews and their admirers were very thankful. The Cambridge eight was got afloat soon after 12, and after turning opposite the boat houses, started for a long steady row on the flood. They made a short easy off the Crab Tree to make some alteration in a slide, and thence went straight through in one piece to the White Hart, at Barnes, and turning there came home in short stages. The time between bridges was given as 19 mins. 17 secs., rather a tardy performance, but the stroke throughout was but 33, and the coxswain lost considerable ground in Corney Reach. Wednesday was another fine day, and the bright sun, despite a coldish wind, drew a great number of spectators to the scene of action. The Cambridge crew put in an appearance about noon, and went for a steady row as far as the Doves and back, going again at a comparatively slow stroke throughout. In the afternoon they were afloat at half-past three, with the President installed at bow in the place of Jones, who it is reported is unwell with boils, and will probably not be able to row in the race. The coaching was entrusted to Mr. Chambers and G.

L. Davis took Clarke's place as coxwain pro tem. They reached Mortlake with several easies, rowing as in the morning 32 strokes per minute, and turning here came back as far as the Doves before making a stoppage. From this point they rowed hard in to the Aqueduct, starting at 32 but soon quickening to 34 and finishing at 36—37, and made a better show than we have seen them make for some days. Thursday was the day fixed for the appearance of the Oxford crew at Putney, and the event was looked forward to with proportionate interest; but we think that those who expected to get "the straight tip" at once on seeing the two crews side by side must have been somewhat disappointed, for we have never seen two crews so unlike in their form and method of rowing, and affording by their style so small a chance to judge of their respective pace. The Cambridge crew were first afloat, superintended by Mr. Rhodes, and, starting from a skiff moored at the Aqueduct, rowed through to Chiswick Church; time to Hammersmith 8 mins. 20 secs., to Chiswick 12 mins. 30 secs. Wind cross to Hammersmith and aft from there to Chiswick. They tried a faster stroke in this piece, but the rowing was short and scratchy and by no means encouraging. From Chiswick they went on to Mortlake and turning there rowed back to Putney, and later on in the afternoon launched the Jesus boat, which had arrived from Cambridge, for a trial trip, the new boat from Swaddle and Winship not giving unqualified satisfaction. The Jesus boat seems to carry the men capitally and is much lighter on the shoulders and off-hand than the new ship, so that it is probable she will be used for the race. The Oxford men put off about an hour after the Cambridge crew, and rowed to Chiswick and back with several easies either way. They rowed a short stroke well together with a very strongly marked beginning and finish, and seemed to create a favourable impression amongst the riverside fraternity on their first appearance. On Friday, the Cambridge crew did some light exercise in the morning, and were out again about three in the afternoon, to do the heavier part of their work. They went to Mortlake and back in long pieces, alternated with sharp bursts, and showed in the newly adopted boat a considerable improvement upon Thursday's form, the manner in which they went through a piece or two of rough water being especially commendable. The Oxford men started about 2.30 for a row all over the course and accomplished the distance in 19 mins. 43 secs. They went off at 35 to the minute and reached the mile post in 4 mins. 18 secs., Hammersmith at 8 mins. 2 secs., Chiswick Church at 12 mins. 13 secs., and Barnes Bridge 16 mins. 35 secs. At Chiswick a scratch eight, stroked by Mr. Hastie of the T.R.C., picked them up, and taking a lead of a length and half made a capital race with the trained crew to the finish. On Friday the Oxford men were content with light work after the course of the previous day, but the Cambridge President decided to finish the week well, and if possible to go over in the afternoon. It was a gloriously warm day, and the attendance on the towpath of the river was consequently immense, in fact, in the latter case, rather too numerous to be pleasant. The Cambridge crew put off from East's at about 3.30, and starting from a skiff moored off the Aqueduct picked up at the boat houses a strong manned London twelve. The twelve took a lead of their own length but were gradually rowed down by the trained crew and finding themselves to the bad at Hammersmith Bridge easied there. The Cantabs pursued the even tenour of their way, and at Chiswick were joined by another scratch boat—an eight this time—stroked by Mr. Hastie, and in strength very much the same as the crew which rowed against Oxford the previous day. The scratch took a lead of about half a length clear and rowed on with the Cambridge crew to the finish. They were passed by the latter soon after Barnes Bridge, and were at the end of the course about a quarter of a length to the bad. Hammersmith was reached by the Cambridge crew in 8 mins. 20 secs. from the start, Chiswick Church in 12 mins. 45 secs., Barnes in 17 mins. 6 secs., and the Ship 20 mins. 4 secs., not at all a bad time, considering the wind from the Aqueduct to Hammersmith, and the numerous craft which overspread the river.

So much for the actual doings of the crews. Next as to their respective merits or demerits. The Cambridge crew has throughout the last week been going on a theory which has certainly proved successful. When they first appeared at Putney they were working fairly well and rowing fairly long, but were apt to get short and scratchy and to fall generally to pieces after rowing for a mile or so at a stretch. This, as was pointed out last week, was owing to a scrambling finish and imperfect recovery before the stroke was really well rowed out. At the beginning of the week the crew were, to remedy this evil, put back at a slow strokeand made to row long steady pieces at 32 or 33 a minute with just a burst from time to time at a faster stroke, and were particularly coached to make their finish more distinct. The result has been most beneficial, for though at times, notably when distressed by a long row or a bit flurried by a crew alongside of them, they are apt to fall back into the old scrambling style, as a whole they row cleanly and evenly. But they must remember that the circumstances which seem to flurry them most are just the circumstances they will meet with in the race. If Cambridge wish to win next Saturday they must above all things remember to keep their attention fixed upon their own boat and to row long whatever happens and however distressed they may get. If every man individually will make up his mind, the instant he feels the slightest tendency in the boat to scramble or to hurry, to check this tendency by rowing longer himself and finishing out his own stroke more perfectly, we may hope to see the Cambridge crew preserve their form and swing throughout the race—and on this depends in a great measure their chances of success. They still want more life throughout the boat at the beginning and at the finish, though they have improved in this respect during the week. They reach out well and catch the water firmly enough with the legs before the boat gets away from them, but it is for marking the time and keeping them together when they begin to get "done" that an improvement in catch is wanted. No crew can get really well together or can keep together over a long course without a considerable amount of catch at the beginning of the stroke and a smartly marked finish: they may row together without it perhaps for a mile but, as soon as they begin to get "blown" they will invariably fall to pieces. It is quite possible to run into errors by too much anxiety to mark the beginning and by giving to "catch" an undue prominence, but there is to our mind no fear of the Cambridge crew running into extremes, and the more they try to mark their beginning and finish between this and next Saturday, the better together will they be on that day. The strong points in the Oxford rowing are the finish and the regularity of their swing, the latter being to a great extent the result of the former. They have in our opinion fallen into a mistake in sacrificing everything to "beginning," for their bodies are thrown back some time before their blades touch the water so that every man of them cuts his stroke at the beginning and at the same time the use of the thighs and loins is utterly disregarded, so that the slide is of more incumbrance than aid to them. In a fixed-seat boat they would we think go faster than they do at present, for the complication of the slide being absent they would be able to row a faster stroke. A week ago Oxford were undoubtedly the faster boat. Which is at present the faster seems to be a matter of doubt; perhaps the balance is slightly in favour of Oxford. Which will prove the faster on Saturday depends entirely upon the use the Cambridge crew make of the remaining practice days; for we think the Oxford boat has reached a stage in which they will not improve to any extent, while the Cambridge men are improving every day, and their style is one in which there is plenty of room for polish. Of the Cambridge crew individually, stroke has vastly improved in the regularity of his stroke, and is rowing long and strongly. Seven is much more uniform than he was, but wants more life; both he and six must be careful to back up stroke well, and to quicken, or, if need be, to slacken exactly with him. Stroke's power of quickening at any critical moment will depend a great deal upon the manner in which the stroke is taken up behind him; otherwise six is rowing well. Five has recovered a good deal of his strength, and is rowing fairly. Four, three and two are smarter than they were, and otherwise are much the same. Bow is hardly in form yet, but gets better every day, and will doubtless be as useful as ever by the day of the race. Subjoined are the latest weights of the crews:—

THE LENT RACES.

These races were held in unusally fine weather; two of the afternoons being almost sultry. The rowing on the whole was good, although individualty none of the men were above the average. Hall III. carried ofi the palm by making three bumps in one day. A disputed one in the morning, and one in each division in the afternoon. Another note-worthy feature was the resuscitation of Corpus II.

FIRST DAY.

Third Division.—Peterhouse got away badly, and allowed First Trinity VI to gain a little. Soon however they began to row away; and the next three boats almost immediately closed up. Sidney II failed to start when the gun went off; and Trinity Hall III got well into them at First Post Corner. While rounding Grassy, the Hall cox. made a shot at Sidney; but the latter boat, taking the corner very well, just got away, and retaining the advantage their steering had given them, rapidly overhauled the Trinity boat. The latter made a plucky spurt up the Plough; but Sidney being now close upon them, the Trinity men were bumped just at Ditton.

Now followed the best piece of racing of the day. The Hall boat, having been deprived of its prey, went in pursuit of Peterhouse, who were now leisurely wending their way home, saving themselves for the second division. All up the Long Reach Hall gained rapidly. At the Ditch they were within a couple of lengths of Peterhouse, who now began to bestir themselves again. At Charon's the gap was lessened to half a length; and on the post very little daylight was perceptible between the two boats—Trinity Hall III may congratulate themselves on their plucky attempt; as few boats would have tried to bump over two places after having twice missed a chance which was so easily within their reach. Third Trinity rowed over. Catharine's II went off well, and actually gained about a length on Jesus III; this however was a last struggle, and Cavendish rowing a tremendously fast stroke, ran into the devoted boat before it was out of Post Reach. L.M.B.C. IV rowed over. Caius IV had the misfortune to start with the rudderlines out of order; and pursued a most eratic course up Post Reach. Corpus II, as we anticipated, were determined to sell their life dearly; and having had the luck to get away well, soon took advantage of Caius' mishap and rowing a tremendous bucket ran into them in the Gut; driving their opponent's boat right up the bank. At this junction, Christ's II were barely a length behind; and rowing steadily past, gained considerably on L.M.B.C. IV but were unable to bump them. Clare II, being obliged to row away from Emmanuel, then tried to lessen the distance between themselves and Christ's. They managed to gain about half a length over the course; Emmanuel paddling in behind them.

Second Division.—Jesus II and Third Trinity II rowed clean away from the others: Third gaining on Jesus, but never getting near them. The Catharine boat got a bad start, and Queens' rowing a fairly fast stroke, gained rapidly upon them. In the Gut there was hardly a length between the two boats, but an excellant Grassy taken by the Catharine cox placed them out of danger for the moment, and Hall II. coming up with a rush, bumped Queens' just before reaching Ditton. King's, pursued by a run of ill-luck, were deprived of the services of No. 5 just before the race, the same mishap having occurred last year. The vacant thwart was occupied by C. W. Foley, but Corpus I were not to be denied, and King's were bumped just round Ditton.

Downing met with a piece of bad luck at starting, and so lost their chance of doing anything. They rowed over.

Magdalene, having improved much of late, got away well, and rowing a dashing stroke up Post Reach. gained rapidly on First Trinity IV. At Grassy only a few feet separated the boats, and a splendid race ensued. In the Plough, the Trinity boat drew away a little, but Magdalene made up the lost ground at Ditton. Up the Long Reach, Trinity again drew away, but touching the bank at the Railway bridge, Magdalene again crept up, but did not succeed in making their bump. Trinity were apparently not even safe after having past the post, for Magdalene persisted in rowing on, forgetting, no doubt, that the longer course was not optional to them. L.M.B.C. III rowed over, followed by Caius III and Christ I.; the latter boat being gained upon by the boat behind it. Pembroke II started right across the river, and allowed First Trinity V to gain rapidly upon them up Post Reach. In the Long Reach a good race followed; and it was only after a succession of crabs, that Pembroke were caught just at the Railway bridge. Peterhouse paddled over behind.

SECOND DAY.

The result of Thursday's rowing was on the whole the same as that of Wednesday, there being three bumps only in each division.

In the third division Peterhouse and Sidney 2 both got off badly, while First Trinity 6, bucketing away at a fast stroke, gained considerably on Sidney as far as Grassy, but from this point the latter drew away, and left Trin. 6 to fall a prey at Ditton to Trin. Hall 3, who would have made their bump earlier but for a bad Grassy by their cox. The next boats, Third Trinity 3 and Jesus 3 rowed over pretty evenly, the latter having a lucky escape from Cavendish, whose bow lost his oar through a crab in Post Reach, and jumped out. The Cath. B. C. had attempted to improve its boats by one or two changes, but without success, as the 2nd boat were run into by L. M. 4 at First Post Corner; Corpus 2 had gained very considerably on Lady Margaret. Christ's 2, starting at a slow stroke, caught Caius 4 at First Post Corner, leaving Clare 2 and Emmanuel 2 to row over at their leisure.

In the second Division races Third Trinity 2 had gained about half a length on Jesus 2 at Grassy, but the latter were rowing well within themselves, and finished out of their distance. Trin. Hall 2, by fine steering, gained rapidly on Cath.'s 1 at Grassy, and, spurting when straight, came up with a rush, and scored their bump at Ditton. Queens' again descended, but only after a gallant struggle; they got off with a good start, and had lost but little till the meanderings of their cox at Grassy a second time gave about a length to their pursuers; Corpus 1 on the other hand were well steered round this corner, and overhauling Queens' all the way up the Plough Reach, got within a few yards at Ditton. From this point a most exciting race ensued up the Long Reach, to within a hundred and fifty yards of the Bridge, where the Queens' boat at last succumbed. King's were again at a disadvantage through another member of their right crew being absent: Downing gained steadily up the Post Reach, and spurting at Grassy, succeeded at their second shot in scoring their bump opposite the Plough. First Trinity 4 were left far behind by Downing, and Magdalene got within a length at Grassy. However the Trinity boat was never in danger, and passed the post, followed at even distances by Magdalene, L. M. 3, and Caius 3. First Trinity 5, with a good start, and good steering all through, drew away from Pembroke 2 after First Post Corner and at Ditton got within a yard of Christ's 1, whose rudder-lines were but indifferently handled. In spite of being overlapped in the Long Reach, however, Christ's held their own, and eventually drew away, finishing about a length and a half behind Caius 3, and about the same distance ahead of Trin. 5. Peterhouse gained considerably on Pembroke 2 up the Post Reach, but though their cox took an excellent course they were unable after their previous row to hold their own further than Ditton, where Pembroke began to draw away.

FRIDAY.

Third Division.—Peterhouse kept away and rowed over. Sidney II started well, and kept away up Post Reach, but taking a very clear course, fell foul of a funny which had been left on the bank at the top of the Gut. This enabled Hall III to get within sticking distance, and turning Grassy the Hall cox made a shot on the outside, the boats overlapping about a foot. The wide steering this occasioned, enabled the Sidney boat to draw away, and although a succession of plucky spurts were made by the Hall men, a bump was not made. The alleged bump at Grassy was in due course registered by the Hall men; but Sidney refused to acknowledge it. The dispute was referred to Messrs. Swift and Nimmo who decided that a bumping race should be rowed at 11.30 on the following day. First Trinity VI started badly, and allowed Third to gain considerably on them; and eventually, in answer to the fog-horn, a spurt was made which resulted in a bump at the beginning of the Plough.

Second Division.—The first three boats rowed over, nothing worthy of record taking place. Corpus I went off at a fast stroke as usual and began at once to gain on their opponents, Catharine I. At Grassy the latter began to draw ahead a little, but without avail; for in spite of their cox's attempts to wash off the Corpus boat, a bump was made at the Willows. This was another unfortunate day for Queens'; for the Downing men, pulling well together, and profiting by good steering, ran right into Queens' at Grassy. King's were better together, and seemed at first likely to keep away, but First Trinity IV gradually rowed them down, and at Ditton were hardly a foot off, their cox, however, adopting a new method of steering which has become the fashion during these races, took the outside at the corner, and allowed the King's men to get away. Up the Long Reach, the Trinity men picked up again, and, although King's made the most plucky spurts, managed to come within a foot of them at the Post. The King's men then eased; considering that, as eighth boat in the division, they had the right of stopping at the first post if they choose. This caused Trinity to bump them between the posts, which bump they claimed, on the ground that King's misunderstood the rule. A meeting was therefore held to decide the point; but the decision was given against Trinity, and the bump disallowed. Magdalene rowed much better, and kept away from L.M.B.C. III. Caius III having made a couple of changes, replacing two and three by stroke and seven of the fourth boat, went better, and managed to gain on L.M.B.C. III, but could not catch it. Pembroke II gained on First Trinity V up the Post Reach; but eventually the Trinity men rowed away.

Cavendish, with eight oars this occasion, bumped Jesus III after a good race, just before Ditton. L.M.B.C. IV rowed over. Catharine's II were bumped by Corpus II at First Post Corner. Christs' II tried to catch L.M.B.C. IV over two places; but were unsuccessful. Caius IV, having succeeded in making their claim, were unable to get away; and Clare II secred their bump in about 40 yards. Emmanuel rowed over.

SATURDAY.

(In consequence of great pressure on our space we are unable to do more than chronicle the bumps on this day.)

Third Division. Trinity Hall III bumped Sidney II (disputed bump of previous day.)

Trinity Hall III. bumped Peterhouse. Cavendish bumped First Trinity VI. Christs' II bumped St. Catharine's. Emmanuel bumped Caius IV.

Second Division.—Jesus II hold the Granta Cup. Downing bumped St. Catharine's I. First Trinity IV bumped King's. Trinity Hall III bumped Pembroke II.

The following is the order of the boats at the close of the races:—

C. U. H. & H. C

A General Meeting of the Hare and Hounds' Club was held at the "Hoop," on Friday Evening, March 12th; T. L. Shann, (capt.) took the chair, and W. W. Hough, Secretary, proceeded to read the minutes of the last meeting, which were duly passed. T. L Shann, in accordance with the rule, that all officers be elected terminally, resigned his post as Captain, and also resigned in their names for the other officers.

E. Storey was then elected President; W. W. Hough, Captain; and R. Hall, Secretary; while T. L. Shann, C. P. Cory, and J. G. Bradshaw filled the vacant places on the Committee.

T. L. Shann then addressed the meeting, giving a retrospective summary of the club's doings during the term, and also explaining that the accounts of the club were in a very satisfactory condition. After a few minor questions had been arranged, the meeting dispersed.

The last meet of the term took place on Monday, March 15th, at Robinson Crusoe's boat house. The hares, W. W. Hough, J. W. Walker, and R. Hall, started at 9 minutes past three, followed in seven minutes by the hounds who had assembled in strong force. The course taken lay along the meadows on the right bank of the Freshmen's River, as far as Byron's Pool, then bearing to the left they skirted the boundaries of Shelford; after this they made straight for home, coming in by the Senior Wrangler's walk. The hares arrived at 4.23, ten minutes in front of the hounds, who came in the following order; J. S. Sandys, C. P. Cory, J. G. Bradshaw, G. S. Smart, W. M. Harvey, E. H. Ellison, and others. The course, which was nearly ten miles in length, was chiefly over meadow land and there were plenty of good jumps, so the run was thoroughly enjoyable.

ASSOCIATION FOOTBALL.

Cambridge v. Oxford. This annual match was played last Saturday, at the Oval, in the presence of a large crowd of spectators. The day and the state of the ground were both perfect, and caused a very fast game. Cambridge having won the toss, Eyre kicked off for Oxford at 3 o'clock, having a slight breeze against them to start with. The Cambridge forwards, as usual, took some time to settle down, and in consequence of this old fault, allowed Oxford to have a decided advantage during the first five minutes, at the end of which a sharp shot was made at goal. This was cleverly stopped by Bates, who unfortunately was unable to get clear of his opponents, and the ball was immediately afterwards kicked through by Heygate. This reverse had the effect of stimulating the Light Blues to more strenuous efforts. The pace was now very quick, Cambridge having a decided superiority in this respect, and several brilliant rushes were made by the forwards, Harvey, Wild, and Whitfeld being to the fore. Heygate and Childs retaliated on behalf of Oxford, and with the heavy kicks of their backs seemed likely to repeat their success. But Harvey was not to be denied, and after taking the ball the whole length of the ground middled it to Wild, who was thus enabled to equalize matters, both players being deservedly applauded by the spectators. From now till change the passing of Cambridge was very good, but, in spite of all efforts, failed to obtain any further success. After change Cambridge still held an advantage, both backs and forwards playing well together, and the Oxford forwards seeming inferior both in dash and pace. Hill and Heygate, at times, proved dangerous on the left, but the ball stayed chiefly in the Oxonian's quarters. About ten minutes after change a verdict of "hands" was given against Oxford, and from the free kick which ensued Lancashire scored a second goal, the ball just touching one of the backs' heads and glancing off it. This roused the Oxonians, and one or two corner kicks fell to them, but without success. Whitfeld and Maclean, by accurate passing along the left side freed the Cambridge lines from danger, and Lancashire, who was backing the forwards up, secured a third goal, the ball just travelling through the top corner of the goal. No further success was gained, and the Cantabs were hailed victors by three goals to one. Besides those mentioned above, we must notice the fine back play of Foley and Topham. All the forwards worked well and it is to their good passing that the result is mainly due. For Oxford, Heygate, Hill, and Childs, strove hard, and Wilson, French, and Rogers played well behind, but they did not play so well together as Cambridge, and were somewhat outpaced.

Cambridge.—P. C. Bates, goal, H. H. Calvert, C. W. Foley, backs; E. H. Topham, O. P. Lancashire, (Capt.) half-backs; A. S. H. Wood, J. O. F. Murray, E. J. Wild, E. D. L. Harvey, J. R. H. Maclean, H. Whitfeld, forwards.

Oxford.—P. C. Parr, goal; C. W. Wilson, T. H. French, backs; B. Rogers, F. A. H. Phillips, half-backs; G. B. Childs, C. M. Smith, J. Eyre, F. D. Crowdy, E. H. Hill, R. T. Heygate, (Capt.) forwards.

OXFORD LETTER.

By the time this is printed all the Colleges here will have gone down: Monday and Tuesday being the favourite days for "Collections;" so named, we can only suppose, because on those days we disperse.

On Saturday, at the Association game versus Cambridge, we were not well represented, Heygate being almost the only man who was playing up to his usual form. There was also a Rugby match in which the University was easily victorious.

On Wednesday Trinity gave a grand bump supper in commemoration of their going head of the river in the Torpids: the supper was given in Hall, and over two hundred were present. Trinity is now the second name on the silver Challenge Cup, presented last year by T. C. Edwards-Moss, the late President of the O.U.B.C.

On Tuesday evening, the 10th, Professor Rolleston gave a lecture on some Roman Pottery, lately found in the drainage workings near Littlemore. The collection is fairly large, and comprises specimens of a large variety of Roman wares. The Pottery kilns were also found, more or less complete, at the place. It is supposed that more remains will be found some day, but for the present it has been necessary to cover it up again, for the British public—as usual—cannot be prevented from spoiling it in any other way.

The representation of the University will not be contested; the Liberal interest—though strong among the residents—being hopelessly swamped by the absent voters who avail themselves of their privilege of voting by letter. The Town, however, is already the scene of much excitement on the subject. Placards, addresses, committee rooms, not to mention supernumerary pencillings on walls and pavements are everywhere to be seen: the Liberals are rather more hopeful here than in some places where they have a seat to gain.

For next term the musical programme is—"Israel in Egypt," by the Choral Society, during the eights; "Creation," by the Philharmonic, at Commemoration: both concerts take place in the Sheldonian Theatre.

Bret Harte will give a lecture in the Clarendon Rooms. The last of the penny readings, in the Town Hall, was given by a combined effort of the various Colleges which had performed during the term: two ladies also kindly assisted them; adding a novel feature to the performance. More than 1,300 pennies were present. These entertainments will be continued during the early part of next term only.

Dawson, the President of the Union, has been distinguishing himself as an ardent canvasser for the Conservative party, and has been addressing monster meetings of the good citizens, in company with Mr. Hall, the member. All the colleges are going down on Monday or Tuesday, and by Wednesday the politicians will have the city to themselves. Mr. Chitty, Q.C., the new Liberal candidate, is an old 'Varsity oar, but nevertheless does not seem popular with the voting watermen.

We are glad to see signs of a revival of the Drama in Oxford. There was a very good dramatic entertainment on Thursday, at Christ Church, and it is reported that a Society on the principles of the A.D.C. at Cambridge is about to be started.

The citizens of Oxford were hoaxed in rather an amusing way the other night. An undergraduate personated Mr. Chitty, one of the Liberal candidates for the City, and drove through the streets, followed by an enthusiastic crowd, to which the pseudo-candidate bowed most gracefully and untiringly.

Balliol held their sports on Tuesday and Wednesday, when Sir S. Crossley and Growse well supported their fame acquired at the 'Varsity meeting. Cave, of New College, won their Strangers' Race.

Since the Torpids and the Athletic Sports were finished, Oxford has been very quiet, except for the electioneering excitement which is pervading all classes.

We receive very good accounts of the 'Varsity Eight, and are very sanguine of pulling off the race.

The following will represent Oxford against Cambridge in the Sports at Lillie Bridge:—Three Miles—Benson, Jones, Chesshire. Mile—Wise, Beverley and Wells. Quarter—Growse and Bruce. Hundred Yards—Trepplin and Crossley. Hurdles—Lawrence (Corpus) and Gilbert. High Jump—Lawrence (Corpus) and Beaumont. Broad Jump—Fellowes and Wood. Hammer—Lawrence (St. John's) and Latter. Weight—Macaulay and another, not yet decided on.

The pot-herbs in Nevile's Court, Trinity, appear to excite the sympathies of warm-hearted bedmakers and College servants. Two of them the other day were heard discoursing thus. Said one, "I see them trees ain't dead yet, then." "No," replied the other, "they looks as if they was pretty well resuffocated."

HYSTERIA IN POLITICS.

An article in a recent number of the Review begins by telling us of the method of defence used by supporters of the Government Foreign Policy. It does not tells us of the method of attack used by their opponents, but it does better, it gives us an example of it. Were it not that we are getting used to the phenomenon, it would seem very strange, this torrent of terrific accusations brought forward in perfect guilelessness and good faith. Mr. Morton, for example, actually thinks that he is not 'handying the missiles of party vituperation,' but is writing with 'that seriousness which readers of the Review have a right to expect.' High, therefore, as the strain is pitched we are willing to acquit Mr. Morton of singing falsetto, but we must congratulate him on the range of his voice. Here are a few notes from his upper register. The Government have trampled upon every principle of justice, without a pang of remorse, have 'driven women and children to perish in the snow without a thrill of pity,' have committed theft and aggravated it by murder,' in short—but here he passes off into high hysterics—the 'characteristic mark of their touch is a red streak of blood!'

Now, for our part, we are always inclined to discredit historians rather than believe such night-mare tales as these even if told of Sulla, Tiberius, or Marat. But look at the circumstances here: It has not been a time of revolutionary orgy: the work is not even that of a despot or a clique. This policy has been initiated by a representative Cabinet, ratified by a representative Parliament, and approved by the direct votes of 48,000 electors out of 95,000, ever since the late outbust of denunciation in Midlothian. Nor was it even the work of a party. At least 50 members of the opposition (one sixth of its number) have persistently refused to vote against it, some have taken a prominent part in approving and recommending it.

With the enunciation of political principles in the early part of the article we have no particular quarrel, although it is not very consistent with itself. How a nation is to set itself up as the friend of the weak, on the continent or elsewhere, and yet avoid what Mr. Morton calls the 'incomprehensible folly of creating Continental interests' and of 'hampering our future action by treaty engagements,' requires elucidation.

But before looking at the series of tableaux which constitute the terrific panorama of events since 1874, as they appear to Mr. Morton, we observe that he artlessly puts us on our guard by a preliminary declaration that he has an aim in view. This aim is no other than the exposition of the immorality as well as the imbecility of the Government policy. This, then, is the "formal cause" existing in Mr. Morton's mind; to this, as he warns us, the "material" will have to be shaped. This frankness on Mr. Morton's part relieves us from the necessity of seriously examining the monstrum horrendum which his plastic imagination constructs. We must point out, however, two palpable distortions in his account of European affairs. From the "absolutely all" which he thinks we have gained, Mr. Morton omits the chief result of the Berlin Treaty, viz., that Russia is by the intervention of Austria now farther removed than ever from establishing herself on the Aegean Sea, and knows it; and, secondly, we never had a chance of rearing against Russia a "free and strong nation," for no one can in calmness apply those terms to the aggregation of Slavs, Greeks, and Turks, inhabiting the Balkan peninsula. But it is when he comes to African and Indian affairs that Mr. Morton's worst fit comes on. Dealing with them he turns his own political principle inside out, so to speak. The Mazzinian apophthegm of his preface is remitted to its not ill-deserved obscurity, and our sympathies are asked for the military despotism of Cetewayo, and the loose aggregate of Afghan tribes, unorganised into a nation, and without prospect of such organisation.

It is nothing to Mr. Morton that the Zulus threaten the peace, nay the very existence of a progressive colony: nothing that Indian authorities declared the absolute necessity of stronger bulwarks for 200 millions of the most helpless people in the world.

In fact, the whole line of invective shows that Mr. Morton declines to use any ideas on the two important conceptions of Property and Nationality, but what are, to say the least, primitive. His notion of title to Property seems limited to title by possession, while his notion of right to property comprehends right of sole use, right of private use against general utility, and in short all that is meant by absolute right. The Afghan tribes hold the N.W. frontier of India by right of undisturbed possession: this is enough for Mr. Morton; to disturb them is a crime, though 200 million people suffer by leaving them alone. There is no attempt to see that property has its limits, and that there is no better standard known for fixing these than General Utility.

Similarly in Africa. Mr. Morton thinks that the possessing of certain lands by the Zulus constitutes irrefragable title to sole and absolute use. He has no further idea of Justice, or at least applies none to these questions, than that what a man has got should not be taken from him, even though it is a weapon which he stands brandishing at your door.

And the confusion is increased by refusal to apply any other than the simplest idea of "Nationality." The "special aim and special aptitude" most manifested by the Zulus was the perpetration of slavery and barbarism. Surely something more than this is wanted before a "nation" is constituted and "national" as distinct from individual rights acquired. It is practically sufficient to point out that if we followed the line of Mr. Morton's sympathies the painted savage would still occupy the heights of Gogmagog: and the Red Indian would still with sparse wigwam monopolise the valleys of the Hudson and the Chesapeake. Barbarism and savagery have indeed always died fighting, but their disappearance has left brighter hopes for the generations to come after.

The whole form and spirit of Mr. Morton's article reflects only too faithfully the influence of Mr. Gladstone, which has had so baneful an effect on the tone of the attack upon the present Government. It is not only that there is exaggeration and distortion; that we could have borne: nor that there is a palpable misdirection of sentiments and sympathies; that is a difficulty of every day occurrence with every one. But there is an unhealthy heat, a fever of excitement, amounting to frenzy. The result is more than a playing fast and loose with epithets of moral approbation and blame, more than melodramatic incentives to excitement of allusions to "red streaks of blood:" there is a palpable loss of moral perception and an inability to deal fairly with other people which amounts to moral disease. It is for the country now to say whether it wishes for the return of calmer and healthier tone to the condition of the body politic.

A. CALDECOTT.

INTEREST V. HONOUR.

THE LAST WORD

Mr. Morton has set forth in these columns the Liberal view of the foreign policy of the Government; Mr. Whitney has wonderingly and half pityingly surveyed the, to him, extraordinary sight of such enthusiasm concerning the possible policy of a nation, and wrath at the principles that actually guide its rulers; Mr. Caldecott has attacked it with a warmth which seems to show that he recognises something more than mere "hysteria" in the Liberal accusation of the Government, and while they yet wrote, the dissolution came upon them. It is now the turn of the nation, which, whatever Mr. Whitney may say, has never endorsed the foreign policy of the Government, to deal with the majority of the House of Commons, that has endorsed that policy. And though in such a case "togae cedunt armis," and tranquil discussion in an University periodical gives place to stump speeches and electioneering posters, I may be pardoned for once more restating the Liberal position, and noticing a few of the criticisms of the two Conservative champions.

And first I may state that just as I claim that my own sincerity should not be questioned, so I fully allow the vast majority of the Conservative party an earnest desire to do what is best for the interests of England. It has always seemed to me beside the mark to speak of the Ministry as if, to quote a recent article in the Review, they were "wandering fragments of the infernal regions." The Conservative party has always seemed to me a rather stupid but well-meaning body, pleased with phrases, and fond of flourishes, which has the misfortune to be led by a clever man, who can do nothing that is not clever and striking, and frequently is, to use a common phrase, "too clever by half."

Admitting then the sincerity of the Conservative party, the question before us is: are the principles on which the foreign policy of England has been based during the last three years, those by which we should wish it to be governed in the future? What then are these principles? Let us hear Mr. Whitney. He points out the extreme difficulty of applying "moral laws" in foreign affairs. "Morality at times fails us . . . . . where sense of right cannot decide, expediency must come in. This is no offence against morality." I wonderingly ask: does Mr. Whitney know what 'morality' means? Is he aware of the existence of an Utilitarian school of morals, which bases morality entirely on the consideration of consequences of actions to ourselves and others? Is he aware that that school interprets "sense of right" as being merely a vague appreciation of utility. Is he aware that in Politics utilitarianism is accepted as the only possible method by all thinking men? And, knowing this does he think it necessary to explain that in guiding Foreign policy by utility he is not committing "an offence against morality"?

But in his next sentence we see why he feels bound to excuse himself. For "in such cases we are forced to act for our own interests;" (the italics are mine.) Here then is the gospel of national selfishness. Mr. Whitney's sense of right having broken down, he proceeds to act on the principle;" each for himself, and his Satanic majesty take the person who has the strongest 'sense of right.'" For such person will assuredly be the hindmost in this egoistic race.

Here then I join issue with Mr. Whitney. I am not surprised that his "sense of right" breaks down under the severe strain to which some of the proceedings of the Conservative government must have put it. There never yet was a system of Intuitional Morality which did not fail when any practical use was made of it. But Mr. Whitney and the Conservative party propose to substitute for it: "Thou shalt seek thine own good;" the Liberal party ask that: "Thou shalt seek the good of all, thine own included"—shall be the "dictation of our diplomacy."

Individual men have long ago ceased in civilized communities to settle their disputes by brute force; they have recognized that "a state of nature is a state of war." They have seen that as members of a community they must seek the good of the community. But nations have not yet seen that to settle disputes like wild beasts, only with more scientific and deadly teeth and claws, is stupid and contrary to their own interests. They have not yet realized that they are members of a community, and that it may sometimes be advisable for individual nations to sacrifice their own interests for the far greater good of the community. Nor, so long as nations are guided by Egoism, screened by "sense of right", will they see this.

Against this general doctrine of national selfishness, we Liberals protest. Let us follow it out in its application to the foreign policy of the government.

Mr. Whitney claims for the government policy that it best regarded, (1) our existing responsibilities; (2) the welfare of the Turkish provinces; (3) the interests of Europe; (4) the future of civilisation.

Let us consider these in order.

Our existing responsibilities were considered, I believe, to be, (1) to maintain the integrity and independence of the Turkish empire; (2) to maintain our road to India. Perhaps the less said about the integrity of the Turkish empire the better. Austria has Bosnia and Herzegovina, Russia has Bessarabia and part of Armenia; we have Cyprus and a protectorate over Asia Minor; Servia, Roumania, and Montenegro are free; and the two Bulgarias are practically independent of Turkish rule. Turkey figures as the result of this "responsibility" of ours, as an invalid of small but "independent" means. As to our road to India, if some Conservatives who, to quote Mr. Whitney, "trust to facts not theories"—will inform us in what way precisely the possession of Constantinople by Russia will affect our road to India, while we have "the British fleet a-riding at anchor" in Lord Beaconsfield's magnificent harbours at Famagosta and Larnaca, he will give the Liberal party information that they have long and fruitlessly asked for.

As to the welfare of the Turkish provinces, if the Government ever regarded it, judging by results, it was from afar off, and in the words of the parable they straightway passed by on the other side. For where are the reforms in Asia Minor? Gone to keep company with the "scientific frontier," "the independence and integrity of the Turkish Empire," and Lord Sandon's steam ploughs. If the Turkish provinces are better governed to-day than they were six years ago, England has no part in the praise. Russia has in this case been the freer of "lands that were loud through all their length with chains," and England has narrowly escaped war with Russia, in behalf of "English interests!"

As to "the interests of Europe," if a Conservative were told that the Government had studied the interests of Russia, Greece, and Turkey, he would greet the announcement with amused scorn; and curiously enough these are three out of the five powers of Europe mainly interested in the Eastern Question. The other two are Austria, who took care of herself, and England, who, Mr. Whitney's "sense of right" not being available, certainly looked after her own interests. As to a "basis of future civilisation," in so far as England has in any way hindered the fall of Turkey, she has delayed the march of civilisation in Eastern Europe. And it is the great fault of the present Government that they will not recognise that Turkey must fall, and the sooner the better. As we cut off a festering limb to save the whole body, so must that mass of immorality and corruption known ironically as the "Turkish Government" be destroyed, to save the surrounding nations it infects, the lands it lays waste, and the peoples it misgoverns.

We see then that the Government policy on the Eastern Question, as directed towards our own interests, has disregarded our responsibilities, overlooked the welfare of the Turkish provinces, sacrificed the interests of Europe to petty jealousies, and delayed the march of civilisation.

These results have followed from "acting for our own interests," and what good have we to show on the other hand? We have Cyprus, with an obligation to defend Asia Minor against Russia; we have an uncertain number of millions of floating debt, we have thrown the Turkish provinces into the arms of Russia, and we have the Earl of Beaconsfield, instead of Benjamin Disraeli. If then "we have been forced to act for our own interests," have not our interests been guarded by foolish heads and feeble hands?

The upshot of the whole matter is this: Mr. Whitney and myself would probably agree that a nation should have a consistent foreign policy, and that, the leading principles once settled, the populace should leave their application to the Ministry; we disagree utterly as to what those principles should be. Mr. Whitney applauds in the Government acts and principles which he would scorn in the man. He justifies deceit in diplomacy, which in the case of an individual he would call flatly a lie. Presumably repudiating individual selfishness, he advocates selfishness in a nation. And he innocently wonders why Liberal politicians should vigorously condemn as inexpedient, unjust, and immoral, such barefaced inconsistency, and utter disregard of morality, (with or without a capital letter).

Let us assume that our Government does right in regarding only the interests of England; the Russian Government is then right in seeking only the interests of Russia. If the interests of England and Russia conflict, the sword can in this system of morality be the only arbiter. Surely in the nineteenth century the first nation in the world should untie, not cut the Gordian knot of diplomacy; should recognise that we must yield as well as Russia, and that the good of the community will come from compromise and conciliation, not from suspicious jealousy and warlike obstinacy.

The few words I have to say concerning the Afghan and Zulu Wars may best be introduced with reference to Mr. Caldecott's article. "Indian Authorities," according to him, "declare the absolute necessity of stronger bulwarks." Has Mr. Caldecott paid any attention to politics during the last two years or so? Does he know that all past Viceroys of India, that a large number of members of the Indian Council, that many Indian officers utterly disapproved of the Afghan War? Sir Bartle Frere was one of its chief advocates; it was carried through in the teeth of determined opposition from all Indian authorities, by Lord Beaconsfield the clever, Lord Lytton, the man after his own heart, and Lord Salisbury, a Caliban tamed by this clever Prospero. If now we are to war with Russia in Asia, we must meet her some 200 miles further from our base of supplies, and separated from them by difficult mountain passes, surrounded by a disaffected people. The Government were warned of the probability of a massacre of their Embassy; they sent their Embassy to death. They were warned of the difficulty of supplying the place of the power they shattered, they will now have to annex the country they denied their intention of annexing. They are laying on India burdens greater than she can bear; they are sowing the seeds of an endless harvest of trouble in the N. W. Frontier; they have done this in opposition to the advice of leading Indian authorities, and yet they say—"Wherein have we erred?"

As to the Zulu War; according to Mr. Caldecott "the Zulus threaten the peace, nay the very existence of a progressive colony"—I suppose Natal. We have it on the authority of Sir Henry Bulwer, governor of Natal, that the most pacific relations existed between Natal and the Zulus; the danger of war arose from the encroachments of the Boers on the Zulu lands; at our wish the Zulus consent to arbitration; the verdict is given in their favour; Sir Bartle Frere, this honourable and Christian governor, sets the arbitration aside and drags Natal into an unprovoked war with peaceful neighbours. Verily Mr. Caldecott's "facts" are marvellous!

But his leader has set him an example: Lord Beaconsfield's letter to the Duke of Marlborough shows us the way in which "men of light and leading" will misrepresent facts to serve party purposes.

The issue then before the country is; shall the foreign policy of England during the next seven years be one of national selfishness, and secret conventions, or an honourable diplomacy seeking the good of the community? Shall the home policy of the Government be permissive legislation which allows the committers of abuses to contract themselves out of the Acts directed against them, or straightforward dealing with that "national life" which is tending to "national death"? Shall our finances be spendthrift and secret, or open and economical? On these issues the country must decide between us.

THE AMERICAN SPIRIT IN LITERATURE.

When we, in England, hear that an American democrat has been talking about "the effete civilisation of the Old World," we smile with the amused forbearance of an experienced elder. Once English orators railed at America as an unnatural child. That phase has passed away, and now we pat America on the back as a promising young thing; with many faults certainly, but still, worthy of encouragement. Does it never occur to us that some day, if America continues to grow, we may find ourselves unable to administer the pat of encouragement—we may find ourselves, perhaps, sitting at her feet?

To most Europeans such a climax may seem impossible. The common theories concerning America are founded, for the most part, on the American fact who may be met in the summer, spending his holidays in "doing Europe": thin, energetic, with a tendency to exaggerate, in order to make facts bear a proper proportion to the unimpressible European mind; not showing all the awe and reverence we could desire, when he is brought face to face with the sacred monuments of the European past.

But we should not like the people of other nations to found their theories of England on the observation of such facts as the Ponsonby de Tomkyns, or the Cimabue Browns. Numerous as they are, we don't regard them as representatives of our civilisation. We are not all snobs and fools, neither are all Americans crude and irreverent swaggerers. No, we must judge America as we would be judged. We must observe her in the thoughts of her greatest men; men whose distinction consists, not in being different from all other Americans, but in carrying to an ideal extreme the characteristics of the American mind. We must judge America through Emerson, Lowell, and Walt Whitman, as we would be judged through Shakespere, George Eliot, and Browning, and others, not the less great because they have left a smaller mark on time.

It has been said that there is nothing distinctive in American literature except its tendencies. This rather slighting criticism should not blind us to the fact that American literature has characteristics which are worthy of our respect and imitation. It is also to the credit of America that these fundamental characteristics are easy to seize: that her literary world is not crowded with the vast mass of rubbish that we find ourselves burdened with. The American spirit is not so tolerant as we are of that energetic commonplaceness which, mounted on its literary stilts, stalks solemnly round. America does not possess so many of those scholars, whose abstraction and want of interest in the life around them is accounted for by observing that, like the bride of the Arabian Nights, who roused her husband's suspicion by indifference to the domestic rice,—they spend their time in digging up dead bodies. But, alas! these bodies are not decently buried again: we find them strewed ostentatiously about the literary world. Everywhere we come in contact with them: they obstruct us in the form of notes, they haunt us in the shape of commentaries, we struggle through heaps of them in order to arrive at one living soul; and when we do attain, we find that it has almost been explained and interpreted off the face of the earth. How often must not Shakespere have turned in his grave at the meanings that have been assigned to him: will his soul not mourn over a degenerate age, that after having buried him under notes, smothered him under commentaries, crowns its literary efforts by reducing him to a primer. What should we have done if the writers of the Elizabethan period had confined themselves to bringing out annotated editions of Chaucer: if their main literary efforts had been confined to pointing out to their age the beauties of Lydgate, Skelton, and Hawes?

What makes the glory of this time in literature is that there was a spiritual independence about its writers; they found a stimulus to originality in their belief in themselves. They interpreted the world for themselves: they did not care to look at things, at which they were told to look, through spectacles manufactured by the authorities of the past.

They would scorn us morbidly analysing the mental development of any author who has become traditionally respectable; they would pity us when we suffer from intellectual indigestion, unable to assimilate the large masses of dead facts which our scholars have dug up for us. They will hold out their hands not to their commentators and annotators, but to those few who have really understood them; to our greatest literary artists, Browning, George Eliot, and Tennyson, who like them have thought it a fine thing to live, to see others live, to watch the development of the inner and outer man. These have an insight into, and a sympathy with the human soul, almost unbounded; but great artists as they are, they have not founded a living and healthy school. Their art is too much tinged with reflection. They dwell too much on the sadness of things: on the "dim tyranny of circumstances," which controls the life of man. They do not stimulate that belief in self, that belief in life and its possibilities, which is what we want now. Their admirers and followers sink into artistic depression, ostentatiously pointing out the sadness of things.

Punch has shown us some devotees of culture, saying they prefer Little Bo-peep to Beethoven. They represent the reaction against the reflective, almost morbid, art of the present; but it is significant to notice that they fail to whistle the tune.

America is whistling the tune, but we refuse to listen to her because she cannot sing to our satisfaction. The whole burden of Emerson's writings, and of those of his worthy contemporaries, is a protest against the depressed and slavish spirit born of too much culture and morbid reflection, an assertion of that spiritual independence, "which is like the lovely varnish of the dew, whereby the old hard-peaked earth and its old self-same productions are made new every morning, and shining with the last touch of the artist's hand."

Digitized by Google

But we will not take enough notice of America: we are apt to think her unconventionality is vulgarity; we think of American literary effort, as Voltaire and his age did of the Divine comedy, "that it is vigorous but in bad taste." We have come into the world, "mortgaged to the usages of Europe, Asia, and Egypt:" we struggle to look at things through the eyes of our cultured ancestors: and triumphing in our learning, we forget its use. We forget that it should be not the groundwork of originality, but only of that higher inexplicable art of originality termed genius: but the stimulus to that spiritual independence which every human being possesses by nature. A knowledge of what has been thought in the past, a knowledge of what man has been, of what he has done, should give us a belief in ourselves and our race, should strengthen in us that freshness and independence of soul, which insists upon looking at things with its own eyes, putting its own interpretation upon them, and acting freely in a day in which it feels it is supreme. We, in England, are like the scholar, who, shutting himself in his room, enjoys a sunset through the eyes of Homer, Shakespere, or Chaucer. We feel a contempt for the milkman, to whom Milton and Chaucer are but black and white print, but whose daily rounds allow him to see with his own eyes both sunrise and sunset, and whose whole being is strengthened and invigorated by actual simple contact with what is beautiful and natural. That milkman is nearer the truth than we are. He may lack the subtlety of thought and feeling that come with culture: but though crude, he is simple: and there was never yet any true greatness, that had not its foundation in simplicity.

Let us try and shake off that reverence for authority which fills our literary world with commentaries and notes, which sits upon our diffident souls with crushing weight—self-confidence is not genius, but it is necessary to genius. Michael Angelo's life justified his determination "to trust in oneself, and be something of worth and value."

If we could but believe that the world is ours now: that we have supreme possession of this day and hour, that this life is more full and varied than it ever was, that there are in it possibilities as beautiful and as great, as there were in those days when Greeks and Italians looking at it, with idealising yet simple souls, produced works which will live for ever and beautify life: if we could but believe "that every genius is but a successful diver in a sea whose floor of pearls is all our own," we should dive with energy; we should not sit sadly on the bank polishing the pearls already gathered, rubbing and rubbing, till they fall into dust.

THE PAPER-KNIFE.

Cetshwayo's Dutchman. Being the private journal of a white trader in Zululand during the British invasion. By Cornelius Vijn. Translated from the Dutch, and edited with preface and notes, by the Right Rev. J. W. Colenso, D.D., Bishop of Natal. Longmans, Green and Co., 1880.

This work has been issued at a time when the interest in the Zulu war is beginning to flag, and it will on this account probably not meet with so much attention as it would have done a few months back. But it is to be hoped that there are some people who can keep up their interest in a subject, after it has ceased to be the matter of daily telegrams, especially when the question involved is whether England has been guilty of a gross injustice or not. Among people of this class "Cetshwayo's Dutchman" ought to find many readers, and it may help some of them to a definite opinion on the question.

As might be expected from the name of the editor, the notes and preface, which form together more than half the volume, take the Zulu side of the case, and are especially occupied with the defence of Cetshwayo against Sir Bartle Frere's accusations. The book is thus to a certain extent a political pamphlet, but very little more so than an ordinary Blue Book, for the notes consist almost entirely of letters stating facts, from which the reader is left in most cases to draw his own conclusions.

The actual diary of Mr. Vijn, which forms ostensibly the raison d'être of the volume, is really little more than a peg on which to hang the notes. It is, however, interesting as far as it goes, owing to the peculiar circumstances of the writer. A few weeks before the war began he crossed into Zululand with a wagon, containing blankets, knives, beads, &c., which he intended to exchange for cattle. The Zulus frequently tried to stop him proceeding, on account of the rumours of the approaching war; he managed, however, to get on for some way, by pleading that he had only come to trade with the King, and knew nothing about the war, and seems on the whole to have done a pretty fair business. But at length he was arrested by the orders of Zebebu, (who has since been made one of the thirteen chiefs), his cattle and goods were taken from him, and if it had not been for the intervention of the King, he would probably have been massacred. As it was two of his followers, who had been separated from him, were killed before Cetshwayo had time to intefere. After this he was detained as a sort of state prisoner till the end of the war, all his property being restored to him, and secured from depredations by the authority of the King's name.

It was only towards the end of the war that he began to take any active part in the affairs going on around him, and his conduct then seems to us scarcely reconcileable with ordinary feelings of gratitude. We cannot here give an account of all the various negotiations in which he was employed, but his principal business was to interpret letters from Lord Chelmsford and Sir Garnet Wolseley to Cetshwayo and to write the answers. Our readers will remember that Cetshwayo sent back the sword of the Ex-Prince Imperial; with it went a letter suing for peace, and on the back of this Mr. Vijn writes in pencil that Cetshwayo's army consists of 20,000 men, so that English had better be strong. To say the least of it, this was rather a strange return for the kindnesses which he had received from Cetshwayo. But this is a small matter compared with the treachery he afterwards displayed in guiding the English troops in pursuit of the man who had saved his life and protected him from violence for several months. Altogether we cannot understand why Bishop Colenso should express such a high opinion of Mr. Vijn as he does in the preface.

But Mr. Vijn's conduct is a minor point: the book before us is an indictment of the whole policy pursued by the South African authorities towards the Zulus, and after reading it carefully we find it difficult to avoid coming to the same conclusion as the Bishop of Natal; namely, that Sir Bartle Frere had made up his mind that Cetshwayo was to be crushed, and carried out his policy with a cynical disregard for justice and fair play.

With regard to the subsequent settlement of Zululand we may make a quotation from the diary of Mr. Vijn, who, whatever his moral qualities may be, has certainly a considerable amount of shrewdness; he says:—

> I am now going to trade in Swaziland, as under the present system it is impossible to trade in Zululand. How can a man trade there, when he has to make arrangements with each chief, and John Dunn alone asks £25 from everyone who wishes to trade in his territory, even though he has but a single wagon.
> It is equally impossible, in my judgment, that the present 'settlement' of Zululand should last. The Zulus are certain to fight among themselves, and there is no central government to restrain them. I believe that if Cetshwayo were brought back and set to rule the country under the supervision of a Resident, it would be far better governed for the good of all parties than it can possibly be under the present arrangement. I believe that the Zulus would be glad to see him back again, the army being broken up, and the young men left free to marry. And Cetshwayo, after this terrible war, would, I am convinced, readily agree to this, or he would even be glad to have allowed him in his father's land a place where he might live as a private individual.

Nor are the missionaries any better satisfied than the Traders with the present arrangement, as the following extract from the Times of Natal shows;

> If Sir G. Wolseley, the representative of a Christian Government, will concede to us the same rights and privileges as we had under the now deposed heathen King, and further, through the British Resident in Zululand, protect our lives and property from violence, as Cetshwayo did, we shall therewith be content.

Considering that the war was in a great measure undertaken for the sake of missionaries and traders, who were to carry on the work of civilisation when Cetshwayo had been disarmed, one is driven to the conviction 'that the ways of statesmen are not as other men's ways.'

The Crayfish. An Introduction to the Study of Zoology, by J. H. Huxley, F.R.S. C. Kegan Paul and Co.

Widely as many persons differ from Professor Huxley on many subjects, his power as a teacher is universally admitted. It was only the other Sunday that words of his were quoted from the University Pulpit as those "of one of the greatest teachers of our age."

He brings to bear on his work a combination of qualities which we may be proud to recognise as characteristic of many of the ablest of English men of science—a stedfast loyalty to the minutest details united with an intense enthusiasm in their subject, and power of communicating something of the same feeling to others. The book on which the following remarks are to be made is, we think, one of the happiest results of the author's didactic power. Taking the crayfish as its subject it professes to be an introduction to the study of zoology—working out the details of structure and function, and demonstrating their illustration of the wide truths of the subject from this basis. Thus while laying a sound foundation of accurate knowledge by the study of one animal the author indicates the chief and wonderfully interesting generalisation to which the study has led.

The Crayfish is a particularly good subject for such a work—a well developed invertebrate animal, easily obtained, and dissected, and illustrating the general principles of animal structure and development on a simpler type than they are met with in the higher forms, and thus forming an introduction to more advanced study.

Simply as the book is written, an elementary knowledge, especially of vertebrate physiology, is presupposed, such perhaps as might be obtained from reading the author's "Elementary Lessons in Physiology."

We are first introduced to the crayfish as he may be met with in most of the chalk streams in the south west of England, crawling soberly along the bottom, cautiously feeling his way with his wonderfully sensitive antennæ, with his black stalked eye on the look out and his great nippers ready for all purposes of offence and defence. These little details of Natural History are of high interest. And here we would protest against the unceremonious manner in which animals are attacked by some morphologists, just cut up, or mounted in slides without a word as to where they are found, what they feed on, or who their neighbours may be. But of this we shall have more to say further on. The little bit of etymology — introduced by the way—is very pleasant, deriving crayfish from old English crevis or crevice, altered to suit the rough ideas of Natural History, which lumps the medusa, the crustacean, the molluse, and the coal under the common title of fish. The crevis is from the low German crevik, or the French écrevisse, both of which names meet in the High German crebiz.

There follows a general account of the structure and physiology, in which the author dwells with his usual fondness over the mechanism involved in the "Gatric Mill," and in a fine passage compares the living organism to a whirlpool, the particles of which are continually coming and going, being altered in their course to form part of the whirl and are then dispersed again. The account of the minute anatomy of the sense organs and especially of the organ of hearing, cannot fail to interest the most general reader.

Having obtained a knowledge of the general arrangement of parts, we are shown how the segments of the body, apparently so different in the different regions are modifications of a simple plan of structure, and how the appendage of these segments, whether eyes, antennæ, jaws, nippers, legs or lobes of the tail are also reducible to a common model—modified as the needs of the animal demanded, to perform different functions in different parts of the body.

The few pages which are devoted to the account of the development of the crayfish, from the single undivided cell which is the egg, up to the highly organised adult animal, require careful reading, and are well worth it; as much a development fully grasped will be of great assistance in understanding the more complicated embryology of the vertebrate type of structure.

Then follows a bit of toughish reading on the various points of anatomy which distinguish the English crayfish from allied forms, much of which we venture to think will hardly be needed by anyone who has devoted careful attention to any special group of animals or plants. With a collection of the forms described to refer to, these details would be of the highest interest, but the pictures—excellent though they are—hardly supply this want. This, however, forms an introduction to the subject of Geographical Distribution, which seems, to those who enter, to be almost an enchanted land; why, it is perhaps difficult to say, but its great attractiveness is none the less certain. With this is introduced a brief statement of the theory of Evolution, without the aid of which the facts of the distribution of animals are meaningless enigmas, with an account of extinct forms from ancestral early mesozoic down to tertiary forms, so closely allied to the recent animals.

To say that the book seems interesting is unnecessary after what has already been said. As to its position as an educational work, it would probably be read to the greatest advantage by one who has mastered the elementary facts of natural science, and has acquired a slight knowledge of Vertebrate Physiology. Not that a person who has not this knowledge would find the book uninteresting, for it is written in a most clear and pleasant style, which must commend itself to anyone at all interested in such matters, and there would probably not be a dozen pages which he would not understand.

But we have some remarks to make on Natural History, with which this brief sketch must close.

We have at Cambridge opportunities for studying Morphology and Embryology which a few scientific schools can boast, but we are perhaps liable to overlook the Natural History of the animals we study. We come to regard them almost exclusively as links in a chain of Morphological or Physiological development, and are apt to lose our interest in the animals themselves, as beings who, in common with ourselves, have to struggle for their existence—whose powers and structure are as they are, because they are the fittest for that struggle. It may be that the calm philosophic mind is above a feeling of interest in a crayfish as a crayfish, and in its endeavours to get on in the world, but surely there has been some such feeling at the bottom of the inspiration of some of the greatest naturalists who have lived. A passage from Wilson and Geikie's Memoir of Edward Forbes will perhaps explain the feeling more clearly.

Speaking of him as a boy they say—"He has an unaccountable fancy for gathering weeds and filling his pockets with creeping things. A tame lizard has a pocket to itself, and there seems a mysterious freemasonry between him and every cat and dog he meets." Now surely this footing did not wear away as his scientific power became more fully developed and his knowledge systematized—it was rather the fundamental note of his life. Every one will remember the keen enjoyment in natural history of Thomas Edwards, the Scotch naturalist, and plenty of other instances might be given. Those who have seen the same feeling underlying the writings of Lyell and of Darwin will need no other instances.

Apart from its more direct educational influences the tone of natural objects is a most important factor in the lives of many men—giving them a rational employment for their spare time and it is not too much to say—doubling their enjoyment in life.

> "Knowing that Nature never did betray

THE MUSE OF ATHENS

Muse of Athens! ere we part
Do not wholly break my heart;
Or since that is past repair
And the tripos gone for e'er,
Hear my vow before I go
*Ζωὴ μοῦ, σ'ἀγαπακτῶ.

By those questions unconfined,
Shewing up my empty mind;
By all the coach's wasted art,
By all the tips I've learnt by heart.
By Homer, Pindar, Thuc. and Co.,
Ζωὴ μοῦ, σ'ἀγαπακτῶ.

By those subjects they have set,
Phædo, Philebus Met: and Rhet:
By those Philologists who tell
What words themselves can never spell;
By History's eternal flow,
Ζωὴ μοῦ, σ'ἀγαπακτῶ.

Muse of Athens! I am ploughed!
Tell it not in Gath aloud,
Utter it not in Ascalon;
Only tell Mamma and †John.
Why I hate you now you know,
Ζωὴ μοῦ, σ'ἀγαπακτῶ.

A FISH OUT OF WATER

*Or (should a Poll-man like to know)
My life, my love, I hate you so.
†That's my brother.

SUPPLEMENT TO

The Cambridge Review.

No. 16. WEDNESDAY, MARCH 17, 1880.

Sermon by the Rev. HENRY FOOTMAN, M.A., Peterhouse.
Sunday, March 14.

Matthew xiii, 3: "Behold a sower went forth to sow."

Placed here but for one short hour to try to be a teacher in a place which I have never entered before, save as a willing and grateful learner, it has seemed to me that it may not be thought impertinent if I try to call your attention to the opening words and to one or two striking characteristics of our Lord's first Parable. They are so suggestive, as it seems to me not only of the manner but also of the method of so large a portion of His whole teaching throughout His ministry on earth, and they are further so prophetic, as I hope we shall see, of the dealings of the model preacher with the hearts and consciences of men in every age, that, even in this place, they may afford food for thought.

Behold! This arousing and arresting summons to turn to external nature, and to human dealings of the humbler sort, would surely be significant for all who are trying to teach the things of God, even if it stood alone and if it were an introduction to a Parable which in this respect was an exception to rather than an instance of the preacher's usual method of address. But this appeal to the mystery and to the meaning of the usual in external nature and to the significance of the common place in man's dealing's with that nature does not stand alone, but is, on the contrary a summons which is a frequent and striking, although a sadly neglected characteristic of almost all our Lord's Parables, and of a very great deal of His whole method of instruction, so far as we have a record of it in the New Testament.

There is not one (e.g.) of the seven Parables in this thirteenth chapter of St. Matthew—not one of the precious pearls in these homely settings, which does not bear me out in this assertion. The Parable of the wheat and tares;—the trading of the merchant man;—the woman at her household stuff;—the fisherman at his net;—the little grain of mustard seed, the proverbial type, for such it was in those days, of things too tiny to be even noticed by the busy or the grand; these all bear out, I say, my statement, as would others had we time to cite. And they should all be read over carefully, once at least now and then for the purpose of engraving on the mind this characteristic, on which at the outset I feel it right to dwell. In fact, careful reading of these parables with this thought for the while predominant, would prove a healthy exercise for many of us, laymen and priests alike!—We should rise from such a reading impressed, not only with the simplicity of our Lord's teaching, and with its calm grave suggestive style—so free, as a great French sceptic has observed,—from rhetorical exaggeration or strained hyperbole;—but impressed, too, as well—with what Paley aptly calls, "His choice of subjects," with the frequency with which He takes us, for light and life, to the ordinary operations of nature, and to the homelier ways of men.

My brethren, in the present condition of the relations which exist between the physicist and the theologian, the philosopher and the priest—I think it is very useful for us preachers to have our attention called to this characteristic of our Lord's teaching, which I have thus described. I think His constant appeals to external Nature, in 'her habit as she is,' this care which He seems to have taken all through His ministry to call the attention of His hearers to the regular silent processes and operations of the forces of nature so far as they were known to the men of His day and generation—is a method which ought to encourage and guide any teacher who finds himself called upon to minister to the spiritual needs of men in a time when so much more is known of the forces of nature than was know then: in a time, then, when we may fairly assume that had our Lord been preaching in it He would have called our attention with equal emphasis to all that is known of nature now. Whatever we do, do not let the students of Nature think we are jealous of them, or that we are disappointed when they announce the discovery of laws where men once thought there were only prodigies or caprice. I do not think that men who worship in the shrine of Nature are so likely to give us trouble as the worshippers in the temple of Mammon, or as the devotees of a fashionable frivolity.

No doubt the study of nature is a very absorbing pursuit, and every absorbing pursuit is beset with dangers in which a man risks his soul if he is not put upon his guard. The student of nature is like the artist or the politician or the lawyer in this respect, and he ought be warned of it—wisely and respectfully—by the preacher from time to time. He ought to be told that he is apt to look at the universe through the medium of this pursuit, and that he is tempted to insist that all problems of life and manners can be stated accurately and solved correctly only when they are reduced to the terms of his science. He ought to be told that he sometimes gets so absorbed, so enchanted, that he is in danger of investing the forces of nature with fictitious personality and a fictitious omnipotence, and that all this may happen even when he is using the word 'nature,' as men did in Locke's time for they know not what, and as that to which when men ascribe things 'they are at the end of their wits.'

But still I think we ought to be very careful not to scold, but, on the contrary, to encourage by grateful appreciation and with wise foresight, the High Priests of Nature, who may be, if they will, the ministers of God as well.

I venture to think that our tone should be—"Behold, and fear not!" The discovery of laws is not the negation of God. Open the book of nature wider and wider and deliver to us a plain unvarnished tale of what you find written there. Behold! He teaches us (it is the very essence of His teaching) that His witness is found not only in the gaps but in the continuity of being. "The regular, the silent, the continuous may be as portentous to us as the deviating, the loud or the abrupt."

And as we preachers gain this wide yet plain and practical idea of Nature, an idea which excludes at once idolatry and neglect from looking at her through the illuminating medium of our Lord's Parables of Nature; so, too, I think, there are very helpful lessons to be learnt from the thought of the frequency with which He calls us, in those Parables, away from the strange, the startling, in human history, and bids us note the common round, the daily task of tradesman, agriculturist, fisherman, or peasant, and the primal simple relations of the family, or of the humblest household. On those many lessons I have no time now to dwell—but this much at least I may say, that surely my brethren, nothing which He has thus consecrated can be treated as common or unclean; or as too secular for notice in the pulpit or the prayer. We may think of this when we hear complaints of preachers, such as some pulpit purists are disposed to make, because we sometimes are guilty of introducing "secular" topics or homely allusions into sermons delivered in the House of God. We claim not only all Nature, but all human ways: the common, the usual, the homely most of all, as ours of right, since the Model Preacher has taken possession of them thus. We claim them in the name of Him who is not only the Head over all things to the Church—but who binds together all Creation from the highest to the lowest—from the mightiest to the meanest form—of Him who has made all things double one against another, one thing establishing the good of another, that there might be no end to the holy joy of beholding His glory thereby. Baskets of silver containing fruits of gold, these parables would certainly be, if they did no more than help us to avoid all foolish depreciation not only of Nature but of that Humanity which he has taken into the Divine—and which He has claimed as His own—that Humanity we need not worship, seeing that we worship the Son of Man; that humanity which we dare not defile now or degrade, or despise, seeing that The Man is on the Throne of the universe, high above all the earth, and far exalted above all gods—not only of ancient mythology but of modern volytheism; Gods of the Market, of the Tribe, of the Cave, or of the Theatre.

II. Now we may venture to behold with the mind's eye, to look, in obedience to the Divine summons, at the Sower going forth to sow.

"Behold, a sower or the sower went forth to sow." You all know the earthly story. Nothing can be simpler, nothing less ornate. There is in it nothing of the glare of the startling, the sudden or the strange. A sower going forth to sow was a common sight enough in the land of Galilee; the varied results of such a sowing would be obvious enough to those of our Lord's congregation who could look around them, as they stood there on the shore, upon the very fields which He thus took as His text. A common sight enough, I say, not only there but here. And yet a sight which you should stop, sometimes that you may notice, a sight through which a Christian, though no poet or no philosopher, may have preached to him a sermon which he will not easily forget. A man (a common prosaic man may be, but that does not destroy the parable's instructiveness, as those who have followed thus far our train of thought can see at once), a man holding in his hand the germs of life, of that life before the mystery of which, even in its lower forms, philosophy is puzzled, or proffers—through the lips of one of the most distinguished of her sons some splendid guess—which only carries us one step further into the unknown, a guess. A man holding in his hand those seeds, one of which, if a thoughtful Christian, in thoughtful mood, will take it in his hand and think steadily for but ten minutes of the strange possibilities of development and multiplication of which it is the envelope,—one of which, I say, will fill him with that wonder, born of the knowledge that he does not know, which should drive him to his knees—a man just scattering these right and left around him, confiding them to the mother earth from whence they sprung, in hope that the seeming loss may prove a real gain, and that what he parts with will return to him, not as it left him, but multiplied indefinitely. A man just assuming that the soil beneath him will offend against the reason of the case, and belie its nature, and prove itself unworthy of his care, if after this it lay bare and fruitless; and if after this its ascertained capacities do not in their exercise send forth upon the surface that which shall contain the germ of still richer harvests in the years to come! All commonplace enough! Nor is there anything of what the vulgar call the wonderful in what follows as the story goes—as it goes on to tell of the subsequent discovery of the issue of this husbandry. This discovery was, you all remember, that although there was success enough to justify the venture which the sower made, yet there were certain seeds, in themselves as really capable, as they left his hand, of reproductiveness as any of the others which he scattered in the spring, certain seeds (alas, too many!) which, through the nature of the soil on which they fell, were, for his purpose, either lost at once, or, through their meeting with adverse and baneful influence, never more than promised, never held out unto the reaping time, and so which mocked his toil, and his free-handed costly confidence.

That is all! But what if, touched with the rays of Christ's own teaching, we are led to see, that, in these dealings of man with earth, and with its products, we have not merely an arbitrary simile selected at haphazard, but a true picture, a miniature, yet correct, of the dealings of the Lord of the whole earth with you and me. What, what if there be a real analogy, not a mere fanciful resemblance, between the underground process of the earth in dealing with the seed which man has cast into its bosom, and the subtle dealings of human hearts and wills, whose springs are deep down indeed, with that seed of eternal life which Christ has cast therein, He, the Incarnate One,—He whose Spirit never ceases His Heavenly operations among men, that they may bring forth the fruits of the Spirit which abide. What if here, as has been well said, "the earth be but the shadow of heaven, and of heaven's law, and things therein each to each other like, more than on earth is thought.

III. The sower going forth to sow. When we spoke of Christ and His Incarnation, of Christ and of His working through His Spirit, in men's hearts, we answered so to say, by anticipation, the anxious, for all teachers the fundamental question—and this sower, who is He? Arguing from another parable, alike in all essentials to this, arguing from the known facts of all the subsequent, as well as of all the previous history of God's dealings with mankind—the sower, beyond all doubt is the Son of Man.—He who, all the ages through, is the light which lighteth every man who has come into the world, before His Incarnation, or since,—He who came forth ·m His Father's home and entered through His Incarnation the ·l of human nature, that therein He might cast the seed of life indeed, and therein pour His Spirit there, where but for this, there must have been barrenness from end to end, an utter spiritual sterility, a waste and a chaos of all souls more than enough to make the angels weep. The Son of Man, the Word of God is He. Source of all life, nay the life, in contact with all consciences. His field the world, the wide, wide human world, on which He has earned the right to tread without permission from its potentates,—the wide human world through which His very Presence breathes a hope, bearing as He does, in whispers of His word, in the expressive silence of His Sacraments, bearing in divers tones, now courting, now compelling, the message of reconciliation: through divers instruments the music of His gospel, in divers subtle influences, the reproving, correcting, sin-striking, life-awakening accents of His divine appeals to man. He is the sower who went forth (oh, from what a home to what an agony) with what a costly seed! Miracle of mercy; Miracle of munificence! He is the sower who is ever near, ever going forth. For surely if this field is the world, then while the world lasts, from generation to generation, this seed time and this harvest can never cease. This is the invisible addressing the invisible; the Spirit speaking to the spirit, seeking to find a residence, yearning for a welcome there, where He would found a throne, and introduce the legislation of the Only Wise.

The sower, I say, is the Son of Man. I want to fasten this thought firmly first. You know, that as a general rule, the preacher takes up, at once, the teaching of the parable, by which it becomes applicable to himself as teacher and to his hearers as the taught. He sows, they receive, some in this way, some in that; some, so as to give him scarce a ray of hope; some, so as to tantalise with just a promise which early disappoints; some to put forth leaves and flowers of spiritual vitality which fall and fade and leave no fruit behind; some to hold on to the last with patience and ripen for the calm autumn of the Holy end.

My brethren, I don't want to rob you of any good which appeals and applications such as these may have done you in the past. God strengthen in you the memory of them more and more, or of any profit you may find in them for the future. If any such appeals have touched your consciences, at any time, thank God for them and keep hold—tight hold upon the truth they brought to light. If any such application shall, in the future, stir your souls, do not let the soul sink back again into the supineness from which they thus, by God's mercy, have been aroused. He must be a hard man (e.g.) whom that sermon of Robertson's, of Brighton, in which this parable is treated thus—does not touch and stir, at some point or other of his spiritual sensibility. But, while I say this, I think it will be better in the long run (even for the Preacher's end), if at first we keep the attention fixed upon the Prince of Preachers. At any rate, do not let us begin by narrowing its range, as if there were no other voices through which the word could reach our parishioners, than those we listen to (or try to listen) in Church, or which come to them through the words and visits of the clergymen.

I hope, indeed, that the great sower is with us now, as we try to speak to you of Him; and with you, too, who are trying to listen or to bear. I believe, indeed, that He has given me seed to sow, which I shall become a castaway if I do not do my utmost to scatter broad-cast with unabated energy, until He tells me, in accents unmistakeable, that my work is done.

All this, indeed, I can and must believe, and hope, or I could not go on! To what a mockery, less sufferable than a badly acted drama on the stage, would my preaching be reduced, to what a wasted hour your time of listening, if this were not really so.

But then, my brethren, this belief need not rob us of the Truth that He who is sowing is the Son of Man. This hope need not rob us of the consolation (oh! how could any man dare to take a parish if he had it not) that Jesus is ever going forth to sow, not only in Church, but in every corner of His Earth where there exists the soil of human hearts, hearts which but for this sower would never be touched by the voice or moulded by the hand of His subordinates. This faith need not rob us of the consolation of the further faith that God may do without us as well as with us, wonders for His name; and that His Spirit is speaking through a hundred channels of which we little dream, working in men mightily, in regions far within and out of our sight at present, and in ways far more efficacious than those which the skill of preachers can devise. The field, His field, I do not doubt is the world, not merely some corner of it where your voice or mine can reach. I know men say they hear nothing, see no lips moving, but it does not follow that there is no voice. For, see you not, as in dreams (to quote old Plutarch whom our children know) there may be distinct communications and yet no articulate speech There may be, not merely the word of mouth, and the word of the mind, to which last men refer when they describe what they call saying things to themselves when their lips nevertheless are still, there may be not only these, but the Inner Word of mind to the mind as well. And I believe that that Word there is, stifled with passion, and by the whirl of outward things, as the traffic in a noisy street may drown the uttered exhortation of a human voice in some great church in town, but yet there, encountering, confronting, accosting men,—coming in some wonderful manner to the recognition within, coming and refusing to go, coming and sowing seeds; haunting men in mercy, in silence eloquent as the still night to the Psalmist of the 19th Psalm. It is the sower, I am sure! What else mean those thoughts of God; those self accusations, that dread, that half-born hope, that distrust of themselves—those questionings of the conscience which one meets with often in the case of men who have not been to church for years, of men on weary sick beds, or of the women whom we put down as lost beyond repair. Do not these cases remind us that the Sower has been there before us! It is, sir, said once a brother of such an one to me, on such a sick bed and in such a plight, it is, sir, the working of the Spirit, is it not? Just so! The sowing of the sower, the echo of His footsteps, going forth to sow. Yes! How are they to hear, one may often say, without a preacher; we preachers often do say it, when we think in towns, for instance, of the tens of thousands committed to our charge with whom neither publicly nor privately can we ever hope to speak. But surely, too, haste as we may, and as we ought for mercy's sake to preach or to send a preacher, we may answer ourselves sometimes, as St. Paul answered the same question once by his own passionate adversative, "But, I say, have they not heard." Nay, is there not a never-failing continuance of the testimony?" The stately march of the divine procession, has it not been, a never failing one? Like the firmanent in that Psalm which the apostle proceeds to quote, has not Jesus ever had a language, although not always to be classed with the dialects of Earth? Nay, rather, hath not the divine bridegroom gone forth from his chamber? Is he not ever going forth? And who is there of woman born, amongst us, who is utterly hid from the heat of His rays. Take the wings of the morning and remain in the uttermost parts of the sea, He is there sowing beside all waters.

Places there are here on earth, good and holy ground, where Paradise seems replanted, climb to them, He is there! Other places there are too, where you cannot go down without a policeman, and into which even if you were sent for, you feel as if it may be only for some foul purpose and not for a pastoral interview, which so shock us and are so revolting that we call them hells on earth, I say, if you go down into those hells, He is there also. My friends, do not let us make light of this, do not say that all this is a convenient pulpit platitude, a mere periphrasis which only means when translated into reasonable language that every man has a conscience and that even in the lowest depths of social and spiritual degradation the sinner is followed by recollections or haunted by presentiments which dog his footsteps and follow him into the darkest corners with the accents or indictments of expostulating shame. I deny that the bare statement that every man has a conscience, or even that every baptised man has an intensified conscience, is an explanation of the strange grouping of moral and spiritual experience to which I have referred. The statement, that in these cases the sower is going forth to sow, is a real explanation of these facts—nay, is a scientific, accurate statement, a statement side by side with which the proposition that every man has a conscience is loose and superficial, or at least provisional. Did you ever meet with a definition of the conscience? did you ever hear claims made on behalf of the supremacy of the conscience which satisfied you, or which made it clear that in claiming the supremacy the claimants were not overlooking for the nonce, some inconvenient facts respecting the liability even of conscience, left to itself, to become an unfit and unfaithful guide for man? I never did. I never met with any merely moral statements of this kind which did not lay open to this objection; an objection, urged in substance, and with great force by the late Dr. Whewell in his reverent and appreciative account of the great Butler's statement on this head. The fact is that no definition of the conscience, no doctrine of the supremacy of conscience, can be maintained against all comers, unless you go out of morals and seek help from the despised theologian. You must bring in the thought of the Mover of the conscience, of the Son of Man going forth to sow, or you involve yourself in utter inability to account for the action of the organ, as well as in the terrible danger of reducing all moral internal transactions to the level of a dialogue between two parts of a man's self; and so, in the last resort, of making a man—the individual man a measure of all things!—nay of making each man practically his own God! This is my profound conviction. I may be but a poor theologian, but I know enough of man, and I know enough of God to feel compelled to state this solemnly. Here as elsewhere we may fold our hands, and bow the head and echo, each one for himself, the solemn statement of the late Canon Kingsley—"I cannot—cannot live without the Man Christ Jesus!" I am utterly at sea, dear friends, I have no word for you and no seed to sow unless the Son of Man is sower and His field the world.

Do not rob the preacher of the consolation, do not rob yourself of the awe, which this great doctrine should inspire. Do not rob me of the consolation. Oh! I want the consolation of being able to believe that the sower has been here before me, that He will remain with you, when we part, to expose, may be, my blunders, but yet, by that very exposure to fulfil my hope, converting stammering platitudes even, if such they be, into truths effectual for your inmost life!—Remain O Lord to sow!

There is consolation in the thought, but there is also awe! The thought of the nearness of the Son of Man to each of us—makes every man's life a very awful thing; makes it so awful that men are glad to put it from them, and to take refuge in some less tremendous theology; awe, surely, there is in the thought, that you and I, and all about us, are the subjects of a secret process, through which (for joy or for our condemnation), Christ and His Eternal Spirit are brought into constant contact with our hearts and wills—that they are the soil over which He is seeking to gain dominion;—that He may reclaim them from their native barrenness. Oh! surely, if it be true, as I once heard a preacher say, that man's anomalous and fallen condition is made manifest in the fact that he is unable, often, to distinguish between the temptations which come to him from his own mind and those which come to him from the devil. If that fact fills with awe, surely the fact to which I now allude should fill us with a holy dread, and a wise humility. Christ, the very Word is near us, is speaking to us, dwelling in us, and walking in us, as Ignatius has it—and yet we know it not; we respond not; we bring forth so little fruit unto perfection. And why? Such costly care; such generous munificence; such untiring love; such splendid Husbandry, and yet so little in the life which corresponds.

Why? Perhaps the mischief is in the soil.

TO THE ELECTORS
OF THE
BOROUGH OF CAMBRIDGE.

GENTLEMEN,

The long-deferred dissolution of Parliament imposes on you the duty of electing representatives.

I venture once more to solicit your suffrages.

Having been during five years one of your Members, I am not a stranger, and the general character of my political views is well known to you. But I think it proper to refer to one or two points of pressing interest.

During the existence of the Parliament now at length concluded domestic questions have been almost entirely neglected by reason of the demands of foreign affairs on our attention. The present Government acknowledge that they have done little at home, but then they say, "Look at our spirited foreign policy." That policy was not approved by two of the most respected members of the Conservative Cabinet—Lords Derby and Carnarvon—and I venture to think that the more you inquire the more you will be disposed to agree with those noblemen. In my opinion the Government have adopted a dangerous and an undignified, if not an "immoral" policy, as they have chosen to support the cruel and effete government of Turkey in order to check the ambition of Russia. But they have not even succeeded in this policy, for Russia has gained all, if not more than all, she could have hoped for when the war began, and Turkey, spite of our vaunted assistance, is so miserably feeble that she cannot even commence those reforms in Asia Minor which were promised by her in July, 1878. So now, having estranged Russia, we have been threatening Turkey who has been giving us much trouble, and seems to be utterly ungrateful for the services we have rendered her. A wiser policy would, I believe, have avoided the Russo-Turkish war, with all its horrors and bloodshed, by uniting the great powers to secure good government to the miserable subjects of Turkey.

I cannot here discuss the proceedings which led up to the Treaty of Berlin. No language can adequately set forth the degradation which has come upon the name of England in consequence of the "Salisbury-Schouvaloff agreement" and the "Anglo-Turkish Convention," nor can I more than hint at the Afghan and Zulu quarrels, in both of which violence, deceit and blundering have been so conspicuous that one is astonished how any body of English gentlemen can have sanctioned such transactions. Parliament has, however, approved of them by great majorities, and it is for you to say whether you do or do not wish for another Parliament of similar views.

Such proceedings are not only disgraceful but also very costly. The present Government inherited a great surplus, and they have turned it into a deficit, besides adding to our taxation. I ask you with the utmost confidence to compare Liberal and Conservative finance.

The present Government can spend money but cannot apparently do much else. Their achievements in the improvement of our laws are miserably small. I think you will prefer a Government which would spend less, and do more towards the improvement of our legal system.

I have long felt a deep interest in the reform of the laws as to the ownership and tenure of land. I believe that great and beneficial changes might be made which would vastly improve the position of owner, occupier and labourer, and would at the same time increase the produce of the soil, and so benefit the people at large. Our agriculturists are fighting with their hands tied against a competitor who is as free as the air.

I will merely say in conclusion that having now tried the Liberal party for five and the Conservative for six years, I trust you will conclude that the late administration was at any rate honest and peaceable abroad and capable at home, whereas chicanery and bluster abroad and incapacity at home characterize the proceedings of our present rulers. This great issue is in your hands. On it depends the happiness and prosperity of a vast population here and in India and in our colonies, and I appeal to your patriotism to give a decided verdict on the side of practical wisdom and honest Government.

I remain, yours most respectfully,

W. FOWLER.

Forest House, Leytonstone, 17th January, 1880.

TO THE ELECTORS
OF THE
BOROUGH OF CAMBRIDGE.

GENTLEMEN,

Having had the honour of being selected as the second Liberal Candidate to fight by the side of my valued friend, and your former member Mr. FOWLER, the battle of Liberalism in the Borough, I come forward in conjunction with him, and respectfully solicit your votes.

The opportunity long desired has at length arrived, when the people of England are to declare whether or not they desire the continuance of the system of Government of which they have now had six years experience. That period has been marked by many strange and novel proceedings on the part of an Imperial Ministry. It has witnessed the arrest of that career of legislative improvement which distinguished five years of Liberal rule. It has seen our country drawn into strife and bloodshed both unnecessary and unjust, and into entangling engagements of which no one can foresee the issue. The national dominions have been increased by useless acquisitions which have only enlarged the national responsibilities without benefit to ourselves or to the world. The policy of the past six years has been in no true sense Conservative. Has not the time arrived to replace it by a Policy genuinely Liberal?

I am proud to call myself a member of the Liberal Party, to whose efforts in times past England owes the civil and religious liberty which makes her constitution the envy of the world, and who at the present time are as jealous of the national honour and of the integrity of the national Dominions, as are the Politicians who modestly claim a monopoly of Patriotism. I repudiate the calumny which represents the Liberal Party as unpatriotic. The great master of pompous phrases at the head of the Government recently brandished the motto "Empire and Liberty." Yet more recently he has reflected on the supposed adherents of a Policy of Disintegration of the United Kingdom. I claim to be a Liberal who is resolute to maintain the integrity of the Kingdom. I am not afraid of the responsibilities of Empire. I am zealous for Liberty; but I deprecate the means by which Lord Beaconsfield's Government have sought to extend the one, and I deplore the lack of sympathy they have manifested for the other.

I disapprove of the Foreign Policy of Her Majesty's Ministers. I recognise the difficulties of the European situation with which they had to deal, but I hold that it was a mistaken Policy to champion the effete and corrupt Government of Turkey. That Policy has been as unsuccessful as it was ill-conceived. The refusal to coerce Turkey by the Berlin Memorandum led by an inevitable and disastrous sequence of events to the dismemberment of Turkey by the Berlin Treaty, and thereby to inordinate aggrandisement of Russia.

It is in Asia that we find the worst fruits of the Ministerial Policy. The Anglo-Turkish Convention I regard as an act of folly which fully satisfies its description as "an insane Covenant." The Afghan war, not less conspicuous in folly, has in addition elements of wickedness that make it the worst achievement of a bad Government. If in Europe our Ministers have had to contend with difficulties created for them, this Afghan trouble they have wholly created for themselves. It is the forseen result of a Policy obstinately pursued in defiance of history, in contempt of experience, and for a long time in concealment from Parliament. Its ultimate result no man can predict. We are told that Afghanistan is not to be annexed; yet we see step after step taken from which annexation may prove to be the only practicable outlet. That annexation will be a source of weakness and not of strength to our Indian Empire, is the judgment of all competent advisers, save only a few fanatical promoters of a "forward policy," whose evil counsels have largely helped to bring about the present disastrous state of things. Withal we are assured on the high authority of the Prime Minister himself that our Afghan policy has been completely successful!

To purchase such success in Foreign Policy domestic Legislation has been avowedly neglected. Yet no one can gainsay that very many improvements of our internal legislation are urgently required.

When I allude to the Land Laws, which call for more efficient Reform than has been suggested in the Bills recently introduced by the Lord Chancellor, I mention one only of the items in the Liberal programme which, should you honour me by electing me one of your representatives, I should labour to promote.

I purpose to call personally on as many Electors as possible, and I hope all who possibly can will attend our meetings and hear the statement of my opinions.

I am, Gentlemen, your most obedient Servant,

HUGH SHELD.

The Cambridge Review:

A JOURNAL OF UNIVERSITY LIFE AND THOUGHT.

No. 17.] WEDNESDAY, APRIL 14, 1880. [Price Sixpence.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

The University Commissioners have announced their intention of holding a series of meetings in Cambridge during the Easter Term, in response to the memorial lately forwarded to them, and urging that step upon them. As the powers of the Commissioners terminate this year, unless extended by the New Parliament for another year, we may expect unusual activity on their part during the present term.

Another step was taken yesterday towards the union of King's and St. Catharine's Colleges: we may hope that a definite scheme will soon be ready for the consideration of the Commissioners.

The Council of the Senate have lately exercised their right of appointing three members of the governing body of Girton College. By this step, understood in connection with the scheme lately passed for the affiliation of local colleges, the University is extending its hold over the education of the country generally.

The University Reporter for April the 9th contains a most important "Report of the Syndicate appointed March, 1879, on the subject of the obligation of passing an examination in Greek, and the questions arising therefrom, with appendices." Of this lengthy document, consisting of 46 pages, we hope to give a fuller account next week, contenting ourselves at present with noting that the Syndicate recommend: (1) That the obligation to satisfy the Examiners for the Previous Examination in two Classical languages be relaxed in the case of candidates for Honours who desire it. (2) That, in the case of those candidates for Honours who do not take up both the Classical Languages, French and German be accepted in place of one of them.

Not many months back the University of Oxford refused to be represented in Parliament by one of the ablest of its own Professors—Mr. H. J. S. Smith. In the recent elections, the borough of Southwark, the Tower Hamlets, and Cricklade, have compensated for this loss, by returning Messrs. Thorold Rogers, Bryce and Maskelyne, all of them Oxford Professors. Mr. Rogers, who was formerly an Anglican clergyman, is the author of several works on Political Economy; Mr. Bryce, who took a double First, is best known by his work on "The Holy Roman Empire"; Mr. Maskelyne is Professor of Mineralogy.

The two Cambridge Professors who sat in the last Parliament—Sir William Harcourt and Mr. Fawcett—have been re-elected by their old constituencies, Oxford City and Hackney. The former, it is rumoured, will succeed Mr. Cross at the Home Office, while the latter will probably be Under-Secretary for India.

In the Borough of Cambridge the Liberal candidates carried both seats by a substantial majority, and Mr. Fowler and Mr. Shield,—the latter a Fellow of Jesus College,—now succeed to the places formerly occupied by Messrs. Marten and Smollett. The representation of the University in the new Parliament remains unchanged, for, following the usual precedent in such cases, Mr. Walpole and Mr. Beresford Hope were left unattacked.

A series of lectures is to be delivered during this term by Mr. James Ward, Fellow of Trinity, on the Elements of Psychology applied to Education. This course will be a sequel to those delivered by Mr. Quick and Mr. Fitch, during the last two terms, under the auspices of the Teachers' Training Syndicate: and those who intend to adopt the profession of education can hardly fail to attend them when they see the scheme as printed in another part of this paper. We regret to notice that the lectures of Dr. Nathan, on Dante and Petrarch, are given at the same time as some of these lectures.

During the vacation the results of the Classical Tripos and the examination for the Chancellor's Classical Medals have been published. Perry, of Kings, Parry, of Trinity, Edwards, of Trinity, was the order in the former: varied to Edwards and Parry (bracketed), Perry (proxime accessit), in the latter. The order of merit in the Tripos will be superseded after two years more by a system of brackets, to the advisability of which these varying results point strongly.

Three Fellowships have been awarded at King's College: to C. Pearson, E. C. Perry, and H. P. Stearn, Scholars of the College.

The Inter-University Sports, contrary to the expectations of those who considered themselves authorities on the subject, resulted in an easy victory for our representatives, six events out of the nine falling to our share. We may especially congratulate ourselves on winning the three miles, for the first time since its institution, Mr. W. W. Hough accomplishing the distance in the wonderful time of 15 mins. 1⅕ secs.

The result of the Boat Race was, however, hardly so satisfactory; but the way in which our crew endeavoured to avert defeat calls for the highest praise. For fully two thirds of the course the victory lay with either, and at the finish our boat was only defeated by two and three quarter lengths.

Both the single and double Racquets fell to us, the former being decided by a love rubber, and the latter by three games to one. We consider the splendid service of the Hon. I. Bligh contributed in no slight degree to the completeness of our success. In the Golf Match matters were reversed, Oxford winning by eight holes. Our captain, Mr. Linskill, of Jesus, was unfortunately absent. Both the single and double Billiard Matches proved easy victories for our opponents; but fortune for once favoured us in the chess competition, Oxford being unable to secure a single game.

COMPETITION IN WORK AND SPORT.

"This is a tendency of the age" has recently become a thoroughly hackneyed expression, so fond are we of analysing our own characteristics, in the hope of discovering what the generations of the future will see in the present one to distinguish it from those of the past. Perhaps of the many tendencies of the time which are supposed to be more than usually characteristic, that of competition is one of the most marked. It may be defined as being the effort of men—not indeed to do well, but to do better than their neighbours. Its action in the field of commerce has been more commented upon than elsewhere; here it has been bitterly assailed by Mr. Ruskin and others, and as eagerly defended by that school of writers which was founded by Adam Smith, and which is perhaps most conspicuously represented at present by Professor Fawcett, the school which may be described as the scientific rather than the philosophical Political Economists.

We see to-day nation competing with nation, class with class, sex with sex, and individual with individual. The American strives with the Englishman, the store-keeper with the shopkeeper, the male post-office assistant with the female post-office assistant, and the grocer who supplies you with your coffee and marmalade, with his vis-à-vis in the same line of business over the way.

But though the action of competition has perhaps been examined more fully in this direction than in any other, the same tendency pervades many of the other phases of modern life; Weston competes with O'Leary, Captain Webb with Captain Boyton; the prize mastiff from Birmingham with the prize mastiff from Cornwall; one railway with another railway; one theatre with another theatre; and a year or two back perhaps the climax was reached by holding a competitive barmaid, which, I believe, was soon followed by a competitive baby-show (the latter was at any rate suggested) at the North Woolwich Gardens.

The Englishman's house will not much longer be his castle; the outworks are already taken, and we cannot pick a nosegay in our garden without being warned off certain bushes by the gardener, who has entered them for the "next annual flower show."

Now has this great new god Competition forced his way into our University life? Who can hesitate a moment for an answer? Think on the one hand of competitive examinations, on the other of boat-races, cricket, football, racket, and tennis-matches, and "Sports," in the specific sense of the word, to say nothing of billiards and chess. But though we find it here as elsewhere its raison d'être must surely be rather different.

In the more ordinary fields of its action which we have noticed it is hardly ever attempted to rest the defence of Competition on its action upon the individual; it would be pretty generally allowed even by the advocates of the system that to him it results in direct loss; but it would be maintained that the individual's loss would cause a more than proportionate gain to society at large, and thus that while almost everyone was called upon to sacrifice a little, they obtained in compensation a more than commensurate share in the increased public weal. Referring to our former examples, in the field of commerce it would not be supposed that the principle of "division of labour," a direct consequence of Competition, rendered the work done by individuals more pleasant; on the contrary, it would be acknowledged that it became more monotonous, uninteresting and incapable of calling forth intelligence; but it would be at the same time maintained that individuals should reconcile themselves to this, in consideration of their share in the increased public weal; though their labour itself becomes more monotonous and arduous, the fruits of that labour become more plentiful and varied. Similarly in other cases, in a flower-show for instance, every individual by sacrificing a little secures a total result which gives a great deal of pleasure to a great number of people.

But this reasoning seems to loose some of its force, when applied to a University, for one of the most conspicuous principles of the University system is the development of the individual, and this is equally true whether we take the English or the German view of the institution; whether we regard its object as being the dissemination of education and culture amongst professed and amongst amateur schoolmen alike—or whether we regard it as being a sort of church of knowledge, handing down its virtue through what may be compared to an Apostolic Succession.

What place, then, shall we find in this institution for the Competitive Examination? It is almost unnecessary for me to recapitulate the familiar arguments urged against the system: how it cramps the individual bent of mind, fills the incapable mind with undigested food, and forces the capable one to digest ten times more than is good for it. After reading such an article as Mr. Sayce wrote not long ago in one of the reviews, do not we fully sympathise with the groaning exclamation with which he concludes: "Examine boys if you must—but for heaven's sake do not examine men!"?

Turning for a moment from the mind to the body, whilst fully acknowledging that rowing, cricket, tennis, and so forth, are admirably adapted for keeping the bodies of young men strong and healthy, is it not also true that the introduction of competition into these pursuits deducts from, rather than adds to, their usefulness. Many a man, for instance, whom rowing in an ordinary way suits thoroughly, breaks down altogether under a system of training.

I believe the number of men whose health is more or less seriously injured by racing is not at all generally realised. Whilst an ordinary man's health is improved by taking an occasional pull in a boat, it requires a man of an extraordinarily vigorous and sound constitution to be benefitted by a month's training, followed by a week's racing.

We must, I think, also acknowledge that on our high wranglers, and on our 'Varsity boat men alike, an unfair demand is made on one side of their capacities, to the probable detriment of all others.

But in spite of all that can be said against competition in our studies and sports, one great fact about it should never be overlooked. It is a great, perhaps an essential, stimulus to the pursuit of these studies and sports. Many a man reads for an examination when he would not do so otherwise; many a man takes up rowing if he has a chance of distinguishing himself in his college eight, when he would otherwise be inactive. And so, after all, the element of competition is perhaps a necessary, though no doubt to a certain extent a detrimental, accompaniment of the quest after a cultivated mind in a healthy and well-developed body, the beau-ideal of the English University system.

But surely we should beware of discouraging efforts not stimulated in this way, or of introducing the stimulus when it is unnecessary. We should, for instance, view with great dissatisfaction any endeavour to discourage efforts at rowing, &c., that were not likely to lead to sensational or even to distinguished results; whilst on the other hand, we should warmly welcome the effort that is now being made to substitute an absolute for a comparative standard of merit in our honours examinations.

THE WINCHESTER READING PRIZES.

The Winchester Reading Prizes were first established in 1866 by an anonymous donation of a sum of money which after payment of the Examiners is divided into two prizes. By this benefaction a University Prize supplemented the rewards given in Cambridge for the encouragement of public reading. Many of the Colleges give annual prizes for the best readers in Chapel. But of course these College Prizes are restricted to a limited class of competitors, because only members of the particular Colleges are eligible for them, and some of these members may be exempted from attendance at the Chapel Services. Moreover the range of subjects is limited, being confined, I believe, to the Holy Scriptures. Nor must it be forgotten that the College Chapel is a bad place in which to test men's qualifications for a reading prize. A man naturally hesitates to allow his careful reading to stand in the way of other people's breakfast or dinner. And on account of its sacredness a Chapel is still more unfitted as a place of Examination. A man would shrink with such surroundings, from reading the sacred Scriptures to please the Junior Dean, and with an eye to a prize. Certainly the system does not seem to have worked wonders, if we may judge from our visitors who constitute themselves our judges in all things, as it is a constant complaint with them that the reading in College Chapels is not good.

The University prize then has many advantages over these College awards. First, of course, because it is a University distinction. Then the class of competitors is wider, the range of subjects greater, and the Examiners and the candidates are not acquainted with one another's peculiarities. And yet it would not be hard to be critical about the arrangement of the examination. On one point only will I touch—the place where it is held. It is difficult to speak with moderation of the acoustic properties of the Senate House in their complete absence there. It is hard that young and comparatively untried readers should have to struggle against a difficulty which overwhelms even the practised officials, causing them on High Days to keep much precious information entirely to themselves. Even the sonorous tones of the Public Orator seem at the end of the building but a confused and exasperating murmur, and thus the admission to degrees is generally dumb show.

The object, however, of all these prizes, whether University or Collegiate, is really admirable, however poorly that object is gained.

The human voice is the most beautiful of all instruments, and can be made to discourse most excellent music, but it requires constant and careful practice. Many a man will take frequent lessons under masters in singing and practise his voice regularly day by day, who thinks any one can read, and that there is nothing to be learnt or unlearnt in regard to Elocution. This is a great mistake. Nothing can be so painful as to hear a speaker, whose matter is admirable, lessen or destroy its effect by his manner. Not to repeat what has been so sufficiently said by the great master Blackstone, in his famous preface to the Commentaries, everybody at one time or another has to make some public announcement, read before an audience, or give evidence in a Court of Law. And more widely—as an ingenious writer in the Cornhill has lately pointed out—the power of expression depends in a great measure on the management of the voice, and a man prejudices himself in society if he is unable to express his thoughts with the appropriate emphasis. And there can be no doubt that many worthy people make their grief and their joy ridiculous by the pitch of their voice and the lack of modulation in it. So, too, the annoyance caused by persons who either talk too loud or too low at dinner-tables would be avoided if they only knew how to regulate their tones. How great an effect can be produced by a small frame and slight lung power, with the aid of perfect art, is shown in Madame Sarah Bernhardt, who fills the large Théatre Français with a whisper, and Earl Cairns, who by faultless elocution overcomes even the acoustic defects of the House of Lords.

The University then by its prizes, and the Colleges by their narrower efforts, help to put before men the necessity of cultivating a clear and graceful style in reading. The University perhaps might do more in this direction by restoring the ancient disputations and oral examinations which bore in the past such admirable fruit, but for the present we must be content that even moderate encouragement is given to the neglected art of elocution.

THE UNIVERSITY VOLUNTEERS.

The presence of a number of members of this Corps at Brighton must be a source of congratulation to all those who wish it well. The energy which took the men there was by no means so small as many may imagine. To rise at the latest at 3.0 a.m., fall in at 4.30 on a raw foggy morning, and take a journey of nearly fifty miles before six o'clock, will scarcely suggest any very pleasant thoughts to those accustomed to study their own comfort. Nor was this all; the trains conveying the ex-combatants to London at night did not, in some cases, reach the metropolis before midnight. But of those who were present there will scarcely be found one who does not look back with pleasure at the time spent in such hard work. Older members of the Corps will not be surprised at this: they will remember the times when at Dartmoor, Cannock Chase and Aldershot, detachments from Cambridge were ever to the front in bearing the discomforts of campaigning, often in the worst of weather, and will see with pleasure that the old spirit of the Corps is as it used to be. Mere laudation of energy would, however, be of little moment, unless efficiency could be at the same time commended. Some may remember that at Aldershot during a field-day, a staff officer sent to enquire the name of the Company which was skirmishing so well: need we say that it was composed of men of the C.U.R.V.? Similarly we find the Times correspondent mentioning the Cambridge men as among those who were especially steady at the "march past" on Easter Monday. Had it not been for the initial postponement of the Review, the muster would no doubt have been larger, but those who were there fully upheld the reputation of the Corps.

There is often a tendency in the University to ridicule those who are Volunteers; they are regarded as engaged to a great extent in "playing at soldiers," or as joining merely with a view of wearing the uniform and enjoying the privileges of the shooting range. But the details of the work done when an opportunity presents itself are a sufficient answer to this. They show that there is something more than play involved, and this is doubly evident when it is considered that to Cambridge men there is no lack of agreeable occupation during the vacation, and that Easter Monday Reviews are not regarded as an excuse for a few days' "outing."

The position of the University Corps with respect to the rest of the Volunteer force differs somewhat from that of others. It is hardly probable that it would be called out as a whole if the necessity for fighting arose; but that it would contribute a considerable contingent of officers is certain. Even now a very large number of officers in other Corps are ex-members of the C.U.R.V. This is the result of the rapid promotion here, and of the fact that the majority of officers obtain certificates from some School of Instruction.

But enough has been said to show that we may feel satisfied that the representation of the University in matters military, is relatively as adequate as it is in the more purely athletic branches of our education.

EGOISTICAL ESSAYS.—No. I.

"ME."

This is an age of Memoirs; everybody who is anybody, and a great many besides who are nobodies, on their decease, or at some crisis in their career, have somebody else who makes it his or her business to write their Memoirs; to rummage up their old letters, invitations to parties, files of bills receipted or unreceipted, or any other odd papers that they may have left about; to ascertain if they had an ancestry, or to account for the fact of their not having had any in particular, making deficiencies in this respect only serve as an extra glorification; to fill up the intervals between the dates of the written records that they have been able to collect with anecdotes, good or bad, extracted from old gardeners, nurses, shopkeepers, or others who may from time to time have been brought into contact with their hero; to speculate on their inward thoughts as illustrated by the incoherent contents of their memorandum books; and finally to make out of sometimes very scanty materials an excellent history, often running into two volumes octavo, from which a moral may be drawn, and which may serve as a ground whereon to base their assertion of what a great man or woman the person of whom they are writing was, is, or might have been, had it not been for the inevitable decree of fortune that the world should know little of its greatest men.

Now, these things being so, and forseeing difficulties with regard to the writing of my Memoirs, I wish, with a view to giving posterity as little trouble as possible in their researches, to get beforehand with the great work, and to put certain notes of my life and times into shape before they are scattered into various nooks and corners. When Samuel Pepys wrote his Diary, he little thought that the time would come when it would serve as one of the best records of the inner life of the period in which he lived; but now we are more experienced, and we know that we are making history, and that everything that is written stands its chance of sharing in the illustration of our present customs to a future generation. Who knows that when the typical New Zealander arrives in England, and, as Herodotus of old among the ancient monuments of Egypt, devotes his enquiries to the University life of past races, he may not in the course of his excavations among the ruins of Cambridge, come upon the fragments of this manuscript in the debris of what will be supposed by the learned to have once been "The Emporium of the Purveyor Mattheos (or as deciphered by others, who will have favourite theories of their own about the use of the digamma, on the brass slab discovered near the same spot, Ma Feof)?" Then he will cry "Eureka," and convey his treasure home in triumph to the Venerable Society of Antiquaries of the New World; the heads of sages will be laid together, the characters, though much obscured, evidently by grease, will be made out, and an interesting paper will be read to the learned body on "University Life at Cambridge, by some supposed to be more properly Barneville, or Barnival, in the Nineteenth Century." Afterwards the manuscript will be taken in hand by another learned circle, who will fill up the gaps with plausible conjectures, and the work will be established as a school classic with valuable notes by the best Scholiasts of the day.

But I am getting rather ahead with my anticipations, and must return to my more immediate subject, viz., "Me."

Perhaps it would be best first to say a few words about my ancestry. I come of a fine old stock and we are extremely proud of our pedigree. It extends over several generations, and is only interrupted by the top having been burnt off in a fire that is traditionally supposed to have taken place B.C. somewhere, when one of my ancestors, then resident in the East, was engaged in a dispute about some property with a neighbouring Duke of the name of Timnath. Not long afterwards my forefathers were forced to migrate into this country, owing to an unjustifiable encroachment on the family estates by a wandering nation from somewhere in the south. This immigration is believed to have taken place a little prior to that of Brutus, the son of Æneas. Since then various members of the family have distinguished themselves in the different movements of their respective periods, it having long been the boast, till within the last fourteen or fifteen generations, that only two of the heads of the race had died in their beds. But those glorious times are passed, and for the last few centuries the energy of my forefathers has been forced in accordance with the degenerate spirit of the age to devote itself to the subtler forms of politics, only enlivened by an occasional rebellion or execution. Three generations ago they held a seat in Parliament for one of the most notorious pocket-boroughs in the kingdom, and true to their respect for old institutions, lent all their aid to the resistance of the Anti-Corn Laws and Reform Bill. However, fortune, in her fickleness, decreed against them, and it now only remains for me to support the honour of the family by other means. In those good old times if anyone interfered with my ancestors' interests they said "Beshrew me," and scored him on the costard with a partizan or a demiculverin, and he generally did not care to say any more on the matter, but this is an age of words and intrigues, and my study has now to be in what way the new forces that place themselves in our way are to be struggled with.

I do not know whether it comes under the heading of Biology, or Psychology, or Physiology, or what, but I have observed in the course of my existence, so far as it has yet extended, that though life has clearly only one ending, yet according to one's elders, it has many beginnings. First, there is the beginning proper, when one first what the poets call sees light; secondly, on first going to school, one's uncle tips one and tells one that this is the beginning of life; and then there is the change to the public school, and the parental warning that this is the first step into life; and the last beginning I experienced was when I first came up here. The drama of life has begun, and for the present, I am the principal person of the drama.

Of my personal appearance of course it is hardly for me to judge. I am rather below than above the middle height, but I feel that there is in my general deportment a something that quite compensates for anything that nature has denied me. My features cannot, I believe, be denominated regular, but by their very variety they afford greater facilities of expressing more than one feeling at the same time. My hair is of a yellowish-browny tinge, with a suspicion of green, and my hands and feet bear evidences of a great power latent somewhere about me. Of course a certain amount of dress is necessary, though I do not consider dress as the one object of life. Personally, I look upon it as more of a trouble than otherwise, and were it not for a desire to live in harmony with my fellow-beings, I should prefer the light and inexpensive attire of our primitive fathers. There is a monotony about putting on clothes in the morning and taking them off at night that tells on one after twenty years or so. Perhaps when I have attained to a position that will enable me to carry them out, this may be included amongst the many reforms that I intend to introduce into society.

But it is not so much on the influence of my outward beauty that I wish to depend as upon the inward resources of an embryo great mind. The wise man, I forget which of the seven, or else it was the son of Sirach, an accommodating person on whom it is always justifiable to father foundling sagacious remarks, has said, "Know thyself." I have acted on his advice, and have made myself my especial study. It has also been observed that no one ought to judge by first appearances, and that a lengthened acquaintance often serves to remove unfounded prejudices. I endorse that remark. Another person has laid down as an axiom, though I conclude in somewhat later days, as travelling is a comparatively modern movement, that the best way of judging of anybody's character is to travel alone with him for three weeks. I had occasion to go abroad by myself for two months last year. I had a very pleasant time of it.

There are certain points in my character which some people may consider open to dispute. Provided that my interests are not seriously affected, I am generally very ready to give way to everybody. I have heard this attributed to indolence; I prefer myself to call it amiability. But on the other hand, if I think my dignity or my desires for human welfare compromised by the unreasonable demands of a soi-disant authority, I am very firm in the support of my own principles against all arguments. This is by some called obstinacy; I consider it proper pride. I despise the vanities of human life, especially when they are out of my reach, but I submit to many of them out of feelings of charity to my neighbours. I have a stern sense of my duty, and having come to the conclusion that it is to be happy, avoid anything that may inconvenience me. I have a conscience, and am on very good terms of mutual accommodation with it. I am desirous of interfering with nobody who does not interfere with me, and to sum up, my great wish is to give and take, with as little trouble as possible, and not to set up to be worse or better than I can help than anyone else.

My habits are regular, and considering the many distractions of

Digitized by Google

University life, I flatter myself that I manage to keep up to a very tolerable average of work per diem. My health is good, though with a slight tendency to biliousness, which has to be kept off by a persistent regularity of exercise and a strict adherence to diet. When the grosser part of my nature asserts itself, and I neglect these necessaries, the worse half of my disposition appears, and I am not at home to visitors. However, this is not the case now, and just at present I feel in an excellent temper with myself and all around me.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ATHLETIC SPORTS.—OXFORD v. CAMBRIDGE.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Dear Sirs,—In the Field of the 20th ult., under the above heading I read:—

"This annual meeting was held yesterday (Friday) at Lillie Bridge, but as the presidents of the respective clubs declined by letter to admit our representative within the enclosure (and it is impossible to report it accurately from the outside), we regret that we can give no details of the event. We think it better to dispense altogether with a report than to insert one which is unreliable."

As one who takes a pride in the breadth that generally stamps the action of Cambridge men, pending some explanation of the above, which I now ask from those competent to give it, I abstain from comment and subscribe myself

Faithfully yours,

A Trinity Man.

COLLEGE CORRESPONDENCE.

ST. PETER'S.

New Entry.—Gray, A. W., 84, Norwich street.
Changes of Address.— Burge, College staircase L; Kingston College staircase A; Sidley, College staircase G.

We have not had an eight down yet, but hope to have one in regular practice in a day or two, to regain our place in the Second Division. The boat will probably be made up much as in last term. In the meantime cricket is proceeding vigorously, and we should have a very fair eleven. Our three lawn tennis courts will evidently be well patronised. The officers of the various clubs are:—Boat Club, captain, W. O. Parish; secretary, W. New; treasurer, H. Bott. Sexcentenary Club: President, H. A. Watson; secretary, J. Eccles; treasurer, J. M. Dodds. Lawn Tennis Club: President, J. Eccles; secretary, H. A. Watson; treasurer, E. W. Floyd.

PEMBROKE.

Saturday, the 10th, was our day for coming up and lectures began on Monday.

Of the crew of our first boat, which was so successful last May, five remain, namely, R. M. Ainslie, W. Burnside, E. Lambert, A. Collison and J. W. Walker. How the three remaining places will be filled does not seem at all certain.

The officers of the cricket club for the ensuing season are E. M. Sturges (Capt), G. M. A. Hewett, Secretary.

It is hoped that some 16 matches will be able to be arranged.

Our new lawn tennis courts are in good working order.

TRINITY HALL.

Rowing members will have plenty to do this term, as we shall have three boats in practice for the May Races. The men at present rowing in the first boat came into residence on Wednesday, and went out on Thursday. The other boats have not yet made their appearance on the river.

The only Hall man in the lately published Classical Tripos is H. Rumsey. He was President of the University Swimming Club, and has also been a well-known figure in our boats for several years.

CORPUS CHRISTI.

In the Lent Term examination of freshmen the following appear in the first class, in the order named: in Mathematics—Hough, Smith, A.R., Ayerst, *Colman, *Stanton. In Classics—Mosse, W.G., Rothwell, Salisbury, Ayerst, Douglass, Morris, Mortimer.

At a business meeting of the Debating Society, held on March 16th, A. A. Cooper was elected Vice-President, and R. E. Johnston, Hon. Secretary.

At a meeting of the Lawn Tennis Club, on Monday, 12th inst., E. L. Richardson was elected President vice W. P. Alford resigned. E. P. Frederick was elected Hon. Sec., and H. G. Owen, B. Meade, and W. W. Hough appointed to serve on the Committee.

KING'S.

It is at present too early in the term to hazard any prophecies about our cricket or rowing prospects. After the series of misfortunes that reduced our boat last term, we may only hope that it will not be necessary to call on our veteran oars to assist us at the last moment.

We have a good if small foundation for a successful cricket eleven: but at present there are not eleven cricketing members of the College: our hopes rest on the freshmen.

The results of the Classical Tripos did not on the whole disappoint our expectations: three firsts were all that we could hope for.

ST. CATHARINE'S.

Changes of Address:— W. G. Aston, College B; D. M. Cann, 13, Market Passage. Hagger, College C; Parr, College A; G. R. Vicars, 55, Bridge Street.

ST. JOHN'S.

The day fixed for reassembling was the 5th, though owing perhaps to election or other detentions all the men did not come up till later. As yet there is but little to report: the Lawn Tennis courts have been marked out, and the nets at the Cricket Ground are up, but few have yet made much use of them, but doubtless more will do so in the next few days.

On Sunday, Rev. G. H. Whitaker, one of our fellows, (Canon and Chancellor of Truro) preached the sermon in the College Chapel.

We are glad to notice that a Johnian has been bracketed for the Harness Shakspearian Essay Prize. In the Classical Tripos the Johnian candidates have done very well, and Colson was also mentioned for the Chancellor's Medals.

THE WINCHESTER READING PRIZES.

The competition for these prizes, on Monday, April 12th, attracted an unusual number of entries, amounting to upwards of 60. Hence the competition was unusually long and tedious. The set subject, with the reading of portions of which the examination begun at 9 a.m., was "Select Discourses of John Smith," Discourses I. and IX. After all had read (at sight) some portions of this all were tried by means of readings from the Prophecies of Isaiah. Then followed a sonnet, in which candidate was allowed to choose his own, and in which such well known pieces as Milton's, on his blindness, and on the Massacre in Piedmont, figured largely; and with this was coupled two verses of Cunningham's "A wet sheet and a flowing sea." This closed the first part, the time being about 2.30, and at once the first weeding began, with the result that twenty were left to take part in the second trial. At 3.30 this began with the final charge in the "Baptism of Adults," to be read by all, followed by portions of the New Testament, readings at sight from the speeches of Edmund Burke, and a reading from "Lear," introducing the scene between Gloster and Edgar, on the assumed top of a cliff near Dover. This closed, at 5.30, the second part, and the examiners were desirous of postponing the final trial till the next day, but as this proved to be inconvenient, they made their second selection, leaving the following five candidates to take part in the last competition:—Bellars, Trinity; Fea, W. H., John's; Hillhouse, Trinity; Robinson, Christ's; and Tovey, Trinity. In the final trial the readings consisted of passages from Jeremy Taylor, Ruskin, Tennyson's "Guinivere," and Aytoun's "Execution of Montrose," and it was generally thought at the conclusion that the three Trinity men were very close together, and some distance ahead of the other two competitors. The examiners next morning reported their award to the Vice-Chancellor, as follows:—(1) Bellars, Trinity; (2) Robinson, Christ's.

There will be a race for the Club Challenge Cup on Monday next, April 19th, distance 4 miles.

The Club have arranged to ride out to Hitchin (27 miles) on April 24th, to meet the London Bicycle Club; it is also proposed to get up one or two paper-chases in the course of the term.

With such a programme as the above the bicyclists will have plenty in hand, and we hope that they may have more success against Oxford than they have had the last two years.

THE UNIVERSITY BOAT RACE.

Tuesday, March 16th. Both crews put in an early appearance on the Thames, in very chilly weather, and consequently with a very small contingent of spectators to view their proceedings. The Cambridge eight was out first, and paddling up to Chiswick, turned and rowed easily to Hammersmith, whence, after a short easy, they rowed in at full speed to the Aqueduct, going very fairly together, and accomplishing the distance in 8 mins. 15 secs. A bit later the Oxford crew started from Mortlake, to row over the course on the ebb. They went away at 36 strokes a minute, and going well together, reached Barnes in 2 mins. 57 secs., but on meeting a little head wind in Corney Reach, slowed their stroke a bit until Hammersmith, which was reached in 12 mins. 8 secs. from the start. Here a scratch eight, manned for the most part by old University oarsmen, was in waiting for them, and taking a lead of a little over a length, the scratch made a good race with the trained crew to the finish, Oxford time all over being 20 mins. 26 secs. In the afternoon Oxford were not out, but the Cambridge crew put in an appearance at about half-past four, and had a start with a scratch crew from the Aqueduct. The scratch, which was a strong one, were a long time starting, and before they got their boat under way, the University crew were a length ahead, and kept their advantage until "easy all" was called at the Bishop's Creek. Hence the Cambridge crew paddled on to Mortlake, where they left their boat to be ready for an early row over on the ebb.

Starting from Mortlake on Wednesday morning, at about half-past eight, the Cambridge crew came away at 37 strokes a minute, and reached Barnes Bridge in 3 mins. 3 secs. After getting well clear of this structure, they met a very strong foul and head wind nearly up to Hammersmith. The pace of the boat in consequence fell off considerably, but they went through the rough water very well, and shot Hammersmith Bridge in 12 mins. 42 secs.; at the Soap Works they found two scratch eights, one stroked by R. H. Labat, T.R.C., and the other by C. D. Shafto, C.U.B.C, waiting to hustle them in. Both scratches took a lead of about a length, Shafto taking the towpath side, and Labat the inside of the bend. Gradually the trained crew overhauled their opponents, and despite vigorous efforts on the part of the scratches, were clear of both at Simmonds', where the latter eased, and the Cambridge men finished alone at the Aqueduct, doing the whole course in 21 mins. 27 secs. This it will be seen was some minute slower than the performance of Oxford on the previous day, but Cambridge had a much stronger head wind to contend against from Barnes to Hammersmith, and some really rough water to go through in Corney Reach, so that the performance altogether was looked upon as satisfactory. Later on the Oxford eight were afloat, and paddling to Chiswick turned and came away at 36—37. After passing Hammersmith they were picked up by an eight of the T.R.C., stroked by J. Hastie, which took a length's lead and maintained their advantage till both crews eased off the boat-houses. In the afternoon the Oxford crew were out again and had a start at two with a scratch stroked by R. H. Labat, T.R.C., having on each occasion the best of it.

Thursday, the last day fixed upon for hard work was bright and clear in the early morning, but the east wind as usual was blowing fresh and cold. The Cambridge crew were out first, and paddling up to Chiswick soon after eight, turned and started to come home in one piece. They seemed, however, unable to settle down, and the rowing was so uneven and scratchy that they were eased off the Crab Tree and ordered back to Hammersmith, from which point they rowed in hard to the Aqueduct, in 8 mins. 25 secs. About an hour later the Oxford crew left the boat-houses, and, rowing in three pieces to Chiswick Church, turned and started off at 37, but eased just above Hammersmith. Drifting under the bridge they came away at a steady stroke of 36, rowing very cleanly and well together. Off the Crab Tree, a scratch stroked by H. A. Wickens, O.U.B.C, picked them up, but the trained crew were past them almost before they started and going gradually away rowed in hard to the Aqueduct in the good time under the circumstances of 8 mins. 12 secs. This was quite the best rowing we have seen the Oxford crew do—the time being perfect and the swing much longer than usual. In the afternoon both crews were out and did some sharp bursts, the Oxonians alone, and the Cantabs with a London twelve oar. The two latter tried a start together from the Aqueduct, and both came away at a great pace, but the scratch never really held more advantage than that given them by the extra length of their boat, and were well overhauled by the time that they reached Craven Cottage. On Friday morning both crews tried starts with a London twelve oar, and the Cambridge, though meeting the scratch when fresh, got more advantage over them at the start, thus leading us to the conclusion that at all events they would not be left behind at the post.

Saturday, the day as every one knows fixed for the race, broke most inauspiciously. The fog which for the past few mornings had been conspicuous by its absence was certainly there in full force at the time appointed for the race to begin. The crews waited for nearly half an hour, but the east wind was if anything making the river and its surroundings thicker than before, and after a conference with Mr. Lord the two Presidents were reluctantly compelled to relinquish the idea of rowing on the date originally fixed, and to postpone the race till Monday, at 10.30. The two crews were out late in the morning and in the afternoon, and both put in some stiffish work in view of an easy day on Sunday.

Monday was everything that could be required for rowing. What little breeze there was came from the N.E.—the most favourable wind for a flood course,—and the river, except when disturbed by row boats, was as smooth as a duck pond. There was a great falling off in the number of the spectators, caused no doubt by the fact that a great many of the sightseers had had their "day out" on Saturday, and could not get away for another holiday. About 10.15 the Oxford crew appeared and paddled down to the Aqueduct, and the Cambridge crew soon followed their example, wearing their "straws" and "blues." With very little delay the boats were into their respective positions—Cambridge on the Surrey, and Oxford on the Middlesex side—and Mr. Searle having given his parting benediction the race started at 10 h. 38 min. 38 sec. The Oxford boat were off very quickly, and for a few strokes held a trifling advantage, but Baillie setting his men a faster stroke than West soon put the nose of the Cambridge boat in front, and opposite the boat houses Cambridge were leading by about half a length. Here both crews settled down to a steadier stroke—Cambridge 38, Oxford 37 to the minute—but the Cambridge boat being well steered, and getting the best of the tide still forged slowly ahead, and were leading off the Crab Tree by a good half length. Clarke brought his boat across a trifle too soon, but kept it very straight, and throughout kept an excellent course. The Cambridge boat began to roll a bit opposite the Soap Works, and there was an irregularity amongst the oars for a few strokes, which enabled the Oxford to better its position a little, and when the two boats passed under Hammersmith (8 min. 16 secs.), Cambridge was leading by three-quarters of a length. Baillie now picked up the stroke to 39, 40, and the men behind responding, the Cambridge's lead was materially increased for a few strokes, but West, afraid of letting the enemy get too far ahead, replied with a counter-spurt, and from Hammersmith to the bottom of Chiswick Eyot a magnificent race took place. The Cambridge men, however, began to show signs of their exertions in the early part of the race, and as they tired the Oxford boat crept gradually up till half way up the Eyot the two crews were on even terms.

From this point Oxford began slowly but surely to go ahead, and though Baillie spurted gamely his efforts were not so well seconded as they had been, and the Light Blue oars gradually dropped astern. Off the Bull's Head Oxford were leading by about a length, and though Baillie made a gallant effort to retrieve the day, his six and seven were done, and could not respond to his spurt. The wash of the Oxford crew as they passed under Barnes Bridge, augmented by some refractory row boats, made the Cambridge boat very unsteady, and for a hundred yards they rolled about terribly, and gave Oxford a chance of improving their position. Steadying themselves, however, after passing the Bridge they rowed on right gallantly to the finish, Baillie spurting again and again in the most plucky and determined manner, but the Oxford crew were now some two lengths ahead, and rowing very well together reached the winning post two lengths and three-quarters in advance, in the time of 21 min. 23 sec.

The result verified our opinion that the race would be a good one, and had seven and six in the Cambridge boat been able to hold on a bit longer and keep stroke going when the Oxford boat was beginning to pass them there would have been a closer race still. In the Cambridge crew Baillie rowed magnificently and his spurts to retain the lead and recover it when lost were a sight to see. Prior rowed hard, but was at times very late and feathered considerably under water. Davis seemed also unable to quite hit off the time and got rather short but otherwise rowed well. Armytage rowed hard and well, a remark equally applicable to Warlow. Barton looked rather wild at first but soon settled down and put his back well into it. Sandford rowed as hard as any one in the boat, and kept it going splendidly right to the end. Prest, too, stuck to it most gamely and helped with the rest of the men to show that a crew may win themselves honour even though beaten in the result. The following are the names and weights of the crews:—

THE INTER-UNIVERSITY SPORTS,

Lillie Bridge, March 19th.

The result of these annual sports was eminently satisfactory, in that Cambridge not only won six out of the nine events, but at last succeeded in securing the Three Miles Race, and that in considerably faster time than has ever been accomplished at any previous amateur sports. The races were this year for the first time started by report of pistol, and efforts were made to prevent waste of time between the various events: but the executive could not be congratulated on the manner in which the telegraph board was worked: and also, though their performances require no apology, it is only fair to the competitors to state that the path was in some places disgracefully bad. The officials were:—Starter, C. W. Jackson; Judges, M. Shearman, W. H. Churchill; Referee, R. Philpot; Stewards, G. H. Urmson, Rev. E. H. Morgan; Timekeeper, R. Rogers.

DETAILS:

100 Yards.—E L Lucas, Jesus, Cambridge, 1; Sir S B Crossley, Balliol, Oxford, 2; W E Bayley, Trinity, Cambridge, 0; E C Trepplin, B.N.C, Oxford, 0. Lucas got a splendid start, and, leading throughout, won by a yard and a half. Trepplin who has won for the last three years got a bad start and came in last. Time 10 1-5 sec.

Putting the Weight.—A H East, St. John's, Cambridge, 37 ft. 5 in., 1; A M Evanson, Jesus, Oxford, 33 ft. 3½ in., 2; L Bury, Trinity, Cambridge, 0. East's "put" is only half an inch shorter than the best that has ever been done in these sports.

120 Yards Hurdle Race.—G P C Lawrence, Corpus, Oxford, 1; C A W Gilbert, Jesus, Oxford, 2; L K Jarvis, Trinity, Cambridge, 0; W E Bayley, Trinity, Cambridge, 0. After a good many breaks away Gilbert got much the best of the start and led till the ninth flight, when Lawrence caught him and won by a yard: Jarvis was evidently out of practice. Time 16 2-5 secs.

Throwing the Hammer.—A H East, St. John's, Cambridge, 116 ft., 1; B H Latter, Ch. Ch., Oxford, 109ft. 6in., 2; W Lawrence, St. John's, Oxford, 105ft. 4in., 0; L Bury, Trinity, Cambridge, 0. This was rather a surprise to some people who expected to see it won by Lawrence who threw 119 feet in the Oxford sports.

High Jump.—R H Macaulay, Kings, Cambridge, 5 ft. 9 in., 1; G P C Lawrence, Corpus, Oxford, 5 ft. 7 in., 2; E J Beaumont, Oriel, Oxford, 5 ft. 6 in., 0; H E Cooke, Trinity, Cambridge, 5 ft. 5 in., 0. Macaulay nearly failed at 5 ft. 7 in., and eventually barely cleared 5 ft. 9 in.

Mile Race.—B R Wise, Queens,' Oxford, 1; T E Wells, Magdalen, Oxford, 2; J G Bradshaw, Jesus, Cambridge, 0; J W Walker, Pembroke, Cambridge, 0; W L Beverley, Pembroke, Oxford, 0; H J Lee-Evans, Trinity, Cambridge, 0. Beverley made the running for the first half mile when he retired leaving Wells with the lead, on entering the last lap Wise, who was running in splendid form, dashed to the front, while Bradshaw assumed the third position. The only alteration after this was that the gaps between the men gradually widened, Wise winning by 30 yards; 20 yards separating the second and third. Time 4 mins. 28 4-5 secs.

Long Jump.—H S Wood, Queens,' Oxford, 20 ft. 11¾ in., 1; J A L Fellowes, Exeter, Oxford, 20 ft. 11¼ in., 2; C. Scott-Chad, Trinity, Cambridge, 20 ft. 3 in., 0. W G Elliot, Trinity, Cambridge, 20 ft. 3 in., 0. The Oxonians were expected not only to win this event but to jump considerably further than they succeeded in doing.

Quarter Mile Race.—R H Macaulay, King's, Cambridge, 1; E J Growse, Balliol, Oxford, 2; Hon W N Bruce, Balliol, Oxford, 0; H P Hodson, Magdalen, Cambridge, 0. Hodson very soon took the lead which he held for about 150 yards, when he was passed by Growse, but at the last corner Macaulay went ahead and won by about 4 yards. Time 51 2-5 secs.

Three Miles. W W Hough, Corpus, Cambridge, 1; F R Benson, New, Oxford, 2; H S Cheshire, Worcester, Oxford, 3; A H Jones, Jesus, Oxford, 0; H E Simonds, Trinity Hall, Cambridge, 0; R. Hall, St. John's, Cambridge, 0. Simonds made the running for the first lap when he was passed by Jones who held the lead till he was passed by Benson and Hough in the fifth lap; Hough finished the second mile in 10 mins. 4 secs., half a yard in front of Benson, Cheshire being 100 yards behind them. After the sixth lap, Hough drew away rapidly and eventually won by 90 yards, while Cheshire was 200 yards behind Benson. Time 15 mins. 1 1-5 secs.

BILLIARDS.

The annual Inter-University match took place on Friday and Saturday, March 12 and 13. Oxford won very easily on both occasions.

In the double-handed match, Douglas-Lane (non-ascriptus) and Thornton (St. John's) for Oxford played against W. M. M'Ewen (Trinity) and Kidson (Clare) for Cambridge. After two hours' play the game was decided in favour of Oxford. Score: Oxford, 500; Cambridge, 366.

In the single-handed match Lane played for Oxford, M'Ewen for Cambridge. After an hour and a half's play the Oxford man had obtained the full score of 500, against M'Ewen's 364.

THE UNIVERSITY VOLUNTEERS AT BRIGHTON.

There is a funny story told of a volunteer who having received the slightest possible scratch from a rear man's bayonet, lay down on the ground and bellowed out "Oh! I'm wounded! I'm wounded! send for the ambulance waggon!" On being remonstrated with, and assured that he wasn't hurt, he bellowed out the more, repeating "Send for the ambulance waggon! I'm wounded!" His cries availing nothing, he at last rose and walked off, remarking with a smile "which was child-like and bland," "Oh! well if you won't play at soldiers properly I won't play at all." Whether this valiant son of Mars ever existed in the flesh any more than did that officer of volunteers of whom it is reported that when marching through the City and his contradictory orders of "Right Wheel!" "Left Wheel!" "Right about face!" had brought his detachment into hopeless confusion, took refuge in the cry "Oh! hang it all, turn down Leadenhall Street!" boots little now. From the days when "Who shot the dog"? was the gamin's greeting to the volunteer he has been subject to good-natured chaff. "What matter? 'tis pleasant to you, friend, and me," as dear Thackeray says, but Quousque tandem? We want but a few more field days such as Brighton Downs witnessed last Easter Monday to convince the great B.P., if it is not already awaking to the fact, that the youngest branch of the military service of this country is year by year asserting itself in the only true way; by improved discipline and steadiness on duty and off duty and can well afford the little pleasantries popped off at it. Sweet revenge comes in the healthy exercise, in improved physique, in the discipline of drill and camp life, in pleasant companionship, and in the "I feel convinced that if ever the occasion should arise for the volunteers, &c., &c." given with all the honours—but I musn't moralise, a few reminiscences of last Easter Monday will be more to the taste of your readers. "Parade at 4.30 a.m. with the 'Inns of Court' in Chester Square or join the 'Artists' (38th) at Lewes at 7 a.m." Such were my brief orders. There is a glorious sense of freedom in having nothing to look after except what you can carry with your hands free, and this I experienced as weighted with scarce anything save my rifle, havresack (where was my water-bottle? Lying idle at the depôt? Oh! fie! Mr. Adjutant!) twenty rounds of blank, and the historical tooth-brush and piece of soap, I found myself in Brighton on the Saturday before the review. The town was already occupied by the friendly foe, but it was not without some palpitation of the heart that I returned to hospitable Como House from a stroll down King's Parade, having recognised but one Cambridge man, and he in civilian garb. Had he his uniform with him? Had I committed a breach of 'Varsity form in donning mine so early? Should I be the only 3rd Cambridgeshire man to do battle? Why didn't Colonel Stanley find out how the law stood from Mr. Attorney-General at the outset, and so have allowed our arrangements for a good muster to work smoothly?

Filled with such doubts and queries as these, I reached Lewes on the Monday morning to find that, despite orders and counter-orders, and our men having gone down under the impression that there was to be no review, the University Volunteers were to be represented by what must be considered under the circumstances a creditable muster. The larger number had paraded with the "Inns of Court" (the Devil's Own), and had come down from town in the morning. Some had slept at Lewes, others at Brighton, whilst one man had been travelling all night—let him be marked for early promotion—willing to act the part of lieutenant-private during the day. The "Star" was our head-quarters, quitting which after a breakfast (variations on pigs' meat, the vilest of coffee, the whole to be consumed in ten minutes, price half-a-crown) we mustered with the Devil's Own, amongst whom one recognised many an old Cambridge face now known to the dusty purlieus of the law, and marched to the rendezvous. Here the scene was as animated as a raw misty morning would allow. We were not long before we were on the move again, going we knew not where. All we knew was that we were the attacking force, in the first division of the 4th or Grey Brigade, and some said that we meant to take Brighton. Soon the sun began to get the mastery of the clouds, and the dust and heat to make themselves felt. I sometimes think the most frequented walks about Cambridge are purposely re-gravelled just before the men come up in October, so that the "constitutionalists" may do the work of a steam roller, and on the Sussex roads it looked very much as if some enterprising contractor had anticipated the effect of the tramp of some 20,000 men over them, so recently had they been re-stoned. But marching over them to the sound of martial music, alternating with "D'ye know John Peile" and "Glory, glory," was child's play to the sort of ground we had to get over when we reached the downs. Really, there was no room for surprise if now and then one did see a portly warrior—fit subject for the Anti-fat—fall out and recline on the side of some steep hill (and there were many such) up which he was required to go almost at the double. Having reached the heights we were to occupy, and taken up our position, we were all eager to see the foe. But if we could see him he was not to see us if we could help it, so "sitting down was our favourite posture," as Dr. Marigold would say. To describe the battle in detail would be beyond me, and would fail to interest your readers. We were a little disappointed at finding we were in the reserve, and that for some time we must be content with watching as much of the fight as we could see through the mist and smoke. Puzzled were we sometimes, too, at our inaction, at the marching and counter-marching, &c., we went through—but "Their's not to make reply,

"Their's not to reason why,
"Their's but to do and——

Well, No! We hoped to dine alive and well at Brighton sometime in the evening, and to carry back a few useful experiences of the day's work, amongst others that one of an officer's difficulties with his men is to restrain them from wanting to get at the foe anyhow, instead of willingly executing some strategical movement, the point of which they can't see at the time, but would before long.

At last our turn came to advance, and as we went on in "Battle's magnificently stern array," through the burning furze and din and cannon's roar perhaps we formed some idea of what the real thing was like. Charging up one hill we came right on the foe, much nearer to him than the regulation 100 yards distance, to which we were restricted, allowed us. Ceasing fire, we waited for the umpire, who declared we had carried the hill. "Really it wasn't badly fought," I heard a staff officer remark when, soon after, it was all over, "but you know no army in the world, except at enormous sacrifices, could have carried this position."

Then came the March past. "Very well, very well indeed," greeted us from the royal standard, as with eyes front and doing all we knew we passed the Duke.

En route to the Grand Stand we came across our ever welcome Colonel, on the look out for us all the day. An enquiry on the Sunday from an old Corpus man for the Major, had led me to think he would have been present. Our Adjutant, too, we missed, and where was the Sergeant Major? Mightn't the Corps have afforded the worthy fellow a holiday and revived his memories of Alma and of Inkerman?

The pleasures of the day set me thinking that the popularity of the service amongst University men would be increased if the number of our field days and across country marches were to be increased. "If you'll let me go to Brighton I'll join the Corps," said a friend of mine (he stands some 6 feet 6 inches in his boots, and erst while I had promised him the post of head of the battalion if he would join), a few days before the review. I closed at once with the offer, knowing my friend was too loyal a man ever to quit the Queen's uniform if once he donned it. Brighton, however, didn't see my recruit in futuro I (for hope to land him yet), but I quote his remark to show how the wind blows. A little more activity on the part of officers in beating up recruits would do much to increase our numbers. "Catch a Scotchman young and you can make some thing of him," Dr. Johnson used to say. From my own experience of what can be done I am led to adapt the expression, and say 'Catch a freshman in his first term, and you'll make a volunteer of him!"

Pardon these lengthy records of a bright and useful day. In busier scenes of strife, in the battle of life, may they never fade from the recollection of one who has been dubbed,

The Honorary Recruiting Sergeant.

THE ECONOMIC ASPECTS OF THRIFT.

Industry is the creator of wealth, thrift its preserver: both are needed for the formation of capital, without which industry is stinted and material progress is slow. The primary importance of thrift among the social virtues, obvious as it is to the beginner in Economics, is too little appreciated by the public in general. In a country like England, where there is so much capital seeking investment, it appears superfluous to advise thrift in order to promote the increase of capital. Capital that is idle seems to perform no service to the community, although it is really of great value, like the still water in areservoir. It is ever difficult to realise that "they also serve who only stand and wait." This is a kind of service that does not much commend itself to the active and vigorous.

To some social aspects of thrift it is proposed to call attention, and, omitting moral considerations, to confine the subject to its economic side.

It will avoid misapprehension to keep always clearly in mind that it is not money that is saved, but things that are done without. The money that is put in the savings' bank is the evidence of thrift: unthrift does not consist in spending money, but in using and destroying things. All things are more destructible than money; many things are partly destroyed in the act of purchase, some in their first use, the majority soon after; comparatively few long escape.

Thrift may be exercised without any saving of money, by judicious spending and taking care of that which is bought. A book collector for instance may spend all his income and at his death it is conceivable that it might be found that his property will realise more than he gave for it. Such thrift as this, which consists in the choice rather than the absence of expenditure, has an important economic effect. In order to trace it more clearly, let us imagine this conduct general. Suppose the working men of England instead of drinking beer were to begin to form libraries. The publican would find his stock of beer diminish slowly, the bookseller would find his shelves empty rapidly, the brewer's orders would fall off, the publishers would be doing an active business. A change in the complexion of the industry of the country would finally result. More people would be employed in the manufacture of things of permanent utility, fewer people would be employed in the composition of things which perish with the using. The wealth of the country would increase faster not by the application of more capital, nor by the exertion of greater efforts, but by the direction of the same capital and the same labour to more beneficial ends.

Thrift, however, generally begins by not spending money, that is to say, the things that would have been bought are saved. Suppose a large number of people were merely to adopt this course. The accounts of the savings banks and the benefit clubs would be full. The dealers in the articles not bought would find their stocks hang upon their hands: industry would be diverted from the manufacture of these articles, but it is not so clear to what it would be directed. That it would be directed to something is certain: the managers of banks and clubs would lend their money; they would lend it where they could get as high an interest as is consistent with safety; the industry that most rewards capital would be that which could afford the highest interest. It may be taken for granted that the things that the consumer does without are those that are least valuable to him: and it would seem that the industry that is most likely to give a large return to the capital employed in it is that of which the country is in most urgent need. The economic effect of this kind of thrift would seem to be therefore to divert industry from the production of things that can be most easily spared to that of those that are more highly esteemed by the people.

The effect of thrift upon wages is to raise them: and this in a variety of ways. Partly, though perhaps least of all, owing to the increase of capital: the competition of capital lowers the rate of interest, and so renders it possible to apply more of the produce of industry to the workman's share. But chiefly because the thrifty labourer, who has accumulated a stock sufficient to support himself for a considerable period out of work, is enabled to escape from a place of low wages and to keep himself abreast of the tide of industry. The transference of industry from one place to another, which is often due to some apparently accidental circumstance, such as the opening of a new railway, is rendered easy by the abundance of capital, but it is most disastrous to the thriftless labourer, who, having no reserve to fall back on, is at the mercy of his employer, an employer who may be suffering from some cause not under his own control and is nothing loth to shift as much of the burden as he can upon his 'hands.'

It is in the comparative independence that thrift gives to the labourer that its economic advantage to him is most evident. He is enabled to bargain on more equal terms with his employer. Still more powerful is he when he combines thrift with mutual help and co-operation. The power of a trades' union may be gauged by the amount of its accumulated funds, and not the least of the benefits of co-operative stores is the teaching of thrift by their means.

Independently of this, the wages of a thrifty labourer are likely to rise above those of his fellows. Having acquired the habit of taking care of his own things, he will be less destructive of his master's property. One of the reasons for a low rate of wages is the high rate of destructfulness, the wastefulness of the workman. The mischief that some workmen habitually perpetrate causes many people to hesitate long before employing their services. One of the most fatal of economic mistakes is that 'destruction is good for trade.' The habit of thrift—saving things—would go far to raise the wages of workmen, without raising the cost of labour to the employer, or the price of commodities to the consumer.

Another effect of thrift would be to cause the existence in the community of a class of retired persons living on the fruits of their past work, a result which deserves notice in its relation to wages. In a time of commercial activity, when there is great demand for labour, and wages are high, these men may for a time be tempted back to their old employments. They form a labour reserve, and a reserve of the best kind; their success, the very fact that they have been able to retire, shews that they are possessed of superior industrial qualities. They are only drawn back into work when wages are high, they would not continue at work when the occasion that called them out is passed, their competition is removed when wages are likely to fall. Thus they steady the rate of wages. When out of work they enjoy life in comfort. How much better this would be than the reserve that is maintained by our Poor Laws. The pauper like the retired artizan is a labourer in reserve, he is never employed unless there is urgent need of his services, he forms a reserve of the worst kind, for he is generally possessed of inferior industrial qualities, and when out of work he lives in squalor or in the restraint of the workhouse. For the sake of industry, no less than that of morality, it is much to be desired that our social leaders, magistrates, guardians, clergy, and others should encourage thrift instead of pauperism.

The effect of thrift upon the rate of interest may be thought to diminish it by the competition of the new capital: this is counteracted by the greater productiveness of the thrifty labourer. Moreover, the capital being increased, though the rate of interest be diminished, it may well be that the whole return by way of interest is no less than before. Again, the first savings of an individual labourer can be invested by him at an enormous rate of interest. If a cottager saves £30 and judiciously invests it in a cow and in his garden, he may make more than 50 per cent. per annum by it, besides reaping various collateral benefits in the health of his children and the avoidance of the public house. Twenty cottagers in a village with £30 each might not improbably make £300 a year amongst them. No farmer with a capital of £600 has a chance of doing this. Part of these extra gains are doubtless properly to be accounted extra wages for the tending of the cow and the work in the garden: making a liberal allowance for this, a rate of interest is left far above the ordinary interest of capital. It is difficult to distinguish accurately between interest and wages when a man works for himself: the productiveness of his capital is partly due to the fact that he is his own labourer, the excellence of his labour is very largely due to the fact that he is his own employer. Whether this extra return be called interest or wages is a matter of classification; under either head, it is a clear benefit both to the individual and to the country. It is possible that this high return might not be fully maintained if every one acted as we have supposed our enlightened villager. This instance, however, shows that in some if not in all cases there is an economic advantage in the diffusion of capital: this diffusion can only be brought about by the extension of habits of thrift. The economic advantage does not consist only in the high return to the investment of a poor man's first savings, but also in the inducement to extra labour that the possession of these savings has held out to him.

That which is done without may not be a material thing but a service; as when a clerk or a servant is discharged for the sake of economy. Conduct such as this, if generally adopted, would increase the number of labourers seeking employment; fewer clerks and fewer footmen being required those who would have filled these positions compete for other employments and thereby tend to reduce wages therein. At the same time capital is set free which may give them employment. It is by no means certain that it will be sufficient to do so, for much of it may be needed for fixed capital. The remainder may be drawn from the reserve of unemployed capital. The energies of the servant are also set free to make something, or perform some other and perhaps some useful service. This, however, he is seldom fitted to do. Retrenchment of this kind is much resented by the lower orders. It is considered a meanness. They have doubtless an instinctive feeling that it causes them an injury from which they can with difficulty escape. Taking a general view of society, all unnecessary services, as those of redundant footmen and the like, are a waste of human energies: there must be an ultimate gain to society in the avoidance of this waste. The difficulty is that so many are unfitted by the want of education for anything but the lowest order of service; deprived of the opportunity of rendering this, they are unable to take to anything else; while the services of which society is in need are of a higher order.

Alike in this mode of exercising thrift and in that of not spending money on articles purchased in shops, there results a change of employment. The makers of the articles for which the demand falls off discharge their workmen, just as we have supposed a person to discharge a servant; and in both cases we have seen reason to believe that the re-adjustment of labour is likely to be for the advantage of society. In the process of that re-adjustment, the discharged workman and servant are likely to suffer from the difficulty of finding new employment. This is a contingency that is inseparable from a complex and fluent society like ours, in which invention is active and industry is ever changing its mode of operation. Against loss of wages during a change of occupation, thrift on the part of the workman and servant is needed as an insurance. Unless the industry of the country is to be of a permanent type, there must be a considerable amount of flexibility in the adaptation of the same labourers to different kinds of work, corresponding to the facility of transferring capital from one industry to another. Thrift which supplies the capital for the new industry also helps to render it more possible for the labourer to change his occupation. But it should be supplemented, or rather preceded, by an education which should adapt him more readily to transfer his energies from one employment to another. Thrift, important as it is, is not the only condition of industrial well being.

It will not be uninstructive to regard the subject anew from the point of view of services. All that a man does, for which he is paid, may be regarded as a series of services rendered to society in the person of particular individuals. His wages are a title to exact equal services in return. The unthrifty exacts these services at once; the thrifty defers the requirement of them, or of some of them, until a future period. He may in old age discontinue performing services to any member of society, while he receives the return for what he has done in youth and manhood. The general practice of thrift means the doing of services and not immediately requiring services in return. Society is benefitted by the services that are rendered, and injured by the services required of it. The individual is fitted to render services during the strong and active period of life and to receive them during its feeble beginning and end. The average aggregate services rendered during life should be greater than those received if progress is to be made. Herein it appears again that thrift is essential to social progress.

Those whom thrift most benefits are the very poorest: the first savings bring the highest return. The common excuse that a man cannot save anything because his earnings are so small is a false and a cruel one: true he cannot save much, but it is all the more imperatively necessary that he should be urged to exercise thrift, if he is to lift himself from his present state; in this, as in most things that are valuable, it is the first beginnings that are difficult. A few shillings once saved may be judiciously invested so as to make thrift easier, and lead to more considerable savings.

The advantage of thrift diminishes as we ascend in the social scale; in a millionaire extravagance is venial. "The destruction of the poor is their poverty." To escape this destruction industry and thrift are both needed. It is by industry and thrift that society has advanced, by the same virtues alone can the individual raise himself.

The above are some of the economic aspects of thrift: many more might have been added. If we are right so far in noting that thrift tends to divert employment from the production of inferior objects to those of greater permanence and value, that it raises wages, renders the labourer more independent, and creates a reserve of labour living in happiness instead of in misery, that it diffuses capital and thereby increases industry and comfort, that it enables higher services to be substituted for lower, that it is essential to social and individual progress, and most benefits those whom we most desire to benefit, we have at all events made out a primâ facie case for ranking thrift high among the virtues of civilised life.

ECLECTIC SPARKS.

April 1, 1880.

MY DEAR YANG-KI,—You will remember that I promised to give you an account of my present abode. I will now try to do so.

My stature has served me greatly in making observations of this country, which with its people is indeed a kind of Lilliput compared with the Vast Territory over which

OUR IMMORTAL EAGLE FLAPS ITS WAY.

Yet, though so puny, they are possessed of feelings, hardly less acute than our own, which I should be loth to wound. And thus as some of them may set eyes on what I am w iting, I will endeavour to be "the man I am but not to seem it," and to wrap myself in metaphorical and hyperbolical language, the use of which is the chief to understand.

The country is in a ferment with elections. What will be their result, it is not easy to predict; as through the people not 'calculating' so much as with us, it is very difficult to reduce a unit of voting to its equivalent in currency. There are two parties whose hostility is of long standing, and a third of more recent origin, who are at present troubled with an ob struction in the blood, which makes them of a green complexion and a turbulent and acrid disposition. These ill humours they would most gladly indulge upon each other quietly in a place by themselves, but, being prevented by the rest, as the next best thing, they hinder and malign all that their molesters propose.

The other two parties require a more distinguished notice. The one, which is also the richer party, has received the name Conservatives from the large conservatories which they possess. So they call themselves; but their adversaries use a less honourable abbreviation, calling them Tories. In these conservatories they keep all kinds of expensive trees and plants, such as the Orange tree (which now flourishes less than formerly) and the Palms and Laurels of the East. These plants, which they set great store by, are much abused by the other side, who say that they are poor sickly things which cannot bear the light of day, or that they corrupt the air by giving out hot sulphurous and infernal fumes, and they call them "Upas trees" and the like. These are the only things that the Conservatives tend. For though they have often given out that they will go into the country and assist in its agriculture, I cannot hear that they have done so, saving and except that they have planted certain logs or faggots which never bud or flower, and are in no way remarkable either for beauty or scent, and yet somehow have of late increased and multiplied.

The other sort are called Liberals according to one name, because they think themselves free to do what they please, but, according to another, Radicals, because they busy themselves about roots. For they say it is nothing if a tree produces fair flowers or goodly fruit if its root is infested with worms. So they dig about it till they find the worm; and when they have found it, they call their fellows and they all curse the worm in concert for three hours, and then they chop it into convenient lengths which they store up as trophies to be displayed to all their opponents. As for the tree itself, they do not care much; if it stand, the removal of the worm has strengthened it, and if it fall, it was rotten and best upon the ground. But they hunt out all the trees which are of the same size and appearance as the tree that had the worm in it, and cut them down or mark them for cutting, and this conduct they call a 'logical outcome.' The Conservatives, however, say that the Radicals have brought down several healthy trees, which have broken their conservatories and damaged their most delicate plants; to which the Radicals reply that even if there were no worms in the trees, they knew by certain signs that worms were forming, and they recommend the Conservatives not to live in glass houses but to build of some more durable material; and, moreover, they taunt the Conservatives for not making their own gardeners set the trees again, which is somewhat unreasonable, seeing that the trees are a kind of Humpty-Dumpties which, when once fallen, are not easily reinstated. Yet it is perhaps due to these remonstrances that they never plant trees themselves, but only vegetables, and of these the humbler sorts. They display the same energy in their case as in that of the trees. For they do not wait for them to come up, but they either root them out again, suspecting them to have worms, or else they plant them all over the country, without regarding the nature of the ground, which they say they do by a 'logical necessity.'

All this I heard from an inhabitant of the country, who shewed me great courtesy, and amongst other things took me to some of the processions and exhibitions of the two parties, which diverted me greatly. On the one side there was a large musical company who performed on divers instruments to very various tunes, some blowing their own trumpets, and others playing psalms through their nasal organs, and all eager to play the first fiddle whenever they could. In the midst of them was a car drawn by 'roarers' and all manner of beasts. I could not see anything in the car: but behind there was a Jewish doll being dragged, with loud cheering, through the mud, and, as it was dragged, methought its impassive features seemed to simulate a smile. In the procession there was an ancient victor or Head-Cutter, now out of employment, who marched along carrying an axe and a bundle of rods. He appeared to be often stung by thoughts of his previous vocation; for he would suddenly stop and flourish the axe and lash out with the rods, to the great hurt and danger of those near him; and, when restrained, he would seize the axe and chop up one of the rods into billets, and scatter them in all directions. Next to him was a truculent person who was always shouting 'Peace!' in a loud voice, and proclaiming to such as would listen to him how wise he had been twenty years ago. Close to him was a young and active screw-driver, who was always putting the screw on the 'roarers,' to make them go faster, which, however, only made them plunge and roar the more. I asked where the conductor of this procession was, and I was shewn him in the rear, apparently following with reluctance, and as if he were dragged along. Over him hung a descending coronet, which, by its imminence, seemed to constrain his movements. For he did not take an active part in the proceson, only rousing himself now and then to fetch the energetic screw-driver a crack with his truncheon. During most of the time I saw him he was reading in a moral treatise, entitled: "The Offices of Cicero: or the Whole Duty of a Trimmer."

On the other side there was the original of the Jewish effigy at the head of a great multitude of people, all fastened with a gilded chain, and singing "Rule Britannia; Britons never shall be slaves," and he kept continually leading them through lobbies to slaughter-houses, where they followed him cheerfully. In his hand he carried an empty money box on which was the inscription: Mancipiis locuples eget aeris Cappadocum rex; and when, as would sometimes happen, the crowd sang in an enquiring key We've got the money too, he would shake the box and clink the chain and they would go on rejoicing.

I further asked what were the aims of the two parties, and I was shewn two pictures which I will do my best to describe. On the one side I saw the Jew figure which I have mentioned, directing a number of inferior gnomes. They were all doing their best to raise a bull into the air, in which all sorts of birds, game cocks and turkies and eagles of all descriptions, were flying about and making the sky black with their whirrings. And some of them were inflating him as the frog in Æsop was inflated, some were raising the wind to lift him from the ground, and others were feeding him with puff balls to lighten his weight, and others were propping him on toad-stools. And underneath was written:

THEY RAISED A MORTAL TO THE SKIES.

But in a corner there was one gnome who, having exhausted himself in the task of heaving the bull up and then pulling him down again, was being shovelled by his angry comrades into a coffin which they then tossed over to the other side. On the coffin there was an inscription recording his fate, and with the words abiit ad plures.

In the companion picture there were the leaders of the other side catching clouds and blue sky in bottles, labelled with 'Humanitarianism' and other such abstractions from philosophy. From these they shaped an etherial figure of uncertain beauty; and to prevent its being carried away from the earth by the wind or being dissipated into its original nebulosity they fastened two immense bags of coin to its feet, on one of which was written "Surplus £90000000," and on the other "Reduction of debt £88000000000." And underneath there was written:

THEY DREW AN ANGEL DOWN.

Then I wondered how it would all end. And my companion took me to a place where there was a dissolving view. And I saw the Jew crowned and sitting in state with his attendants and his captives; and suddenly the scene changed and I saw him sinking in a watery grave, and heard the last accents of him crying:

"O Tracy, twine no wreath for me,
Or twine it of the Cyprus tree."

And all the earth reverberated with cannon.

PATAGONIUS AMERICANUS.

NOTE.—My companion tells me that the Cyprus tree is the Eucalyptus philopetra, a tree of such singular virtue that it removes all miasmatic influence from the country.

It is expected that a Conference of Cooperators will be held in Cambridge on Tuesday, 20th April, in connexion with which it is proposed to have a special meeting for members of the University in Professor Stuart's rooms, Trinity College, at five o'clock p.m. on that day.

SOPHY'S RETORT.

Tom, you airiest of scoffers,
Master of the art of chaff;
Always, when occasion offers,
Raising against girls the laugh,

Had your satire harmless been, I'd
Not have ventured to reply;
But I think the monster green-eyed
As you wrote, was hovering by.

Yes, no matter what you tell us
In denial, I suspect
That you're growing slightly jealous,
Of the female intellect.

Recollect the ancient story,
Of the tortoise and the hare,
Where the latter won of glory
Hardly the superior share.

Manifold distractions lure you
Which we sober maidens lack,
By the way, now, are you sure, you
Ne'er peruse a yellow-back?

Cricketing ad lib: and hunting
Which you scarcely ever shirk,
Efficacious are in blunting
Zest for intellectual work.

Have a care, O brother Thomas,
Lest you haply come to grief,
And your "May's" successful promise
Fall into a yellow leaf.

It would be extremely galling,
Tom, to your exalted pride,
If, within one bracket falling,
Our degrees should coincide.

THE PAPER-KNIFE.

On Post-Epic or Imitative Words in Homer, by F. A. Paley, 36 pp. (F. Norgate.)

Mr. Paley has written this pamphlet to expand certain linguistic arguments in favour of his theory that "our Homer was not the Homer of the age of Pericles," but is a compilation from old Epic materials made about 400 B.C., so that the poems "cannot fairly be accepted as evidence of anything more than of the state of the Epic dialect in the time of Plato." We cannot but admire the courage with which he stands unmoved amid the all but unanimous chorus of adverse criticism which his earlier utterances have called down upon him, and we may admit the importance of the subject which he here treats; but it is hard to see that this fresh outwork does much to strengthen his main position. It is a striking proof of Mr. Paley's curious inability to grasp a question as a whole that throughout the 36 pages of the pamphlet the work of the Alexandrian critics is virtually ignored. He actually argues that "the mere fact, that the two poems are separate episodes arranged in twenty-four books in conformity with a general plot or plan, according to the later Greek alphabet, is enough to show a late recension." Does Mr. Paley suppose that the existence of Zenodotus, Aristophanes, and Aristarchus has to be deduced from such considerations as this? Of course not: he is simply writing with a theory before his eyes which tells him that any evidence of "late recension" is to be ascribed to a "compiler of the age of Plato," and utterly forgets the fact that between Plato and Mr. Paley the poems have undergone somewhat drastic treatment at the hands of a trio of very eminent men, men who wrote not as compilers or rhapsodists, but as scholars anxious to improve as far as possible a text which had confessedly suffered from wear and tear during the centuries in which it had been current.

The only really scientific method would be to begin, not with a "compiler of the age of Plato," of whom we know nothing, but with the Alexandrian critics, of whom we know a great deal. The first problem Mr. Paley has to solve is this: "how far did Aristarchus and his predecessors venture to tamper with the text in introducing forms which they believed to be archaic, and in expelling archaic forms which they did not understand?" Brugmann's masterly attack upon the monster ἔηος shows how much may be done in this direction; and it is only when some progress has been made here that we can even take into consideration any apparent residue which may still seem to be an accretion from the Attic period. Meanwhile, Mr. Paley says nothing to convince us that such accretions will turn out to be either numerous or important; for he does not even hint at any criterion by which a word used during the "Attic period" may be proved not to have existed in the older Ionic: he simply gives us his impression that such or such a word is "not archaic."

Although Mr. Paley's radically vicious method destroys the value of his argument as a buttress to his own peculiar theory concerning the absolute date of the poems, many of the words he quotes are of great interest as bearing on a very different but somewhat more promising problem, namely, the relative dates of different portions of the Iliad and Odyssey. His criticisms on Cobet's attempt to restore the digamma thoughout the two poems are perfectly justifiable, though they do nothing towards proving his point, inasmuch as the digamma had entirely disappeared in the Ionic dialect long before the age of Plato or Pericles, or even of Solon: not the faintest trace of it is found in the oldest Ionic monuments we possess; and the statement that it "remained in use till about B.C. 500, and probably considerably later," is true only of the Aeolic and kindred dialects, so far as at least the written character is concerned.

Detailed criticism of particular words is more appropriate to the Philological Journal than to the Review: but it is perhaps just worth pointing out as a further illustration of Mr. Paley's strangely unscientific turn of mind, that while he quotes Curtius's Greek Etymology half a dozen times in the course of the pamphlet, he still expresses his belief (note 2, p. 27) that ὕλαϜη and silva "belong to the same root as pilus and our felt, and denote the dense crowding or packing of trees." The "sibilant digamma" is not yet dead!

A Study of Shakespeare. By A. C. Swinburne. Chatto and Windus, 1880.

The author's name will be associated by most readers rather with "Erechtheus" or "Songs before Sunrise" than with Shakespeare: but Mr. Swinburne has before given ample evidence of careful study and wide knowledge of the writings of that wonderful band of men, from Nicholas Udall to Shirley, known generally by the rather vague term of the "Elizabethan Dramatists." Those who may have read the essays on Ford and Chapman will find in the present volume much that will remind them of the former essays, but they will also find that the style and treatment have improved and expanded with the subject.

Mr. Swinburne tells us that he has "made of the study of Shakespeare the chief intellectual business and found in it the chief spiritual delight" of his whole life, and the resulting "study," "this little labour of a livelong love" is a strong witness to the truth of his assertion.

The criticism of Shakespeare's dramatic writings is partly æsthetic partly scientific, but chiefly the former. After the (almost) unfailing allusion to "the greatest poet of our age," Mr. Swinburne indulges in a light skirmish against critics of Shakespeare in general and the German critics in particular, holds up the arithmetical method of criticism to intensest scorn and derision, and then like a giant refreshed begins his study.

It must be obvious to any intelligent reader of Shakespeare that his plays are capable of a grouping into periods corresponding to various states and stages of his mind and art; and it is only by such a process that any true insight can be gained of Shakespeare. Every student will more or less have a grouping of his own: Mr. Swinburne prefers to divide the plays into three periods, disclaiming any attempt to arrange each drama in its exact chronological place, anxious only to trace the broad outlines of the progress and development of manner and matter, of method and design.

The first period he terms "lyric and fantastic:" the tragedy marked by a strong simplicity, the comedy by simplicity and poetic sweetness. To this epoch belong, besides original dramas, the share in Titus Andronicus, and the partial recasting and supervision of Henry VI. In this last play a large part is attributed to Marlowe: Shakespeare's share being chiefly a careful retouching, an addition of lines in some places, in others a striking out. Through this period the dramatist is traced fighting, at first with very moderate success, against the temptation of rhyme, the successful issue of the conflict being marked by Richard III. Marlowe seems to have had no such struggle: his influence on much of Shakespeare's early work is noted, also his undoubted power in rhyme as shown in "Hero and Leander."

The second period, "comic and historic" contains Shakespeare's finest comedies "The Merry Wives," "Twelfth Night," "As You Like it," and "Much Ado," the latter the most perfect of plays. In this period "the language is most limpid in its fulness, the style most pure," here is "the most absolute pattern that could be set before man." Tragedy has not yet attained to the full dimensions of the last state: we have "King John" and "Julius Cæsar," not "Lear" and "Othello."

In this group Mr. Swinburne includes Henry VIII., a play usually considered one of the latest, if not the very last work of the dramatist: he also refuses to admit the co-operation of Fletcher: in this he opposes himself to all recent criticism on the play. While admitting the difference of style so evident in this play, as pointed out by Mr. Spedding and many others, he objects that this division gives to Fletcher the death-scene of Katharine, "the crowning glory of the whole poem," and he denies Fletcher's capability to produce such a scene: also the collectors of Beaumont and Fletcher would have been careful to collect all traces of Fletcher's writing. The fact, however, remains that there are two distinct styles, and various critics working by various methods have come to much the same conclusion as to the relative shares of the two writers.

Among the doubtful plays Mr. Swinburne claims "Arden of Feversham," as decidedly Shakespeare's work, and of this period. Against this there is no external evidence: the play was published in 1592, and the event on which it was built happened in 1551, so that it might have been an early work, and there is thus far no objection as in the "The Yorkshire Tragedy" (happened 1604, play 1608) to assigning the play to Shakespeare: nor is the internal evidence much against this view: this is not of the class of "Locrine" and "Mucedorus" "A warning for Faire women," and "Edward III," are very properly rejected: the first was assigned to Shakespeare by Collier and Simpson (i.e. in part) the latter will be mentioned later. "Hamlet" is regarded as the link between between the second and third periods. The third period, "tragic and romantic," contains "Lear," "Macbeth," "Othello," indicating a state of deepest gloom unrelieved by any light: from these we pass through the strange and unpleasant, though powerful and striking group of "Measure for Measure," "Troilus" and "Timon," to the exquisite last series of the "Tempest," "Winter's Tale," "Two Noble Kinsmen," and "Cymbeline."

"Macbeth" serves to evoke from Mr. Swinburne an indignant tirade against the editors of the Cambridge Shakespeare—Cantabrigian Magi, they are called—for their detection of a second hand (Middleton's) in parts of this play: Mr. Fleay at one time was of a similar opinion, but recanted; Mr. Aldis Wright, I believe, still remains recalcitrant. The question is one of considerable difficulty. As to Shakespeare's share in the "Two Noble Kinsmen" there can now be no reasonable doubt, all evidence external and internal pointing to the truth of the original attribution of the play to the "memorable worthies Mr. John Fletcher and Mr. William Shakespeare."

The name Pericles is the signal for an outpour of well-merited sarcasm on the "virtuous critical public of nice and nasty mind:" why the fourth act should always be taken to represent the whole play we know not, but the fact remains that it is so, and the whole of this fine drama is damned for three short scenes—and those of strongly moral tendency, the very triumph of virtue. "Cymbeline" is reserved for the last, and it is treated with most enthusiastic admiration: Imogen, Guiderius, and Arviragus are styled "as it were a living god-garland of the noblest earth-born brothers and love-worthiest heaven-born sister;" why Imogen should be heaven-born and her brothers earth-born, or what a living god-garland may be Mr. Swinborne does not condescend to explain; it surely has a meaning.

This division into three periods is good enough for all general purposes; perhaps many will prefer a division into four as more accurately presenting the states of Shakespeare's mind and art; Mr. Swinburne at one time favoured this latter plan but abandoned it, as he tells us, in consequence of the difficulty of drawing a rigid demarcation-line between the plays of the true storm-period and those of the ensuing calm: certainly the change is gradual rather than abrupt. Among the studies of individual character in this book that of Iago is one of the best, if not the best; Iago is presented as he was—as Shakespeare created him, not after the manner of the traditional Iago, cringing and obsequious: he is nothing if not honest and bluff. For delicacy of treatment the brief notices of Arthur and Mamillius will not fail to strike any reader.

While the matter of the book cannot fail to be welcome to most readers who have a knowledge of Shakespeare and of his chief contemporaries—and it must be said that a tolerably extensive acquaintance with the Elizabethan writers is required for the thorough comprehension of the merits and value of the book—the manner will be objected to by many: the style is Mr. Swinburne's most mannered style: the sentences are often somewhat involved: the allusions and references are generally none of the clearest: and running through the whole is an undercurrent of aggressive criticism on the other critics of Shakespeare, and on the pruriency and prudery of modern men and times, which though often perfectly justified is always put in the most offensive form. After Shakespeare, Rabelais is the prevailing idea, one of the results of which is a comparison between Falstaff, Sancho Panza, and Panurge, which seems to have little to recommend it beyond an air of novelty.

A somewhat lengthy appendix is devoted to a note on the historical play of Edward III. and to a burlesque of the proceedings of the New Shakespeare Society. The note on Edward III. appeared in the Gentleman's Magazine, and is reprinted with a few alterations, and those chiefly of the nature of pruning of redundant bitterness against individuals unfortunate enough to have offended the author. This play, first published in 1596, was reprinted in 1760 by Capell as "a play thought to be writ by Shakespeare": many critics were inclined to this view: but, though there are many passages of great beauty and eloquence, the hand of Shakespeare is not there. Mr. Swinburne says "I am perfectly satisfied with one single and simple piece of evidence that Shakespeare had not a finger in the concoction of King Edward III. He was the author of King Henry V."

The burlesque on the society's proceedings, "Report of the proceedings on the first anniversary session of the newest Shakespeare society," is perhaps of rather questionable taste but of most unquestionable fun: the suggestions that Romeo was a satire on Lord Burghley, and that Peele was the author: the ascription of Arden of Feversham to Jonson, who wrote it as a satire of Shakespeare and Drayton: the detection of four hands in Othello; these touches and many others such are very comic, and would quite entitle Mr. Swinburne to a place in a collection of English humourists of the nineteenth century.

The book should certainly be read: though the reader may not like all, he will surely like much of Mr. Swinburne's study of Shakespeare.

The Cambridge Review:

A JOURNAL OF UNIVERSITY LIFE AND THOUGHT.

No. 18.] WEDNESDAY, APRIL 21, 1880. [PRICE SIXPENCE.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

An examination of the list of members elected to the new House of Commons gives the following interesting result. Out of the whole number, so far as can be ascertained, 131 are Oxford men and 106 Cambridge, 75 of the latter being from Trinity. Of the Oxford men 59 or 45 per cent. are Liberals, of the Trinity men 47 or 63 per cent., and from the other Cambridge colleges 19 or 61 per cent. The percentage of Liberals in the whole House, excluding Home Rulers, is 60, so that the Cambridge contingent is more and the Oxford less Liberal than the whole body. The 31 men from the other colleges are divided as follows: St. John's, 8; Trinity Hall, 7; Magdalene, 6; Clare, Jesus, Christ's, and Emmanuel, two each; and Peterhouse and Downing one each.

Professor Harcourt has signified to the Edinburgh students his willingness to stand for the Lord-Rectorship of the University.

We have received from the Civil Service Commissioners notice of the examination for "Clerkships (Class I) in the Civil Service." The following are the subjects of Examination:—English Composition, full marks, 500; English History, 500; English Language, 500; Greek, 750; Latin, 750; French, 375; German, 375; Italian, 375; Mathematics, 1,250; Natural Science, 1,000; Moral Science, 500; Jurisprudence, 375; Political Economy, 375. Candidates are at liberty to offer any or all of these subjects. A preliminary examination will be held on May 7th; the competitive examination will begin on the 19th. The limits of age are 18 and 24.

The organ of the Conservative party in Cambridge, in last Saturday's issue, exults over the defeat of Mr. Henry Sidgwick and Mr. W. H. H. Hudson, who came forward as candidates in the annual election of Guardians of the Poor. We regret that the violence of party politics should have led to the rejection of two candidates of such exceptional claim.

Professor Jebb's recent lectures in Glasgow, on Modern Greece, will be published almost immediately, by Messrs. Macmillan and Co. Added to them will be a reprint of a paper on the Progress of Greece, contributed a year ago to Macmillan's Magazine, and a short appendix on the part taken by Lord Byron, in relation to Greek independence.

By an order in Council the powers of the Oxford University Commission have been extended to the end of the year 1881.

Among the announcements of "Lectures for Women" this term, we notice that Miss Scott is lecturing on Analytical Conics, and Professor Hales on English Literature. At the Fitzwilliam Museum, Dr. Waldstein, of Heidelberg, will deliver a course on "Greek Sculpture," while at the Cavendish Laboratory, Lord Rayleigh—the new professor of Experimental Physics—lectures on Electricity and Magnetism.

The Annual Meeting of the British Medical Association will be held at Cambridge, on August 12th, and the three following days. The President of the Association is Professor O'Connor, of Queens' College, Cork, the Vice-President Professor Humphry, of Cambridge.

The Vegetarian Banquet, given on March 31st, was so great a success that Professor Mayor proposes to carry the attack on sumptuous living further, and to found a society whose members shall be pledged not to eat animal food more than once a day. Our social customs will require a little rearrangement before this plan can be carried out at all widely, but we wish all success to the new guild.

The Athenæum announces that an opera by an English composer is to be brought out at Hanover next winter. The work in question is The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan, composed by Mr. C. Villiers Stanford, the organist of Trinity College, and conductor of the University Musical Society. An opera on the same subject was projected by Schumann, but never written. This is probably the first occasion on which an English opera will have been produced for the first time on a German stage.

Some of our readers may have seen a small volume of poems, entitled, "Waifs and Strays," published last year by a few Oxford undergraduates. We are informed that Messrs. Deighton and Bell have in the press a similar work,—"A Wreath of Song,"—written by a select circle of Cambridge undergraduates, who have called themselves the "Lotus Club." We shall look forward with some interest to the publication of this "Wreath of Song."

People are beginning to wonder what is become of the Journal of Philology which has been due some time. The irregularity of its appearance seriously damages its sale, and in particular makes it useless as an advertising medium. If we are rightly informed, it is not due to a want of contributions this time, as there are enough on hand for nearly two numbers.

The unusually long time which intervenes between the beginning of term and the May races, will give the various College Captains plenty of time to choose their crews. All the boats are now in practice, and training will most probably begin for most of the crews in about ten days. Although in one or two boats the crews of last year remain unchanged, yet on the whole there are more new men in the first division than usual. There is a rumour that Jesus are again going to have the services of Hockin, who will probably resume his old place in their boat.

The All-England Challenge Cup given by the Oxford University Lawn Tennis Club for double matches, will be competed for at Oxford, on May 11th, and the following days.

CAMBRIDGE POETS.

Cambridge is chiefly celebrated for the production of mathematicians, lawyers, and poets. The lawyers and mathematicians she views with sober pleasure as her legitimate offspring; her poetic children she regards with mingled feelings; proud of them, but not well knowing what claims she has to be their mother. It is certain that has received a large tributary stream from Cambridge, though it is not at all clear that the Chancellor's Medal is the fountain-head to which the poetry of Cambridge may be traced. It is also noteworthy that while many a poet has come from Cambridge, none, except Gray, of any eminence have ever stayed there. It may even be doubted whether the poetry of Gray did not suffer rather than gain by his prolonged residence at the University.

> "Poesie's unfailing river
> That through Albion winds for ever"

There have been epochs of undergraduate poetry at Cambridge; one such there was about fifty years ago. At such a time young authors stepped forward undisguisedly and were not ashamed to father their works. They found a public in their friends and vied with one another in production. Now the Muse has grown more modest. She lurks behind pseudonyms and initials; even in this Review we have seen her take refuge behind mysterious symbols from the Greek alphabet. Few are those who like Mr. Julian Home, or his even greater prototype in the field of memorial poetry, venture to issue a volume under their true and full name while yet they are degreeless. And little wonder! how much scorn and contumely must not the budding bard undergo—of what practical perils does he not run the gauntlet! Hapless one! On him will fall the full weight of the contempt of practical men, of those who cannot see why one should stray out of the beaten highway of plain prose. The famous commentator was unable to understand why the ordinary text was allowed to run "Sermons in stones and books in running streams" when Shakespeare so evidently wrote "Sermons in books and stones in running streams." There are not a few who see by his light, and whose indignation is roused by the attempt to distort plain sense by images, and to force honest words into rhyme and metre.

In addition to the general contempt which the young poet will incur, he will also find his chance of gaining a livelihood greatly lessened. The muse does not often feed her votaries, and unless the youthful aspirant to her honours be possessed of private means, the bread and cheese question will assume for him a significance yet more terrific than that which it wears for others. If he attempt to solve it by applying himself to the study of the law (such appliance being in itself a severe strain upon the poetic mind), every solicitor will look suspiciously upon him, as no true servant of Themis, that jealous goddess. If he take orders, his earnestness and sobriety will be called in question; a wandering imagination is barely orthodox; or, rather, the study of theology has a tendency to limit the imagination to certain fixed lines. To write for newspapers and magazines is perhaps the shortest way to perdition for a promising young poet. Many have begun by being poets and ended in becoming great critics; but few who have started as critics have succeeded in becoming great poets. A poet must of necessity stand somewhat aloof from the world and be independent thereof; but no one is so much dependent on the world as he who supplies it with its daily literary food. These difficulties are great, and he must needs be bold, who, not feeling absolutely certain of the possession of high poetic power, will yet venture to face them. Much more likely will he be of the mind of Swift's Grub-street bard, who—

> "Since he found the penny stamp,
> Did very much his genius cramp,
> And that he could not spend his fire,
> Had now determined to retire."

Of course all this will be nothing to one who is of true poetic stature. He will, like Wordsworth, for the sake of his art accept with complacency the prospect of a life of poverty, supplemented by the chance of what help the gods may send. Being sure of his own power, he will know that he will receive ample recompense for the sacrifice of any worldly advantages. I do not know whether there are any such among the younger generation. It can hardly be expected that the great outburst of poetry in the earlier half of the century should not in great measure have exhausted its power; we are, perhaps, so far as poetry is concerned, entering upon a period of criticism and of second hand production. It may be that time is healing the rents made by the great European upheaval in the always formidable mass of anti-poetic custom and prejudice. Our modern education with its highly organised system of athletic and intellectual competition cannot be favourable to the development of any independent and original spirit. At certain periods in the world's history, notably the Elizabethan age in England and the latter part of the eighteenth century in Germany, there have met together the conditions most favourable to poetic productiveness, namely, where there have been found co-existing an upper class capable of appreciating and desirous of encouraging the fine arts, and a middle class filled with intellectual ambition and energy. Such a middle class is free from that somewhat stern repression which the tone of the most cultivated education seems to place upon the emotions, while such an upper class is a better public for art than are the many. It cannot be said that the energy of the English middle class is at present bent upon things intellectual; perhaps, as Matthew Arnold maintains, having once entered the prison house of Puritanism it has never again succeeded in escaping therefrom.

Meanwhile at Cambridge, at least, the fount of poetic inspiration seems to have run dry. The themes whereby the University endeavours to rekindle the dying flame grow year by year less alluring; it is not improbable that competitors for the medal will next be invited to write upon the general elections. Like the early Christians, the votaries of the Muse worship in secret, while her all-triumphant sister of Music is openly and loudly adored. This, if there be any profit in poetical labours, is to be lamented. The atmosphere of a society which is in any way unproductive, is unfavourable to production in that direction, and one might as well expect to see a Mont Blanc rising abruptly out of the plain of Lincolnshire as to find a great poet in the midst of a quite prosaic generation.

CLUBS AND CLIQUES.

The two factors which make up the heading of this article are so frequently met with in University life that they may well form a subject for philosophical contemplation. There is no College which has not its numerous cliques, and its scarcely less numerous clubs. The question naturally arises what are the various influences of these strongly defined social organisations.

The training of Cambridge, otherwise than strictly educational, is admitted on all hands: its social influence is universally acknowledged. This is strongly modified by College limits: there are many men whose social position within their own College is high, and who have gained it by an exclusive intercourse with their fellow-collegians. Cambridge social training works by means of a number of tolerably isolated corporations, which are in a certain sense clubs for the promotion of society. In fact, we pride ourselves on the College system, not because it is the best method for the promotion of teaching, but because its effect—the social compact of individuals—is the strong promotion of general culture.

But within the Colleges themselves we have clubs within clubs. There are, of course, the general College institutions for the promotion of athletics and debates, open to everyone: these I do not intend to dilate on. I shall confine my attention solely to those which are limited in the number of members, and have literary, musical, or vaguely social objects.

To investigate the reasons why men get into sets is a task unnecessarily tedious; very often the proximate cause is a previous acquaintance at school, a mere local neighbourliness in lodgings, a chance conversation in the lecture-room. Men conglomerate from reasons rational and irrational; indeed experience teaches that accident has as much to say to it as anything else. However, I suppose we have to admit the fact that there are, and must be sets, and they are doubtless productive of some good. A man cannot be intimate with everyone: time is too precious, and leisure too scarce, and the body too confined to locality to permit of universal friendship. Besides, in order that our affections and interests may be strongly engaged, they cannot have very many objects to excite them. Strong intimacy is only possible with limited numbers, and without it society loses its chief value.

From the set develops evolutionally the club: it is found convenient that the conditions and times of meeting should be definitely settled, in order that men may come together without the bother of invitations. The result of the establishment of the club is the crystallization of the set; whether the circumstances which induced intimacy were fortuitous or not, acquaintanceship is perpetuated by the artificial barrier of the club. Perhaps it is this interference, preventing the free-trade of friendship, that is one of the strongest objections to our latest social development.

Besides the convenience of establishing club organisation to accommodate the members of the set, as above described, there is a strong desire, almost an infatuation amongst men, to belong to clubs. Mere membership of a number of them flatters a man's self-esteem, and he thinks himself a social notability in consequence.

Small clubs, too, are often formed with some settled object to promote, and are not founded on an indefinite social basis. These may be music, Shakespere, debates, whist, &c., and are in all cases desirable. For without some common purpose which remains unalterable, a society whose constituents must constantly change will in time completely alter its tone, and the intentions of the founders be entirely reversed. Whenever the spirit of a club ebbs away it is best to dissolve it, and this can be seen by a want of interest being displayed in the object; there is then an excuse for dissolution. Nothing is more absurd than the endeavour to keep alive an institution whose spirit is gone; much better to let it die a natural death.

Unfortunately at Cambridge, as well as in the world generally, there is a strong prejudice to favour one's friends on all possible occasions, and whether it is right to do so or not; if there is any office to be filled by means of election more especially, personal predilection, instead of fitness in the candidate, has a strong tendency to bias the voter. Co-operations of cliques are, in these matters, commonly apparent; but party feeling, excited by a cliquish club, produces still stronger partizanship. There are not wanting numerous instances, in which the athletic clubs of colleges have been totally demoralised by this means. A College cannot possibly pull together for the promotion of anything when it is a kingdom divided against itself. Where, however, social clubs are very numerous many individuals must be members of several, and the consequence is they are so much bound together by mutual links that they cease to act in antagonism to each other and mark out the confines of hostile camps.

It is questionable if clubs are useful in the promotion of mere social intercourse. The natural conditions which develop the set, and of their own accord produce strong intimacy amongst the members of it, are sufficient, without artificial aid, to accomplish this purpose. They are only desirable as a means of bringing together men having mutual inclinations to some common object, who but for a club would never have an opportunity of coming together. In this case the club ceases to be a clique with a name, the personal element is totally excluded, and as a consequence rabid partizanship and cliquish zeal no longer operate prejudicially in favour of a member of it.

I have already touched on the necessity there is for the existence of sets. These should not develop into dangerous cliques. A man need not love his friends the less for respecting men in his own College whom he does not know. Remembering the chance element in the formation of acquaintanceships he should keep his mind open to the reception of friendly feelings towards any one who shews tastes similar to his own, and be equally ready to turn a cold shoulder towards those who disappoint his expectations.

EGOISTICAL ESSAYS.—No. II.

MY ROOMS.

I must acknowledge that it was contrary to all precedent, but on my first arrival here I am afraid I did not fulfil my duty as a Freshman by relapsing into a primitive state of innocence, and by allowing myself to be made the victim of a series of petty jokes and swindles such as an average private schoolboy would scorn to have practised on him. On the contrary, I immediately acquired a large stock of ready-made experience, second-hand indeed, but none the less valuable for that, and perhaps even improved, as all those sort of things are, by age. Using this as a basis, and acting on the principle of never believing anything that I was told until I had safe proofs of the credibility of my informers, I have hitherto managed to get on pretty well. I was a little awkward at first in my commercial transactions, but the lordly air with which I can now go into a grocer's shop and order in a pound of short sixes, or grumble on the recent rise of a half-penny in the pound in the price of sugar surpasses description.

I came up possessed of a certificate, obtained at my public school by a judicious system of concealment from the Examiners of how little I knew, while at the same time I carefully utilized my resources in a manner calculated to make them suppose that I had a great deal more in the background. Thus I escaped the perils of Matriculation, and immediately proceeded to grasp my new situation.

Owing, perhaps, to the authorities not having had long enough notice to make special provision for me, I was informed on application to the Tutor that suitable rooms in College were at present not forthcoming, but he undertook to find me lodgings, and then wrote to put me into correspondence with my future landlady. With a prudence that will be one of the most prominent points in my character when my biography is written, not wishing to delay until the last moment, I opened negotiations considerably before the beginning of term as to what I should be required to find in the way of furniture.

I don't know whether the landlady took me for an idiot, or for a spendthrift ready to lavish my money right or left, or for both combined, but the list of necessaries she returned was one such as is not to be seen every day. She evidently was not one to allow any opportunity to pass of re-stocking her house, fixtures and all, where a chance likely or not presented itself. Coal-scuttles, slop-pails, dust-pans—I forget the exact articles—but I won't be positive that there wasn't a new kitchen range with all accessories included. I was prepared for a good deal, but this was rather too much, and accordingly I replied in an epistle teeming with all the other people's wisdom and experience, which, as they had in many cases presented me with it gratuitously, I considered I had a right to use as my own, and let the landlady have my opinion of what the contents of a well-ordered set of furnished apartments ought to contain.

The letter was the result of much laborious thought and many revisions, but it bore marks of my ready powers of argumentative sarcasm, and I flattered myself that the general style would wither that landlady up. However, it didn't, and her answer was even more sarcastic, giving me almost to understand that she didn't much care if I went somewhere else,—I mean, to some other rooms. She evidently wasn't sufficiently impressed with my name—some people are so behind in the affairs of the world—so I shifted my residence and dated my letters from a place where the note paper had a very imposing address stamped on the corner.

The style of this letter was more diplomatic; it gave hopes of a compromise, but I still held out firmly against coal-scuttles and dustpans. The landlady wavered, and gave up coal-scuttles and dustpans. Then I moved again to a little country seaside place, and bought a sheet of paper with some specimen arms emblazoned on it in blue and gold, out of the village shop. This time I stipulated against slop-pails and water-cans. Result: complete submission of the landlady and a humble acceptance of my ultimatum.

I sent on the possessions that I was going to bring up, books, crockery, &c., by instalments, in a series of packing cases, each the size of an average coffin, and with careful directions that they were not to be touched until I came up myself. After these had been coming in at intervals of two or three days for about a fortnight, I appeared myself and took possession. I was enthusiastically received by the landlady and the whole of the land-family, and then I dismissed them and sat down to reflect on the cares of housekeeping.

I suppose that the Tutor had not allowed for the changes that have taken place in our fortunes, and so took it for granted that none of our family ever stirred anywhere without a coach, for the rooms he had found me were, to say the least of it, a reasonable Sunday afternoon's walk from College. However, perhaps this had its advantages, as it prevented casual loungers dropping in to waste their time and mine in needless sociability. And lying, as the rooms did, in the more rural parts of Cambridge, there was always a certain amount of country air ensured even on the busiest of days.

When once there, as far as the actual rooms went, which was not very far, there was nothing particular to complain of. In the sitting room there were a window and a door, both practicable, and a fire-place, also practicable under certain conditions of the wind; there were no marked defects in the ceiling, and the paper and carpet, though perhaps not altogether beautiful, at least could be styled striking. The bedroom was much the same, only perhaps a little more liberally ventilated. As for the furniture, I saw from the first moment of entering my new abode, that there would have to be great alterations. I found a centre table, a sofa, a piano, a small table with wonderfully situated flaps, and enough chairs to seat a small temperance meeting. That was all. I enquired for a writing table and a bookcase; also a sideboard, as essential to comfortable living. The landlady being of an adaptive and evidently not of an enthusiastically musical turn of mind, suggested that the pianoforte—pronounced P and O fort—would serve, if not used for purposes of harmony, as a bookshelf. She was not quite sure that it would do to put my glass and crockery away into it, as she believed that there was some sort of machinery that filled up the interior, but still the lower part that enclosed the keyboard might do to write on. But I have tolerably clear notices of where the line should be drawn, and I could not bring myself to take advantage of the general credulity of the public so far as to try to persuade it that a piano was a new kind of combined writing table and book-shelf, so I decided that it wouldn't do, and sallied forth to make my own purchases. I excited great hopes in the bosoms of the majority of the owners of the second-hand shops in Cambridge, made a judicious selection from a vast variety of necessary and unnecessary furniture, had it sent home, and set to work to arrange it.

There was an armchair, a bookcase, and a writing table, all undeniable bargains, and all capable of being put into good working order after a little exercise. The next question was, what was to be done with the piano. It wouldn't go upstairs, and it couldn't go down, and my landlady was unwilling to sell it or hire it out, so we finally decided on putting it into the bedroom. By dint of trundling it along over and over like a beer barrel, to which proceeding, as my landlady didn't seem to mind, I had no objection to offer, we managed to move it there, where it did duty for a hat-stand and boot-rack, but as that room was not habitually open to the public, this deceit did not weigh so much upon my conscience. I got a new bed, for in the original state of things my bedroom was crowded to that extent that it would have been otherwise necessary to have devised some system of hanging my bath up to the ceiling, and putting the dressing table when not in use under the pillow of the large four-post bed. Then I put my front room in order, and was happy for a time.

My moral victory over that landlady had been complete, and she only once ever again showed symptoms of rebellion; that was on an occasion when I had been lately rather too lenient in my manner, and she thought it would be safe to resume the offensive. It was over a poker that one of my friends had broken by way of a wet afternoon's employment to keep himself out of mischief, and I had some little difficulty at first in persuading her that the market value of a poker at the present rate of iron is not fifteen shillings: however, when she saw me get down my mathematical books and begin to work it out on paper, she succumbed, and thenceforward never attempted to throw off the yoke again.

I was very comfortable there, being the only lodger, and the whole of the family was at my service. There was the landlady herself, who waited on me; the landlord, whom, however, being kept out of the way by his business, I only saw once, on a Sunday evening, when my landlady had gone to church, and left him in her place, and he distinguished himself by tumbling upstairs with all my teacups; and two landchildren, a small girl, who I believe played surreptitiously on the piano while I was out, escaping when she heard me come in, and who ran on my errands; and a smaller boy who being, I presume, dearly beloved, was, consistently and proportionately chastised by his mother, as far as I could gather from the noises that resounded through the house at all hours of the day or night. There was no cat in those lodgings, but there was no need; the little boy supplied all that was deficient in that respect. At least, I know one afternoon I had had some friends in to lunch, and I had got some cigars for them: we went out about three, leaving four large cigars and a bottle of claret on the table, and when I returned at about half-past five the bottle was empty, and there were only cigar-ashes left; on enquiry, my landlady assured me that no one had been about all the afternoon but her little boy. Of course there was only one conclusion to be drawn: but such depravity! and only four and a half years old!!

For myself, I was sorry to have to leave those rooms, once I was comfortably settled; but still one can have too much of solitude with all its charms, and my friends represented that their means could not run to cabs to come down to see me. So I hardened my heart and issued forth in quest of rooms again. I wanted very select rooms; preference given to the ground floor. I have read in some medical journal or somewhere that it shortens one's life by the thirty-fifth part of a second every time one goes up stairs. I made out a calculation once, but I forget exactly what it came to; I think if I lived a thousand years I should die in about nine hundred and ninty-nine years seven months and a few odd weeks and days, with perhaps some hours, minutes, and seconds over; and as it would be undoubtedly foolish to run unnecessary risks, I avoid going upstairs as much as possible. Then of course I wanted them in more civilized parts, so that on rainy days it should not be a matter of hesitation whether I should go to hall—or lectures.

But perfection is not always to be obtained at once, and I spent some time before I could find anything suited to my desires. I had almost given up hopes of success, and had even began to ascend to first floors and even higher in my search. One of the chief obstacles that I found was pianos. Now why pianos should be such an essential to lodgings in the ideas of the majority of landladies I don't know. I don't play myself, except occasionally with one finger, and other people's pianos do quite well enough for that; so why I was to be perpetually harrassed with pianos I cannot conceive, unless that it was because it is not good for us to be too easily happy. I even went up in one room where the staircase was too narrow for two to pass, and there was a piano! It must have been brought up in pieces or let down through before the roof was put on; at any rate, there was no getting it out again.

But patience was at last rewarded, and I found what I wanted: ground floor, no piano, and all complete. Then I arranged with the porter to move my things, parted with my original landlady on terms of the greatest mutual amicability, and went down.

When I came up this term I found my furniture moved, and for some time I have been living in a state of chaos. However, I have been to work from early morning till late at night with a hammer and nails doing a little amateur carpentering, and things are now finding their proper places. Unfortunately various new disadvantages have been presenting themselves. One is that I have fellow-lodgers in this house, and I have fears that the mysterious noises from my room, when, not feeling sleepy, I have recommenced operations at 1.30 a.m., may give the house the reputation of being haunted. The other is that my room is commanded by the street, and all the little boys occupy the time between the heats of their boatraces in the gutter in gazing in at my private affairs. I do not think I am over shy, but there are certain times when one prefers to be alone—after lunch, for instance, on a hot day.

Amongst other things, I have been rather exercised with book-cases. Having brought up some new books, I bought a new book-case. Now I have had to get some more books to fill up that bookcase, and there are some left over. This condition of things may go on indefinitely. But my great trouble is in the arrangement of my furniture. Everyone who comes in has some notion of his own on the subject. There are eleven pieces of moveable furniture in my room, not counting the fender and coalscuttle, for which I do not think anyone could propose more than one suitable position. This would allow of something over forty-one million permutations. I will not go so far as to say I have tried all of these, but I certainly have tried an immense variety of changes. A lot of my things being alike in form, I don't think I can do much more to alter the general aspect of my room, unless I turn the tables, &c., upside down, or group the bookshelves in the middle of the room—but I daresay if any casual member of the University has nothing else particular to do he will drop in and make a few suggestions.

THE EDUCATIONAL VALUE OF READING AND RECITING.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—The three R's, necessary to everybody at some period of life, are probably better taught at Elementary and Board Schools than at the secondary and higher schools, where they are generally despised or ignored, and insufficiently studied, and supposed to come by instinct.

Reading at least receives very small attention at any.

It is true reading prizes are offered, but no advice is given to aid preparation. There is no regular recognition of the utility of ability to read. Poetry is repeated in a sing-song or unintelligible manner, and the classics read before translation are guiltless of regard to stops or sense. The want of training in this branch of education among public school men is lamentably apparent.

And yet has not reading an undoubted educational value? If it has, it should form a part of University teaching as well as examination. We have the examination: why not the teaching?

And by reading let not merely monotonous mouthing of syllables he meant; but all the branches of elocution in some degree, so as to admit of ability to read pieces intelligibly at sight, as well as after perusal. Dr. Franklin says in his "Sketch of an English School:" "Accustoming boys to read aloud what they do not first understand is the cause of those even set tones so common among readers, which when they have once got a habit of using, they find so difficult to correct; by which means among fifty readers we scarcely find a good one."

Surely Dr. Franklin's shade was in the Senate House on Monday, the 12th, repeating those words in listener's ears. For to impartial critics there seemed need for the same verdict on most of the reading. And certainly to some, if not many, the award was surprising.

Said an old examiner for the Winchester Prizes to a quondam prize winner whom he had just heard that he had examined—"Yes, you know, my experience is, that it's a very uncertain thing—very; the worst man generally gets it." (!) After this candid admission really made by one who ought to know, criticisms on general awards and an attempt to explain this unfortunate rule of awards may be excusable, and must not be taken for impertinent reflections on individuals. For such decisions are no consolation to the really better readers; but damaging to the interest in reading for the prizes. There should be no doubt as to the superiority of the winner over other candidates. The question arises: What causes the dissatisfaction? Of course the examiners decide honestly to the best of their abilities and in accordance with their opinion. But a word as to these abilities. It may be assumed that the qualifications of candidates should be tested by examiners of undoubted qualifications. But are the Examiners for the Winchester Reading Prizes always prize-men? We should naturally point to those who have had experience in deciding college prizes for reading in chapel, as possessing the necessary qualifications for examining, if in chapel anything but the Bible, and an occasional Declamation were read. But is this experience enough? Examiners for Triposes have gone through a training involving necessary work for that Tripos and though it does not follow that they can teach, they may be able to examine.

Are not the examiners for the Winchester Prizes the only examiners who have not gone through any training involving necessary qualifications for good reading? It is true that a non-painter may be an excellent art critic; and that ability to criticize does not necessarily involve ability to perform: also "Most have the seeds of judgment in their mind," although "Some neither can for wits nor critics pass;" but perhaps "There are who judge s'ill worse than others read." But what really makes the awards unsatisfactory? Is it not because of a difference of opinion as to what does or does not constitute good reading? Query then: does reading include declamation or reciting? The reply to this query may explain some recent awards, rather due to difference of opinion than inability to judge. Whether it does or not, let us consider the intention of the generous donor of prizes. Number 14 of the Regulations empowers the Senate to "vary and alter the Regulations as to the method of conducting the examination and awarding the prizes, and to make such new rules as may be necessary for rendering the Prizes efficient in promoting elocution or good reading.

The point is, then, does the present system "render the prizes efficient in promoting Elocution or good reading"? Some will think decidedly it does not. But now we have to define Elocution. Without a Johnson this is difficult. Let us consider the examination and decide what is not "Elocution or good reading." When a man who may have won a College Prize for Reading in Chapel, or for Declamation (not declaiming), reads a sonnet in so low a voice as to be half-distinguishable, Cunningham's "Wet sheet and flowing sea," in the same tone, a little louder; Isaiah, the Baptismal Exhortation, a speech of Burke's, a dialogue from King Lear—all in the same tone, no matter what the passage read, and that tone the "accentus ecclesiasticus," we ask ourselves, is this not false taste? Is it "good reading"? If we agree that it is not, then we must own that good reading involves change of tone with change of subject and character. Surely we must consider the soundness and smoothness of the tone produced, the method of its production, timbre. But can these be appreciated at their proper value by any except men of musical training or at least trained in Elocution?

Another important requisite is sustained vocal capacity. Alas for clergymen's sore throats—synomym for mis-used powers, and ignorant use of tongue and lips! It is to be hoped the Homiletical Society will deal with this among other essentials for making matter effective as well as good.

The whole passages read in the examination would not have exceeded half-an-hour, but separated as they were by long intervals, sometimes of over an hour, they formed no test of a candidates ability to read aloud for an hour or so on the stretch. In reply it may be urged that there is no time for this. But why should it not be the final test, and the duration of the examination longer? At present there is a vagueness as to the length of the examination; which appears to be independent of the number of candidates, so that there is risk of a scamped finish. Not that the time need be much, if at all extended. A trained ear would almost immediately detect from the quality of tone produced whether the voice had staying powers or not.

The weeding process, too, could be acclerated by the examiners and candidates sitting at opposite ends of the room. Anyone failing to make himself heard distinctly from want of power should be immediately rejected. Surely the first sine qua non should be clearness and distinctiveness; involving, of course sufficient loudness or penetration.

Candidates have a right to think that they will be expected to read so as to be heard in every part of the room, and not to modulate their voices so as to exactly suit the position the examiners may have taken up; and also that they will not be expected to immediately measure the acoustic properties of a room in which they have never previously spoken—especially one like the Senate House. The need of attention to these requisites is realized at public speaking of all kinds; not only in the Senate House on Degree Days, or in St. Paul's, under the dome, but in churches generally.

As to the possibility of getting the requisite examiners from the University as at present constituted there would seem, from the nature of the case, to be none. No training, no fruit. But if extraneous aid were necessary would it be so outrageously Radical to introduce it? We may compare the case with music in which assistance is rendered by such men as Macfarren, Joachim, eminent in their profession. Granting the need, should false pride prevent an admission of temporary inability to examine in Elocution on the part of the University? Would it be so much infra dig. to have D'Orsey or Brandram to lecture and examine? If the greatest height that the powers of the human voice can reach is found in Declamation, Dramatic Reading and Recitation—the perfection of Elocution, and guarantee of ability for inferior demands—might not we go further, and call to our aid those who have won positions of acknowledged merit in the world of Dramatic criticism—men such as Irving, Vezin, W. H. Wills, Tom Taylor, (an old Cambridge coach), Hullah, and others, who could assist in awarding prizes like the Winchester? There might be objections to a decision by only one, from fear of bias towards similarity to his own idiosyncrasies. Two or three would prevent this. But after wandering into the clouds of imagination we must descend to the realities of ways and means. The examiners' work now is almost a labour of love. But if any reform is called for, what a grand opportunity for the Cambridge Commission to appoint a new Lecturer in Elocution who could examine for the Winchester Prizes!

Such a step would do much to increase the powers of criticism, and therefore the appreciation of, and benefit from Dramatic Reading, and would be a parallel movement, to some extent connected with the elevating of the stage; and by beginning at the wrong end (rather than not at all) might induce in schoolmasters an idea of the importance of this neglected branch of the three R's.

Mr. Fitch, in his Educational Lectures last term, referred to the "neglect of fine reading in large schools, and to the rarity of good reading—by which he did not mean stagey, and pompous utterances; but clear, easy, natural." There would be risk of staginess, with green voices, but it would be perfectly possible to avoid it. He said "that reading was not merely a result, but a means of educational culture." Books are not comprehended till well read or recited. Arnold's pupils said they had never understood the Psalms before he read them. "The powers of the human voice were given to interpret thoughts. But right thoughts involve right utterance. And what is done oftenest is done best." Practice makes perfect. "In the Highest Schools even there should be time for the cultivation of the art of reading." We may add: and for those who wish it at the University, should there not be training in the art—for intending ornaments of the Church, Bar, Senate (who perhaps do not all use Debating Societies sufficiently), and (it may be) to save some captain of volunteers from hoarseness and sore throat?

It is not only the pauses at stops that are needed, but where the logical sense require them. Yet how many begin to read counting so much for each stop, and when they have grown tired of that, go on in a hap-hazard way, ignoring the logical sense in reading (say) lessons, making the end of a verse of scripture or line of poetry always the end of a sentence, by a dropping of the voice. The main point is: how can Elocution be best taught? Is theory impossible, practice the only method? In either case would not a teacher and examiner of elocution supply a want? If the demand is deemed insufficient, how can an entry of 60 for the Winchester Prizes be explained away—some of whom invite lecturers on elocution to come up to aid their preparation for the examination. Besides, ought there not to be a demand? and would not the example of the University stimulate attention to the subject at schools, reacting by creating a demand from an increased interest at the Alma Mater, in the cultivation of that most potent, most beautiful of natural organs—the human voice?

THE INTER-UNIVERSITY SPORTS.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Dear Sirs,—I notice in your last issue a letter signed by a "Trinity Man," who asks for an explanation of the refusal to admit the representative of the Field into the enclosure at Lillie Bridge during the Inter-University Sports.

The grievance of the Field representative is no new one, for it has been the invariable rule that no one, except the necessary officials and competitors should be admitted within the enclosure, while the representatives of the press have a special place set apart for them outside, from which they have a better view of the proceedings than most of the other spectators.

It is a moot point whether it might not be advisable to select one or two representatives of the press for admission within the enclosure, but to admit the whole body would, it is agreed, be most inconvenient for the judges and other officials, and it would be invidious to admit some and exclude others.

Yours truly, R. H. Macaulay.

C. U. CHESS CLUB.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Dear Sirs,—The two little words "for once" which crept into your last week's summary when speaking of the Inter-University Chess Match were scarcely happily chosen when I tell you that of the ten matches as yet played Oxford has won four and Cambridge six. Dame Fortune, too, is a lady that the "King of Games" flatters himself he stoops not to woo, albeit that in the political "Game of Kings" she hath no small part.

Your very humble servant,

Giuoco Pianissimo.

COMPULSORY DIVINITY LECTURES.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Sirs,—Not long ago one of your correspondents called attention to the inconvenient mode of registering the attendance at Dr. Westcott's lectures, and, as might have been expected, where so courteous a lecturer was concerned, the matter was at once remedied. It seemed to me at the time that there was a much better (if more radical) cure, viz: to make the lectures entirely voluntary. Why should men, intending to enter the Church, be required to produce certificates of having attended some Professor's lectures? I presume, because it is thought that without some such regulation they would not attend at all; but if they go only for the sake of the certificate (which will be acknowledged to be the case of the majority), had they not better stop away and employ their time otherwise?

The somewhat recent institution of an examination at the end of the term, to my mind, does not mend matters, for that appears to be intended as an inducement to men to take notes rather than as a test of any knowledge they may gain from them. It will doubtless be urged that men will obtain from their attendance a wider acquaintance with Greek Testament, but your readers who frequent the Divinity Schools will be able to say whether or not the expectation is justified by the results. If it is felt that the Bishop's examinations are insufficient tests of Greek Testament knowledge would it not be better for them to be altered as they may require, and to leave the Divinity Lectures to those who are only too grateful for the opportunity of attending them?

But such matters must be referred to the authorities, who it is hoped will not be uninfluenced by two considerations:—one for the lecturer, that he may feel that all before him, as voluntary attendants, are heart and soul in the work of the hour, and not wearily longing for its last moment, and the other for those students who are anxious to hear and follow what is said, that they may be able to enjoy, when left to themselves, the same quiet and order as reign supreme in the Monday evening lectures.

Yours obediently,

March 8, 1880. X. Y. Z.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Sirs,—Your issue of the 14th inst. contains an announcement of a course of lectures on "The Elements of Psychology applied to Education," to be delivered in the present term, under the auspices of the Teachers' Training Syndicate. I am encouraged thereby to ask through your medium for some information, fuller and more particular than I have been able to gather from the daily papers, about the Examination in the Theory, History, and Art of Teaching, which the University professes to hold this summer.

A short experience of school-mastering in an exceptionally well-conducted preparatory school makes me eager to welcome any well-considered scheme for the organisation of Teaching. That this, of all arts in the world, should be left to be picked up haphazard by vagrant experience, must surely strike every thoughtful person as at least rather strange!

It is therefore very gratifying to learn that the University of Cambridge is attempting to supply a glaring deficiency, and I, for one, wish her all success. And in order to accelerate that success I venture to urge the authorities to give all possible encouragement to men who have already adopted the profession of teaching to submit themselves to the new scheme. There are many masters, I am convinced, who, possessing a natural aptitude for teaching, and taking a genuine delight therein, are at the same time keenly sensible of a comparative failure of their efforts, in consequence of their ignorance of the laws which govern boys' minds and tastes.

It is in their interests, and in the interests of their pupils, that I am making this request for a detailed account of the scheme adopted by the University at the suggestion of the Teachers' Training Syndicate.

I am, &c.,

April 16th. E. C. Price.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Riview.

Sirs,—I wish to correct the statement of your correspondent A. V. Q. that "a member of St. John's College was sent down for disturbing the Local Option Meeting."

The "Member of St. John's College" alluded to did not arrive at the Guildhall until after the termination of the meeting, and his offence was "resisting the Proctor in the execution of his duty."

The difference between the two offences is obvious.

I am, faithfully yours,

E. H. Griffiths.

COLLEGE CORRESPONDENCE.

CLARE.

Changes of Address.—W. M. Cann, 13, Market Passage; J. F. Gaskell, College; W. H. S. Hartley, College; W. Keess, College; B. H. Madden, 14, Green Street; J. C. McConnel, College; A. S. Rolleston, 7, Sussex Street; A. Wayte, 11, Green Street; W. H. Winter, College.

Bye term Entry.—White, 10, Peas Hill.

The men came up after the vacation early last week. On Sunday morning the Master, Rev. Ed. Atkinson, D.D., preached in chapel.

The first boat has been out every day. At present four of last year's eight are in residence: A. E. Campbell, W. M. Cann, W. Keess, and H. Roberson. The latter is first captain. The Clayton Pairs, now held by T. F. W. Crawhall and C. E. H. Laughlin, will be rowed for this term, as will also the sculls for freshmen, presented by R. J. Roddam, a member of our last year's first boat.

On Saturday we had our opening game at cricket, between elevens captained respectively by J. B. Maul and C. F. Weston, the captain and secretary of the club; Mr. Maul's side won. We hope to have a strong eleven this year, as besides some promising material among the freshmen, we have the following six of our last year's eleven:—W. H. Alderson, J. B. Maul, J. E. Norman, E. O. Ormerod, J. Sidgwick, and C. F. Weston.

Lawn tennis has started with great activity. Our nets daily present a charming study in black and yellow.

The Debating Society does not meet this term, probably because it would be but thinly attended, owing to the press of examinations and athletics.

PEMBROKE.

The first boat is at present made up as follows:—Walker (bow), Stack, Taylor, Collison, Morton, Lambert, Burnside, Ainslie (stroke).

TRINITY HALL.

Change of Address.—G. A. Tomkinson, 65, Sidney Street.

CORPUS CHRISTI.

The Rev. Thomas Collier, M.A., (B.A. 1863) formerly of this College, has been appointed vicar of Dovercourt, Essex.

A general meeting of the cricket club was held on Wednesday, the 14th, when a large number of new members were elected. A. Paice was elected 2nd captain. A. Tanner is the 1st eleven captain and F. Colson the secretary. Seventeen matches have been arranged for the 1st eleven and three for the 2nd eleven.

Our eight went out for the first time on Monday last; most of the Lent term crew are rowing again.

KING'S.

At a meeting of the King's Musical Society, held last week, Messrs. Prothero and Nixon, Fellows of this College, together with C. F. Crowder, H. P. Bevan and C. Capel Cure, were elected as a Committee. A concert is to be given in our Hall on Monday, at 8 p.m.

The boat has not been out: as last term's crew have not yet all come up.

At a College meeting, held last Tuesday, the 14th, it was voted by a large majority that the College of St. Catharine's should be invited to amalgamate with us.

QUEENS'.

At the business meeting of the S. Bernard Society held last term, the following officers were elected for this term; President, A. Giles; Vice-President, J. Kidd; Hon. Sec. J. Jervis; Hon. Treas., J. R. Dummelow. During the vacation two cinder tennis-courts have, by the kind liberality of the Fellows, been laid down in the Grove, replacing the old one of turf. With such an encouragement, the tennis club should flourish. At a meeting of the club held last week some rules relating to the use of the courts were passed.

We have also had a piece of ground levelled for cricket-practice on which two sets of nets can be used. We hope this may prove a decided benefit to the cricket team, who will now be able to get good practice near at hand. The new colours of the cricket club are red, dark-green, and French grey, and are a decided improvement on the former ones. Our first match is on the 21st, v. Caius 2nd eleven on the Caius Ground: on Saturday, 24th, we play Cavendish on their ground.

New entry, Holmes, 1, Brunswick Walk.

Change of address, J. R. Dummelow, College.

ST. CATHARINE'S.

We are very proud of our success in the Classical Tripos, this being the first time that we have ever scored two "firsts" in it.

Boat Club.—The Challenge Sculls are fixed for May 29th, and the Scratch Fours for next Saturday, 24th.

The Debating Society held a meeting last Thursday, at which the following were elected officers: President, W. H. Pidgeon; Secretary, J. P. Nichols; Librarian, E. R. Newton; Committee, A. D. Davies, J. Chisman, J. Thornton.

A Lawn Tennis Club has been organised this term, and promises to be a decided success, as it has already enrolled a large number of members. Nets have been set up on a portion of the Corpus ground, which has been let to the club. The officers for the present term are: President, M. W. Searle; Secretary, G. S. Wilson; Committee, D. M. Cann, T. Taylor, and E. D. S. Vidal.

CHRIST'S.

C.C.B C.—The following officers were elected on April 14 President, Rev. J. W. Cartmell; First Captain, J. E. Stephenson; Second Captain, F. N. Hill; Hon. Sec. H. W. Pigeon E. A. Parkyn brought forward a motion in favour of changing the colours of the club to chocolate, to bring them into uniformity with the colours of the other college clubs. The motion was however lost by 29 to 23.

C.C.M.S.—Mr. E. S. Thompson has been elected president and R. Whinnery, secretary. The programme for the concert this May includes "The Erl-King's Daughter" by Gade, and "Hohenlinden" by Cooke.

C.C.L.T.C.—H. W. Collins was elected president and C. R. Fowler, secretary. A series of single-handed and double-handed matches and single-handed handicaps have been arranged for this term. The winners of last term's single and double handicaps were Cooper and Cooper and Pearson.

C.C.C.C.—The following are the officers for this term. President, Mr. Sharkey, Hon. Sec., A. St. H. Gibbons. The opening match was played on April 19, in which G. A. Mc'Millan's eleven were easily victorious.

J. Ll. Dove, 28th wrangler, has obtained a mastership at Haileybury.

Bye-Term.—The following men have entered College this term: Cameron, 18, Emmanuel Road; E. R. Christie, 4, Regent Terrace; Kershaw, College, Z; Raymond, 1, Brunswick Place.

TRINITY.

Mr. R. T. Glazebrook has been appointed a demonstrator at the Cavendish Laboratory, in conjunction Mr. W. N. Shaw of Emmanuel.

The following elections made on April 10th, were accidently omitted last week. I. To Exhibitions of £40: Blenkin, G. W., Harrow. Jenkin, A. F., Private Tuition. Kirkpatrick, F. A., Wellington. Rendall, M. J., Harrow. II. To an Exhibition for Natural Science (£50): Thompson, D. W., Edinburgh. III. To Foundation Sizarships: Laz, Bedford. Edwards, B. L., Harrow. Davies, J. R., South Kensington (for Natural Science).

MAGDALENE.

At present little has been going on. The cricket field has been patronized during last week. The opening match was played on Saturday, between two sides chosen by the Captain and Secretary. The Secretary's side was rather too strong, scoring 133 to 97. We have more matches this season, and we hope that we shall be more successful.

There is one Freshman this term, A. St. J. Mildmay.

DOWNING.

The Boat Club held its first meeting for the term on Monday, April 19th. The chief business was the election of officers other than the Captains, W. P. Schreiner and W. E. Beaumont, who were elected at the end of last term. N. C. Hardcastle was re-elected Secretary and Treasurer; T. Robson and J. E. Viney were elected Extra Committee-men; C. Alison and R. D. Brinton, Auditors.

The competition for the Brogden Challenge Cup, for light pairs, which were put off from the October term, took place on Saturday, April 17th, and resulted in a row over for N. C. Hardcastle and R. D. Brinton, no other pairs having entered for the race.

ST. PETER'S.

Sir Andrew Fairbairn, lately elected as Liberal representative, for the West Riding of Yorkshire, took a Wrangler's degree here in 1850.

The officers of the Cricket Club are: Captain, C. Planck; Secretary and Treasurer, E. S. Arkle. The matches at present arranged are: April 20th, v. St. John's 2nd. on St. John's ground; April 23rd and 24th, v. Pembroke, on Amalgamation ground; April 28th and 29th, v. Emmanuel, on Amalgamation ground; May 1st, v. Caius, on Caius ground; May 6th, v. Trinity, on Trinity ground; May 8th, v. Queens; May 15, v. Christ's; May 29th, v. Sidney, all on Amalgamation ground.

EMMANUEL.

Boating began again on Tuesday and the eight went out for the first time on Friday. It is at present constituted: Bow, Jukes 2, Bulstrode; 3, Kneale; 4, Durrant; 5, Thornton; 6, Whelpton; 7, Oakes; stroke, Hopkinson; cox, Hall. It is thus the same as last year with Jukes and Thornton substituted for Whistler and Gorton.

We are glad to hear the fund for the payment of the boat club debt and to provide a new boat for this term, has reached within £20 of the required amount. We hope this will soon be made up by those who have not yet subscribed. The new out-rigger has been built by Winter.

The Debating Society hold their first meeting next Saturday, when R. W. Crawfurd will move "that this house deplores the results of the elections."

SIDNEY.

The officers of the Boat Club for this term are 1st Captain, C. W. Williams; 2nd, C. C. Naters; Secretary, Harding. We have four of last year's First Boat rowing at present, but the Second Captain is not sufficiently well to take his place in the boat.

The Cricket Captain is A. F. Ostrehan, with R. S. Goodchild as Secretary; seven matches have been arranged so far.

In the Classical Tripos List, the name of A. H. Blake, late First Captain of the Boat Club, appeared in the Third Class.

NON-COLLEGIATE.

Our new ground in Hills Road seems to give general satisfaction. There is ample room for cricket practice and three lawn tennis courts are in full swing.

The Non-Ascripti freshman's match will be on Parker's Piece on Wednesday, the 21st. Williams as a bat, Buncombe as a bowler, and Graham as a wicket-keeper are expected to be of great assistance to our eleven. We must not, however, reckon our chickens, &c.

Beck, the senior brother of the S.T.C., having gone down for his health's sake, Flower takes his place.

There are seven freshmen this term; migrations, however, keep our numbers about the same. We hear our "shining light" has gone to lighten the Gentiles, no, I should say, the Christians.

Cavendish College.—We are sorry to have to record the death of a member of this college. William Hemery Carnegie died here on Friday, 16th inst., of inflammation of the lungs, after a week's illness. He was in his third year, intending to take the Natural Science Tripos at the end of this term, and leaves many friends.

Our Scratch Fours took place at the end of last term. Four boats rowed, and the following was the winning crew:—Bow, E. L. Fox; 2, T. Coombe; 3, Rev. H. E. Maddock; stroke, F. L. Brereton; cox, H. Thomas.

Our Debating Society met for the first time this term on Thursday evening, when the motion before the house, proposed by Mr. Hitchcock, was that "The present Nihilistic movement in Russia deserves our hearty sympathy and approval." This motion was opposed by Mr. Sturges, and upon the house dividing was rejected by 29 votes to one, the proposer having succeeded in convincing no one but himself.

UNIVERSITY INTELLIGENCE.

Burney Prize.—The Burney Prize for 1879 has been adjudged to Thomas Thorneley, B.A., LL.B., Trinity Hall. The value of the prize is £105. The subject of the essay, which will be hereafter published, is "Habitual Confession to a Priest—to discuss its ethical and social tendency."

Professor Humphry, M.D., F.R.S., has been appointed to the office of Sir Robert Rede's Lecturer for the ensuing year. The office of Solicitor to the University, rendered vacant by the death of the late Clement Francis, Esq., M.A., has been filled by the appointment of Samuel Peed, Esq.

Tyrwhitt's Hebrew Scholarships.—The examination for these will commence on Wednesday, the 12th of May, at nine a.m.

The Council of the Senate have made a representation to the University Commissioners about the statutes, which the Commissioners contemplated making, respecting the Smith's Prizes and other matters. These statutes are four in number, and concern the management of Trust Estates, the Affiliation of Colleges, and the proposed degree of Doctor of Letters. The Council represent that some of the statutes require modification, and that the University should have more power on these subjects.

Owing to Professor Hughes' illness, R. D. Roberts, M.A., of Clare College, will lecture for him.

The Board of Legal Studies in consideration of hardships alleged by B.A. candidates for the degree of LL.M. have recommended that the option of taking LL.B. should only be allowed to candidates for LL.M. who have taken honours in some other Tripos. An amended report has been published by the Vice-Chancellor, in which the Board recommend certain changes in the examination for the Chancellor's medal for Legal Studies.

At a congregation on April 15, in the Senate House, the Vice-Chancellor, the Rev. Dr. Perowne, Master of Corpus Christi College, presiding, graces passed the Senate:—Remitting the fees for the degree of Doctor in Divinity recently conferred upon the Right Rev. Acton Windeyer Sillitoe, M.A., Bishop of New Westminster in British Columbia; granting £75 from the Worts Travelling Scholars Fund to John Edward Marr, B.A., St. John's College, to enable him to travel in Norway, Sweden, and the islands of the Baltic, and collect evidence and specimens bearing upon the question of the classification of the Cambrian and Silurian rocks, with the understanding that specimens be sent by him to the University accompanied by reports which may be hereafter published; appointing A. W. Barclay, M.D., of Gonville and Caius College; A. Ransome, M.D., Gonville and Caius College; Francis S. B. F. de Chaumont, M.D., Edinburgh; and William H. Corfield, M.D., Oxford, examiners in State Medicine in the ensuing Michaelmas term.

DEGREES.

At the Congregation on Thursday last, the Vice-Chancellor (Rev. Dr. Perowne) presiding, the following degrees were conferred:—

M.D.—J. Abercrombie, Caius.

M.A.—J. E. C. Welldon, J. C. Tarver, W. D. Grant, and G. Chawner, King's; J. E. Gilbert, S. A. Donaldson, G. J. Howson, E. J. Tyser, R. C. Rowe, J. S. Nicholson, and E. T. Davies, Trinity; W. Warren, W. Caister, H. B. Carr, F. T. Ridley, A. J. W. Thorndike, H. Hanstock, J. P. Baynes, W. B. Lowe, A. R. Wilson, G. H. Marwood, J. Alberga, C. Pendlebury, and J. P. A. Bowers, St. John's; H. C. The principal feature of interest in the "University Calendar for 1880," is the publication of the new regulations for the different Triposes. The fact is very plainly brought forward that the best part of the May Term will no longer be able to be given up to our time-honoured festivities and those who arrange the times of boat races, concerts, ball, and other gaieties, had better lose no time in settling definitely how their arrangements are to be altered to suit the new conditions.

In future the Classical, Moral Science, Law, and Natural Science Triposes will begin all on one day, which will fall at the earliest on the 19th of May, or in certain circumstances on the 17th, and at the latest on the 25th. The year after next all the Triposes will be according to the new system, but next year only the first part of the Classical Tripos. This is said in the Calendar to begin on May 23rd. It should, however, be May 21st, since the falling of Ascension Day in the following week will by Regulation 13 make it necessary to begin the examination on the Saturday and not the Monday before it.

All those who are interested in any of these Triposes should take the pains to read through for themselves the regulations which affect them, which seem to be written clearly enough for anyone to understand with not much trouble, and it is not well to depend on second hand information with reference to particulars of which most men seem to have a very vague conception. Theological men should notice that the references in their regulations to the Mathematical Tripos in No. 9, and to others in Nos. 4 and 5, refer to the old regulations for these Triposes; these should have been altered to bring them up to date.

THE PROPOSED NEW REGULATIONS FOR LODGING HOUSES.

The University Lodging-House Syndicate have submitted an amended report to the Senate, in reference to the proposed new regulations of the University lodging-houses. A discussion on the original recommendations of the Syndicate, took place in the Arts School, a few weeks back, when various alterations were suggested, and the report was referred back to the Syndicate. The following are the proposed new rules in which alterations have since been made. The extent of the alterations is indicated by brackets.

1. [I will not let my lodgings to any student without written permission from his tutor, and I will not require him to take them for more than one term certain. 2. I will show my licence, if required, to any student desirous to take my lodgings.]

7. I will note down the time after 10 p.m.—or such earlier hour as the University or College authorities may direct—at which any student lodging in my house enters or leaves the house, and will deliver or send by a responsible person a statement thereof [once a week—or oftener if required]—to the College authorities, with a special note of occasions on which such student has so entered or left without his academical dress.

8. [In case a student lodging in my house has not entered or left the house after 10 p.m. during any week, I will send a statement to that effect at the end of the week.]

10. I will allow none but inmates of the house to have access to the rooms of any student lodging in my house after 10 p.m., without written permission from his tutor, except in cases of illness or other urgent necessity.

The rest of the proposed new rules are submitted as before.

CAMBRIDGE PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY.

At the meeting held on Monday, April 19, at 8.30 p.m., Prof. Newton, President, in the chair, Prof. Asa Gray, of Harvard College, U.S.A., was elected an honorary member, and W. W. Cordeaux, St. John's College, and C. M. Prior, Trinity Hall, were elected associates. The following Communications were made to the Society:—

1. By Lord Rayleigh (read in his absence by Mr. Glaisher): On "the minimum aberration of a single lens for parallel rays."
2. By Mr. A. Freeman: "Note on the value of the first root of $J_0(x) = 0$.

CAMBRIDGE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

At the meeting, last Thursday, the Rev. F. H. Chase, M.A., Christ's, the Rev. F. Wallis, M.A., Caius, and H. H. West, Esq., B.A., Trinity, were elected members. Mr. Ridgeway read a paper on Soph. Phil. 527, where he contended that ἀπαρνηθήσεται was active, the Argo being half personified, 'she will not refuse' to take Philoctetes; and on Iliad 15, 18-20, 18, 507, and where he explained τάλαντον as a small talent like the Sicilian. The Secretary read a paper by Dr. Hager, on 'Books and Publication in Greece." Dr. Hager combated Mr. Paley's well known views on the subject of the age of written compositions, and quoted passages to shew that there was a reading public as early as Thucydides, and that books were copied earlier still. He also shewed that libraries existed much earlier than Mr. Paley supposed. Publication (ἔκδοσις) began with a public reading, which introduced the book: it was then copied privately or for sale. But the money-making publisher was unknown. The chief place for the sale of books was the ὀρχήστρα, a part of the ἀγορά. Dr. Hager also proposed a new interpretation of Xen. Vect. 4, 14. He thought that in that passage where Nicias hired 1,000 slaves from Sosias, for whom he received an obol a day, that the risk was taken by the lessees as otherwise the interest (nearly 50 per cent., reckoning 350 days to the year, and the price of a mining slave at 140 drachmae) is quite exorbitant.

The meeting was rather smaller than usual, but exceedingly appreciative, and comprised, we were glad to see, two of the lately elected members, one a non-resident. In consequence of the number of papers promised there will be an extra meeting this term on the 29th of April.

COMPULSORY GREEK.

Report of the Syndicate appointed to consider the advisability of dispensing with the knowledge of Greek as a condition for obtaining a degree in honours.

In December, 1878, a Memorial was published in the Reporter advocating the abolition of Greek as an indispensable subject in the Little-go for candidates in honours. Accordingly in March, 1879, a Syndicate was appointed to consider the question: circular letters were sent round to the Memorialists and to Head Masters and others. The following report has now been published, together with a considerable number of answers to the circular letters.

Part I.

In the opinion of the Syndicate there is good reason to believe that the existing obligation to satisfy the Examiners for the Previous Examination both in Greek and in Latin excludes from the University a number of able and industrious students, educated in schools in which Greek is not taught or in the modern departments of classical schools. The Syndicate are of opinion that this exclusion is injurious not only to the students who are deprived of the advantages of residence and study in the University, but also to the schools and departments of schools thus dissociated from the University, and to the University itself.

The Syndicate therefore recommend:

(1) That the existing obligation to satisfy the Examiners for the Previous examination in two Classical Languages be relaxed, (a proper substitute being provided for the language omitted,) in the case of Candidates for Honours who may desire it.

It would seem that a knowledge of the two principal languages of continental Europe might fairly be recognised as a substitute for that of Greek or of Latin, especially as particular attention is usually given to Modern Languages in those schools and departments of schools in which Greek is not taught.

The Syndicate therefore recommend:

(2) That, in the case of those Candidates for Honours who do not take up both the Classical Languages, French and German be accepted in place of one of them.

The Syndicate further recommend:

(3) That Candidates for Honours be permitted to take, in place of one of the two Classical Languages, a paper in French and German, consisting of Unprepared Passages for translation, not too difficult, with plain Grammatical Questions.

(4) That Candidates for Honours be permitted, in case they take French and German in lieu of Greek, to take in place of the Gospel in Greek an alternative paper containing such Questions on the Gospel selected for the Greek Testament subject, and on matter collateral thereto, as do not require a knowledge of the Greek language.

Part II.

With a view to the discrimination of Honour men and Pass men, and the relaxation, in the case of Honour men only, of the existing obligation to satisfy the Examiners for the Previous Examination in both the Classical Languages, the Syndicate suggest:

1. That an Examination of Candidates for Honours be held twice in each year, namely, in the first third of the Michaelmas term, and the last third of the Lent term.

2. That it consist of papers in (1) Mathematics, (2) Greek, (3) Latin, (4) French, (5) German, (6) the Elements of Physics.

3. That the examination in Mathematics consist of questions in Euclid, Algebra, Trigonometry, the Elements of Conic Sections and Analytical Geometry, and Mechanics (including Statics, Dynamics, and Hydrostatics).

4. That the examination in Greek and Latin consist of (a) Questions in Grammar, (b) Prose Composition, and (c) the Translation of Unprepared Passages, in each of which divisions the Candidate shall satisfy the Examiners.

5. That the examinations in French and German consist of (a) Questions in Grammar, (b) Prose Composition, and (c) the Translation of Unprepared Passages, in each of which divisions the Candidate shall satisfy the Examiners.

6. That the examination in the Elements of Physics consist of Questions in Mechanical Philosophy, the Laws of Heat, and Chemistry.

7. That no Candidate be examined in more than one of these subjects.

8. That every Candidate signify, fourteen days before the commencement of the Examination, the subject which he presents.

9. That this Examination be open to Students in their first or any later term of residence.

 Two questions, (i) that of treating this Examination as a substitute for the existing Additional Examination, and (ii) that of withdrawing the permission now given to Candidates for an Ordinary Degree to present themselves for the Previous Examination in their first term, were felt by the Syndicate to be closely connected with the above proposals; but it was not thought advisable, pending the suggested reconsideration of the arrangements for the Previous Examination (see Report of the Board of Examinations, Reporter, March 9, 1880), to submit to the Senate definite recommendations with regard to them.

March 17, 1880.

Appendix A sets forth the circular letters.

In Appendix we find the replies from the Memorialists; they are from Mr. Matthew Arnold, Mr. J. L. Hammond, Professor Huxley, the Bishop of Manchester, Mr. Roby, Mr. Stone, the Rev. W. H. Watson. In these replies we find two chief arguments, (1) the yearly increasing number of students, especially of Mathematics and Natural Science, who have not learnt Greek, and cannot afford the time or money necessary to master the requisite minimum; (2) the futility of that minimum.

To note particular points;—

Mr. Matthew Arnold points out that in Germany the Polytechnicum dispenses with Greek, while in France it is not required for the degree of Bachelors of Science.

Mr. Hammond recalls the similar attempt of Lord Lyttelton in 1870, in the interests of the Modern Schools and reiterates the same plea. He makes three suggestions;—

(1)—This relaxation should only be allowed to candidates for Natural Science and Mathematics.

(2)—Some substitute should be taken up, Mathematics by Natural Science men, Natural Science by Mathematicians.

(3)—The standard of Greek in the Previous Examination, where it is retained, should be raised—at all events in the case of candidates for a degree in Honours.

Professor Huxley is very characteristic; after deprecating any under-valuing of Greek, he gives the following as one of his reasons for signing the Memorial:—"Assiduous application of the method of concomitant variations has not, as yet enabled me to discover any relation of cause and effect between ordinary Greek scholarship and literary culture properly so called, and I venture to think that a knowledge of Greek is no more an indispensable element of a liberal education, in the highest sense of the term, than is a knowledge of Sanscrit, or of the Differential Calculus, or of Vertebrate Morphology."

The Bishop of Manchester is brief and business-like: his only reason is the one given above, the futillty of the minimum of Greek required.

Mr. Roby poses as the champion of Latin; he says:—"Whatever benefit is derivable from the study of Latin and Greek is derivable in a very large proportion from the study of one of them only. And looking to the incorporation of Latin in the languages and literature of Europe and its much more generally assured place in Education, I think there can be no serious question as to which should be dropped, if either is dropped."

Mr. Stone draws attention to the vast increase of late years in the field of knowledge which makes it very undesirable to waste any part of the time given to study in a line which is not to be followed far enough for some substantial result; he advocates a more rational mode of teaching Greek and the introduction of the Modern pronunciation.

The Rev H. W. Watson sends the most lengthy reply. His main point is that the standard in the last class of the Tripos is not sufficiently high: we would therefore only allow an alternative for Greek to those who consider themselves able to attain a certain standard, though he acknowledges the seeming impracticableness of such a scheme.

Next we come to the answers of the Headmasters to the questions circulated by the Syndicate. Nearly all the great schools are represented, and a number of smaller ones. Among the absentees are Harrow, Cheltenham, Marlborough, and Fettes.

The first important question is the educational value of Greek in the case of boys of average ability. Most of the Greek schools give it considerable value; Sherborne is fainter in its approval, while Repton and Dulwich allow it none at all.

The possibility of a substitute, from an educational point of view, is denied by no less than 25 schools, including Eton, Uppingham, Clifton, Westminster, and Winchester and Rugby (except in the case of inferior boys), but allowed by Sherborne and Dulwich, with 81 others.

On the possibility of supplying the necessary teaching the division list is different.

Ayes 17, including Sherborne and City of London.

Noes 10, including Eton, Uppingham, Winchester and Westminster; Neutral, Repton, Rugby, Tonbridge.

Next comes an interesting question as to the relative proficiency of the Classical and Modern sides in common subjects.

The Classical side has 15 supporters against 7; but it is pointed out that the clever boys stay in the classical side.

As to the proposed change altering the arrangements of the schools, and attracting more boys to the Universities, it is denied, more or less emphatically, by the great majority of schools.

Lastly comes the consideration of the substitute. Is it to be (1) a wider knowledge of Latin, including unseen translations or, (2) one or two modern languages? Latin has the fewest supporters, the Modern Languages more, while the great majority deprecate any change.

It will thus be seen that, as might be expected, the majority of the schools, especially the great public schools, are on the side of Greek, Sherborne and Repton being the most lukewarm.

After the answers of the school are published the letters from which they are taken: these letters are full of interesting matter and suggestions, and will well repay perusal. The question of the value of Greek to the boy of average ability is especially well dealt with.

On this point the Master of Rugby says:—"But after all, allowance for such accidental advantages and such admitted failures, I attach a very great value to Greek even for boys of average ability. I am not now discussing the value of a knowledge of Greek literature, but the educational value of it to a fourth form boy who is doing his 20 lines of Xenophon for a lesson. For him it is second, if second, only to Latin, and perhaps to Mathematics, where Mathematics are exceptionally well taught—taught, that is, so as to make boys think as well as work. When the average boy is learning his Xenophon, his mind is in a more active state than it is over any lesson except perhaps Latin. There are small problems incessantly proposed, the solution of all of them is within his power."

Dr. Hornby too says:—

"I think that its educational value is very great even for boys of average ability. It is a great gain for boys not intended for a learned profession, but for the army or for business, to have read, as some such boys in my time at school had read, the whole of Homer's Iliad. As a means of literary culture this was no small gain, even when the language was not studied very critically. In other ways the gain from Greek teaching is, I think, greater now than it was in my school days."

The Master of Haileybury advances the claims of English, of which he says two distinct branches would need recognition. 1. The historical study of the language starting with Anglo Saxon. 2. English Literature.

The Rev. W. E. Pryke, of Lancaster School, starts a novel defence for the retention of Greek; he says, "there are two advantages in the present system, (1) that it enables a student of Natural Science to understand the vocabulary of his subject, (2) that it gives him the power, at any future time, of reading Greek authors. This few would ever attempt who had not learned, when boys, to conjugate τύπτω."

Dr. Huckin, of Repton, has little doubt that the result of the change would be that eventually Greek would become a luxury, and, though perhaps learned by more pupils than Hebrew is now, it would in thirty years stand to other subjects much as German did ten years ago, i.e. would be learned by about 1 in every 10 of the pupils at our schools.

The Master of Rugby gives us some facts bearing on the relative proficiency of the classical and modern side; he says that while he was at Cheltenham (a period of six years) "there were competitions open to both Departments in these seven subjects: French, German, English Essay, English Poem, English Divinity, English Literature, Geography; and in every instance but one every one of those Prizes was carried off by a Classical boy The one instance to the contrary occurred when a boy in the Modern Department carried off the History Prize; being superannuated really, and having returned accidentally, a most upright and trustworthy boy. In Mathematics the Modern boys were certainly further advanced than the Classical, and were most soundly trained. In Natural Science, it is doubtful. In French and German the Classical boys were decidedly—in Latin immeasurably—better than the Modern." His concluding words are very instructive; "It is not a smattering of many things that it is desirable to require of a lad of nineteen, but a sound knowledge of some few main and primary studies; a knowledge not great in itself, but yet involving a knowledge of the conditions of all true learning; a knowledge of the difference between ignorance and knowledge; the only kind of knowledge which is suggestive and fertile, and not easily lost."

The Rev. E. M. Young, of Sherborne, is also a supporter of English: he gives the following reason for signing the Memorial:—"No student ought, in my opinion, to be excluded from a University degree by reason of not passing in a subject so special, and so far removed from English speech and thought, as Greek is. I would limit the obligatory subjects for the Previous Examination to Mathematics, Latin and English (Language and Literature), and allow students afterwards to follow any line for a pass degree to which a Tripos is attached. I strongly deprecate the idea which appears to underlie the suggestions III. (a) (b) that, if Greek is no longer required, some other special test must take its place. Surely a man's own language is the most important thing for him to know."

The Master of Tonbridge, the Rev. T. B. Rowe, makes a very novel suggestion. It seems to him "to be a serious misfortune that our present B.A. covers things so different as the Classical and Mathematical Triposes. Could it be restricted to literature, or to the Poll;—so as to give degrees thus? B.A. = Poll.

B.C. = Classics, or Literature.

B.M. or B.S. = Mathematics or Science.

Every one would know what these meant."

The Master of Uppingham defends Greek in his own peculiarly trenchant style. "If Greek is given up, Greek, and with it Asiatic History, will fall. Are we prepared for this? If Greek is given up, the most important Poetry, Philosophy, Theology, and we may add Philology of the world, become a narrow monopoly. The Greek Testament would be closed to many more than it is at present. Are we prepared for this? The ignorance displayed by many eminent men of the facts of human progress is not encouraging. Greater ignorance must be the result of dropping Greek." "Again, until a law is passed making fluency of speech equally valuable with mental training I fail to see how any Modern Language can be a substitute for Greek." He would, however, have a Modern Languages Tripos, for "the Modern Subjects are either worthy of a degree or they are not. If they are worthy of a degree, as I think they are, then a degree given for them is an intelligible honour and a thoroughly satisfactory conclusion. If they are not worthy of a degree of their own (as some of their promoters appear to think) they ought not to make the B.A. degree less of a reality, in order that they may seem to share a culture which they do not share."

The Master of Wellington would not abolish Greek for all candidates for honours; he would prefer to follow generally the lines of the existing arrangement in London University, and of the one at present under discussion at Oxford, and to draw a distinction between two alternative courses—one in which Literature, in some form or other, is the staple, and Mathematics or Science the qualifying minimum; the other in which Mathematics or Science is the staple and Literature the qualifying minimum. In the first case he would for the present retain Greek, feeling that the removal of the requirement opens larger questions than we are yet prepared to meet. In the second case he would be ready to let the literary minimum be made as attainable and as useful as may be; and he thinks a modern language, grammatically and thoroughly studied, might very well be substituted for the small amount of Greek now required. As to the relative value of the Classical and Modern sides he asserts that "a boy of the same age and capacity in the Classical School will understand an English author better, will write a better letter, speak better in the Debating Society, start more intelligently at a new subject, than his equal in the Modern School."

Westminster unanimously upholds Greek as a compulsory subject for ordinary degrees.

Dr. Scott says;—"I do not think any language could be substituted for it without serious educational loss, as things now stand. The precision of the Classical tongues and the accuracy with which the Syntax has been analysed, as well as the fact that the rules are fixed and not liable to change from varying usage, make them of peculiar value for education. It is doubtful whether Latin would long survive the separation from Greek; and the Greek literature is infinitely richer and more full of interest for boys, as well as for grown men."

Dr. Ridding is an upholder of English as a substitute, if required, for one of the classical languages.

Dr. Percival presents a more elaborate scheme;—"I think that the translation of easy unprepared passages should be required of candidates in every language which they present, but as an alternative for Greek I should like to see one Modern Language required and some Natural Science. It would be a misfortune if any system were adopted at the Universities which did not tend to preserve as the school curriculum a sound training either in both Latin and Greek, or in one of these languages and Natural Science. I myself should wish to see both Elementary Mathematics and the elements of Natural Science required of all candidates, as well as English Composition or Literature, so that the alternative requirements might be somewhat as follows:—

Latin Greek Mathematics Natural Science English Composition or English Literature	or	Latin or Greek One Modern Language Mathematics Natural Science English Composition or Literature.

Appendix E contains four letters from under masters who are admitted to the conclave of their superiors.

Two came from Harrow, from Mr. Bowen and Mr. Colbeck, the latter of whom refers to Dr. Butler's reply, which is not forthcoming.

The other two are from the Rev. J. H. D. Matthews, head of the Mathematical School at Wellington, and from Mr. Arthur Sidgwick, of Rugby.

Mr. Bowen gives his powerful testimony for some change, he says:—"I have seen repeated instances of the prohibitive effect of compulsory Greek on boys who would have derived benefit from a University education. At this moment some excellent boys at Harrow are anxiously awaiting the result of your legislation." He would have a temporary scheme to be in action for five years, in which a degree is to be given for so many subjects out of so many classes of subjects (including Modern Languages.)

Mr. Colbeck discusses the value of Greek, and points out the vagueness of the term average. He would have German substituted.

The result in his opinion would be that "our present standard of Classics would gain largely, because the 'scholars' would be taught together more. The number of candidates for Classical Honours would be very slightly less, if at all, and the decrease would come from the lower ranks."

The Rev. J. H. D. Matthews is in favour of German properly taught, not by German nurses, governesses, etc.

Mr. Sidgwick treats the question of the value of Greek in a most interesting way. He admits the advantages derived from it by the highest forms, but he says "it may be confidently stated that, of those who learn Greek at a public school, half get none of the higher advantages, though possibly the best of these get a fairly adequate training: but fully a third are the failures of the system. To be quite certainly within the mark, I will say that one quarter of those who are at a Public School would be better off if they had not to do Greek. But this is not all: for the worst boys who do Greek at a public school, it is not merely useless, but pernicious. The accidence is so much more complex than any other accidence they learn, that they never master it: the language is too hard for them. And this being so, Greek is a lesson for them in slipshod. They never get the ideal, nor even the idea, of doing their work perfectly: they give up the attempt at being sure of it; and nothing can be more demoralising to the intellect than this. They make shots at the inflections, shots at the syntax, and shots at the general sense; often shots at the spelling, so that they look out the wrong word in the dictionary. The total result may be fairly called slipshod, and the reason is that Greek is too hard. He considers German with its syntax, complex structure, and literature a good substitute. He would not have the exemption of Greek confined to Honour men, because that would not benefit the duller boys who are the very ones that suffer most from studying too hard a subject."

This interesting report is closed by two letters from Professor Bacumber in Freiburg, Baden, and Dr. Ludwig (on the Medical Staff of the German Hospital in London) and Dr. Weber.

The Professor dwells on the position of the Realschule, which answer to our middle class schools, and do not teach Greek. The practice of admitting their students to degrees varies in different Universities; but in spite of strenuous endeavours they have not yet been able to gain admission to medical degrees.

Dr. Ludwig states that in Germany Matriculation does not require Greek, but for admission to the degree examination a Greek certificate is generally necessary. Many Universities confer degrees in Mathematics and Natural Science without Greek.

It is stated that some of the old houses in Petty Cury are to be pulled down. This proposal has already excited considerable regret among members of the University, and attempts will probably be made to save the buildings.

A Club meet was held on Friday, 16th inst. Seven members rode out along the Great Chesterford road, through Stapleford and Sawston, to the right along the Newmarket and Royston Road, past Whittlesford station and home through Shelford. Distance 17 miles.

On Monday, 17th, a four mile handicap took place at the path for the Terminal Challenge Cup. The winner, P. L. Renouf, Trinity College, was treated too leniently by the handicappers, and completely the distance with 840 yards start in 12 mins. 14 secs. J. Isard, Trinity College, was second; out of 15 entries 11 started.

On Saturday, there is to be a Club ride to Hitchin, (27 miles), where the London Bicycle Club have arranged to meet the C.U.Bi.C. A first detachment of men, wishing to take matters easily, will leave the Club rooms at 2.30, while those who are in training for the races and others who wish to ride fast will follow an hour later. The two Clubs will have tea together at Hitchin, about 6.30, and a start back will be made about 8 o'clock. There are however trains at 8.35 and 9.48 from Hitchin, stopping at Royston at 9.3 and 10.10, of which no doubt some will avail themselves.

We hope that a large number of Cambridge riders will turn out and show that the Club can hold its own against others, as well in numbers on the road as in speed on the racing path. In order to get a rough idea of how many purpose to go the committee have invited members to signify their intention of doing so to the attendant.

MR. BRANDRAM AT THE GUILDHALL.

Mr. Brandram gave another of his powerful recitations on Thursday evening, before an audience, which, if not very large, was certainly very appreciative. All Shakespeare's plays improve marvellously on the stage, but in "As you like it" especially we feel the want of the woodland scenery, and above all of a woman to represent that most charming of Shakespeare's heroines, who is now being so charmingly represented by Miss Litton at the Imperial Theatre. In fact it is impossible for a man, however gifted he may be, clad in the sombre habiliments of the British waiter, to bring out the full poetry of this most perfect of pastorals, or the sprightliness and grace of Rosalind; all the more wonderful that Mr. Brandram should be able to keep his audience so thoroughly interested from beginning to end of the play. His Jaques offered a striking contrast to that of Mr. Hermann Vezin, who is playing the part in London; and especially in his delivery of the famous "seven ages" speech. Here Mr. Brandram poses before the audience and gives it out as a studied piece of declamation, which is effective enough and brings down the house as he intends it to do; Mr. Vezin on the contrary delivers it simply and naturally, sitting on the stump of a tree, as if he did not know it was a set speech at all; and for our own part we are disposed to prefer the latter method, while we venture to think Mr. Brandram is distinctly wrong in changing his voice to simulate the "childish treble" of the sixth age. But it is hardly fair to consider Mr. Brandram's recital except as a whole, and viewed as a whole it is certainly a wonderful performance; his complete command over that most beautiful of musical instruments, the human voice, and the power of keeping each personage in the play clear and distinct, are as rare as they are remarkable. We were surprised to notice two or three stumbles, a thing we have never before noticed in Mr. Brandram; though indeed their absence formerly afforded more real ground for surprise. It should be added that the glees were very well rendered, and gained their full share of applause.

THE RIVER.

The May term this year is an unusually long one, extending over a period of twelve weeks, and thus necessitating a residence of at least eight. Rowing men have therefore no less than five weeks' practice before the beginning of the races, which ought on this account to be above the average.

Digitized by Google

Although they have such a long time before them, several energetic captains, determined to take time by the forelock, have had their boats in practice already for ten days, among the most prominent in shewing this praiseworthy activity being Trinity Hall and Caius.

It is as yet early to give any decided opinions as to how the various crews are likely to turn out; but Jesus, Caius, and the Trinities have fairish lots of men.

Jesus is lucky in having the stroke of this year's University crew filling the same important position in its first boat, backed up as he is by Armytage, and as he most probably will be, by Prest and Hockin.

Lady Margaret have lost the services of their three best men, and though they will be certain to row with all the pluck and "go" which have distinguished them in former years, yet they will have to work very hard to keep the honourable position which they have inherited.

Caius I. will have the pick of nearly all their last year's crew and ought to do well.

First Trinity are at present being stroked by Gubbins, who rowed in the last trial eights. Davis has been rowing both at seven and five, while the post of six seems best fitted for Nimmo. Keyser who sculled such a plucky second for the Colquhouns is at bow.

Third Trinity are stroked by Pilkington; Gridley, who rowed in their four in the October term as a freshman, being at six.

Trinity Hall are at present scarcely shewing the benefit of early practice.

Caius II. are strong, but have as yet hardly the 'life' which characterized them last year.

Clare are unsteady, and want to work hard and be painstaking.

Pembroke has a standing dish in Burnside at seven; and after last year's success are not likely to be underrated.

Emmanuel have several old oars at their disposal, though the new material seems weak.

Sidney are very rough, and have lost a good man, and a valuable 'coach' in Blake, who has gone down.

Queens', with two "blues" rowing for them, ought to turn the tables on some of the boats which bumped them while their champions were at Putney.

The other boats have hardly been out long enough to call for comment at this stage of their practice.

On one point we may congratulate the college captains, that is on their being enabled, owing to the long time which they have before them, to maintain that slow stroke at present, which is so essential, especially in the case of the First Division, when the slide causes innumerable extra pitfalls which it is no easy matter to escape.

In former years the men have returned from the Easter Vacation with barely three weeks practice before the races and have necessarily been hurried into a fast stroke long before they were able to row properly; the natural consequence of this is that many faults have become firmly implanted into rowing, which a little longer practice at the slow stroke would have eradicated from boats where they might have been conspicuous by their absence.

With this advantage we feel that the hope we expressed at starting has a good chance of being fulfilled, and the general rowing of the University of benefiting to an extent which will render an easy victory at Putney next year not only possible but probable.

OXFORD LETTER.

April 17.

All the eights are now hard at work for the races, which are fixed for May 5th, an unusually early date. B.N.C., New College, and one or two others came up a week earlier than most of the crews, and are consequently more advanced. B.N.C. certainly seem the fastest eight on as yet, and row with a great deal of life and dash. Exeter, Magdalen, and Hertford ought to turn out well. Balliol, the head of the river, seem to be the worst crew in the First Division, and will have to do all they know to save themselves from a fall every night.

I have to record the death of a prominent member of the Balliol B.C., a member who has rowed both in their eight and four. W. H. P. Rowe died suddenly, last Sunday, greatly to the regret not only of his own College but of the University in general.

The cricket prospects do not seem promising, and though little has been done this week, I fail to hear of a single freshman likely to make his mark. The new cricket ground is progressing favourably, and by next year should be really good.

We were beaten in the final tie for the Association Football Cup, by the Clapham Rovers, by one goal.

TEMPERANCE LEGISLATION.

I.

During the recent General Election the vast majority of Englishmen have been astonished to find how little they really knew of the real opinions of the people among whom they had been living. Foremost among the delusions from which we are now emancipated may be reckoned the prevalent opinion as to the overwhelming political power of the brewing interest. A few days ago an assertion to this effect was reckoned a mere truism. Liberal papers owned with sorrow that the Conservatives had the publicans on their side in the struggle, and that their own chance of success was considerably discounted thereby. The Licensed Victuallers Association felt itself strong enough to disregard warnings like those of the Chancellor of the Exchequer at Exeter, and to exact stringent pledges from would-be Members even against any restriction of the existing hours. Not even the conciliatory eloquence of Mr. Bright sufficed to disarm their opposition in the great capital of English Liberalism. And now the bubble has burst, and the Licensed Victuallers' candidates have been in nearly every case contemptuously rejected. The wealthy classes, who in their zeal for national improvement fondly hoped that at some indefinite period in the future the English workman would be sufficiently educated to appreciate the sober habits of his betters, have been somewhat sharply compelled to learn that the ignorance was on their side. While they were moralising upon the iniquity of depriving a poor man of his beer, the working classes have taken the matter into their own hands and have returned Members at all events unfettered by the Licensed Victuallers and disposed from the past attitude of their party to give the temperance question a fair hearing.

The imperturbable calmness with which the Conservative party leaders throughout the country have clung to their own conceptions of what the attitude of the working man towards temperance must be, in spite of overwhelming evidence of what it is, may suggest some suspicion as to the universal soundness of such a priori reasoning, even in the sacred domain of foreign politics. For the facts as to the wish of the masses were plain and incontestable.

In the report of the Committee of the House of Lords on intemperance, printed by order of the House, March 7, 1879, we find it stated as a result of a canvass by the Sunday Closing Association that in a group of 200 representative houses 83 per cent. of the householders voted for Sunday closing, and 11 per cent. against. In Manchester the numbers were 83 per cent. for and 9 per cent. against; while an independent canvass in Liverpool, a stronghold of intemperance, shewed 63 per cent. for and 12 per cent. against. In many places a majority of publicans support the proposal, for it must be remembered that the interests of the publicans and the brewers are far from being identical in this as in other matters.

It must surely be a matter of regret to a large number of Conservatives that they refused to recognise the evidences of a strong and growing public opinion, and preferred the wrong and suicidal course of identifying themselves with the sinking cause of the "trade interests." Perhaps this is the solution of the enigma. Can it be that the too familiar sound of the word 'interests' led to the ignoring of the report of the House of Lords' Committee? Alas, this is one of the secrets we shall never have the chance of knowing. At all events the most eminent, though not the least injured persons in the matter are those Conservatives who were placed in the unfortunate dilemma of either stultifying their own convictions and work by supporting a Conservative champion of the 'non-possumus' policy with regard to licensing reform, or of voting for a candidate to whose general political views they were opposed. They, of course, formed only a minority of the party, still a minority too large to be altogether neglected. In Leeds it is stated that 3,000 Conservatives refused to support Mr. Wheelhouse on this ground, and the indirect loss from this cause must have been considerable. These gentlemen will not only have to abide the temporary wrath of more thorough-going partisans, but will further have the mortification of seeing the government of the country pass for an indefinite period into the hands of their political opponents—and this in a considerable degree through the short sightedness of political wire-pullers, whom they had no means of influencing.

Nor can it be urged in excuse, as is sometimes done, that the need for legislation is imaginary or exaggerated. The peers on the one hand give emphatic testimony to the beneficial operation of the Acts of 1869 and 1872. The principal effect of these Acts was to extinguish free trade in beer houses, to restrict the hours of opening, to render compulsory the endorsement of licenses for certain offences, and to check adulteration. The committee state that "they have examined magistrates, chief constables, and other representatives of the largest towns and most populous districts in the country. These witnesses unanimously bear testimony to the beneficial effects of recent legislation." It may be mentioned that these witnesses speak for such places as Liverpool, Manchester, Sheffield, Bristol, Newcastle, the East-end of London, &c. The Committee states that a great improvement in the order of the streets of our large towns is attributed mainly to the closing regulations of 1872, and also to the abolition, under the Act of 1869, of a large number of beer-houses of the worst class, and to the improved condition of licensed houses generally. It is true that the operation of the Act of 1872 was considerably impeded by the so-called amending Act of 1874, which rescinded many valuable provisions of the former Act; but Conservatives at least are debarred from using this as an argument against the legislation they have partially abrogated. Yet notwithstanding the confessedly beneficial operation of the Act of 1872, it is by no means certain that the tide of intemperance is turning. We hear sinister rumours of a great outbreak of female intemperance, due to the action of the grocers' licenses. The number of apprehensions for drunkenness has largely increased, and although this is not a certain indication of increased drunkenness, it is still a weighty fact. The Lords themselves admit an increase of intemperance, which they attribute chiefly to the late high wages and short hours of the operatives, although they confess that with the fall of wages the habits of self-indulgence still continue. Further, they assert the reasonableness of the supposition that "had it not been for the severe restrictions imposed by the Act of 1872, drunkenness would have increased at a still more rapid rate." We find then more intemperance than ever, intemperance growing in good times, but not falling off in bad times, and this under the operation of laws tending to check intemperance which can be proved to have been successful.

Does not this make out a strong a priori case in favour of further legislation on similar lines? It can neither be contended that the evil is stemmed, nor that legislation has proved powerless to render material aid in stemming it. Surely we have reached a crisis in which the "do nothing" policy is the height of folly.

The House of Lords' Committee have reported in favour of considerable and important amendments in the existing law, based on the same general principles as those of the Act of 1872; and although this portion of the report has appeared to many educated and well-informed temperance workers inadequate to meet the evils disclosed in the evidence, and weaker than the conclusions embodied in other parts of the Report would warrant, it is at all events amply sufficient to dispose of the argument for that shelving process fromwhich temperance questions have so long suffered, and which, we may hope, they have now finally escaped.

In a subsequent paper I hope to discuss some of the principal proposals for legislation on the subject.

THE CANT OF AESTHETICISM.

Cant is of many kinds: cant of religion, cant of patriotism, cant of science, cant of philosophy; in short there is nothing earnest, true, noble, or beautiful, no system of any sort, no art, profession or trade, that does not draw after it an immense amount of cant, as the substance is followed by the shadow, or, as "atra Cura" has stuck to Horace's unlucky rider, for nineteen centuries and more.

Cant is, to define it briefly, the assumption of the technical words or phrases of any system, sect, science, or art, by those who in reality know or care little or nothing about its principles, but wish to appear to do so. The easiest way to do this is to catch up and repeat the words of necessity oftenest used by the earnest workers in the van of the cause—full of meaning on their lips—to use them on every occasion, in and out of season, to toss them about like jugglers' balls, till they become mere jingling counters, representing little or nothing. So it was with the "seeking the Lord," and other Biblical phrases, often strangely enough distorted, of the Puritans—perhaps rather say Pseudo-Puritans—of the English Revolution. So it was that Liberté, Egalité, Fraternité, sacred words truly, and to be reverenced as denoting all that is holiest in the rights and duties of man, came to be bandied about as the watchword of factions and the war-cry of some of the bloodiest and most unscrupulous tyrants the world has ever seen.

So it is, and this is a case still more in point, with the works of Professor Ruskin. It would certainly be most unjust and ungrateful to blame him for the works which have been done, and the words which have been spoken in his name: how could he have foreseen, when writing in 1857 such sentences of magnificent English as the following: "The best part of every great work is always inexplicable; it is good because it is good and innocently gracious, opening as the green of the earth or falling as the dew of heaven . . . ," or, " . . . goodly and solemn pines, with trunks like the pillars of temples, and the purple burning of their branches sheathed in deep globes of cloudy green . . ," that words which were so grand and expressive when they came from his pen, "subtle," "solemn," "goodly," "gracious," (I am not sure whether he is answerable for "delectable," but "precious" is certainly a favourite with him), would become the slang of fashionable drawing-rooms, languidly whispered, or passionately breathed forth by aesthetic youths, or "intense" girls, in curly fringes and peacock-green or blue, whose study is much upon the "Earthly Paradise," and who take delight in twisting their speech into unusual and supposed-to-be-graceful (or "gracious") collocations of nouns and adjectives and adverbs.

It is now many years since Mr. Ruskin first began to write, and the Pre-Raphaelites to paint, and some cultivated and intellectual men—aye, and good men and true as well, for was not Charles Kingsley one of them, though about as far removed from an "Aesthetic" as he could be?—began to see that we were a most intolerably prosaic and vulgar nation, without any true feeling for art, and proceeded to indoctrinate us with this view forthwith. Which doctrine being conveyed for the most part in most delightful books, was gladly received by many, who truly and honestly believed the same, though some of them, no doubt, were very weak brethren, who—or their descendants—are now running rampant at Oxford, in long hair and pearl-velvet coats. So by degrees the movement grew till it became fashionable, whereupon the mass of wind-driven thistledown nobodies, whose fetish is the great god Καινότερον Τι, immediately flung themselves upon this novelty—far too great a prize to be overlooked—and proceeded to pick up for their share what shibboleths they could, in order to proclaim to all the world, Anch' io son, not pittore perhaps, but far greater, for is he not a judge of painters? "Estetico."

And because some—whether rightly or wrongly, this is not the place to decide—evolved a theory that fashion was utterly absurd and wrong, and that every individual man and woman had a right to dress as was pleasing in his or her own eyes, therefore did these same nobodies erect their practice into a fashion that was just as much a fashion as any that had gone before (and which the new lights had so laboured to destroy), and succeeded in making frights of themselves even as previous generations had done.

Happy, in these days, is the man who understands nothing about pictures, or statues, or art in general, or, if he does understand and enjoy them, is free to do so undisturbed, and is not forced to associate with people who are supposed to do the like. Happy are they who do not number among their friends persons who storm one with "subtle," "lovely," "delectable," and the like, till one is fain to violate the rule, "De mortuis," &c., and wish all manner of untold plagues on the heads of those, doubtless very respectable and honest Aryans, our ancestors, who invented the pro-pro-pro-progenitors of those unlucky words. It is so easy, too, to catch up that way of speaking; I have no doubt that after an hour's intercourse daily, for, say, a week, with a pretty strong Aesthetic, a person of a moderately good capacity would be able to talk the Aesthetic dialect in perfection for the rest of his natural life, without troubling himself to enter into the refinements and technicalities understood only of the initiated.

But what (to the writer's mind) seems to make the cant of Aestheticism doubly objectionable, is, that it is not, like most other cant, the shadow, the base imitation of some strong and good reality, but the shadow of a shadow—a very beautiful shadow, but still a shadow nevertheless.

(Favete linguis! . . . . Surely this is heresy—very big, black, rampant heresy. . . . . Yes—I will speak very low—are not these men whose talk is of "Culture" and "sweet reasonableness" lying in wait in their fair retreats, ever ready to spring out and throttle the unlucky wight who dares dissent from them?)

Not that I would, for one moment, be understood as speaking thus of the great men before-named, or many others like them. But—not to go further into detail,—they differed from the "Aesthetic" school in this at least; that they knew what they meant and wanted, whereas I should be sorry to affirm that proposition off-hand of the Aesthetics. Surely it is one of the most pitiful sights in the world, to see people, who are conscious of wanting as a nation both art and art-feeling, trying as hard as they can to work up themselves and others into the latter, if haply thereby they may in time produce the former. Pitiful, because the task is so hopeless—true art being in its nature unconscious—and only comparable to the spectacle of a man who might make a first-rate merchant, engineer, or sailor, but has no more poetical feeling than Quintilian or a lamp-post, sitting down to his desk under the idea with which some adverse influence has inspired him, that he must make a poem. Surely the Inquisition never invented such tortures as the racking of brains which that man undergoes—the ideas painfully hauled up from the utmost depths of the mind, only to slip from his fingers and fall back just as he lays hold of them . . . . let us draw a veil over the rest.

It is perhaps very natural for highly educated and intelligent men of sensibility and delicate organization and what not far above the average of ordinary human beings, to feel pained at the want of sympathy they meet with from fellow creatures who have too much to do to think about their organizations, and shrink with disgust from such rough unappreciative barbarians. It may be very true, indeed it is true, that these people miss a great deal of enjoyment, that their lives are hard and bare, that they do not even care for art or beauty or anything of the sort. But is it not the cruellest of mockery to exhort a man who has to work hard from morning to night for his daily bread and that of his wife and children, whose sensibilities are blunted by the incessant daily grind, who is forced to live in a house which it is almost a hopeless task to keep even decently clean, to be less absorbed in the prose of daily life, to enjoy the beauties of art and nature, to "beautify his surroundings" &c., &c.? And because he does not respond to their appeal, perhaps does not understand it, they begin calling him hard names, say that he is a money-grubbing Philistine, and a heathen, and a Goth, and a person who ought to be ashamed of himself, and then retire into a beautiful little paradise or private sanctuary of their own, fitted up with art-furniture and plenty of books and pictures, where they can lament in peace over the degeneracy of the world, carefully shutting out all disagreeable sights and sounds and odours, and leave the poor grubby hard-working Philistines to themselves, instead of by taking some of the hard work off their shoulders, trying to make their lives a little easier, and so leading in time to a better appreciation of the things they condemn them for despising. Perhaps even those who love Art best might be surprised to find how much better they understood and loved it after learning to lay aside their little personal tastes and feelings and prejudices, and live in true brotherhood with their fellow-men. Surely it is better, more manly, more truly wise, to face the battle and take one's chance with the rest, raising the courage of the weary fighters by sympathy and fellowship, standing by others as they will stand by you in your need, helping the weak and wounded, and being helped as gladly and gratefully when your turn comes, than to sit aloft, like Lucretius' exceedingly selfish wise men, and

"E terra magnum alterius spectare laborem."

THE PAPER-KNIFE.

"Home they brought her warrior dead." An "In Memoriam" to the late Prince Imperial of France: by Julian Home.

The first criticism that will strike any reader of this volume is that Mr. Julian Home has mistaken his vocation: as a writer of sentimental poetry he only excites our ridicule: but we may confidently assure him success in burlesques and parodies. In fact the whole volume is a burlesque: and that on one of the noblest poems ever written, Mr. Tennyson's "In Memoriam." In a preface to another of his works Mr. Julian Home states that he owes to Mr. Tennyson more than he can ever repay: which is perfectly true: and on the fly leaf of his volume we read a puff taken from a paper of no very world-wide celebrity, which states that "this disciple of Tennyson puts himself in rivalry with his master," a compliment which however well intended, will bear two constructions. The book is chiefly interesting as being an instance of the extraordinary facility with which Mr. Tennyson can be parodied: though it is not Mr. Tennyson alone who is Mr. Julian Home's master: to the authors of the "Hymns Ancient and Modern," to Dr. Johnson, and to several other poets, Mr. Julian Home owes a great deal—in the very first line we are confronted by the following astonishing instance:

"There was a name at which the world grew pale."

On this we may say, with Sneer, "Haven't we heard that line before?" Surely there is something like it the Vanity of Human wishes. Lord Macaulay's remark is true of our author, as well as of Montgomery, "That none of the poets whom he has plundered will ever think of making reprisals."

It is always an easy matter to sneer at a preface, but we cannot refrain from quoting the following words:—Mr. Julian Home says, "the thousand verses, which, with some hesitation I offer to the world, were written in the short space of two months. For this reason I claim the generosity of a Public and a Press." Observe, if Mr. Julian Home means what he says (which seems hardly possible), we are asked to be generous to him, because he wrote sixty-four lines a day: a feat on which we may only refer to Horace's comment on Lucilius. Our impulse after reading the first few pages was to turn to the end of the volume in search of notes, which we did not find, though an annotated explanatory edition of the work would be valuable: a great many passages only admit of conjectural explanation, the author's language being always vague and sometimes wholly devoid of meaning, and frequently single words are met with which only occur in the writings of Mr. Julian Home.

The poem itself gives a history of the Prince Imperial from his birth to his death: we are introduced to the second Empire, and told that France the treacherous past atoned,

And welcomed with impulsive grace,
Imperial rule again, and basked
Within the sunshine of its smile:
And stifled smouldering strifes awhile,
And communistic phantoms masked.
Till strangers, journeying from afar,
Beyond the surf of western sea,
Were dazzled by its piquancy,
And murmured "'Tis Utopia."

Truly a beautiful, if hardly truthful, picture; well called Utopia. The picture of France as it basks under the sunshine of the second Empire, engaged in stifling smouldering strife with one hand and masking Communistic phantoms with the other, is remarkable. By-the-bye does "Utopia" rhyme to "afar"? or, as we read soon after, "Tuileries" to "day," or "balcony" to "sea"? But if we get reason now and then, we must not be too exacting, and ask Mr. Julian Home for rhyme with it.

The language is nearly always obscure; and careful study is often necessary to evolve any meaning at all: such a description as that of Death as a "Swart-clad messenger, who sits on a ghastly horse and pours arrows from unslackening bows," must represent death as an individual with numberless bows hanging about his person.

The most remarkable stanza in this very remarkable work is the following:

Where art thou now? what gilded span,
Of æon clasps thee by the hand?
Whence is the music and the land
Which makes me something more than man!

As in a passage of an ancient author where words are used in a unusual sense, we must examine the different lines in which these words occur in that author and thus extract a meaning. So we will quote a few lines in which the words "span" and "æon" occur, to see what our author means: here we read

"To paint in feeble tremulous odes
Thy footprints on the dusty roads,
Thy blameless æon to the world."

In all other places æon is simply equivalent to a space of time. Now for span; we are told elsewhere "that the cyclic spans of age are rent."

Mr. Julian Home asks

"What are years to me, who knows the span of time?"

And mentions "the days yet lying in the lengthened span."

Can Mr. Julian Home mean "what gilt span of time shakes hands with thee?" We cannot tell, but we too would like to know "whence is the music and the land" which makes Mr. Julian Home "something more than man"?

There is a great deal in this book about nature; and some very original discoveries on the colours and hues of nature—the stars, sun, and moon are often appealed to in passionate apostrophe: but even from Mr. Julian Home, the stars would hardly answer to the call of "stars vermilion pale," "red ambrosial," or "scarlet;" the moon too seems green to our author, as we read "Luna sails on emerald wing" and again "Moon's rays faintly shed a sea-green light thro' all the land;" observe the contrast between sea and land; we read too "in the blue flush of your sunlight;" "primrose mountain," and "primrose years."

The author's idea too of childhood and its games are touching, if rather incorrect: witness the following:—

Each moment like a draught of wine,
Stirred pulses, surging o'er with love,
At gift of timid fawn or dove,
Or shuttle-bat or fishing-line.

The first two lines and even the third seem to lead one up to a climax of lover's vows and passions, but what a fall is here: "pulses surging o'er into love at gift of shuttle-bat or fishing line." Is "shuttle bat" one of Mr. Lewis Carroll's portmanteau words for "battledore" and "shuttlecock?"

As an instance of how often Mr. Julian Home is ridiculous when he means to be pathetic, we give the following lines:

"Remembering by your guilt his life was curst, Remembering, when he sleeps at Chislehurst."

Again, when we are told that on one occasion "Death gave three derisive leaps." On another, that Mr. Julian Home "Hobs and nobs with dusky grief."

In conclusion we should advise Mr. Julian Home to hesitate a little longer before he offers to the world another thousand verses: he does not seem to have understood how narrow is the boundary between the pathetic and the ridiculous: and we can assure him that no amount of self-confidence will make an author a poet, not even should he know Mr. Tennyson's poems by heart and be able to plagiarise freely from them: we say self-confidence because in more than one passage our author assumes to himself success as certain: thus we read:—

"I sometimes wonder, in the years
Of after centuries, will the look
Of after ages scan my book,
And read the record of my tears?"

Mr. Julian answers the question thus:

"Yes: in my heart conviction grows,
That, through the glory of thy name,
My feet will reach the goal of fame,
When many yules have donned their snows."

The time at which Mr. Julian Home's feet will reach the goal of fame he carefully conceals in the obscurity of the last line.

THE UNIVERSITY PULPIT:

SUPPLEMENT TO

The Cambridge Review.

No. 18. WEDNESDAY, April 21, 1880.

Sermon by the Rev. D. J. Vaughan, M.A., Trinity College.
Sunday, April 11, 1880.

Matthew xxii., 31—33: "But as touching the resurrection of the dead, have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God, saying,—I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? God is not the God of the dead, but of the living. And when the multitude heard this, they were astonished at his doctrine."

We have in these words a direct argument,—our Lord's own argument—for the immortality of the soul. I think it is the only argument of the kind that is to be found in the pages either of the New Testament or of the Old. This, of itself, invests the passage with a very high and special interest; and this interest is greatly enhanced by the fact, that it is the argument, not of a disciple or of an apostle, but of our Lord Himself.

In attributing this uniqueness to the argument of the passage, I am not forgetting the famous fifteenth chapter of St. Paul's First Epistle to the Co inthians. The argument, however, of that great chapter has a different aim and scope from this of Jesus. St. Paul's contention, against those at Corinth who were denying the immortality of the soul, is that our resurrection is involved in the resurrection of Jesus Christ; that He, being what He is to man, His resurrection carries with it ours; His triumph over death our triumph. He posits the resurrection of Christ as a fact most certain and unquestionable, proved to demonstration by a super-abundant wealth of concurrent testimony. He shows that the denial of man's immortality implies the denial of Christ's resurrection; and that to deny the resurrection of Christ is not only to strike at the very root of our Christian faith and hope, but is also to fly in the face of the facts themselves, which guarantee a thousand times over the truth of His Resurrection. He rose, then, from the dead; and, being what He was, rising from the grave He must needs rise not for Himself only, but on behalf of men, as "the first fruits of them that slept." The soul of St. Paul's argument for immortality is all embodied in the statements contained in these three verses:—"But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept: For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead: For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." When, afterwards, he begins to speak of the seed, which passes through death into higher life, he is no longer arguing for immortality, but is answering the further questions,—questions prompted, not by a destructive scepticism, but by a not unreasonable curiosity; "How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?"

By some critics great fault has been found with St. Paul's argument for immortality. It has been charged with moving in a vicious circle, from which it never escapes. Such a criticism as this, however, arises out of a total misunderstanding of the argument itself. The fact of the resurrection of Christ is affirmed—the evidence for that fact is briefly summarised and is shown to be conclusive—this is the starting point of the entire argument. But the argument, as an argument for man's immortality, does undoubtedly depend for its validity upon a particular view of the relation of Christ to men as their head and Lord—upon a distinctively Christian faith in Jesus as Son of Man and Son of God. In the case of those professed Christians at Corinth whom St. Paul is specially addressing in that fifteenth chapter of the Epistle, the denial of man's immortality was, he shows them, a denial of the faith which they professed to hold; a direct denial, indeed, of the fact of Christ's resurrection, as well as a virtual denial of the relation in which they stood to Him and He to them. The argument is perfectly valid and unassailable, so far as those were concerned to whom it was addressed. But it is limited—avowedly and on the very face of it limited—in its range and application. Its scope and aim, as I said before, are very different from the scope and aim of the argument of Jesus, to which we will now apply ourselves.

Let me begin by reminding you, that the passsage from the life of Jesus, with which we are now concerned, belongs to the last day of His public ministry, the Tuesday, as it were, before the first Easter Day. Let me remind you also, that that last day of His public ministry was emphatically a day of questions and of conflict; of questions propounded now by one party of bitter enemies and now by another, in the hope of either destroying his popularity or compromising Him with the Roman Government. Amongst these questions was the one which drew from Him this argument for man's immortality. The question was propounded by the Sadducees, the materialists or the secularists of the day: whose faith, or no faith, is described on a memorable occasion in the Acts of the Apostles, by contrast with the Pharisees, thus: "For the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit, but the Pharisees confess both." The question was intended to turn into ridicule, and reduce to the absurd, the common orthodox belief of the time in a future state: and as addressed to Pharisees, with their utterly unspiritual conceptions as to the nature of that future state, it would no doubt have its force and its sting. Apparently the question was one which had been tried by the Sadducees upon the Pharisees often before; and with such triumphant success, as to encourage the former to put their famous problem even to Jesus. "Last of all the woman died also: Therefore, in the resurrection, whose wife shall she be of the seven?"

We all know, how, in a moment and with a word, Jesus swept the whole web of pitiful Sadducean sophistry away.—"Ye do err, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God. For in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven." This, however, is not the matter for which I ask your attention now. Having the Sadducees before Him, He would not let them go until he had not only exposed the folly of their question, but had assailed the key of their own position. Without pausing, therefore, He proceeded thus: "But as touching the resurrection of the dead, have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? God is not the God of the dead, but of the living."

Before we attempt to analyse the argument and discover where its force lies, two or three matters deserve our attention. We are assured that it produced a great impression at the time, upon the bystanders,—upon the opponents of the Sadducees,—and even upon the Sadducees themselves. For the moment at any rate the Sadducees (St. Matthew tells us) were silenced. He pursues the narrative thus:—"But when the Pharisees had heard that He had put the Sadducees to silence, they were gathered together." Some Scribes, St. Luke says, who were present and heard what passed, could not conceal their satisfaction and their approval. "Then certain of the scribes answering said, Master, thou hast well said." His enemies began to feel, that it was not safe to put questions to a disputant of such matchless ability. "After that they durst not ask him any question at all." Deepest of all, it would seem, and most satisfactory, was the impression produced upon the common people. He was surrounded by a group of hearers, when the question of the Sadducees was propounded to Him, and the result on their minds is thus described by St. Matthew:—"When the multitude heard this, they were astonished at his doctrine." A distinguished commentator in a recent work on the Gospel says:—"This answer of our Lord to the Sadducees made a strong, and apparently a lasting, impression upon the Jews. It is substantially adopted, in a treatise on the Resurrection, by Rabbi Manasse Ben Israel, quoted by Keim, who says that the passage is very like this, but of later date, and resting certainly upon it." Putting all these hints and suggestions together, we shall certainly expect to find in the argument of Jesus a vein of thought, at once profound and popular,—going to the very root of the matter, yet carefully avoiding the subtleties of philosophy and metaphysics,—direct in its aim, and large and truly human in its scope. Of no common kind, surely, could that argument be, which at one and the same moment could command the admiration of scribes and the sympathy of a crowd. We address ourselves to the study of it with the keenest possible interest; bearing in mind, whose the argument is, and what its theme is, and how wide and deep the impression which it produced Applying ourselves to the argument thus, I fancy that our first feeling is not unlikely to be one of some perplexity, and even of disappointment. The argument is so compressed, through the necessities of the Evangelical narrative, that it is by no means easy to seize and firmly grasp the point of it. Were it not for the repetition of it in the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke, we should be exceedingly likely to miss its aim. Most happily for us, through the good providence of God and the inspiration of His Spirit, St. Mark and St. Luke have preserved the same striking incident, and have presented it in their pages with just enough of variety, just sufficient shifting of the point of view, to preserve us from mistakes into which it would have been so easy to fall; and to convert the flat plain photograph into the solidity and the reality of the stereoscopic picture.

The argument, we must remember, was addressed to Sadducees; that is, to men, not without education and intellegence, who denied "the resurrection of the dead," or, in other words, who denied "the immortality of the soul." For this is, unquestionably, what is really intended; and it is to this denial of immortality that the argument of Jesus is addressed. It is just possible that it might be fancied that the question at issue between the Sadducees and Jesus was, not the immortality of the soul, but the resurrection of the body,—meaning by the body, not that of which St. Paul says, "It is raised a spiritual body," but this material organism, compacted of flesh and blood, bones and sinews, which we lay decently and reverently in the ground, when the breath of life has gone out of it; and of which the same St. Paul says, "flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption." Let me say, in passing, that neither Jesus Himself, nor His Apostles, have committed the Christian Church to this doctrine of a resurrection of what we rightly call the "remains" of the departed, as an article of our Christian faith. It is, at the most, a pious opinion, which Christian people may hold, or not hold, as they please. This, however, only in passing. Now, to return to the argument of Jesus: He is addressing the materialists of his day on this great matter of the immortality of the soul: and, in order to convict them of error on this cardinal point, so completely as to reduce them to silence, it was necessary to choose, as 'basis' of the argument, ground common both to Him and to them. Now the Sadducees admitted the authority of the Five Books of Moses: but they refused to recognise the authority of anything, whether written word or oral tradition, outside those Five Books. Their contention was, that the immortality of the soul was not taught in those Five Books: and that, therefore, it was not to believed by the true followers and disciples of Moses, their great national leader, teacher, and Law-giver. The argument therefore, which would convict them of error, must find its starting-point within those Five Books. And so the argument of Jesus does. No Sadducee would deny, that the passage which Jesus proceeded to cite from the third chapter of the Book of Exodus, was of Divine authority. No Sadducee would cavil at the words with which Jesus introduced the quotation:—"Have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God?'

And what was it? "I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." Proof of immortality, contained in these words,—where, we naturally ask, is it? It is here, we know: but at what point,—lurking under what hidden form? At first, we are inclined to suppose, that the point of the argument lies in the words: "I am:" "I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob:" that for God to say this, "I am," not, "I was;" but "I am,' the "God of Abraham," centuries after the death of Abraham, implied that Abraham was still living: that he had passed unharmed through death into the life beyond. It is true, that, in St. Matthew's Gospel, the "am" of the "I am" is expressed; is not, therefore, necessarily, unemphatic. It is true, also, that the words which follow:—"God is not the God of the dead, but of the living," might seem, at the first glance, to suggest such an interpretation of the argument. But, the moment we turn from St. Matthew's Gospel to St. Mark's and St. Luke's, this view of the passage fails us; this explanation of the argument breaks down completely. The "am" of St. Matthew's "I am" disappears entirely from St. Mark's version and St. Luke's,—from St. Mark's in the original, from St. Luke's both in the original and in our English version of the original. St. Mark has: "And as touching the dead, that they rise; have ye not read in the book of Moses, how in the bush God spake unto him, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob:" the "am" of the "I am" being omitted in the original, as the italics of our English version tell us. St. Luke has: "Now that the dead are raised, even Moses shewed at the bush, when he calleth the Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." There is no trace at all of the "I am" here. What is left, as the common ground of the argument, in the narratives of all the three Evangelists alike, is simply the emphatic and (as Jesus teaches us) most pregnant phrase: "The God of Abraham and the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob," or, as it stands in the Book of Exodus, "The God of thy father, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob."

Let us pause for one moment, before we bend our minds to discover what secret of immortality is implied in this phrase. If the force of the argument of Jesus rested on the I am of St. Matthew's Gospel,—if what was meant was, "I am, at this moment, the God of Abraham; therefore Abraham still lives;" it is quite clear, that no conclusion as to immortality in general could be drawn from a premise so narrow and so individual. Add the names of Isaac and Jacob; go on adding names, as long as you will; still you can get no further than a conclusion of very modified and bated probability, such as this: "If these men survived death, and still live to God, why not others also? Why not we ourselves?" Such a lame and impotent conclusion as this could never have silenced the Sadducees then; could never have extorted the admiration of scribes; could never have produced so profound an impression upon the popular mind. From the narratives of the Evangelists it is perfectly evident, that the conclusion, which Jesus drew, was general, was universal. And this universal conclusion has found its way expressly into St. Luke's narrative; "He is not a God of the dead, but of the living: for all men live to Him."

We are now surely prepared to seize the true interpretation. The argument of Jesus rests for its force simply upon the phrase "God of thy father, God of Abraham, God of Isaac, God of Jacob." That phrase implied a certain relation between these men and God: and that relation implied a certain capacity in man, as man, a capability of communion with God, of prayer to Him, of trust and love and worship having Him for their object. This capacity, which manifestly and undeniably resides in man,—which differentiates him, even at his lowest estate, from the brutes which perish,—is (so Jesus argues) a pledge of his immortality. The being, who can cry to God "O God, thou art my God; early will I seek Thee; my soul thirsteth for Thee;" has that within him which can defy death,—is of such a nature as cannot be conquered by death. Of course the argument would go home with special force to those, whose proud boast it was, that they were the children of Abraham. But there is nothing in it which can limit its effect to the seed of Abraham, or debar the whole round world of men from the glory of the prospect which is thus opened to them. Every movement of the heart towards God, every aspiration, every prayer, every impulse to good, is thus, in the view of Jesus, a pledge of immortality. Add to this St. Paul's argument, and shall we not be prepared to understand and echo his statement, that our "Saviour Jesus Christ" hath "abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel?"

This being the argument of Jesus—it being so simple, so popular, yet at the same time so searching and profound,—we cannot wonder that it should have produced the impression, upon friends and foes alike, which we know that it did produce. Does it surprise and disappoint us by its very simplicity? Did we expect from the lips of the Son of Man some elaborate train of argument, such as might remain a landmark of philosophical research for the ages to come?—Well, let us consider for a moment, what such elaborate reasonings on this subject of immortality have done or can do for us. Two familiar specimens of the greatest human achievements in this direction will occur at once to our minds; one, the product of the ancient world,—the other of the modern. Let any one thoughtfully peruse Plato's immortal work, giving an account of that last conversation of Socrates with his friends—(and whether the conversation were actual or ideal makes no difference to my present purpose)—in which the Master, standing on the edge of death, strove to prove to his disciples the immortality of the soul:—or let him peruse the Chapter on a Future Life in Bishop Butler's "Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature":—and he will soon be satisfied, how little on such a subject arguments, the most erudite and elaborate, can avail to bring conviction to the mind. The doubt still comes back, after every effort to dispel it; and the master-pieces of philosophical genius, to which I have just made reference, prove their pre-eminence by nothing so much as their recognition of this fact. When all has been said, Bishop Butler can only claim for his argument, that it has the effect of establishing "the credibility of a future life;" can only affirm that his "observations remove all presumptions against a future state," and "prove to a very considerable degree of probability one fundamental doctrine of religion." In Plato's famous dialogue, there comes a point in the discussion between Socrates and his friends, at which, he says, a long silence ensued. The arguments of Socrates seemed to be victorious, and the battle of immortality appeared to be won. But the silence is presently broken by a restatement of doubts and difficulties, in which the whole previous train of argument disappears; and the Penelope web has to be woven over again, as fruitlessly as before. So, I think, it always has been; and so, I believe, it always will be. No philosophy, no metaphysics, no trains of reasoning, however learned and acute, have ever proved, or can ever prove, conclusively to the human intellect, the soul's immortality. However ingeniously and laboriously the Sisyphus stone be rolled towards the top of the hill, it will ever thunder back again into the valley, ere the summit is reached.

With all our hearts, then, let us thank our dear Lord Jesus Christ for adopting a different method;—for bidding us find in capacities, of which we are all conscious, the pledge of immortality. "Look within," He says, "not without. To look outside you for an evidence which is really within you,—to seek it in subtleties of intellect, and not in the voice of conscience, can have no effect but to perplex, bewilder, and sadden you. Trust that inner voice:—it will not deceive you. Look within, and know thyself, in the deep mystery of a nature truly supernatural; and thou shalt find there both the hope and promise of the future glory, and a light and a voice Divine which can guide thee along the path which leads to it."

This is a matter of such transcendant interest and importance, that it deserves a still closer and more exact consideration. I venture to say, that the arguments, both of the Anglican Bishop and of the Greek Philosopher, gain in strength and validity, just in proportion as they approximate, however remotely, to the method of Jesus;—become comparatively weak and worthless, just in proportion as they recede from that method. At what point, let us ask ourselves, does Bishop Butler's argument rise to anything like the height of his subject? Is it when he is arguing from the presumption implied in the word "Continuance,"— or from what he calls "the reason of the thing,"— or from the "analogy of nature," —or from our ignorance of what death is in itself, or from strange notions, more physical than metaphysical, as to "the bulk of the living being each man calls himself," and its size as compared with "the solid elementary particles of matter, which there is no ground to think any natural power can dissolve"? I fancy that we rise from the perusal of such arguments as these, with the feeling that they are all a mere "beating the air";—with a feeling too of surprise, slightly dashed with impatience if not with indignation, that so great a man should waste time on an array of arguments, whose ineffectiveness pre-disposes the mind, rather to reject, than to accept, the conclusion which he is seeking to establish. At one point, and at one point only, does he seem to hit the mark and make an impression upon us; and this, rather by the way and incidentally, than with a clear perception of the weight and importance of the argument which he is advancing. It is when he turns inwards and makes his appeal to consciousness; arguing that "since consciousness is a single and indivisible power,"—"since the perception or consciousness, which we have of our own existence, is indivisible, so as that it is a contradiction to suppose one part of it should be here and the other there"; therefore "the perceptive power, or the power of consciousness, is indivisible too; and, consequently, the subject in which it resides; that is, the conscious being." Whence the conclusion is obvious, that "our organised bodies are no more ourselves or part of ourselves, than any other matter around us"; and that their dissolution could "have no more conceivable tendency to destroy the living beings ourselves, than the dissolution of any foreign matter, which we are capable of receiving impressions from, and making use of for the common occasions of life." Now this appeal to consciousness,—what is it but a momentary adoption of the method, though not of the argument, of Jesus Christ?

And again, passing back, over a gulf of more than 2,000 years, from the Christian writer to the heathen philosopher, what shall we say? Is there, in the course of the work, any argument, which, whether in the form in which Plato himself presents it in his Phædo, or when translated into its modern equivalent, comes home with any force of conviction to our own minds? And, if there is, where is it to be found? It will not be found, I apprehend, in those passages in which Socrates is represented as producing definite proofs of the immortality of the soul,—resting, as these proofs so often do, upon purely verbal or logical subtleties; nor yet will it be found, I conceive, in any distinctively Platonic theories as to the nature of knowledge and the existence of ideas. No; it is not while we are listening to the arguments of the work, of whatever kind, that the hope of immortality grows stronger within us: nay, quite otherwise, I imagine. It is when we turn our thoughts from the argument to the speaker, that the man himself becomes his own best argument. It has been well said, "Socrates is himself more confident of immortality, than he is of his own arguments; and the confidence which he expresses is less strong than that which his cheerfulness and composure in death inspire in us." "His external elevation above his own situation, and the ordinary interests of life, create in the mind of the reader an impression stronger than could be derived from arguments, that such an one, in his own language, has in him 'a principle which does not admit of death.'" We can listen unmoved, or even with a smile of incredulity, to his proofs and evidences of the soul's immortality. But the smile passes into the deepest seriousness and the strongest sympathy of conviction, as we listen to the expression of his own hopes and faith, couched in such words as these:—"I am quite ready to acknowledge, that I ought to be grieved at death, if I were not persuaded that I am going to other gods who are wise and good (of which I am as certain as I can be of anything of the sort), and to men departed, (though I am not so certain of this last), who are better than those whom I leave behind; and therefore I do not grieve as I might have done, for I have good hope that there is yet something remaining for the dead, and, as has been said of old, some far better thing for the good than for the evil." "Are we to suppose that the soul, which is invisible, in passing to the true Hades, which like her is invisible and pure and noble, and on her way to the good and wise God, whither, if God will, my soul is also soon to go; that the soul, I repeat, if this be her nature and origin, is blown away and perishes immediately on quitting the body, as the many say? That can never be!" "Then, O my friends, if the soul is really immortal, what care should be taken of her, not only in respect of the portion of time which is called life, but of eternity! And the danger of neglecting her from this point of view does indeed appear to be awful. If death had only been the end of all, the wicked would have had a good bargain in dying, for they would have been happily quit not only of their body, but of their own evil together with their souls. But now, inasmuch as the soul is manifestly immortal, there is no release or salvation from evil except the attainment of the highest virtue and wisdom." Now to come under the influence of Plato's work from this its personal, and not its argumentative side, (and from this side alone, I venture to think can we come under its influence to any strengthening of the hope of immortality in ourselves), is at least to pre-dispose our minds for the argument of Jesus, which turns, as we have already seen, upon the simple fact, that there is in man that which cries out for the living God, and which only the living God can satisfy; that the thirst of the soul for God is the pledge of the soul's immortality; that the being, with whom God can enter into this relation of communion, whereby the Almighty and Eternal One becomes his God, has that in him, which can defy and conquer death.

It has been said, and well said, by one of the wisest and subtlest of English thinkers, "The one great and binding ground of the belief of God and a hereafter is the law of conscience." The appeal of Jeeus is not so much to a "law of conscience," as to something deeper and more fundamental still—the craving of the human spirit for God—the cry of the orphan soul to the Father; that cry which uttered itself in the presence of Jesus on the last evening of His earthly life, by the lips of the disciple, in the words: "Lord, shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us." That inner voice, be sure, does not deceive us, when it whispers to the doubting, desponding, troubled soul, that beyond this poor earthly life—sinstained and sorrow-stricken as it too often is—there is a better and a brighter life, to fit ourselves for which is the one all-important thing for us. Even Socrates, standing in the faint twilight of a Pagan world upon which the Sun of Righteousness had not yet risen could believe this; could risk all for this; could plead earnestly with his friends in those last moments of his life to do the same. We have a far better hope than it was possible for him to have, so that his example may well put us to shame. We have the words of Jesus, saying to Mary Magdalene on the first Easter Day, "Go to my brethren and say unto them, I ascend unto My Father and your Father, unto My God and your God." The dim hope of immortality, which even a Socrates could cherish, is by the life and death and resurrection of Jesus Christ converted into the assurance of that Father's house, of which He said, "In My Father's house are many mansions. I go to prepare a place for you." O weary and sorrowful souls, listen to Him; yea, come to Him; take His yoke upon you and learn of Him and be at rest. Then the future is yours, if not of this life, yet beyond. Then, All things are yours: whether Paul] or Apollos or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present or things to come; all are yours, for ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's.

Sermon by the Rev. D. J. Vaughan, M.A., Trinity College.
Sunday, April 18.

Luke xii, 57: "Yea, and why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right?"

At the close of that remarkable narrative which occupied us a week ago, we read, that "when the multitude heard this,"—heard the argument of Jesus addressed to the Sadducees in proof of the resurrection,—"they were astonished at his doctrine." "The "doctrine," or, as we should say, the "teaching," of Jesus arrested the attention of the hearers, made a deep impression upon them, compelled their admiration, amazed them by the force and mastery with which He spoke. Long before this, at the very outset of his public ministry, we read: "It came to pass, when Jesus had ended these sayings, the people were astonished at his doctrine: for he taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes." And now, at the very end of all, on the last day of his public teaching, the same evangelist makes a similar record in connection with an incident, unique in its kind and of singular and exceptional interest. What was said a week ago has not half exhausted the significance of the incident, nor the fruitfulness of the teaching of Jesus in connection with it.

Only on one other occasion, I think, do we read of any conflict or controversy between the Sadducees and Jesus. On that one other occasion, which (unlike this) is recorded only by St. Matthew, they are for a moment leagued in hollow alliance with their bitter enemies, the Pharisees, to make an attack upon Jesus. St. Matthew's account of the matter is this:—"The Pharisees also with the Sadducees came, and tempting desired him that he would shew them a sign from heaven." To which request the answer of Jesus was: "When it is evening, ye say, it will be fair weather, for the sky is red. And in the morning, it will be foul weather to-day: for the sky is red and lowring. O hypocrites, ye can discern the face of the sky; but can ye not discern the signs of the times? A wicked and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and there shall no sign be given unto it, but the sign of the prophet Jonas." And then, in the subsequent voyage across the sea of Tiberias, he took occasion to solemnly warn his disciples against "the leaven," that is, as He Himself afterwards explained it, "the teaching," of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees In this earlier encounter with the Sadducees, however, there was nothing specially distinctive: nothing, either in their request or in his reply, which was specially appropriate to them in their character as Sadducees. They shared both question and answer with the Pharisees; a common hatred having for a moment united those, who, in other matters and for other purposes, were the bitterest of opponents.

It is otherwise with the later incident. The temporary partnership with the Pharisees has been long ago dissolved; and the Sadducees appear in their true colours, and are dealt with strictly in their capacity as such. Now it is this, which gives that special and (as I believe) unique interest to the narrative, which describes the conflict of Jesus with the Sadducees, just at the most characteristic point of Sadducean teaching. However difficult it may be to define with precision the tenets of the Sadducees, it is beyond question that they represented, within the limits of the Jewish world, the sceptical tendencies of the age; and that, within those limits, they were the sole representatives of those tendencies. We may be right or wrong in describing them as materialists or secularists; but at any rate, they were the sceptics and free-thinkers of the time. The intellectual scepticism, as distinguished from the practical atheism, of the age, so far as the Jewish nation was concerned, was confined to the Sadducees; and only at that point, therefore, was it possible for Jesus to come into contact and into conflict with it. The incident, therefore, which is now under our view, has not only the singular merit of bringing out Christ's own argument for the immortality of the soul, but has also this, if possible, still greater interest for us, that it exhibits, for our guidance and instruction, his method of dealing with the sceptical tendencies of his own time; a method, which, we may be confident in advance, will be found to admit of many applications. Before we can come to these applications, however, we must make a brief study of the method.

It has often been observed that the reply of Jesus to the question of the Sadducees is more gentle in tone, and measured in language, than his reply to the question of the Pharisees and Herodians which immediately preceded this. There was a want of candour and frankness, there was an amount of artifice and insincerity, in that question about the tribute money, which well deserved the exposure and the rebuke of the counter-question, "Why tempt ye me, ye hypocrites?" In the case of the Sadducees, on the other hand, the reply of Jesus, while firmly exposing and rebuking their error, treats it as error only, and not as the deliberate falsehood of a conscious hypocrisy. The answer, as recorded by St. Mark, brings out, with remarkable clearness and precision, this particular feature of the method of Jesus. It runs thus:—"And Jesus answering said unto them, Do ye not therefore err, because ye know not the scriptures, neither the power of God? For when they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry, nor are given in marriage; but are as the angels which are in heaven. And as touching the dead, that they rise: have ye not read in the book of Moses, how in the bush God spake unto him, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? He is not the God of the dead, but the God of the living: Ye therefore do greatly err."

Why was it, one naturally asks, that Jesus dealt thus,—with this comparative leniency and tenderness,—with the scepticism of the Sadducees? There was nothing (as I apprehend) in the particular character of that scepticism itself, which called for, or could lay claim to, such comparatively lenient and gentle treatment. The spirit of it had nothing in common with much of the scepticism of our own day. There was no special seriousness in it, no pathos, no deep undercurrent of moral earnestness and real conviction. Dr. Keim, no mean authority on such a subject, speaks of the "extraordinary fondness for disputation which characterized the Sadducees"; affirms, that, "the one contended with the other, the scholar with the teacher," and that "by virtue of this spirit of contradiction, which turned debate into a mere trial of skill, they deserved more than any other Jews the name of those Greek sophists who defended everything and disputed everything." This, this spirit of debate and contradiction, does not suggest the notion of an unbelief which would gladly disown itself and revert to faith; suggests, rather, the notion of a levity which is content with itself, and which can find amusement in disputation even on the brink of the abyss. Certainly, the problem, which the Sadducees put before Jesus, looks more like jesting with serious things, than like strong convictions, gravely and most reluctantly arrived at.

Still there was something to be said for the Sadducees. Though the spirit of the books of Moses was against them; yet they had the letter on their side. It is a remarkable fact, that, familiar as Moses must have been through his long residence in Egypt with the doctrines of a future state and the immortality of the soul, he yet makes no appeal whatever to these doctrines, with the view of ratifying and affirming his own heaven-taught legislation. The omission was, I believe, on his part, intentional, divinely guided;—grew out of a deep conviction, to which his experience of Egypt had brought him, that it is quite possible to hold the doctrines of man's immortality and of a future state of rewards and punishments, without any impulse to virtue and righteousness in this life; that the only true foundation, upon which to build the virtue of the individual and the righteousness of a nation, is faith in the living and the righteous God, and in his eternal kingdom and present moral government of men. The Sadducees might also have pleaded with some show of truth, that even the language of psalmists and prophets is wavering on this subject of man's immortality; that it only very gradually deepens down towards conviction; that the formulation of the doctrine was the work, not of Moses, nor yet of psalmists and prophets, but of generations of scribes and lawyers long after the last of the prophets had been laid to rest. And they might have pleaded also with still greater force, or, rather, this might be pleaded for them, that the tenet of immortality, as formulated by previous generations and embraced by the Pharisees of the day, was so grossly vulgar and materialistic in its conception, that their own unbelief on the subject was but a natural rebound, an inevitable reaction, from a faith which no thoughtful person would care to hold. In this, I fancy, more than in anything else, lay the motive for the forbearance with which Jesus treated them. The Sadducees' unbelief was, to a large extent, the creation of the misbelief of the Pharisees. Few in number by comparison with the Pharisees, and without influence amongst the people, they were a protest, though a false protest, against the falseness of their opponents. There was something truly pitiable about their position, isolated and disliked as they were. Come as He was to seek and to save that which was lost, it was not in the Son of Man to speak one word of needless harshness and severity to an insignificant minority, for whose existence and for whose unbelief the dominant and (as they considered themselves) orthodox majority were so largely responsible. Rather, He would put out a strong and kindly hand to lift them out of the mire in which they were sunk, to set their feet upon the rock, to restore them to themselves and to God.

As to the actual argument which Jesus addressed to the Sadducees on this memorable occasion I need say little or nothing to-day, having spoken about it, as clearly as I could, a week ago. But I would ask you to notice now, that He makes no attempt to beat these sceptics down by force of authority. He condescends to argue with them; and to argue with them upon a ground common to Him and them; the weight and authority of which they would themselves be the first to acknowledge. He calls their attention to a phrase employed at the most critical moment of their national history, and bids them consider what it was that was implied in that phrase. He goes behind and beneath their scepticism; and makes his appeal through reason, to the conscience and soul within. To state His argument in the most general way, it amounts, I think, to this:—If God can reveal Himself to man,—if there is that in man which makes revelation possible—(and even the Sadducees did not deny the possibility of a revelation, nor the fact that such a revelation had actually been made to their forefathers and was faithfully recorded in the Books of Moses)—then there is evidently that in man, which makes communion or fellowship with God possible,—a relation between man and God, which compels us not to think so meanly of ourselves, as to suppose that death can undo us or be our destruction. Rather we do but drop in dying a "muddy vesture of decay,"—a tent or tabernacle (to use St. Paul's metaphor) torn and ruinous and dismantled; only to be so "clothed upon, that mortality may be swallowed up by life,"—only to enter "a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

Our study, then, of the method of Jesus Christ in dealing with the intellectual scepticism of the day, as represented by its only representatives within the confines of Judaism, namely, the Sadducees, yields us these results. In manner and outward form it was eminently calm, considerate, and even (I think we may say) conciliatory. There was not a trace in it of the threatening, overbearing, denunciatory tone, so often adopted by human disputants towards heretics and unbelievers; no appeal to the despotism of authority, to stifle doubt. And in substance, it seems to have availed itself of argument and reasoning, only so far as was necessary to parry, and as it were get within the inevitable fencing of the intellect, and thus to reach and elicit the testimony of the conscience and soul, that is of the man himself. In this fundamental aspect, indeed, it was only one particular application of the general method of Jesus in dealing with the perverseness, whether intellectual or moral, of human beings—the key to which is nowhere so succinctly stated as in the question of our text,—"Yea, and why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right?" For in the view of Him, who "knew what was in man" and who spake as never man spake" and who is Himself the Light of men, "The true light which lighteth every man," there is that within us, which has a natural affinity for truth and right; and which only needs to be duly interrogated on behalf of truth and right, in order to respond fitly and justly. And this was, doubtless, the reason why, on that earlier occasion to which I have already referred, when the Sadducees and Pharisees combined to desire him "that he would shew them a sign from heaven," He answered, as He did,—"A wicked and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign, and there shall no sign be given unto it, but the sign of the prophet Jonas;" that sign of the prophet Jonas being as Jesus Himself explained on a subsequent occasion, a moral sign, not a physical portrait, a prophet's appeal to the moral sense or conscience of his hearers, to repent and amend. Listen and judge:—"When the people were gathered together, he began to say, This is an evil generation; they seek a sign; and there shall no sign be given it, but the sign of Jonas the prophet. For as Jonas was a sign unto the Ninevites, so shall also the Son of Man be to this generation. The men of Nineve shall rise up in the judgment with the men of this generation, and shall condemn it; for they repented at the preaching of Jonas; and, behold a greater than Jonas is here."

Having studied, and (so far as one might dare to attempt to do so) defined, the method of our Lord Jesus Christ, both in form and substance, at its point of contact with the intellectual scepticism of his day; we may now venture to suggest a few of the more obvious applications of a subject, which (of itself, however it be handled) cannot fail to be of the highest interest for us all. For all, I presume, with one consent, would admit, that our own age is emphatically a sceptical age. The admission would be made in despair by some, in hope by others. But with whatever feelings we make the admission, none can doubt that the fact itself imposes the heaviest of responsibilities upon us. Those who have learned, by long trial, to love and reverence and adore Jesus Christ, as Saviour and Lord; and also to place the most absolute reliance upon Him, as Teacher and Friend, will feel perfectly confident, that no responsibility, however heavy, can await us, upon which he cannot shed light; no duty, however difficult, meet us, for which He will not afford the needed strength and guidance.

That our own age is emphatically a sceptical age, none, I repeat, will deny. But scepticism is a vague word, and covers many varieties, not merely of opinion, but of tone and feeling. The quality of the scepticism, with which we are conversant, is peculiar. It is not like that of the Sadducees, coarse and jesting. Nor yet is it like that, which Bishop Butler describes as characteristic of the English society of his own time; writing thus in the preface to his Analogy: "It is come, I know not how, to be taken for granted, by many persons, that Christianity is not so much as a subject of inquiry; but that it is, now at length, discovered to be fictitious. And accordingly they treat it, as if, in the present age, this were an agreed point among all people of discernment; and nothing remained, but to set it up as a principal subject of mirth and ridicule, as it were by way of reprisals for its having so long interrupted the pleasures of the world." No one, I imagine, would say that this was a true description of the scepticism, which we ourselves encounter in the society of the day, or in its current literature, or wherever it may meet us. On the contrary, the scepticism which crosses our path is, for the most part, grave and serious, and even respectful towards Christanity. It is, to no small extent, the scepticism of men, who would willingly believe, if they could; who have lost their hold upon the traditional Christianity, simply in consequence of the impression, that the evidence for it is insufficient. And this feature of the sceptical tendencies of our own time lends a kind of sorrowful pathos to the whole situation. It reminds us of the Psalmist's language: "All the foundations of the earth are out of course:" "If the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do?"

Now if our Lord Jesus Christ dealt so tenderly and forbearingly as he did with the scepticism of the Sadducees,—frivolous, by comparison, and jesting as that scepticism was; how much greater is the claim of the scepticisms of this nineteenth century to a similar treatment at the hands of those who find themselves called to resist it to the uttermost, to expose its fallacies, to convict it of error! Nor will this claim for forbearance and tenderness of treatment be diminished by the reflection, that, as the Pharisee was largely responsible for the existence of the Sadducee, so the Christian Church is largely responsible for the existence of the various forms of scepticism, which time after time come to the birth. I speak from an experience, extended over many years, and gathered chiefly by intercourse with the various classes, high and low alike, of one of our great centers of manufacturing industry, when I say, that I have been again and again impressed by the fact, that a very large proportion of the prevailing scepticism is due to mis-statements of Christian truth and misunderstandings of its real evidence, on the part of those who call themselves, and quite honestly call themselves, Christians; and that, if only these misstatements and misunderstandings could be got rid of, the ground would be cut away from under a very large proportion of the unbelief which at present afflicts and perplexes and saddens us. The responsibility which all thoughtful members of the Church of England have long ago learned penitently and humbly to acknowledge towards Dissent, as they reflect upon the past, has its counterpart in the responsibility of the whole Christian Church towards unbelief. And, for the future, we may rest assured, that, just as, in proportion as the Church of England is faithful to her great trust, the boundaries of Dissent will ever tend to contract, and fuse themselves, and merge in the Church: so, also, in proportion as the Christian Church, as a whole, is faithful to her still greater trust, the area of unbelief will narrow and shrink, until there is left nothing but a nucleus of blank immoral and antisocial atheism, from which every honest and earnest soul must instinctively recoil.

We are still very far, however, from any such consummation as this; and meanwhile the scepticism of our time knows how even to transform itself into an angel of light and so win an entrance into us. It is around us as an atmosphere which we cannot help breathing—depressing, enervating, poisonous. The enemy is within as well as outside us; and we must fight our own battle successfully, within if we would fight it to advantage also outside. With two or three considerations and reflections on this point, which I trust may be found helpful, I must leave this great subject with you.

Let us ask ourselves, then—we who hold firmly and loyally by the Gospel of Christ, yet are not insensible to the pressure from without, that would tear that Gospel from our grasp if it could—let us ask ourselves, I say, "What is it that we want? What more than we have do we want?" "More and stronger evidence," perhaps we reply, "overwhelming evidence for the resurrection of Christ perhaps;—or evidence for the genuineness and authenticity of the four gospels, out of which may be constructed a crushing rejoinder to all impugners of them:—or whatever it may be." This cry for evidence resolves itself at last, I think, into a cry for demonstration. We want, in short, the truth of Christianity demonstrated to us, so that there shall not be a word to be said on the other side. But what becomes, then, of the province of faith, whose essence is a choice—a choice determined more by moral than by intellectual considerations;—whose cry is "Lord, I believe, help Thou mine unbelief,"—and which, because it is this, saves and justifies? To grant what we fancy we want under this head of evidence would really be to destroy the highest and most ennobling aspect of the life that now is, as a field of moral probation, education, preparation for eternity. The question of Jesus, "Yea, and why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right?" would, under these circumstances, cease to have any meaning for us. If the great controversy of Christ with men could be settled once for all within the sphere of the intellect by a process of reasoning which should amount to demonstration, where would be the room for an appeal to conscience, to the soul to the moral sense, to choose Christ and be saved? And with this appeal gone, what would become of human nature? Would not its highest and noblest vocation be taken from it?

The actual position of the evidence for the greatest things that come within our ken and need here,—God, immortality, the Gospel of Christ,—is indeed perfectly consistent with the Christian idea of life (and a grand idea it is), as a solemn trust for God and for man, a vocation and ministry,—a moral probation, an education for eternity. To disturb the evidence to any considerable extent one way or the other,—to make it either very much stronger or very much weaker than it is,—would be to obscure, if not to negative, that idea, and so to run a terrible risk of diminishing the grandeur, and tarnishing the glory, of human life. For this life is, indeed, a grand and glorious thing, if only it be used according to its idea,—that is according to the intention of the Giver. Let those who stand upon the threshold of it remember this. We who can look back over some thirty years and more to the time when we were the occupants of the galleries yonder, know well (as we trace the career of contemporaries) how nobly life may be used; and also, alas! what a wreck may be made of it. But, to return for one moment longer to our subject:—let us try the matter out again once more in this way.

Let us present to ourselves, as clearly and distinctly as we can, what kind of thing human life would be without the risen Christ, and without the hope of immortality. Let us suppose the world to be satisfied that the slumber of Jesus in his grave had never been broken; that the proclamation had never gone forth, or was false—"He is risen; he is not here:" "Why seek ye the living amongst the dead?" Let us suppose too, that the life that now is, is confessedly and undeniably bounded by death, without the shadow of a hope beyond. And let us give full time for this absolute negation of our dearest hopes and faiths to operate so as to produce the full effect, the full moral and social effect, which it is in it to produce. For let it not for one moment be supposed that we can retain the results of Christianity, while surrendering its living principle,—or keep the end, whilst renouncing the means. Would not the effect, then, of this negation be the gradual deterioration and degradation of human life and human society; deterioration and degradation, gradual but certain,—all that is most precious and excellent in life and society being swept, as with the besom of destruction, slowly yet surely away? We should know the extent and the bitterness of our loss, only when we had suffered it. We need not look outside of us to answer our question: it is amply sufficient to look within. Here, too, the method of Jesus is the true method for us. Take any fragment of our own life to pieces, as it were; study it in the details of sorrow and joy, love and friendship, trial and temptations, moral victory and moral defeat, of which it is composed; and we shall soon see, how surely, to strike out the hope of immortality, faith in the crucified and risen Christ, and that communion with the Father which we owe to Christ and to realise which is to defy death;—how surely to strike out these, I say, is to kill every blossom of life, to destroy the root of goodness within, and to turn the whole scene in which we find ourselves placed into the dreariest of deserts. By way of a single example, where multitudes offer themselves, to make the matter more real to us—take the power of the cross of Christ to comfort and support the sorrowful, the afflicted, the bereaved; power so well ascertained, so universally acknowledged, even by those who hardly believe in Him as the Christ, the Son of the living God. What is it that invests the Cross with this singular and sovereign virtue? Withdraw the resurrection as the complement of the Cross; and what becomes of that virtue? Let the cry of the dying Saviour, "Father into Thy hands I commend my spirit" find no response beyond death, or at best a mere "peradventure" and "perhaps:" and what stay or refuge in sorrow does the Cross offer to us? The Cross, without the Resurrection to complete it, is, in truth, but as the plunge of a Roman Curtius into the gulf, with nothing but guess-work beyond; with no healing, saving virtue in it, therefore,—no power to soothe, to strengthen, to sustain. We can only wonder, and admire, and pass by.

To put the matter to ourselves in this way, to test it by this extreme test of its great moral and social results, to let it verify itself to us by these, will help us to realise, as I think nothing can so well help us to realise, how inexpressibly dear and precious the Gospel of Christ is to us, in spite of all passing doubts; how impossible it is to part with it; how to part with it is, indeed, to part with everything that makes life in the long run worth living,—purifying, ennobling, hallowing it. I say advisedly "in the long run," because I am well aware that, at the outset of life, there is often a joy in existence for its own sake, which is for the time self-sufficing. And when once this conviction has been brought home to us, the doubts and difficulties with which the intellectual atmosphere of the day is confessedly loaded fall into their proper place and assume their real proportions; as, in truth, but as the small dust of the balance, when weighed against the solid conviction, and the vehemence and the intensity of choice, with which we are prepared to cast in our lot with Jesus Christ, to obey his call, to take His yoke upon us and learn from Him.

"Thanks be unto God for His unspeakable gift." So St. Paul wrote, the gift evidently being the gift of His Son Jesus Christ. The more we reflect upon the gift the more shall we join St. Paul in earnestly thanking God for it. The more confident shall we also be of the final victory of the Crucified and the Risen One. His own words, in view of the cross, were, "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." Never, I believe, was that attraction more strongly felt than it is in these days, in spite of all appearances to the contrary. Never was His life more earnestly studied, never were His words more reverently pondered, than now. Of all this there can be but one result—a deeper, truer homage, a more devoted loyalty, a more intense and profound adoration, having Him, the Crucified and Risen, for their object. What better thing can I wish for this great seat of learning than that it should help forward this result;—that the piety and learning of its teachers, and the zeal and devotion of its scholars, when they quit this place to take their post in the world, should all cooperate in the one great work of giving glory to Christ, and bringing immortal souls to the foot of the Cross. Amen. In loving admiration for the munificent and noble spirit which, after years of absence, I find in this place, I would convert this wish (as in duty bound) into an earnest prayer.

THE UNIVERSITIES MISSION TO AFRICA.

At a meeting of the Royal Geographical Society on Monday night, the chair was taken by Sir Henry Barkly.

A very interesting paper was read by the Rev. Chauncy Maples, of the Universities Mission to Central Africa, descriptive of the country and peoples around and beyond the village of Masasi, founded by the Mission about three and a half years ago, the inhabitants of which consist of released slaves. Its locality, one of the most salubrious in tropical Africa is about half-way between Lake Nyassa and Zanzibar and the coast. Between the village and the coast there are dense forests, whole sections of which are composed of indiarubber vines. The fruit of these vines is luscious and grateful. The natives spend days in the recesses of the forest "gashing" the trees, the exudation from which produces the substance known as indiarubber. This they afterwards collect and convey to Lindi, where the merchants buy it at about a fourth of its value. The dark recesses and oppressive silence of these forests have gained for them a superstitious reverence. A very noticable feature of the Masasi district was the fertility of the soil. The cassava attains an enormous size, while the sorghum, sesamum, and rice grown there were famous for miles round. When the missionaries first settled in the country the tamarind, the cashew apple, and the banana were the only fruits of any importance that were indigenous, but they very soon introduced guavas, oranges, lemons, limes, pomegranates, custard apples, mangoes, pine-apples, jack-fruit, and other fruit trees from the coast. They had also tried to grow cinnamon, coffee, ginger, and cloves, with varying success; while last year a goodly crop of English vegetables—cucumbers, peas, scarlet-runners, vegetable marrows, and potatoes—was raised. Mr. Maples also described an exploratory journey by himself and Mr. Joseph Williams, in November, 1877, to the Rovuma and the Makonde country, when, at a place called Matola he heard of a man who wished specially to see the English visitors. A pompous old man, who spoke in a dignified manner, was presented to them. Over his right shoulder there hung an old coat, mouldy, partially eaten away, but still to be recognised as of decidedly English make and material. "Whose was it?" they thought, as he began with much mystery to tell of a white man who ten years ago had travelled with him to Mataka's town, a white man, he said, whom to have once seen and talked with was to remember for ever; a white man who treated black men as his brothers, and whose memory would be cherished all along that Rovuma Valley after we were all dead and gone. Then he described him—a short man with a bushy moustache, and a keen piercing eye, whose words were always gentle, and whose manners were always kind, whom as a leader it was a privilege to follow, and who knew the way to the hearts of all men. This was the description this African savage (as men speak) gave of Dr. Livingstone. [Cheers.] Then he showed the coat; it was ragged now, he knew, but he had kept it those ten years in memory of the giver, from whom it had been a legacy when they parted at Mataka's. To no one but to an Englishman would he part with it, but he let Mr. Maples have it as one of Livingstone's brothers (he said), and it now lies in the museum at Charterhouse School, a precious relic of one whose heart bled for Africa, and whose life was laid down in efforts for her redemption. [Cheers.] Mr. Maples and his young friend Mr. Williams during this journey paid a visit to a terrible and dreaded chief, named Machemba, who, at the head of a robber band, was one of the most bloodthirsty and cruel giants ever known. He is the same man of that name whom Dr. Livingstone wrote about in his journals, although at that time he lived 250 miles further from the coast. They were hospitably received, and Mr. Maples remonstrated with him on his ill-deeds, upon which he promised amendment. They had also a long conversation on the subject of the slave trade. "He is," said Mr. Maples, "the great slave-dealer of these parts. I myself have seen a caravan of five hundred Yao and Nyassa slaves, whom his headman was bringing him from Matarika's on the Lujenda. When he saw that we were well acquainted with his slaving propensities he honestly confessed it all, and added that so long as the Arabs brought powder and cloth and beads to his town, and only wanted slaves in exchange, so long would he continue the traffic; but he gladly assented when I asked him whether he would give ivory and copal and india-rubber in exchange for the European commodities if such things were asked for. It is clear to me that the demand for slaves must be absolutely stopped before the slave trade will be finally crushed out in the interior of Africa." They spent four days with Machemba, and then with some little difficulty persuaded him to let them leave him. He very liberally gave them a large lion's skin, and allowed them to carry off his own son and two other boys to be educated in their schools, and, as he said, as a pledge of goodwill. Almost the entire population of the place escorted them down the hill into the valley, where they fired a farewell salute, and retraced their steps to Masasi, which they reached in five days, having completed a circuit of about 250 miles, and having been away from home just three weeks. The friends they made on their journey did not forget them. Machemba now constantly sent him his most influential men to visit them and to ask them when they were going to send one of themselves to settle amongst his people. It was well understood and thoroughly believed that he would never again molest any one who had known and visited and made friends with the missionaries. Although he could not truthfully speak of him as a thoroughly reformed character, he could certainly say, on the authority of the people of Yaos, Makuas, and Makondes, that he was no longer the terror to the country that he was formerly.

A vote of thanks to the reader of the paper was moved and spoken to by the Rev. Horace Waller, Sir. F. Buxton, Colonel Grant, Mr. Randolph, and others.

The Chairman, in putting the question, which was heartily received, suggested that the otherwise extremely well-qualified men sent out by the Universities should also qualify themselves for taking astronomical observations, so that they might lay down with certainty the position of the places they visited. [Cheers.]

The reception of a letter from Mr. Thompson, the leader of the expedition of the Society since the death of Mr. Keith Johnstone to explore the country between the Lakes Nyassa and Tanganyika, was announced, but its reading was postponed until the next meeting.—Standard.

THE LATE REV. JOHN LAMB.—Intelligence yesterday week reached Cambridge of the sudden death of the Rev. John Lamb, M.A., rector of Blofield, Norfolk, and formerly Fellow and Bursar of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge. The deceased was a son of the late Dr. Lamb, Master of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and Dean of Bristol. He was educated at Caius, where he graduated in 1848 as 11th Wrangler in the Mathematical Tripos. He was in due course elected to a Fellowship, and was ordained in 1850 by Bishop Turton, of Ely. In 1858 he was appointed vicar of St. Edward's, Cambridge, which preferment he held until 1866. In 1860 he was elected Hulsean Lecturer. He subsequently became Bursar of the college. In 1876 he was presented by the college to the rectory of Blofield, Norfolk, which is returned in "Crockford" as of the annual value of £1,030, with a house.—Cambridge Independent Press.

At the conclusion of the dinner, after grace had been said, Professor Mayor called upon Rev. C. H. Collyns, of Wirksworth, formerly senior student of Christ Church, to address the meeting.

Mr. COLLYNS said that some ten years ago, his general health being in a very bad state, he consulted a physician, who said he was full of gout, and that he would never be better till he had had an acute attack, which would drive it out of his fingers and toes. To his enquiry whether there was no other cure, the physician replied that there was, but he doubted whether he (Mr. Collyns) would have the courage to try it. The second course was, however, adopted. It consisted in abstinence from all flesh food and alcoholic drinks, and other stimulants. The affect of this regimen was a rapid improvement in general health and the complete disappearance of all gouty symptoms. After ten years' experience of vegetarian diet, and at the age of 60, the speaker stated that he was better in health than he had ever been before, and stronger than when he was 30.

Professor MAYOR gave some account of his early life in India, and of his recent dietetic experiments in Cambridge. For some time past he had been a strict vegetarian.

Mr. HOLDING gave an account of his life in Madagascar, and of the perfect health he enjoyed while he adhered to a vegetarian diet.

Mr. ETHERINGTON strongly recommended vegetable food and abstinence from alcoholic drinks for tropical climates, founding his recommendation on his Indian experiences, having spent fourteen years in the plains of India without once visiting the mountains. For some months past Mr. Etherington and his family have flourished upon vegetarian diet in Cambridge.

Mr. MONK astonished the company by stating that he had drank nothing for eighteen months. Mr. Monk lives upon milk porridge, biscuits, fresh fruit, and the like, but never employs a drinking vessel, or touches flesh food, and he has enjoyed perfect health since he adopted this mode of life.

Mr. CHALMERS rose to express to Professor Mayor the thanks of the guests for the sumptuous entertainment which he had provided, and gave some account of his early days spent in the north of Scotland, eleven miles from a butcher's shop.

The guests departed at about 10.30, expressing a general opinion that they would never require flesh if they could always fare as they had done that evening; but before departing, several gave in their names as associates of the Vegetarian Society, pledging themselves to take in the Dietetic Reformer (2½d. monthly, post free), and to advocate simplicity of diet, though not necessarily to abstain from flesh.

Professor Mayor proposes to start a higher order of associates, who shall promise to take meat only once a day.—Cambridge Independent Press.

GREEK SCULPTURE.

On Tuesday afternoon, at 2.15, in the Fitzwilliam Museum, Mr. Waldstein delivered the first lecture of his course on Greek Sculpture. He was going, he said, to treat the subject from the point of view first of Art, next of Plastic Art, and lastly, of History. The art of the Greeks was a great reality, growing as their life grew, influencing and influenced by it. It was to them a native language, capable of enshrouding their highest thoughts and their noblest aspirations. The right place to understand it was under the blue sky, or the shadow of the temple porch; buried in the gloom of museums it has lost that which gave it its life—the nature from which it took its rise. The tendency of the Greek mind was specially towards Plastic Art. They wanted symbols to express both their faith and their delight. They regarded things as they are, contemplated them, saw the life that was in them, and this life expressing itself in form seemed to them the secret of the whole. The result of our modern life and modern system of education has reversed this feeling. We may be said to have had our associative faculty developed out of proportion, and at the expense of the contemplative. Hence music, which appeals like language to the ear, has grown ever stronger; but sculpture has faded like blades of bitter grass in a desert of sand. The Greeks bridged over the gulf that severs man from nature by humanising the latter and naturalising the former. Hence their delight in natural beauty manifested itself in a tendency to anthropomorphism. They did not, like the Orientals, try to represent their gods, their conceptions of natural or divine force, with bodies other than human, if it might be higher than human. They thought rightly that the greatest glory they could render to whatever they delighted to honour was to clothe it in a body like those which they saw about them, endeavouring only to make that body perfect in its kind, and glorious in its perfection. They shrouded their gods in the form of perfect men; and so doing they were led along the right road through nature and ever upwards. The lecturer then went on to contrast the Greeks, the Romans, and the Moderns, he touched on the various incidents to be found in the conditions of climate and natural features in Greece conducive to art; and brought his lecture to a conclusion by an analysis of the constitution and life of the state which aided the growth of a feeling for beauty, and a tendency for that feeling to find expression in the Plastic Arts.

The lectures will be continued on Tuesdays and Fridays at the same hour. They are perfectly open, and the 'cap and gown' is not required.

CONFERENCE OF COOPERATORS.

A meeting of members of the University to explain the principles of the Society of Cooperatives, was held yesterday afternoon. A large number of ladies, including Miss Clough, of Newnham Hall, were present, and Professors Stuart, Seeley, Caley, and Messrs. Sedley Taylor, H. Sidgwick, Oscar Browning, W. Garnett, G. H. Rendall, Rev. Coutts Trotter, Rev. V. H. Stanton, Rev. R. Burn, W. H. Hudson, J. E. C. Weldon, Colonel Wale and others, with a deputation of working men.

Professor Stuart having introduced Mr. Tom Hughes, Q.C., and Mr. Hodson Pratt,

Mr. HUGHES said he had been attending that day a district conference at the store in Fitzroy Street, Cambridge, as a representative of the Central Board of Co-operatives, which represented above 960 Registered Friendly and Industrial Societies from all England.

The members of these societies number 490,000, the business done amounts to 18½ millions; the profits made and available for members are upwards of 1½ millions per annum, and the savings out of the profits up to date of last report amounted to about 5½ millions. The movement was a working class movement, and he thought it the most important of the societies that were trying to raise the standard of the poor.

In 1850 trading societies organized by the poor were entirely outside the law, but in 1851 the first Industrial Societies Act was passed. The money raised had been invested in ready money purchases of groceries, haberdasheries, &c. The movement had largely assisted to educate the working classes in business habits and principles, but it was still only in its infancy.

The manufactory or "Family Stores" of M. Godin was a notable instance of the results of philanthropic conduct and was an instance of the highest result of co-operation. Here the speaker exhibited a view of the building which shewed a great contrast to the small store in Fitzroy Street, Cambridge, comprising a park, crèches, common dining rooms, &c., besides private apartments for the members.

The Cambridge district was backward in organizing branch societies and the existing societies were organised on only a small scale: but the facts nevertheless were very encouraging. He had found, however, a want of scientific accuracy of method in the book-keeping department and hoped that the people would be found able and willing to render the society some assistance.

Mr. Hodson Pratt represented a little propagandist society—"the Guild of Co-operators," which had been productive of very great benefit in the North of England. His Society much wished to have the assistance of men of leisure, education, and social influence, to spread the principles of the Society in the Southern Counties, which he considered less intelligent and less reliant than the Northern.

A recent meeting at Exeter Hall had called attention to the Society, and he was glad to have an opportunity of explaining the advantages of working class co-operation, and he believed that both rich and poor would be benefited, if means could be obtained of teaching them how to work together.

The disciples of Denison Maurice had greatly assisted the movement by their advice. He had himself been intimately connected during the last 15 years with the movement for establishing Workmen's Clubs, and found that while workmen deprecated any assumption of superiority, they were most ready and willing to receive that advice, which came with a larger experience than many of themselves could possess. He hoped that the younger members of the University would make themselves acquainted with the movement, and endeavour to assist it by a kind word or otherwise, when they came to fill their several positions in future life.

It was in the spirit of social reform that the 28 weavers of "the Rochdale Pioneers" had declared that 2½ per cent. ought to be set aside out of the profits of each society for the education of its members.

Mr. HODSON PRATT then suggested that the audience should procure tracts setting forth the aims and methods of the society, and that they should become members of the Cooperative Guild (subscription 1s. a year).

Several questions were then put to the speakers, who in reply gave some details of the causes which have led to the failure of most of the productive cooperative societies in the past. A short discussion followed as to the possibility of undergraduates becoming members of and taking part in the business of the co-operative stores already existing in Cambridge.

The Cambridge Review:

A JOURNAL OF UNIVERSITY LIFE AND THOUGHT.

No. 19.] WEDNESDAY, APRIL 28, 1880. [PRICE SIXPENCE.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

The Commissioners have made an announcement to the Senate with regard to a proposed statute for the creation of a Degree of Doctor in Letters. They propose that students in letters, who, having already taken a degree in Arts, Law, Medicine or Surgery, have given proofs of distinction by some original contributions to the advancement of learning, and have done all that is required by the statutes of the University, may be admitted to the title of Doctor designate in Letters, and shall afterwards be created Doctors at the time prescribed by the University.

The meeting of the British Medical Association, which is to be held at Cambridge in August, will be presided over by Professor Humphry. A considerable number of leading members of the medical profession have expressed their intention to be present, and it appears likely that the meeting will be unusually well attended. Some of the Colleges have placed their vacant sets of rooms at the disposal of the visitors. The business of the meeting will, it is believed, be conducted in the Senate House and in the New Museums and Lecture Rooms. Various hospitable schemes of entertainment, such as the lighting of the Fitzwilliam by the electric light for a soirée, a garden party in King's, a conversazione in St. John's, and so forth, are under discussion. The Union has already voted the granting of the privileges of visitors without introduction to those who attend the meeting.

Amongst the 15 candidates for the Fellowship of the Royal Society we notice the names of Mr. Charles Niven, Trinity, Mr. H. M. Jeffrey, St. Catharine's, and Mr. J. F. Moulton, Christ's.

Several old Cambridge men have been among those who have received the honours distributed by the outgoing Ministry. Sir Ivor Guest and Mr. Montagu Corry have been raised to the Peerage, and the late Home Secretary, the Right Hon. R. A. Cross, has received a Baronetcy, and has been made a G.C.B. All three are members of Trinity College.

At the Graduation Ceremony held at Edinburgh University last week, the honorary degree of LL.D. was conferred on Mr. Frederick Pollock, late Fellow of Trinity, the joint editor of Professor Clifford's collected Essays.

The plans for the Union of King's and St. Catharine's colleges are at an end, the latter college having refused to entertain the proposal.

We are glad to notice that the Fishmonger's Company have made a grant of 100 guineas to the building fund of Girton College. The Brewer's Company have contributed £100 towards the same object; and the Clothworker's have voted 100 guineas a year for 3 years.

Canon Farrar attracted a large crowd to St. Mary's on Sunday; the building being so full that many undergraduates were refused admittance. As this was the case, it seems a pity that all the available space was not utilised; and also that the doors should not have been opened till a quarter before two. The alteration in the position of the pulpit is a good one.

On Friday, the 23rd, the day of the Annual Inspection of the University Rifle Volunteers, the Officers of the Corps entertained at dinner, in Corpus Christi College, the Vice-Chancellor, Sir Watkin Williams-Wynn, and Colonel McKay, the Inspecting Officer, who is in command of the Eastern Military District.

In our last number we omitted to notice that four members of the "Greek Syndicate" abstained from signing the Report. These were the Vice-Chancellor, Prof. Westcott, Prof. Mayor, and the Rev. G. F. Browne.

On Thursday last, Bret Harte gave a lecture at the Guildhall, on "Californian immigration," or "the Argonauts of '49." The lecture was as amusing as it was instructive: an account will be found in another part of our columns.

The experiment of a Vegetarian Banquet in Cambridge is to be repeated on Thursday fortnight. Mr. Frank Newman is expected to attend, and preparations are being made for a large party. We hear that tickets are to be issued at one shilling each.

On Saturday last, a meeting of the leading athletic clubs in England, was held at the Randolph Hotel, Oxford, under the presidency of B. R. Wise. Esq., (President O.U.A.C.) The clubs present formed themselves into an Amateur Athletic Association, and a committee was appointed for its management. Various other resolutions were passed, condemning the sale of prizes by amateurs, limiting the value of such prizes to ten guineas: not to offer any "value" prizes (i.e. cheques on tradesmen), and the definition of an amateur was extended to include "mechanics, artisans, and labourers."

The Organ Recitals in Trinity College Chapel will be given on the following days:—Wednesday, April 28th, Mr. C. V. Stanford; Monday, May 3rd, Dr. Naylor, (Organist of All Saints', Scarborough); Friday, May 7th, Mr. Parratt, (Organist of Magdalene College, Oxford); Tuesday, May 11th, Dr. Gladstone, (Organist of Norwich Cathedral); Saturday, May 15th, Mr. Stanford; Thursday, May 20th, Mr. Alan Gray; Saturday, May 22nd, Mr. Stanford; Monday, May 24th, Mr. G. F. Cobb; Thursday, May 27th, Mr. Stanford; Saturday, May 29th, Mr. F. Dewberry. The Recitals will commence at 3.30 p.m., on each occasion.

A concert will be given in the Newnham School Room, on Friday next, at 8 p.m., in aid of the Fund for the Restoration of St. Botolph's Church, at which several ladies and members of the University have promised to assist.

THE TRAINING OF TEACHERS.

In the last number of the Review Mr. E. C. Price asks what the University of Cambridge is doing with regard to examining teachers and granting them certificates of theoretical and practical efficiency. As secretary of the syndicate appointed by the University for these purposes, I propose to give a short account of its operations. A number of memorials had been addressed to the University complaining of the want of systematic training for teachers, and asking the University to do something to supply the deficiency. The memorials were published in the Reporter in November, 1877, and a syndicate was appointed to consider them on Feb. 7, 1878. Their first step was to issue a circular to the memorialists, to head-masters and mistresses and other persons interested in education, asking for suggestions or for a decided scheme for carrying out the purposes of the syndicate. Answers were received from a large number of those addressed, and in May the syndicate was able to come to the conclusion that instruction in the principles and methods of education and teaching should be provided by the University, and that an examination should be arranged for those who have attended upon such instruction, or who are or have been engaged in the actual work of teaching. They thought that the University could not at present give instruction in practical work, but it might test and certify to the efficiency of practical skill acquired elsewhere.

A detailed scheme embodying these views was completed in November, 1878, and was approved by the Senate in the following April. By it a managing syndicate was appointed for three years, "to organise a course of lectures on the theory, history and practice of education, and to organise and superintend examinations in the same subjects, and to award certificates of proficiency as the results of the examinations." The syndicate was also empowered to inspect Training Colleges and to give certificates to their students.

These powers were very soon put into exercise. In the October term a course of lectures on the history of education was delivered by Mr. Quick; in the Lent term Mr. Fitch lectured on the practice of education; and Mr. Ward, of Trinity, is now lecturing on the theory. The lectures have been largely attended by men and women. An examination will be held in London and at Cambridge on June 22 and 23, at which certificates of theoretical knowledge will be awarded to those who deserve them, and the Training College at Bishopsgate will probably be inspected at the same time. Certificates of practical efficiency will only be awarded after a year's practical work in a school, except to pupils of training colleges. Those only are admitted to the examination for certificates who have passed certain preliminary examinations approved of by the syndicate. This is not the place to discuss the general advantages which schoolmasters will derive from studying the theory and practice of their profession. Suffice it to say that there is no reason why English schoolmasters should neglect assistance which their brethren of all other civilized countries are accustomed to value highly. It may have more effect to state that the provision of University certificates will in all probability be much esteemed by head-masters in search of assistants. Indeed, the head-masters of eleven public schools have announced that they will give special weight to the University certificate in the appointment of masters, and many others have pronounced themselves generally favourable to the scheme. It is not unreasonable to hope that this enterprise is a new departure in the history of English education, but its success must depend mainly on the cooperation of Cambridge men who intend to devote themselves to the profession of teaching.

POOR STUDENTS.

It is, I believe, generally supposed in the outside world that a University education with all its attendant advantages is a luxury only attainable by the wealthier classes, unless, indeed, in an exceptional case some poor student has been able by the possession of unusual ability or singular perseverance to "break his birth's invidious bar," and overcoming all obstacles, to win for himself the prize. Though this opinion is happily not strictly true, yet its general correctness will not be disputed by many, and it must be admitted that in her treatment of poor students our University is far from realising her ideal as one of the great educational centres of the nation. But now that recent changes have made it evident that the leading spirits of the University are growing day by day more alive to the necessity of modifying University institutions in conformity with the wants of the age, it is perhaps not an unreasonable hope that some plan may soon be devised to supply our shortcomings in this respect, a plan which will ensure greater help and more encouragement to poor students, and enable those to participate in the admitted advantages of a University education who are now only precluded from profiting by them through their inability to provide the necessary funds. In country parsonages and city terraces there are many such even now, and to their ever increasing numbers will surely be added the fruits of the newly-established system of national education, as it spreads through the land and makes its results felt amongst us. To such as these the chance of a University education will be an inestimable benefit, and their presence in Cambridge can hardly fail to be of the highest value both to the intellectual and social power of the University.

At the present time, as far as I am aware, the only direct help that is given to such students here consists of the sizarships which exist in several colleges, particularly at St. John's and Trinity, and sundry minor aids in the shape of small exhibition funds at the disposal generally of the various college tutors. Indirectly, perhaps, considerable assistance is afforded by the exhibitions granted by many of the city companies and other charitable bodies, but this of course lies outside the present subject. While it may be readily allowed that the aid given by the sizarships and exhibition funds referred to has certainly done a large amount of good, and has given a University education to many who would otherwise have been precluded from it, yet they have sometimes, if not frequently, been misapplied, and they must in any case appear both too inadequate and too unsystematic to suffice for the necessities of the case; and if the University is to do her duty thoroughly in the matter, some better scheme must be devised and carried into execution. In the first place steps should be taken by the colleges separately, or by the University, to provide the necessary funds: this might be done either by the remission of tuition, hall, and other charges, or by the establishment of an adequate exhibition fund from the revenues of each college, which will be more usefully thus employed than if devoted to the maintenance of superfluous professors and unneeded readerships; or if it seemed more advisable, perhaps both of these methods might be adopted. It is perhaps impossible for me to form an estimate of the amount that would be required for the full working of the scheme, but doubtless the experience of a year or two would furnish sufficient data, and in any case it may be confidently anticipated that the outlay would be fully repaid by the results of the experiment. Whether the administration of the fund when established should be under the control of the University or left to the management of individual colleges is a matter of detail, but probably the former plan would be found in many ways the most satisfactory. As to the method of distributing the fund here outlined, considerable freedom of action is no doubt desirable, and the plan to be adopted—whether grants should be awarded supplementary to scholarships, or exhibitions gained in open competition, or whether a special examination should be established for the purpose—must in great measure depend on the circumstances of the case. Still, however these details were arranged, there are some principles which are never to be lost sight of in awarding help. Care must be taken that assistance is only granted to those who are really in want of it, and also that no more is given than is actually required. This consideration is obviously of the first importance, yet at the same time it certainly presents the greatest practical difficulty. Family affairs and private circumstances are so intricate and involve so many varied interests that it is almost if not quite impossible to adopt one uniform standard or to lay down any one hard and fast line in dealing with them. It may, however, perhaps be safe to say in general terms, that those alone should be considered eligible for help who produce evidence satisfactory to the authorities that their parents or friends are, in the main, unable to contribute to their University expenses, and that therefore in default of help they cannot enter on their University course. Those would necessarily be ineligible whose income from school or college or elsewhere, together with any exhibition which might thus be granted to them, exceeded some fixed sum, say perhaps £130 or £140 per annum; an amount which, though it may seem to some rather short allowance, is at Cambridge sufficient with economy to enable a man to meet the necessary expenses of college life.

Poverty, however, though of course a sine qua non, is hardly sufficient of itself to warrant the bestowal of any University or college assistance; the possession therefore of an adequately high standard of intellectual ability and attainments must be held equally indispensable if a candidate is to make good his claims to help or consideration. The reasonableness of this requirement will, I conceive, hardly be disputed, for few will be found to contend that a college or a University should contribute out of its own funds to the maintenance and education of those who are intellectually unfitted to profit by the teaching it provides, or that it is at all desirable to raise from the poorer classes those who are by nature unable to exercise an active influence on the persons with whom their after life may bring them into contact. Moreover the avenues to higher work in the country are already so thronged with the crowd of mediocrities that it would only be mistaken kindness to place such men in a sphere for which they were not qualified, and in which they were naturally incapable of holding their own. Hence it is evidently necessary to fix some reasonable standard of intellectual power; but what this standard should be is a question the decision of which allows room for considerable difference of opinion. At any rate the examination which tests the mental capabilities of the candidates should be as wide and comprehensive as possible, and should include all the various branches of learning recognised by the University. As far, too, as may be practicable, both prepared and unprepared work should be set, to gauge both the abilities and industry of the candidates; an arrangement, moreover, which might not only prove useful in the many small schools of the country, but also helpful to those private students whose industry and patience at present so often go unrewarded. In the great majority of cases it will certainly be desirable to require a reasonable anticipation of attaining a fair honours degree; yet at the same time cases may occasionally arise where the candidate would better content himself with an ordinary degree; but from such a first-class in the pass examinations may fairly be exacted. The renewal of all assistance granted should always be conditional on good conduct as certified by the proper University and College authorities, and generally it may be advisable to make the certificate depend on a good place in the various examinations which have to be undertaken, a regulation which would largely assist in forming steady and industrious habits, and at the same time not give cause for undue apprehensions.

It will furthermore be most desirable that all assistance and help be given privately, and that the recipients should not be publicly made known. Though at Cambridge the influence and prejudices of wealth have largely disappeared, or rather have never been seriously felt, yet it is still undesirable that a man should be publicly marked as a "poor student": no man need ever be ashamed of his poverty, and the more "poor students," we have at Cambridge the better, but they will get on quite as well if the fact is unknown, and if they are allowed undistinguished and unrecognised to walk where and how they will in the crowded ways of undergraduate life. If these three main principles are jealously kept in view in the operation of the scheme, it may confidently be trusted that its success in every particular will be assured, and the faults and shortcomings of the present system, or rather want of system, will reproach us no more. Should it, then, be found practicable to initiate and carry into execution some definite scheme, such as the one here faintly sketched, for assisting those deserving students who now are often prevented from joining us, or who, if they do venture on so doing, come up on faith and subsist, if they subsist at all, on hopes and expectations; if something be done to add to our numbers such as these, the University will have taken one more great step towards her goal, and will have done much towards fulfilling her high office as one of the great Educational centres of the English people, an office she does not adequately recognise so long as she permits that poverty which is the destruction of the poor, to prevent some of England's best and perhaps ablest sons from enjoying the high education she is so well able to bestow. The leaders of liberal reforms in the University have already, by securing the affiliation of local colleges, done something towards realising the great end we all, I trust, have in view, and it may surely be hoped that their success will lead them to conceive and carry out a plan by which many poor students may be enabled to share our advantages who are at present prevented by causes over which they have no control. Then, and then only, when her benefits shall have been placed within the reach of all classes of the community, from the highest even to the lowest, will Cambridge be in reality, as well as in name, a national University in the highest sense of the word.

"TRAINING."

Training is a special preparation undergone for the better performance of some athletic feat; such at least is the almost universally adopted modern interpretation of the term. What training ought to be is quite another affair, to be discussed later. We find the earliest records of physical training among the Greeks. The Greeks aimed at a perfect culture of mind and body, and seem to have believed to a great extent that a really healthy mind could not exist in an imperfect, uncultured body: this is not an article of faith in modern creeds, which rather say "Take care of the mind and the body will take care of itself." Destitute of any scientific knowledge on the subject, they could not help observing that the human frame might be very considerably improved by a system of carefully regulated exercises: an individual thus improved was much more likely to be a good citizen, was much more fit to meet the exigencies of life—more especially fit for war: and though, since Darwin and Wallace had not yet arisen, they knew nothing of "Survival of the Fittest" or "Heredity," they must have noticed that the children of healthy parents were usually themselves healthy. Partly to give a motive and impulse for this course of training, partly to test the progress made, and partly, of course, as a bond of national union, the great games were instituted. The Greeks held the games to a great extent for the sake of the training, the modern athlete trains merely for the sake of the games.

Sports of various kinds seem to have been practised in England from time immemorial, but no systematised training of any sort seems to have been known until almost modern times; such training when it was introduced was strictly confined to professionals; amateur performances bringing with them amateur training were still more modern, though Captain Barclay Allardice did his historical 1,000 miles in 1,000 hours in 1809.

The example of amateur competitions was set by the 'Varsity Boat Race in 1829; the Wingfield Sculls were held in 1830: amateur athletics were much later, the first Inter-University meeting being held in 1864, the first amateur championship in 1866.

In order that a man might have the necessary activity and endurance for the severe exertion of the competition, that he might do a "good performance," and that without injury to himself, he adopted a system of diet and exercise, and this system was called training. Though the training code has since been entirely revised, the object remains the same—to get a man as "fit" as possible for a certain event. A man is going to run or row in the College, University, or Inter-University sports or races: he pays some attention to diet, abjures his pipe, gets up early and goes to bed early, and does some hard work for a short time each day on the path or on the river. The race over, having perhaps gained κῶδος or a "pot," he goes out of training—rather he goes to the very opposite of training: this is, of course, not always the case, but is frequently: and to this going out of training many of the so-called evils of training are to be attributed; many more are due to the sudden commencement of training; everything is done in a hurry.

The question arises, does such training do any good beyond a temporary one? A man may have helped to win what the papers call "the blue ribbon of the Thames," or he may have secured the "odd event," but he has done himself very little, if any, permanent good; some people will say he has done himself harm. The training is much too sudden; it lasts so short a time, and everything is so subordinated to the end in view, that very little good is really done: above all it is so partial.

Rowing probably affords the most complete exercise of all forms of athletics: but that is by no means perfect; there is much less muscular work in rowing than is usually supposed, and that limited in distribution: perhaps one of the greatest objections is that eight men are supposed to have no individual idiosyncrasies, all are expected to want the same amount of work, the same habits, the same everything: the runner can at least consult his own constitutional peculiarities.

Training, then, as at present understood, is merely the means to a temporary end, the preparation for an impending contest.

When we speak of mental training we do not mean the hurried "cram" for a too long neglected examination, the work of a lazy man's last term, but a regulated progressive course, having for its aim the development of the intellectual powers; this mental training begins early, often woefully early, and ends only with life in many individuals. Precocity in knowledge is encouraged, physical culture is neglected.

At a time like the present, when most of the educated world lives fast, when the railway is a type of life, when the competition for life is so keen, when beyond all times there is need of a healthy system, for hard brain-work exhausts the system more than hard body-work, everything is done for the perfecting of mind—little or nothing for the perfecting of that on which the brain so much depends.

But surely at the Public Schools, at the Universities there is no want of opportunity for physical culture? There can be found every form of exercise and amusement known. The answer is that by no means all the world can have the advantages of Public Schools and Universities; at the latter, a man must to a great extent specialise in sports (the partial character of such forms of sport has before been noticed), and unless he is fairly good in some branch of sport he will not care to take it up—so much has competition permeated the whole system of exercises of body as of mind. The result of athletics is rather to keep up an existing state of health than to supply such a state to those who have it not already. It would seem then, that there is a need for a system of true physical training, especially during the early period of life; such a system would not, of course, abolish athletic training for a particular contest, but would render such subsequent training easier and more effective.

The question is one that has received considerable attention of late years, the result of it being the foundation of gymnasia at many public schools, and at the Universities, also the introduction of physical training in the army.

"THE GREAT UNIVERSITY THAT HAS BUT ONE RIVAL."

Such is the title under which the special correspondent of the Philadelphia Weekly Express describes a week's sojourn at Cambridge, and there are some points of interest in the views of this intelligent stranger. He is writing from Emmanuel: and accordingly opens his letter with an eloquent account of "the historic walls from whence the germs of civil freedom, and that education which alone can protect and perpetuate it, were borne to our New England,"—"that Puritan foundation established in faith away back in the stormy days of the Commonwealth,"—"to which foundation," the correspondent adds, with a truly American bathos "some of our best New England and New-York families have sent their sons for their collegiate education."

Our correspondent then proceeds to describe Cambridge as it now is. Like most strangers to the town he is struck by the arrangement of its streets which he describes thus:—"If you will take seventeen silver dollars and half dollars and throw them down on a piece of white paper irregularly but rather close together, draw circles with a pencil around each of the coins and then connect these circular enclosures by convenient lines indicating streets and walks, you will have a pretty good idea of the plan of Cambridge town. It is what in Pennsylvania is called the 'campus' of the several colleges."

In one respect he was disappointed with Cambridge. He was surprised at the 'small territorial plant' of the Colleges which "in our imaginations rise in magnificent proportions and seem to stand in princely domains of glebe and forest." At the same time however he makes a comparison highly favourable to Cambridge, between the exquisitely kept grounds of English colleges and the extensive but entirely unadorned territories of those in America. In this respect, as well as in many others, he is painfully struck by the meagreness and barrenness of the American system, the nature of which is illustrated by the following advertisement which appears in another column of the same paper:

Digitized by Google

BOYS WAKED UP AND SET AGOING. NO EXPENSIVE CLAP-TRAPS. Thorough work and moderate charges. BENJAMIN MASON'S School for Boys, Yonkers, N. Y.

Then follows a description in detail of Cambridge life:—"Each section or house of six or eight suites has its own separate servants, with their own quarters, to whose services each fellow or student has equal rights. This staff consisted generally of a man and wife or small family, who can between them readily cook the breakfasts, prepare the morning baths, brush the clothes, black boots and run the errands of the six or eight single gentlemen who form the family. Some of these servants, as is always the case around a college, become quite scholastic in appearance and demeanor."

"The daily life of the English college resident is simple, and differs from ours distinctively in the care with which it is arranged to distribute the time for work and exercise or rest, and the ease with which it consequently bears on the individual. The English student attains a far higher grade of Scholarship than ours, but we never hear of his breaking down, of shattered nerves and prostrated brain. He takes more time, it is true, but saves his body and his head."

"Bathe in your room at 6 or 7 o'clock; breakfast served in your front chamber at 7 or 8 o'clock; reading until 1 o'clock P.M.; when then comes a light lunch in your room, generally, only bread and cheese and strong college ale."

"Lunch hour ends absolutely the day of study or work. At this point the whole college—master, fellows and students—betake themselves to the open air and spend the whole afternoon, until 6 or 7 o'clock out of doors—walking, riding, boating, fishing or at athletic games. It is here the College boy builds himself up for life. At 7 o'clock dinner, and from dinner to bedtime rest. This is the common schedule of an ordinary university day."

"At 11 or 12 o'clock the English University man brews a pot of hot tea, drinks it and on this extraordinary sleeping potion goes to bed. Here ends the college day."

Whatever other errors the correspondent may have fallen into, he managed to discover what is the chief boast of Cambridge;—

"But these old times are gone and nothing is left of them at Cambridge, not even the cold ashes of the dead controversies. The ancient theological camp is now the pleasant home of humaner letters and a passionless science which studies their remains as it would the nerves of a frog or the traces of a prehistoric habitation of the globe. Toleration, a spirit of judicial study, is the claim and intellectual boast of the Cambridge of to-day. It is its pride now that it never burnt a bishop on either side when the fires of hate and narrowness were flaming over all England,

Speaking one evening at King's College table of Whistler, "whose work is just at this time a bone of contention in the art and critical world of England;"

"It may be heresy here," I said, "to admit to an enjoyment of his paintings."

"There are no heresies in Cambridge," promptly spoke up the senior fellow at the table.

In fact the correspondent comes to the conclusion "that the Cambridge of to day is changed from the Cambridge in which John Harvard took his degree in 1628. I hardly think the gaunt old Puritan of the seventeenth century would recognize his Emmanuel boy at Cambridge to-day. I much fear the undergraduate has a carnal knowledge of playing cards and running horses and boat racing and strange wines and ungodly games, and I do not think the corporate fellows would object to having their college and now consecrated chapel all covered over with Madonnas and saints and crucifixes if only it were done in good taste and in the highest glory of marble and stained glass and mosaic and oaken carving."

The letter, which extends over some four columns is then brought to a close with a doubtful piece of historical information.

"Every night here, precisely at 9 o'clock, the curfew bell sounds. It tolls just the same strokes as in the troubled times of the Norman Conquest, carrying us back hundreds of years, but it cannot carry us off to bed any more."

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE UNIVERSITY CHURCH.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Dear Sirs,—All who were present at Canon Farrar's sermon on Sunday, must have noticed the very sensible alteration in the position of the pulpit, by which those in the North Gallery were enabled to see the preacher. But is it necessary that reform in the arrangements at Gt. St. Mary's, when a crowd is expected, should stop here? Is it not possible that the doors should be opened earlier than fifteen minutes before the service begins? Unless some change is made in this respect next week it is certain that we shall see a crowd extending half way across the road, and a most unseemly rush and scramble along the galleries when at last the doors are opened.

It seems strange also that the usual practice of filling up the vacant M.A. seats before the commencement of the sermon, was not followed. The men standing in the aisle were most uncomfortably crowded, and there was room for at least forty undergraduates in the seats alluded to, without causing any inconvenience to the senior members of the University. It may perhaps be argued that had men been allowed to go into these seats there would have been some confusion for a few minutes, but with a little care and by permitting only a few men at a time to pass on, the empty places might surely have been quietly filled up: had this been done the remaining men would have been able to stand in comfort and not wedged together, as were those who could not find seats last Sunday.

Yours truly,
C. A. E. Pollock.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Sirs,—I wish to avail myself of the opportunity your widely-read periodical affords in making a complaint which does not appear to me to be unreasonable or uncalled for. I with many other undergraduates was present at the University sermon last Sunday afternoon and was obliged to stand for over an hour whilst no less than three benches reserved for M.A's (but always thrown open to undergraduates after the bidding prayer) were for the most part empty and unoccupied.

On this occasion, however, no one was allowed to pass the barrier at the stated time, for reasons best known to the officials themselves. If there is necessity to exclude undergraduates from seats which by custom and regulation they can occupy owing to the intrusion of the public, (and by the bye they have no right in the nave for this service), surely measures might be taken in order to prevent any except members of the University from entering the Church at the principal west end entrance.

I remain, yours. &c.,
H. L. Dawson.

St. John's College,
Monday, April 26.

An M.A. writes to us:—Long before the service began, the passage was so crowded with undergraduates that scarcely a single M.A. was able to fight his way through to his seat. He either had to absent himself altogether or struggle through a less compact crowd of ladies and others at the Doctors' entrance. The service also was delayed because the Vice-Chancellor also was driven to enter through the side door. It thus came to pass that crowding into the seats of the M.A.'s and even into those of the Professors, which has frequently taken place when there was abundant room unoccupied in the galleries, was prevented for the first time when both galleries were filled to overflowing.

THE UNIVERSITY VOLUNTEERS.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Sirs,—Those who witnessed the annual inspection of the University Volunteer Corps on Friday last, will probably think Colonel McKay's criticism expressed in very qualified terms "considering the few opportunities you have given, you have done fairly well." But those more intimately acquainted with the corps will be surprised, not that the inspection passed off so badly, but that it passed off so well.

By the Government regulations, a corps must present at least two-thirds of its paper strength at the annual inspection, in order to be returned as efficient, and attendance thereat is an essential condition towards individual efficiency. As we only just presented the required proportion, our efficiency is not likely to be returned at more than 68 per cent., while the average return from the various corps composing the volunteer force is slightly over 97 per cent.

It is rare to find the University taking up an object and not being among the foremost in its pursuit. In any other branch of athletics, we are at least qualified to compete with the best team the country can send against us and in many we distinctly excel. But in a competitive volunteer inspection, I fear we should come out low.

What is most needed is that those who become members and who at the time of joining may be reasonably supposed to estimate the responsibilities they incur, would give the four or five afternoons per term necessary to keep all the battalion drills.

The Corps possesses many advantages over some other corps in having an excellent drill ground, rifle range, energetic and capable adjutant and officers, and the encouragement of the senior members of the University. The spirit of some members was pointed out in an article in your No. 17. If members would turn out in such numbers that our battalion drills could be performed on a larger scale, the corps would vastly improve in smartness. Colonel McKay pointed out our deficiencies, and expressed his conviction that a hint of what he thought ought to be attained, would be sufficient to impress the desirability of attaining it upon us.

I am, yours obediently,

Alfred N. Disney.

COLLEGE CORRESPONDENCE.

CLARE.

On Sunday morning the Tutor, Rev. W. Raynes, M.A., preached in Chapel.

The usual half-yearly meeting of the Fellows was held last week to transact business.

T. F. Buckton, M.A., of this College, has been appointed a Mathematical Master at Truro Grammar School.

The first boat have been down the river to Baitsbite every afternoon, and seem settling together. The order of rowing, however, can hardly yet be regarded as quite settled.

Our cricket prospects look bright. At a practice match on Monday, 19th April, H. J. Ford, late captain of Repton School, hit vigorously for 112.—On Wednesday, 21st April, we played Magdalene on our ground, and beat them by 73 runs with three wickets to fall. Scores: Clare, 206 for seven wickets; Magdalene, 123. On our side H. J. Ford headed the scores with 64, while for Magdalene the most conspicuous were H. G. Barlow, not out for 46, and W. Roe, 44.

The match with Peterhouse on Monday resulted in our favour by 69 runs. The light rendered scoring very uncertain. Scores: Clare 107, Peterhouse 38.

Some fifteen cricket matches have been arranged for the term.

A double-handed lawn tennis match is to take place with the Trinity Mayflies Club, 3 couples a side.

Clare members of the C.U.R.V. mustered strongly under Lieut. T. J. Reed, on Friday last, at the annual inspection. We understand that there is a sergeantship vacant in the College.

Dick, our black cat with the white breast, the companion of the famous Tom, has had an accident to his right eye. He appears out of sorts, and has lost his keen appetite for cutlets and milk.

PEMBROKE.

On Friday and Saturday last we played Peterhouse, on the Amalgamation ground; we went in first, and made a total of 220, Sturges being the principal contributor, with 80, not out, the other good scores were Finch 31, Cobbold 22, and Hitchcock 19. Peterhouse then went in, but only succeeded in reaching a total of 60, the bowling of Finch and Hewett being apparently too much for them. They had accordingly to follow on, and in the second innings made 120, Planck's 59 being the highest score. We thus won by an innings and 20 runs. On Monday, the 19th, the First Eleven played the Next Sixteen, and beat them easily by 127 to 30.

A four-handed Lawn Tennis Tournament is in progress. The first ties are to be played off by Wednesday evening, as yet most of the ties have not been very exciting, but as soon as some of the bad pairs have been weeded out, we may hope for some good games. The popularity of Lawn Tennis is attested by 50 entries for the tournament.

We have only had one man playing in the Freshmen's match, W. L. Hitchcock.

GONVILLE AND CAIUS.

The College has to lament the sudden death of the Rev. John Lamb, Rector of Blofield, Norfolk, late fellow and for 16 years bursar of this College. His great administrative and social qualities won him high esteem not only in his own College, but in the University at large.

We are glad to see that Dr. Clifford Allbutt, of Leeds, is one of the fortunate individuals selected by the Royal Society as a recipient of their honours.

"The oracles" of the College Societies "are dumb" for the present term; "No voice or hideous hum &c."

The genial face of one of our old first Captains, H. S. Withington, shines within the College walls once more, whilst his sonorous voice daily exhorts (Sundays excepted) the first boat to doughty eats on the breast of Cam. The first boat though in active operation is not finally settled. The places bow, two and five seem not yet permanently allotted. Owing to the uncertainty about the first boat the organisation of the second is still somewhat chaotic.

At present the Lawn Tennis tournament is raging hotly; the final ties have not yet been played off.

Our cricketing contingent are somewhat slack in opening their campaign.

TRINITY HALL.

Mr. R. F. Duff, removed to 66, Trumpington Street.

A meeting of the Cricket Club was held at the beginning of the term, at which A. G. Steel was elected President; H. M. Stutfield 1st captain; J. T. Steele, 2nd captain; H. Shearburn, secretary. The finances of the club appear to be in a very satisfactory condition.

Rowing has been carried on very vigorously, and the first two boats have not lately undergone much change. The third boat seems also to be pretty definitely filled. The first boat is composed thus: Bow, L. G. Reed; 2, F. W. Isaacson; 3, G. L. Stevens; 4, H. Heape; 5, C. S. Brandon; 6, C. E. Freeling; 7, E. Simpson; stroke, E. C. Brooksbank; cox, H. Woodhouse. During the temporary absence of Brooksbank for several days from the boat. Trevor-Jones took No. 4 seat, six and four being moved respectively to stroke and six. On Monday the new light ship was tried in horrible weather, a trip was however made to Baitsbite, and the boat gave every satisfaction.

CORPUS CHRISTI.

The Eleven played Eleven Freshmen on Wednesday, the 21st. The Freshmen made 78, of which W. G. Morse made 40, (not out); for the Eleven Tanner scored 44. On the following Friday the Captain's Eleven played the Secretary's Eleven, and the latter won; for the winners Owen made 37, Brown 32, Morse 24; for the losers Hough made 45, Isaacs 18.

The Final double handed Lawn Tennis tie, left over from last term, has been played off, and resulted in Owen and Ayerst defeating Richardson and Cooper.

KING'S.

We played our first match on Saturday last against Magdalene; after getting them out for 67, we got 166 for seven wickets, but the value of our performance was somewhat lessened by the fact that A. F. J. Ford contributed 115 (not out) and extras 20 to the sum total of our score—to complete the subtraction sum would be too humiliating. The boat has been slow in putting in an appearance on the river owing to the late return of some of its members.

The College Musical Society held their second concert in the Hall on Monday evening. The seats were crowded and the audience was in no way slow in testifying its appreciation of the performances. E. Capel Cure with his violoncello, and C. F. Crowder with his violin formed prominent features in the evening's entertainment, while the pianoforte solo of J. B. Croft and the vocal solo of C. W. Foley both earned well deserved encores. The quartetts also were good, that of "the Chafers" especially eliciting applause such as was good evidence that old acquaintance has not made it the less acceptable in King's. Nor must we forget the kind assistance of the Rev. H. T. Bascoe and Messrs. W. Austen-Leigh and A. H. Mann, who contributed in no small way to the general success. The next concert will be held on Thursday, May 20.

QUEENS'.

We played our first cricket match on Wednesday, 21st, v. Caius, on the Caius Ground. Our score reached a total of 75, Wildman (Capt.) making 10, Longbottom 19, Wright 9 (not out). Our opponents scored 105, thus heading us by 30. Of the bowlers, Butler and Longbottom were most successful. We have some promising freshmen, both in batting and bowling, and hope to do better this season than last.

A Lawn Tennis Match has been arranged for May 6th, v. Caius. Our representatives on that occasion will be Bolton and Haynes.

ST. CATHARINE'S.

We hear that at a college meeting held last week, it was decided that the proposal of King's to unite with us, should not be accepted.

The Scratch Fours were rowed on Saturday, 24th; after four time races had been rowed between Jesus Locks and Waits,' the following crew remained the winners: Bow, M. W. Searle; 2, R. J. Hodson; 3, A. D. Davies; Stroke, G. G. Coulton; Cox, M. Gilbert.

The Debating Society was declared to be in a very satisfactory financial condition at the last meeting, and it was decided that the surplus funds should be devoted to the assistance of another Club.

The following have entered the college this term:—Walker, J. C., 6, Regent Terrace; Spicer, 37, Green Street.

JESUS.

On the river the boats are not yet quite settled: in the first boat Prest is rowing stroke, and Baillie is at six; Hockin is coming up to row seven, so that somebody is keeping his place warm. The only cricket match yet played is the Eleven v. Fifteen Freshmen, which resulted in a draw, the eleven making 179 (Garforth 81, Gelderd 21 not out) while the Freshmen scored 147 and 101 (Birley 29, Orford 30). The first out college match is on Friday v. Clare.

CHRIST'S.

P. H. Clifford, Fourth Classic, 1878, has been elected fellow of this college.

ST. JOHN'S.

Lawn tennis is now in full swing; the following have been appointed as committee, E. J. C. Morton (President), A. R. Aspinall, A. S. Reid, W. H. Bissett; it has been decided that the club have a blazer, but the question of colours was left to the committee, who have not yet decided it. The English Essay Prizes annually given by the Master have been awarded as follows:—For the third year: to J. Spencer Hill and G. C. Moore Smith, equal; proxime accesserunt, Theodore Coppock; E. N. Coulthard; for the second year: to James Peiris; for the first year: none awarded.

Mr. W. H. Widgery, B.A., scholar of this College, has been appointed second master of the Brewers Company's Schools, London.

The annual college examinations commence on May 31st.

MAGDALENE.

During last week our Eleven has played two matches, and has been defeated in both. The first, against Clare, was not a success, for although we scored 123, Roe playing a good innings of 44, and Barlow making 46, not out, in good style, we were not able to get more than 7 wickets down before time was called. Ford made 64, though he was missed early in the game; Elder made 37, not out; their total for 7 wickets being 206.

On Saturday last we played against King's. We went in first, and only scored 67; of these Roe made 19, and Barlow 18, not out. Again we were only able to procure 7 wickets, this time for 166 runs. Ford played a brilliant innings of 115, not out.

TRINITY.

The Irregulars met for the first time this term on Thursday, April 22. E. Lutton brought forward a motion "That this house regards with pleasure the return of a liberal majority." The house however refused to do so.

EMMANUEL.

At a meeting of the Lawn Tennis Club, A. Durrant, president, S. Spry, treasurer and C. B. Walters, secretary, were all re-elected.

The Debating Society on Saturday, passed a resolution moved by R. M. Pattisson regretting the results of the recent elections by a majority of 15.

SIDNEY.

Our first boat has now had time to get together a bit, and, though Naters will not be able to stroke it, gives promise of being a very fair boat. The crew, which goes into training this week, is as follows: bow, Palmer; 2, Robson; 3, Metcalfe; 4, Reynolds; 5, Woodhouse; 6, Ostrehan; 7, Williams, C.W.; stroke, Logan.

Our first cricket match is against Cavendish to-day (Wednesday): besides which others have been arranged. The college labours under the very great disadvantage of having no ground upon which the eleven can practise together. It seems curious that although the Tutor is willing to render us any assistance in his power, no field can be found anywhere fit for the purpose.

DOWNING.

Bye Term Entry.—D. F. Richardson, Fellow-Commoner.

Changes of Address.—L. W. F. H. Berkeley, Downing House, Regent Street; Brinton, R. D., College, Letter K; Broadwood, C. G., 28, Green Street; Jones, H., College, Letter I; Richardson, D. F., 57, Regent Street; Trulock-Hankin, H. A., 28, Green Street.

Alexander Hill, B.A., Scholar of this College, was, on Wednesday, April 21st, admitted a member of the Royal College of Surgeons.

Besides the one M.P. from Downing mentioned in the Review, viz., Sir Hy. Verney, member for Buckingham, we are also represented by a former Fellow-Commoner, R. Creyke, Esq., member for York.

The Debating Society does not meet again until the October term.

The Lawn Tennis Club held a meeting last week, at which T Robson was re-elected Secretary, and C. Alison and J. E. Viney Committee-men. The single and double-handed matches will probably be played during the last week of next month.

NON-COLLEGIATE.

Our Freshman's match proved Manners, Kelly and Mitchell very desirable bats. As for bowling, Challoner, our tried member, appears to be in very good form. Cricket matches are announced with King's (Ely), Corpus, Sidney, Cavendish, the Leys School and one or two others. How is it the Secretary has arranged so few?

It is said that Manners has been asked to join Jesus. He certainly would make them a very pretty cox.

In the contest for the prize racquet the tug will be between Cameron and Mc Causland. Bernays, however, may have a look in.

UNIVERSITY INTELLIGENCE.

The University Commissioners, by a Writing issued on April 23 have exempted from the operation of their rule limiting to December 31, 1880 the tenure of all emoluments or appointments conferred since March 14th, 1878, all such appointments and emoluments, lasting for one year only, to which the University may appoint after the date of the publication of this order.

The Vice-Chancellor gives notice that the Rede Lecture will be delivered by Professor Humphry, M.D., F.R.S., in the Senate House on Wednesday, May 26, at 2.30 p.m.

The examination for the two vacant Whewell Scholarships will take place on Saturday, June 5th. Applications and certificates must be forwarded to the Vice-Chancellor by May 24th.

The Board of Mathematical Studies have reported to the Senate, advising that Inter-collegiate lectures should be given in the long vacation as well as in term-time, and recommend that Intercollegiate lecturers should be invited to volunteer for courses of lectures in the long vacation of 1881.

The Board have also submitted a tabular statement of the marks obtained in the last Tripos Examination, from which it appears that the average obtained by the first eleven Wranglers was 4,771 (out of 18,235), as against 1,858, by the last ten Wranglers, 1,305, by the first eleven Senior Optimes, and 671 by the first ten Junior Optimes. The twenty-second annual report has also been published by the Local Examinations and Lectures Syndicate, shewing the number of candidates in the recent Local Examinations, with the results obtained. Sixty-six schools have also been examined under the direction of the Syndicate, during the past year.

The examiners in the Hebrew Subjects for the Theological Tripos in the years 1879 and 1880, have reported very unfavourably upon the performance of the Candidates, stating that a sound elementary knowledge of Hebrew is possessed by very few candidates, and recommending a few plain grammatical questions in the paper on Genesis.

The Board of Oriental Studies have forwarded a representation to the Commissioners, expressing a decided opinion against the amalgamation of the two existing Boards of Oriental and of Mediæval and Modern Languages. They further recommend that the Professor of Sanskrit should be relieved of the duty of teaching Comparative Philology, and that a separate chair in this subject should be established. They point out also that the promotion of Oriental Studies has not been adequately provided for in the scheme, and suggest that the existing Readership of Talmudic and Rabbinic Literature should be included in the scheme, and that three additional Readerships in Persian, Hindustani, and Tamil and Telegu, should be founded.

The following subjects have been appointed for the Examinations in 1881. For the Previous Examination: St. Mark's Gospel; Æschylus; Prometheus Vinctus; Cicero, Pro Lege Manilia. For the General Examination: Aristophanes, Nubes, Livy, Book xxii.

The following Graces, among others, will be proposed to the Senate to-morrow. That the degree of D.D. be conferred on the Rev. Josiah Brown Pearson, of St. John's, Bishop Designate of New South Wales, under chap. III., sec 5, par. 1 of the University Statutes. That Mr. Temperley of Queens, and Mr. Burnside of Pembroke, be appointed Moderators for the ensuing year.

The Report on the Greek Question.—The Vice-Chancellor invites the attendance of members of the Senate in the Arts Schools, on Friday next, April 30, at 2.30 p.m. for the discussion of the Report, dated April 9, 1880, of the Syndicate appointed to consider the Memorial on the subject of the obligation of passing an examination in Greek, and the questions arising therefrom.

The LL.M. Examination.—The Board of Legal Studies reports upon this subject:—The Board of Legal Studies have had under their consideration the hardship alleged in the case of B.A. Candidates for the degree of LL.M., who pass the same examination in English Property Law, as candidates for the Tripos, but cannot avail themselves of a certificate to excuse that part of the Inns of Court Examination, because the Inns of Court require that a degree in law should have been actually taken while such candidates are often not of standing to take the degree of Master. Should, however, the degree of Bachelor of Law (which has hitherto been given for the whole of the law tripos only) be allowed to all B.A. candidates, the board fears that a considerable number of law students now reading for honours might be induced to prepare only the subjects for the law special examination and the limited portion of the tripos subjects which is assigned to the LL.M. examination. They therefore recommend that the option of taking LL.B. should be allowed only to candidates for LL.M. who have taken honours in some other tripos.—(Signed) E. C, Clark, H. S. Maine, W. Ll. C.U.M.S.

The current series of Wednesday Popular Concerts was resumed last week, and a thoroughly popular programme performed.

The oftener Beethoven's well-known Clarinet Trio in B flat is heard the more lovely it seems; and it has been given at these concerts at least twice before, once with Clarinet and once with Violin in the alternative part. On this occasion Mr. Galpin played the title rôle in his usual excellent fashion; the President of the Society was at the Piano, and we were glad to hear in Mr. Capel Cure of King's a Violoncellist of promise, new to Cambridge.

Mr. Tindall sang, with much effect, Mr. Stanford's "Valentine," and Sullivan's pleasing setting of the old Cambridge Orator's "Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright." Mr. Cobb played, with great taste, the famous Fugue with Chorale of Mendelssohn; and two of the now almost forgotten Lieder ohne Worte were received with the warmth of novelty.

But the vigorous and original wine-songs of Hubert Parry, which Mr. Deane sang with appropriate spirit, appeared to us the most valuable item in the concert. Works by Mr. Parry, who is among the foremost of English composers, have been given by the Society before, but we remember none that more happily combine scholarship with interest.

The programme ended with a pleasing but slight Duo (MS) for Clarinet and Piano by the late Professor Walmisley.

Attention should be called to the Easter Term Concerts announced for 21st and 25th of next month. There will be given Beethoven's Sinfonia Eroica (No. 3), Goetz's Naenie, Schubert's Trout Quintett, Professor Macfarren's Violin Concerto, Mr. Stanford's new Piano Quartett, and much more.

CAMBRIDGE PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY.

At the next meeting, to be held on Monday, May 3, 1880, at 8.30 p.m., it is expected that the following communications will be made to the Society:—

1. By Mr. Keeping:

The included pebbles of the Neocomian deposits of Potton and Upware and their bearing upon the physical features of the lower cretaceous period.

2. By Mr. A. Sedgwick:

On the development of the structure known as the glomerulus of the head kidney of the chick.

We propose to hold a Symposium in these columns on the subject of "Midnight Oil," by which we hope to obtain the opinions of many of our contributors on the value of reading at night. Those who would wish to take part in it are requested to send in their names, with a short outline of their views on the subject. Each contributor will be allowed to read the papers of his predecessors, but not of those that follow him. The length of each paper will be restricted to half a column of large print.

CRICKET.

THE FRESHMEN'S MATCH.

April 26th and 27th. Two fairly good elevens had been chosen for this annual match, several members on either side having already distinguished themselves both at school and elsewhere. Mr. Bligh's side, on paper, looked perhaps the stronger, containing three good bats in Studd, Capron, and Ford, and two useful bowlers in Studd and Ramsey: on the other side Roe Spencer and Henery were about the best known performers. There was the usual cold north wind sweeping across Fenners, and though this made the ground more or less uninviting to all concerned, it did not prevent a fairly good circle of spectators from attending in the afternoon. The wickets were sticky and slow, owing to heavy rain in the morning, and were not improved by a hail storm during lunch time.

Steel having won the toss, sent in H. Hitchcock and Green-Price to combat the bowling of Studd and Ramsay, both slow round hand. Green-Price was caught at slip in the first over; 1 for 1. Roe was shortly after caught at long leg from a lofty hit and Hitchcock foolishly ran himself out. No stand was made till Spencer and Francis were partnered. The former showed good defence, and hit vigorously. He brought on more than one change of bowling, Cole (fast round) for Ramsay, and Lucas for Cole. He eventually was caught at short slip, by Studd, for 26. No one else made any mark of importance on the score sheet, with the exception of Maynard, who carried out his bat for 17. The innings closed for 106, Studd having been the most successful bowler, with 7 wickets for 35 runs to his name. Bradshaw fielded well at cover-point.

Mr. Bligh's side failed to reach their opponent's score by 21 runs, out of 77 scored, while he was at the wickets, and a total of 81 altogether from the bat. Studd compiled as many as 53. He played well on the whole, his hard driving being the chief point in his play, but several judges said they had seen better innings from his bat. No one else, except Orford (14 not out) reached double figures.

Henery and Spencer both bowled well, and obtained all the wickets between them.

Steel's side commenced their second innings with the same batsmen as before, and nearly doubled their previous total. Henery played far and away the best innings of the side; in fact it was quite as good, if not better, than that of Studd's on the opposite side. He was well supported by Cooper, Birley, and Green-Price, who made 40, 30, and 25 respectively, though none of them in such good style as Henery. Bligh's side had now 223 to win, and as there remained but two hours for play, there was but little chance of their doing it. Several of those that batted reached double figures, Studd, Ford, and Lucas all playing well for their runs. Henery took five out of the seven wickets that fell. When time was called, Bligh's side had made 110 for seven wickets, out of the necessary 223 and consequently the match was drawn considerably in favour of Steel's side, Judging by the results of the match we consider that Studd, Henery, Spencer and Ford, are about the pick of the two sides. The three former are all ahead of their rivals both in batting and bowling; the first named of them ought certainly to prove an acquisition to the University Eleven. Ford should make a good bat, while some useful players make their mark in the shape of Green-Price, Cooper, Birley, Ramsay, and Lucas.

THE RIVER.

The present stage of the practice is an uninteresting one to an onlooker; although for those who are striving for a place in their college boat the last week has probably decided much. What we said on Wednesday last about the probable issue of events, we must repeat; few of the boats being sufficiently "together" to enable us to go beyond what we then stated.

Good "coaches" are scarce this term, indeed some captains seem to find it hard to get any at all; so that we see many riding along the towing path with a eight under their care, who, to quote a well-known river-side character, "do not know a hoick from a hang, sir!" In fact the few good coaches seem to be lazy, so that we miss the system of Inter-collegiate coaching which was established by the late C.U.B.C. Secretary, and which has proved so useful to college captains. We well know what trouble this gives the secretary, so it is with diffidence that we suggest its re-establishment.

Since our last issue, Prest has taken his place at stroke in the Jesus boat, while Baillie has gone to six. There is plenty of good material in the boat, but still the pace is not what it ought to be; while Caius are rapidly improving and at present are the best looking boat on the river. Six in the latter boat always gets in before stroke, which is rather a serious defect if allowed to go on for any length of time.

There is a rumour that Prior is coming up to row for Lady Margaret; and he will no doubt prove a great help to a boat which at present seem utterly "at sea." Barton is not rowing nearly so well as he did; and, were it not for his blue cap, would hardly be taken for a University oar.

Pembroke are undoubtedly a taking boat, but some of their men seem in their wrong places; and they are, to say the least of it, hardly good enough to try their fortune at Henley; a determination which we believe to be on the tapis.

Magdalene are very much in want of Watson-Taylor, who has not made his appearance. It was generally supposed that he would be back in time for the May races.

One word more about Henley. Jesus are to have the same boat as last year, with the exception of Fairbairn, and though their May boat may not be as good as last year, yet they ought to feel fairly confident of bringing the Grand Challenge Cup back again to Cambridge. We have not heard whether Caius intend also to follow the example of Jesus in this respect, but surely it would be a pity if a boat, which not only promises well, but also seems strong enough to fill with credit at least the second place on the River, should content itself merely with the laurels to be gained on the Cam. There are few boats besides these two, if we except Trinity, who have at present the power which should be possessed by those who aspire to row in such a celebrated Regatta as is Henley, yet there is still plenty of time for improvement, and it is quite possible for some crews to "come on" more than their present appearance predicts; in which case there is no reason why the victories of Cambridge at Henley should not this year be as numerous and decisive as they were last.

It is surprising to see in how many boats we are disappointed in our expectations of seeing faces which we nevertheless meet certainly in the streets and elsewhere. We think we are right when we assert that in hardly any of the boats are all the available "old hands" rowing: we trust that this is not due to the fascinations of any less vigorous though more seductive pursuit; it is quite a new phase in the University to see every Cricket ground fringed with Lawn Tennis nets, which may perhaps offer a more pleasant amusement than is afforded by rowing, which, though beneficial is not always comfortable; still when did man ever win his way to honour without trouble? We trust that this enticing game has not won away from the River so many of its former votaries, and that the plea of "work" is indeed only the result of anxiety caused by the new and mystic arrangements of the Tripos.

C.U.Bi.C.

The ride on Saturday to Hitchin to meet the London Bicycle Club was a great success. On no previous occasion has the Club mustered in such force upon the road. The captain started at 2.50 at the head of a party of twenty. It did not take long to discover that the wind was contrary, and sufficiently strong to considerably interfere with the progress of riders. However a steady pace was kept up until Royston was reached, when a halt was made for a quarter of an hour. Here a well-known member of the club, now resident at Shelford, made his appearance and volunteered the information that it would take two hours to ride the remaining 14 miles to Hitchin, a prophecy not justified by subsequent events. However the prophet took the train to Baldock, where he again joined the Club, who keeping up the same steady rate as before, rode into Hitchin at 6.0, having left a few of their number straggling behind in the last few miles. A second contingent of ten riders left the Club rooms at 3.40. It had been announced that this detachment would ride fast, and two or three accordingly started off at a great pace as soon as they were well out of Cambridge. "Wait till they get into the wind" said the Assistant-Treasurer: and as soon as the full force of the wind was felt it was found that those in front were allowing the rest to come up. However a mile farther some more spurting was done until the whole body were again united at the level crossing at Harston, where a halt of 5 minutes had to be made until a train had passed.

A steadier pace was now made, and all kept well together through Melbourn, Royston being reached in 70 minutes from the start. No halt was made until about three miles from Baldock, and then only for five minutes at the top of the last of a long series of hills. Here some of the first division were sighted about a mile ahead. Soon after starting again it began to drizzle, and after Baldock the riders were soon separated by considerable intervals along the road, some eagerly striving to overtake the early starters, others remembering that they were but a few miles from their destination and that the L.B.C. were not due there for nearly an hour. A few of the first succeeded in catching the stragglers of the other contingent and rode into Hitchin about 6.10 having thus taken 2¼ hours to complete the distance. The Sun Hotel was the rendezvous, and here were found two well-known members of the Club, who have now gone down, and had ridden from London to be present: later on A. P. Trotter, Trinity, ex-captain, also turned up. The last arrival from Cambridge was the Vice-President, who started 15 minutes after the second division, and gained five minutes in the 27 miles.

Several of the C.U.Bi.C. walked out to meet the main body of the L.B.C., and after waiting a short time a little way outside the town, about 25 men in grey uniforms appeared, riding in good order. Others came in later, and the following were the numbers at tea: L.B.C.—35; C.U.Bi.C.—30; members of both clubs—5.

The Cambridge Captain had made excellent arrangements with the landlord, and the 70 men sat down in a room capable of holding 100 comfortably, and were well served. After tea a few songs were sung and a couple of short speeches were made.

At 8.50 most of the C.U.Bi.C. started for home, a few remaining behind, and taking the 9.48 train.

Since 6 o'clock the weather had been steadily improving, and although the clouds refused to give the moon a fair chance, the night was not very dark; the wind had somewhat dropped, but, such as it was, it was favourable. Four L.B.C. men rode with the Club to Cambridge, and after passing Baldock a pace of about 13 miles an hour was kept up, and most rode the whole way without dismounting. The leaders passed through Royston at 10.10, and reached Cambridge at 11.10, others following two or three together at short intervals.

All who went were well pleased with the expedition, and next year we hope to see a still larger number of men turn out.

The following is a list of the Club runs for next week:—Wednesday, April 20th, St. Ives and back (30 miles); start at 3.30. Saturday, May 1st, by 4.40 train to Bishop Stortford, back by road (28 miles.) Tuesday, May 4th, Haslingfield and Barrington (14 miles); start at 3.30.

C. U. R. V.

The past fortnight has been a very busy one with our University Corps, and the drills have been of a character calculated to satisfy the strictest martinet. The reason for this period of activity may be explained by the fact that the annual inspection of the corps was arranged to take place on Friday, the 23rd inst., and the officers, from gallant Colonel down to most recent subaltern, seemed bent upon working up the men to the highest possible pitch of perfection in order to ensure a good report from the inspecting officer. The drills, which consisted of five company and three battalion, were all well attended, and by no means came under the term usually applied to volunteers, namely, that of 'playing at soldiers;' and under the Adjutant's skilful handling the men showed vast improvement as the time of trial drew near. Recruits, too, were not wanting, so that on the inspection day a goodly array of military enthusiasts assembled on the Corps ground, there being present 24 officers, 21 sergeants, and 180 rank and file, including Ven. Archdeacon Emery, the oldest chaplain in the volunteer service. The band of the Cambridgeshire Militia was in attendance, and a large number of spectators lined the ground to watch the 'Varsity volunteers. Shortly after 1.30 p.m., the time appointed, the inspecting officer, Colonel McKay, commanding 32 Sub District, rode on to the ground and at once proceeded to inspect the C.U.R.V. in column: when he had seen each company and had been introduced to the several officers in command, the regiment was equalized for drill; it then received him with a general salute, and after marching past in column, quarter column, and at the double, formed up on the original ground and was put through the manual and firing exercises by Major Caldwell. Colonel Wale then took command again, and the Corps performed several movements with great steadiness and precision, after which each Captain drilled the Battalion in succession. Finally it was put through some skirmishing movements by Colonel Wale, after which it was again drawn up in column, and Colonel McKay expressed his perfect satisfaction to the Corps, and impressed upon them the necessity of turning out as often as possible, concluding by reminding them that a detachment would proceed to Colchester, on the 14th of June, to be encamped for a fortnight. Colonel Wale afterwards addressed a few words to the men, thanking them for following out his instructions so implicitly, and telling them they could not know how pleased he had been with them that day.

Colonel McKay dined with the officers of the Corps, at Corpus Christi College, in the evening, and amongst the guests were the Vice-Chancellor and Sir Watkin Williams-Wynn. In responding to the toast of the health of the Inspecting Officer, Colonel McKay again expressed his complete satisfaction with all he had seen, and with the state of efficiency of the Cambridge University Rifle Corps. Such a compliment from a veteran officer must indeed be gratifying to the various officers of the Corps, and they are to be congratulated upon so successful a result of their labours. Captain and Adjutant Brownrigg deserves all praise for his assiduous attention to the drilling of the Corps. The various movements executed during the day were all characterised by that steadiness which Colonel Wale insists upon so strongly, whilst the skirmishing struck us as being admirable, decidedly the forte of our Corps, for it would have done no discredit to any body of regulars.

It would not be out of place to call the attention of readers of the Review to the extreme utility of our University Corps, and to remind them that, owing to the nomadic nature of its members, recruits are continually in requisition to supply the blanks made by the men who go down from term to term. Our range is one of the finest in England, the facilities for drill and rifle practice almost unequalled, added to which the subscription is but small, and the cost of uniform very moderate. For the sum of £3 8s., Dixon, of Downing Street, undertakes to supply a new uniform, with gaiters, &c., complete; and considering that the annual subscription is only a guinea, we do not think that the expense should deter men from joining. We mention this for the sake of those who may wish to join the Corps, but hesitate through want of definite information on this point.

BRET HARTE AT THE GUILDHALL.

On Thursday evening a crowded and appreciative audience assembled at the Guildhall to hear Bret Harte tell them the tale of the Argonauts of '49. It is not an easy matter to command the entire attention of a Cambridge audience: but on this occasion we may defy contradiction when we affirm that there never was a lecture more carefully and quietly listened to; the only interruptions being occasional bursts of laughter and applause, which could not be suppressed, either at the quaint epigrammatic humour of the anecdotes or at the incidental mention of such old friends, as "the Heathen Chinee" or "John Oakhurst Gambler." The pleasure of welcoming an author, whose writings are to some of us almost more familiar than any other literature, must be always mixed with a slight fear of disappointment: but who could have been disappointed on Thursday? Throughout the lecture there ran side by side the same streams of pathos and humour, which are the greatest attraction and exercise the greatest fascination in such tales as "Tennessee's Partner." And it was doubly a pleasure to be told by an author that such characters as John Oakhurst or Yuba Bill are not creations of his own, but were men as real in their individuality as any hero of history: to learn too that there really existed that strange lawless life, of which not the least strange characteristic was the fact that the rule of the strongest was just and merciful, which gave daily instances of devotion and self-sacrifice, too common then for remark, but which in another age, and in a more civilized country would have been called heroism. The darker side of the picture was necessarily only slightly sketched, but the very omission was perhaps more eloquent than the most elaborate description could have been. The only adverse comment we heard was that the lecture was too short.

CANON ELLISON AT ST. MICHAEL'S.

On Thursday evening, at St. Michael's Church, the Rev. Canon Ellison, Rector of Hasely, Oxon, and Chaplain in ordinary to the Queen, preached a sermon on behalf of the University Branch of the Church of England Temperance Society, and took for his text the words of Isaiah 9, verse 19, "When the enemy shall come in like a flood, the spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against them."

The Higher Education of Women.—The memorial to the Vice-Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, praying that the Tripos examinations may be opened and degrees granted to properly qualified women, has received more than 8,000 signatures. The memorial is as follows:—"To the Vice-Chancellor of the University of Cambridge. The memorial of the undersigned persons, interested in the higher education of women, showeth,—That repeated instances of success on the part of students of Girton and Newnham Colleges in satisfying the examiners in various degree examinations at Cambridge, and notably an instance in connexion with the last Mathematical Tripos, show that many women desire sound training in higher learning, and also desire to have the results of that training authoritatively tested and certified. That the present informal admission of women to the various Tripos Examinations of the University of Cambridge, depending, as it does, on the courtesy of individual examiners, is unsatisfactory as regards the University and is liable to cause severe disappointment to candidates who may possibly find themselves refused admission to examinations for which they have been working for years. Your memorialists, therefore, pray that the Senate of the University of Cambridge will grant to properly qualified women the right of admission to the examinations for University degrees and to the degrees conferred according to the results of such examinations." The memorial is signed, among others, by the Countess of Portsmouth, the Countess of Ducie, the Earl of Mount Cashell, and in all more than 60 members of Parliament; by Sir C. Reed, M.P., the chairman, and 28 members of the London School Board; by Lieutenant-Colonel Britton, the master, Sir Sydney H. Waterlow, and 11 other members of the Clothworkers' Company, and by the master and five members of the Cutlers' Company; by the Dean of Canterbury and about 200 clergymen of the Established Church; the Rev. H. Allon, D.D., Rev. Joseph Angus, D.D., R. W. Dale, Rev. James Martineau, Principal of Manchester New College, London, and about 200 Nonconformist ministers; by about 250 medical practitioners; by Professors G. Carey Foster, W. S. Jevons, G. Burdon Sanderson, O. Henrici, and seven other professors of University College, London; Professors Blackie, Calderwood, Geikie, Hodgson, Masson, and Lorimer, of the University of Edinburgh; by Professor Balfour Stewart, three other professors, and six lecturers of Owens College, Manchester; and by 19 professors of the University of Dublin and four fellows of Trinity College, Dublin.—Times.

OXFORD LETTER.

The summer term is now in full swing. Training has begun for the eights; the Freshman's match is over; the schools rapidly approach: in fact everyone has something to do and a good deal of shop to talk.

We began this term well,—with distinguished visitors. We have had Prince Leopold, Renan, and Bret Harte: as an eminent personage here is reported to have said, Rank, Talent, and Unorthodoxy, the three most powerful forces in the world. As to the first, the daily papers have given any that want sufficient information. A dinner, some speeches, a distinguished party at the Deanery—nothing has been left unsaid. Speaking as an undergraduate, all that affected me in it was that I had no dinner in my lodgings, and that, on my asking my landlady the reason afterwards, I was informed that His Royal Highness had called to buy a wig to act in, and that really, she had to go and tell her neighbours. The excitement would, however, have been greater had not a popular circus arrived simultaneously with our first distinguished visitor.

Our second, M. Renan, has delighted everyone. He has seen everything, and admired everything; perhaps it is not too much to say, he has understood a good deal. And I hope Oxford has too: for I hear he was full of pretty speeches to everyone who was introduced to him; compliments which were not the less pleasant, let us believe, for being couched in "the decent obscurity of a learned language." At Professor Max Müller's was to be seen the ceremony of his introduction to the Master of Balliol. "You have no doubt" said the Professor, "read the Master's edition of the Galatians." "Ah, ah," was the answer "mon guide, mon maître!"

Of our third distinguished visitor Cambridge knows as much as we do. Of his lecture I need not say anything: those who would care for it, no doubt went and enjoyed it: to those who would not, is it worth writing? But perhaps Mr. Bret Harte had not the advantage at Cambridge of lecturing next door to a billiard room, and having his Californian studies accompanied and illustrated by the "click" of the balls, and the rattle of the cues: and perhaps he had not an audience that cheered so very inopportunely. At every pathetic passage, at every touching death-scene, the roof rang again. But our enthusiasm, though perhaps misplaced, was real. At Professor Max Müller's this second great man was to be seen. He stood and smoked in the conservatory, and those who wished had a word and probably a jest from him. He has left very pleasant impressions behind. But will he take his revenge on us? Will the author of "the Argonauts" lecture in America on another sort of voyagers—say "The wise men of Gotham, or a sketch of Oxford life"? Distinguished strangers are very delightful, but here in Oxford experience has made us wise, we may say, and our admiration is not unmixed with fear.

I wonder whether it was in honour of M. Renan that we have had a set of Bampton lectures on the constitution of the early Church, proving that the bishop was the treasurer of a friendly society of which the deacons were the relieving officers—nothing more; no sacred association attaching to the office till the fifth century. So says rumour—and this is Oxford! But, courage: It is only the bishops and deacons—the deans are left unscathed.

One item more and we shall have done with intellect. The Lothian has been won by Mr. Hardinge, of Balliol. The Subject was Queen Christina of Sweden. We understand that with rare self-denial, he alone withstood the great temptation to scandal and quoting Swedish.

And now for body. The Freshman's match is over—no one but Mr. Evelyn, of Oriel, has much distinguished himself. We are somewhat despondent: but we comfort ourselves by thinking of our new cricket ground. Situated in a most "eligible site" between Keble and the Museum, Religion and Science, on the top of our only hill, with the gentle influences of the Parks and Parks-spectators around, we can hardly hope too much of it. At present, however, it has but the small beginning of greatness; I might describe it like the ancient rhyme, "on the top of a hill is some clay, and on the top of the clay is some mud, and on the top of the mud is the new University cricket ground."

The Seniors' match takes place on Monday.

The river is looking very gay with the practising eights. They have improved very rapidly, with a few exceptions, and there may be some really good boats among them. That interesting ruin, the Balliol boat, can hardly expect to keep its place in spite of the well-known pluck of its stroke, Sir Saville Crossley (Sir Samuel as our contemporaries call him—preferring, I suppose, the sacred associations). Only three of the old crew remain, and those who have succeeded to the vacated places have hardly sufficient experience of sliders. The University boat is, we are assured, to be head. They certainly are improving rapidly, and have a good deal of go about them—perhaps it is their confidence which makes them begin to train a week later than the others. Brasenose had the start of the others, and certainly seemed a few days ago more at home with their sliders, but their improvement is not very rapid at present. Magdalen have Wharton rowing for them, and are going well; University will have a hard race after them. New, in spite of frequent changes, is progressing rapidly; perhaps the fact that it contains five Eton men gives it an air of uniformity wanted in a good many others. Exeter and Hertford are also striking boats; but all is yet in incerto. Many crews are getting into their light boats for the first time: the effect is very striking from the bank: a roll, a confused billowy splash, a cry from cox, a curse from stroke, and the series is repeated.

There is to be a new University boat house built opposite the barges, which is exciting a good deal of interest. There are to be rooms in it for several colleges to change in, and applications are being made. It is to be an elegant Swiss cottage, with an Italian balcony, I have heard. We are all looking forward to it.

The Athletic meeting is over. It lasted four hours, and would no doubt have lasted more if it had not terminated in a dinner. Admirable sense must have been displayed on all sides, for without one outburst of temper, these extremely difficult and awkward questions have been settled, we will hope, satisfactorily. There was considerable difficulty in making the original selection, as the president was always receiving letters from some "extremely important club, which the writer was most surprised should have been overlooked." But, however, this and difficulties worse than this are now at an end; and the bond of alliance was sealed with an interchange of photographs between the president and several of the delegates. In fact the only dispute was between the two rival bands of Oxford, which, as one of them explained, was on the ground of "the art," for "it wasn't right that the gentlemen should hear bad music."

The Eights are no doubt delightful races: but I think the training has its draw-backs—to judge of it externally, that is, "If thou hast a friend in training, cut him." It is a most important precept. "What are you going to do?" I asked such a friend early in the morning. "Training breakfast," he said. And, "then?" I proceeded—"Training walk." "And after that?"—"Training lunch." "Then?"—"Sleep." My friend, trust not that combination of putty and beefsteak which makes a rowing man's mind. The training, I think, should decide the waverer in favour of cricket. It is better to be silly than to be stupid.

The summer is the term for visitors. Already I see many undergraduates shewing the beauties of Oxford to enraptured parents, or astonished sisters. There is an expression on the face of such a man, when he is telling the date of his College, to a not undesirable cousin—an expression of mingled pleasure and embarrassment which is not, I think, to be seen in any other place or time. It must be inherited from our first parent: Was it not with such a face that he took the apple?

And now that I have done mind and body, what have I left? There are three great classes of human beings—the useful, the beautiful and a Tertium quid—the Aesthetic. We have always of course had the useful; and now that we have lady Colleges as well as Heads of Colleges, we may boast the full enjoyment of the beautiful. The last is but a recent acquisition. Let me tell you the last of it. A friend of mine, when an acquaintance had cast scorn on all his pet occupations, asked in despair, "What then should he do?" "Cultivate the soul," was the answer. "And how am I to cultivate my soul?" my poor friend asked. "By not cultivating the body or the mind."

The plans for the new O.U.B.C. boat house are now on view at the 'Varsity Barge, and are generally admired. The new house will include house-room for a large number of eights and other boats, and will also contain a few good dressing rooms for the use of colleges who do not possess barges. The authorities of University College (who are the landlords of the new site) have somewhat delayed proceedings by objecting to the shape of the chimney-pots and by one or two other trivial objections of a like nature.

Most of the eights have now been out at least once or twice in their light boats, and so their respective merits can be more easily judged of. Balliol, the head boat, are certainly not good, and must fall. University are fair, and will probably improve a good deal before the races. B.N.C. are fast, though they do not seem to have improved much lately, and their change of stroke has not benefited them. Magdalen, who start second, are hot favourites for the headship, and certainly their chances seem to be very good indeed. Pembroke are slow and clumsy. Exeter and Hertford are both fast, and should rise together. Of the rest, Trinity and Worcester are the best, both being very fair indeed. St. Edmund's Hall are bad, while St. Mary's and Jesus are better than usual. Wadham is the only club unrepresented on the river.

TEMPERANCE LEGISLATION.

II.

For many years Temperance workers have directed their efforts towards the attainment of two main objects. They have endeavoured to stem the growing popular taste for intoxicants, and to awaken the public opinion of all classes to the existence of a terrible national evil. Each of these objects may now be regarded as in part accomplished. The general and growing interest of thoughtful men in the subject of national temperance is incontestable; whilst a diminution in the consumption of alcoholic drinks this year to the extent of nearly 10 per cent. tells its own tale. By general consent temperance has won its first battle; it remains to be seen whether the victory can be permanently secured. Under present circumstances it is clearly of the first importance to determine the lines which Temperance legislation should follow. Past experience has shewn the fatal consequences of mistaken legislation in this matter. The Statute Book can produce many such Acts passed with the best intentions, which have succeeded only in greatly intensifying the evils they were intended to cure. The Act permitting free trade in spirits in the eighteenth century, and the similar Act of 1830 for free trade in beer-houses are instances of this. We must now almost certainly add Mr. Gladstone's Act for the unrestrained issue of Grocers' licenses. In each of the two former cases, at least, the passing of the Acts was a signal for a flood of intemperance, which steadily advanced until it was checked by legislation in an opposite sense. The pages of Lecky shew the effect of the free trade Act of the eighteenth century, while to the Act of 1830 we owe most of our present troubles, and its complete reversal has just been effected by the Beerhouse Act of this session. On the other hand, a considerable reduction in the number of houses, where the experiment has been tried, has produced a marked improvement. The Lords' Committee cite the case of Sweden, until recently the most drunken country in the world. Here a wholesale reduction of spirit licenses in 1854 has greatly diminished intemperance. In Gothenberg, a large town of 65,000 people, the advantage of reducing the number of licenses by one half has been so marked that every large town in Sweden save one has adopted the same system. It has been objected that in England no direct relation can be shewn to exist between the number of licensed houses and the amount of intemperance. The explanation is to be found in the patent fact that even where the per centage of houses is lowest it is yet so ridiculously in excess of the real needs of the inhabitants in all cases, that comparison becomes misleading. We need everywhere a very large reduction of licensed houses to test the working of the principle; and, meanwhile, there is not a particle of evidence to shew that the effect of this reduction in England would differ from its known effect in Sweden. In view of the proposed reduction, the Licensed Victualler's Association have raised an outcry against the injustice of taxing surviving houses to compensate suppressed ones. They plead that the measure is proposed in the interests of temperance, and that it is therefore unfair to reckon on a continuance of the present rate of consumption. It would seem then that the Association is for once of the same opinion with Temperance workers as to the ultimate effect of the reduction. We have then concurrent testimony against the free trade policy, and in favour of considerable restriction, from the acknowledged evils of past free trade legislation, from the actual working of reduction in Sweden, and from the implicit statement of the Licensed Victualler's Association. Nor is it hard to see the fallacy in the free licensing argument. Free competition is for the advantage of the community, when it is not in the power of the seller to create an artificial and illicit demand. Thus in the case of ordinary articles of food, the demand rests entirely in the hands of the consumer. It is the unique property of alcohol, (and this is doubly true of adulterated alcoholic drinks), that if taken in any considerable quantities, it so injures the system as to generate an unnatural ceaseless craving. "It is an attribute of nothing else to be a food, or medicine, or a poison, according to the dosage and plan in which it is administered." The disregard of this unique nature of alcohol vitiates all free trade arguments. In any district which possesses a larger number of houses than can be kept up by a legitimate demand, the publicans are compelled to obtain a livelihood by promoting execessive drinking; unfortunately this is no very difficult task. By the extravagant issue of licences, the state has made the degradation of its citizens essential to the maintenance of a large proportion of the existing publicans, while it has armed them with fatal facilities for bringing this degradation about. Since the abolition of compulsory endorsement in 1874, the Lords report that the endorsement of licenses throughout the country has been extremely rare, and thus the evil has grown unchecked.

There seems then every reason to join in the decision of the Lords' Committee. "The Free Trade experiment, tried under the Beer Acts, is universally admitted to have failed, and there appears to be no reason for believing that any safeguards can be devised which would secure a better result."

The principle of Free Trade then being rejected, we are confronted with that of Local Option. This, in its perfectly general form, as embodied in Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Resolution, means the placing of power over the granting of all licenses in the hands of the ratepayers. As originally drafted in the Permissive Bill, it involved a power of total suppression in all places where a majority of two thirds of the ratepayers desired it; but in its present form, it is perhaps not inconsistent with a minimum limit, fixed by Parliament. Taking the measure in its original form, as the best exemplification of its actual working, although it cannot be described as vicious in principle, it is yet too dangerous, and involves too many elements of risk for adoption. To begin with, it is manifestly better in so important a matter to proceed by imperial legislation, if possible, rather than by the shifting vote of local bodies. The working of purely elective municipal boards is far too likely to be affected by local and party considerations, to make it desirable to entrust them with any power which is not strictly limited. Local boards may only be safely permitted to carry into effect a measure, the main principles of which have been carefully laid down by the Legislature. In many cases the aggrieved minority would be a considerable factor in the community, and the appearance of hardship would facilitate unlimited, often successful opposition. This would be especially likely if the majority were only just two-thirds, and the excitement of such a contest, with its effect if the agitation were successful, may be easily imagined.

No doubt Total Prohibition has worked well in cases like the large town of Saltaire, where the will of the landowner has afforded scope for its trial. The populations are content, while pauperism and crime are almost entirely absent. In the opinion of a competent medical witness of no extreme type, contained in the Church Quarterly Review for January, 1880, the open sale of ardent spirits is an "indefensible abomination," and whenever the public mind is satisfied that spirit drinking is an evil in all ordinary cases, such open sale should be prohibited; all prohibition, however, to be effectual, must be national and not local.

Digitized by Google

If then we reject the opposing theories of Free Trade and Local Option, we must fall back upon the old lines of restrictive legislation; a measure based on such lines would seem likely to meet with general approval.

This measure should include the reduction of the number of licensed houses to a reasonable percentage to population. The percentage being determined by the legislature, as in the case of the hours, would probably vary for the country and for "populous places." The other great desideratum is Sunday closing, with perhaps an open hour in the middle of the day for "off" consumption. A meal could be obtained at any time on Sunday by "bona fide" travellers. The reduction of houses could be effected in one of two ways. According to the first the local authority would give notice that after a certain licensing day the existing licenses would not be renewed; but that a specified number distributed over the different municipal districts would be offered for auction, and sold to the highest bidder, the proceeds of such sale to go towards the compensation of all claims, and the deficit, if any, to be borne by the rates. In settling the amount of compensation, it should be remembered that the monopoly is a gift of the State, and that if free trade were adopted, its fictitious value would cease. According to another scheme, embodied in the Church of England Temperance Society's Bill, the reduction to the defined percentage would be carried out gradually by a licensing board, elected by the rate-payers and magistrates jointly for this purpose, and the compensation obtained by means of a tax on the surviving houses distributed according to their rateable value.

The measure should contain further provisions for the reduction of the long night hours of opening, for compulsory endorsement of licenses, and for proper safeguards against adulteration. With the reduced number of houses, the value of the monopoly would be greatly enhanced, and by consequence the fear of losing it increased. Thus it would be the direct interest of the owners, to have well conducted houses, whereas now the interests are usually the other way. The houses would gradually again become licensed victualling houses; and voluntary effort would have fair play in the task of elevating and purifying the habits of the people.

SCHOOL SPORTS IN THE TIME OF ELIZABETH.

Nothing that is perpetual is pleasant. So our ancestors found with respect to school matters. Boys who were hardy enough to begin "before breakfast school" at five in summer, and an hour later in winter, and who frequently had a school day of from eight to nine hours, must, unless the Saxon race is different to-day in all its more pointed characteristics from what it was in the reign of the "Virgin Queen," have had vigorous and sturdy physical exercises to counter-balance such an amount of sedentary work. Those long school hours, too, were spent over ponderous tomes of the classics, for nothing else was taught, "casting of accompts," the humble predecessor of mathematical teaching, being lightly esteemed. A dread, too, of an impending "ferula," compelled the carrying on in Latin of all communications in school, between master and scholar, and boy and boy. While we feel much interest in this vigorous mental training of our predecessors at school, of boys who drank beer at breakfast, dinner, and supper, we shall perhaps feel as much in the games which were in vogue with them on "playe dayes" and which enlivened so much dismal drudgery.

In days when crowned heads took delight in witnessing cockfights, combats of dogs and bulls, of dogs and bears, and even of bulls and bears, when everything that savoured of fighting was peculiarly dear in the eyes of an Englishman, it is only natural to find that schoolboys' games were sometimes such as we should not dream of to-day. So we are not surprised to find cockfighting authoritatively recognised at Grammar schools. In some schools it was customary on each Shrove Tuesday for each boy to bring his fighting-cock to his master, and we find that—and we tremble to chronicle it—a whole morning was spent in watching a cockfight—of all places—in the school room. A curious proof of the prevalence of cockfighting is found in Dean Colet's "Statutes of St. Paul's School." We may be sure that had this custom not obtained generally it would not have been formally prohibited. The worthy Dean ordained emphatically that the "scholers were to use no cockfightinge nor riding about of victoring." Almost the same words are used in the statutes of Merchant Taylor's School. What the "riding about of victoring" was we shall see later. Cockfighting has left a curious trace at Sedbergh School, where it was, and perhaps, unless abolished under the new scheme, still is customary for the boys to pay to their masters on a particular day of each year a sum of money called "cockpenny." Again at Nottingham, "the schoolemaster and usher nor any of them," were "not to have, make, nor use any potations, cockfightings, nor drinking, but once or twice in a year." And at Hartlebury in 1557, we find it enacted "that the schoolmaster shall use and take the profits of all cockfights and potations as are commonly used in schools, and such other gifts as the friends of the scholars may give."

"Probations," or "apposing," the predecessors of annual school examinations and speech-days are a remnant of the "ridinge about of victoring," and "disputing abroade" forbidden by Colet in his clause: "I will they use no ridinge about of victoring nor disputing at Saint Bartilimewe, which is but foolish babling and losse of time." Strype, in his edition of "Stow's Survey," says, "I myself have yearly seen, on the eve of Saint Bartholomew, the scholars of divers Grammar Schools repair unto the churchyard of St. Bartholomew, the Priory in Smithfield, where, upon a bank boarded about under a tree, some one scholar hath stepped up, and there hath 'apposed' and answered till he were by some better scholar overcome and put down, and then the over-comer taking the place did like as the first. And in the end the best 'apposer and answerer' had rewards."

After dinner in the winter boys usually indulged in football. The football was of leather, "as large as a man's head, and filled with wind and tossed with the feet in the streets."

When ice came the boys skated, the "skates" being the leg bones of some animal, fastened with thongs to the boots. Thus accoutred they punted themselves along the ice with iron-shod poles. All the year round the whipping top was in favour. The whipping top we find from illuminated manuscripts was an Anglo-Saxon institution. Young England was recommended to take to the whipping-top in preference to more doubtful games, as we see from the following lines:—

"Take a tope gif thou will playe
And not at the hasardye."

This advice could not have been uncalled for, as we find that the statutes of Camberwell Grammar School, founded about this period, enacted that "money players and betters were to be punished and expulsed." Besides the whipping-top there was the game of nine pins or keyles (a corruption perhaps of the French Quilles). All the year through boys were allowed to "play at weapons," "to shote with long bowes," chess, running, wrestling, and leaping. At Easter, playing at the water Quintain came in. The Quintain was something like a vane. On an upright post a spar was fixed so as to turn freely, on one end of the spar was a target, at the other end a vessel containing water. The target was charged at full speed; if the charger were awkward, and did not take the bull's eye properly, the Quintain turning on a swivel brought a douche of water over him.

"Barring out," apparently a curious relic of a rude civilisation, was legally recognised. At Witton, in Cheshire, in 1558, we find it solemnly allowed by Statute in these words:—"That the scholars have not any evil opinion of the schoolmaster, nor the schoolmaster should not mistake the schollars for requiring of customs and orders, I will that upon Thursdaies and Saturdaies, in the afternoons and upon holydays they refresh themselves, and a week before Christmas and Easter, according to the old custom they bar and keep forth the school the schoolmaster in such sort as other schools: and that as well in the vacation as in the days aforesaid they use their bows and arrows only."

Rough as many of these customs must seem to us to-day, we must remember that it was by this training that men, famous for faculties of self-command, firmness, observation, deep thought and penetration, were moulded. And yet Mons. H. Taine, as intelligent a foreigner as has ever described the English draws this picture of the men of these times: "Des grands corps blancs, flegmatiques; des estomacs voraces, repus de viande et de fromage, rechauffés par des liqueurs fortes; un temperament froid: le penchant à l'ivrognerie brutale; ce sont là encore aujourdhui les traits que l'hérédité et le climat maintiennent dans la race anglaise."

ON PUNS.

The art of punning is the counterfeit of that of joking, or rather the one is a part or division, or more accurately a copy of the other; both of them take all subjects alike as their province, and both may be practiced in a greater or less degree by all men. He, therefore, that is a good joker and understands the sources from whence and the method by which jokes are produced, will likewise be a good punster, generally speaking, though punning, as we will attempt to shew hereafter, being but a bastard brother of joking, the true joker will refrain from practising the kindred art of punning, though understanding it well.

Let joking be defined as 'the art (or faculty) of discerning in every particular case the available means of amusing.' Now amusement, the object or end of joking, may be obtained in three ways—

(1.) Through the character of the joker, as when he maketh himself to appear ridiculous, that others may laugh thereat, as do the clowns or public jokers employed by our comic poets.

(2.) Through the state of mind of the hearers, when the joker striveth to reduce them to a condition of levity and flippancy, so that they are ready to laugh at nothing. This method is especially affected by punsters to economise their wit.

(3.) Through the citation of amusing incident, which may be done either verbally or pictorially. This is the main substance or body of the art.

Now amusing incident may be produced in two ways; for either it may be sought out and stored in the memory, in which case pains must be taken to effect a suitable opportunity for its introduction, or else it may be suddenly developed whenever the suitable opportunity occurs. The latter is the more approved, the former the more easy course. But care should in all cases be taken that the same incidents be not frequently repeated to the same persons except after long intervals of time.

Again, incident may appear to be amusing for two reasons; firstly, indeed, on account of the matter related being itself such as men are wont to laugh at, but secondly from its being narrated in a manner that causeth laughter (for laughter is the external or bodily sign of amusement), and it is in respect of the manner of narration rather than in the matter that is narrated that a pun appeareth amusing.

Punning, then, is a degraded form of joking, which by means of the identity or similarity of sounds expressing different meanings seeketh to arrive at incongruous conclusions, which being incongruous produce a tickling sensation of pleasure or amusement in small and ill-balanced minds. It is not an uncommon device of punsters to put some paradoxical query by way of introducing their art; thus one will ask 'When is a door not a door?' not that he desireth to examine scientifically the metaphysical relations of Being and Not-being, but rather that having startled and confounded his hearers he may himself give the fallacious and misleading reply, 'When it's a-jar,' misleading, in as much as it is impossible for a door to desert its own nature and become an earthen vessel, or, in the language of the Platonists, for the Absolute and Unchangeable Idea of Door to be commingled with the Absolute and Unchangeable Idea of Jar.

As to the character of the men who follow the art of punning, we may speak quite briefly. For the most part, indeed, they are low and foolish, but at times one may find men, in other respects worthy and honourable, afflicted with this dangerous habit, like a comely tree with blight: the young are more liable to this affection than the old, as being more addicted to the pursuit of trifling matters generally, and as having had less experience of the pain which punsters often cause unto those that are compelled to listen unto them. Not that I would say that punning must ever entirely fail to amuse, else it were not to be included under the art of Joking, but rather that, through the weakness of them that practise it, for the most part it faileth to attain its object, both in other men, and especially with the wise and discerning, producing not amusement and laughter, but vexation and strange oaths.

When a man hath made a pun, he hath a self-conscious aspect, and smileth, either universally, or for the most part, as being pleased with his own skill, and looketh upon his hearers as who should say 'Laugh, for I have made a pun;' whereupon the hearers as many indeed as are foolish, laugh and appear amused; but the wise among them laugh not, but gravely as men that have not understood the matter, seek a full and careful explanation. And punsters love not explanations, because the shallowness and fallacy of their method is thereby revealed.

For in truth, as it seemeth to me, punning is a branch of sophistic, and a pun is a kind of fallacious syllogism, such as we have described in the Topics, with the first term omitted. Thus, if a man saith that his tobacco-pipe* is like a popular comedy because it draws well, supposing that he hath made a pun and laughing much thereat, he argueth in this way:

To draw well is one mark of a popular comedy;
My tobacco-pipe draweth well;
Therefore my tobacco pipe in one respect is like a popular comedy.

And this seemeth to him incongruous, wherefore he laugheth.

— — — — — — — — —

(Here there appears to be a hiatus in the M.S.)

If any man therefore will make puns, let him make good puns, and those but few: and indeed as it seemeth to me, he will do best of all that maketh no puns whatever.

THE PAPER-KNIFE.

Classical Writers. Edited by J. R. Green. (Macmillan, 1879.)

Euripides. By Prof. Mahaffy.

This little book, though a very useful one, serves as an example of the evil caused by the numberless series of primers so fashionable in the present day, namely, a want of breadth which sacrifices to the study of the subject immediately in hand, that wider and more general survey of men and facts which is so essential to true knowledge. Consequently in the volume before us we are at first somewhat shocked by its polemical tone; Prof. Mahaffy writes as if he had just been arguing with some one about Euripides and had hardly recovered his equanimity, and in the endeavour to raise him in our estimation, he sometimes attacks Aeschylus and Sophocles as dangerous rivals, instead of allowing them an equal share of merit.

But this objection is greatly reduced by the consideration that in assuming an apologetic tone, Prof. Mahaffy is on the right side; for he is defending a man who has been most unfairly treated, and as the champion of the weaker but better cause, he deserves all our respect. And here we should like to assert that we fully agree with Prof. Mahaffy in his favourable view of his subject, and to point out that Euripides has never received the just criticism accorded to his great rivals. Scholars have always admired Aeschylus and Sophocles, the former as a test of their ingenuity, the latter as a model of pure Greek thought and language. But Euripides has neither the grammatical difficulties of the one or the classical correctness of the other. Yet he is more truly human than both; he appeals to wider sympathies, and yet he is restricted to the same narrow criticism of unappreciative scholars as his rivals, under which he suffers far greater disadvantages. Until he is studied with more intelligent appreciation, Euripides will never be fairly understood.

We have strayed somewhat from Prof. Mahaffy; we return to him with the more pleasure as we can hail him as one of the foremost leaders of a movement towards that "consummation devoutly to be wished" to which we have just alluded. His opinion of Euripides is based upon real feeling and sound appreciation; nor, in his favourable estimate, has he fallen into the errors of those admirers from whom the tragedian has suffered as much as from his detractors; there is no unmeaning praise, no palliation of defects. In conclusion, we can recommend the work to all our readers; it is very interesting, and what is more important, very suggestive. But we cannot help expressing a hope that Prof. Mahaffy will return to that wider study of Greek literature of which, as he has already shown us, he is pre-eminently capable.

Livy. By W. W. Capes, M.A.

Mr. Capes, the Reader in Ancient History at Oxford, is well known as the author of "The Early Roman Empire" and "The Age of the Antonines," books remarkable for beauty of style and for the scientific spirit in which they are conceived. His little volume on "Livy" does not disappoint our expectations. In the brief space of 120 pages we have an account of "Livy as a literary man at Rome," an estimate of his chief characteristics, and a vivid sketch of the different periods of which his history treats. Besides this we are furnished with information on various collateral subjects, i.e., the credibility of the history of the Kings, the origin of the Plebs, the rise of the Comitia, and an extremely interesting discussion on Roman policy in the East. It will thus be seen that the book will be of great service not only to the reader of "Livy," but also to the ordinary student of Roman History. We could not recommend any better introduction to the scientific study of the latter subject. In conclusion, by way of illustrating Mr. Capes' method of treatment, we quote the following passage on the Revolutionary Struggles at Rome:—

"But Rome herself was not long to be spared some at least of the miseries which she had brought on the surrounding nations. The arrogant self-assertion of the ruling families had grown to an unexampled height; their merciless greed was turning the gardens of the world into a desert, while they were heaping up colossal fortunes for their children; but the population of Italy was being ruined by constant war and neglect of economic evils; the sturdy yeomanry was dying out, and their place was being taken by slave-labourers in the country, and a motley populace in the large towns, scrambling for the doles of noble bounty, and claiming to subsist as pensioners upon a subject-world. Soon the Gracchi were to appear upon the scene, clamouring for legislation to be carried through and for the lower orders, thus striving to break down the exclusive power of the senatorian rulers, and opening the long period of Revolution, which was to bring un-numbered evils upon Italy, and to be closed only by the Empire."

G. M. E.

In the notice of "Post-Epic Words" &c., the reviewer seems to think it very extraordinary, and nothing less than a proof of mental imbecility ("curious inability to grasp a question as a whole") that "the work of the Alexandrine Critics is virtually ignored." He supposes that I "utterly forgot the fact" that those eminent scholars had revised the text after Plato!

If I forgot such a fact as that, I certainly was quite incompetent to write about Homer at all. But the simple truth is, that F. A. Wolf has treated so exhaustively the subject of the recensions of Zenodotus and his Alexandrine successors, in chaps xli—l of his Prolegomena, that it seemed wholly unnecessary for me to add a single word about them in a short pamphlet of 36 pages.

My argument applies to a period fully two centuries earlier, when, as we know from Plato and Xenophon, the rhapsodists, whom the latter twice calls (Conv. iii. 5 and Mem. iv. 2. 10) "great fools" lived and sang. To "begin with the Alexandrine critics," so far from being "the only really scientific method," would be to begin at the end. It is something startling to be told, that to begin at the beginning is "a radically vicious method." If so, it is one that Wolf himself has adopted. I trust this is not a specimen of Cambridge logic.

As it is certain that Pindar and the Tragic poets used a different Homer from ours, I think the "Professionals" of B.C. 400 may have had more to do with "our Homer" than Mr. Grote or Mr. Gladstone supposes. And I think this view, in itself a very reasonable one, is strongly supported by the "Non-Homeric" character of the earlier vase-paintings, and by an examination of the Homeric language.

I fail to see why such very hard and even contemptuous epithets should be applied to me, because long study and research have brought me to the same conclusion as C. G. Cobet, that our Homer texts are "the work of many poets of different ages and countries" (Miscell. Crit. p. 402.)

POETRY.

CASABIANCA.

(A new and improved version.)

Alas, the horrors of a war
At sea! 'Tis sad to think
How many gallant ships blow up,
How many others sink.

For me to sing, but not the first
An oft repeated tale
Of one whose body fed the fish,
Fit subject for a wail.

Casabianca was his name,
A proper boy was he,
He'd firm attachment for the ship
A hankering for the sea.

Of the French fleet his father was
The gallant commodore,
He took his little son on board
To save his board on shore.

A powerful fleet was soon sent forth
From Britain's sunny isle,
Near Egypt it attacked the French,
August the first (old style).

The English fleet drove back the foe,
And many a ship was sunk;
But 'mid the crash of falling spars,
That young boys heart ne'er shrunk.

His father when he left the deck,
Had told him there to stay,
And (perhaps because he couldn't swim)
He could not disobey.

"Father!" he cried in accents shrill
"Oh tell me, may I go."
But while the bullets hailed above
Dead silence reigned below.

For all but he had left the ship
Except the Commodore,
He wounded in the cabin lay,
Extended on the floor.

The ship blew up with loud report,
He left the deck, 'tis true
But his father could not blow him up
For he was blown up too.

THE UNIVERSITY PULPIT:

SUPPLEMENT TO

The Cambridge Review.

No. 19. WEDNESDAY, April 28, 1880.

Sunday, April 25, Sermon by the Rev. F. W. Farrar, D.D., Trinity College.

"The letter killeth."—2 Col. iii. 6.

"In which are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, to their own destruction."—2 Peter iii., 16.

On previous occasions, when it has been my duty to preach from this pulpit, I have preached on subjects connected with the defence and practice of Christianity; on the Fall of Man, on the Witness of History to Christ, on the voices in which God speaks to us, and on matters of deep importance to human progress or the welfare of the individual soul. I desire now to say a few imperfect words on the right use and interpretation of Scripture, a subject which largely affects the work of the Church of God. I desire, if I may, to lead you to the impartial, unbiassed, fearless, truthful, and, above all, wise and loving study of the Holy Scriptures, by pointing out to you not only some of the follies, but some of the deadly evils which have resulted from a neglect of the warning that it is possible to wrest it to perdition. My brethren, let me not be misunderstood. In humblest reverence for the Holy Scriptures; in devout acceptance of their eternal principles; in heartfelt thankfulness for the inestimable boon of their guidance and consolation; in glad admiration of the divine beauty which they exhibit; in the deepening certainty that there is neither help nor comfort for man to be found anywhere except in the lessons which they teach; I yield neither to the most learned nor the most ignorant worshipper of the letter, though I regard a blind letterworship as a dishonouring invention which is the main cause of unbelief in this age, and has been prolific of evil in ages past. It is to dishonour the Bible—for it is to ignore its teachings—if we deny that there are many revelations of God to man. He reveals Himself in science; He reveals Himself in the phenomena of the universe; He reveals Himself in the majestic uniformity of natural law; He reveals Himself in History; He reveals Himself in the individual consciences of men; above all in this last Gospel dispensation does He reveal Himself by the Inspiration of that Holy Spirit which He has promised to them that seek Him. In the Holy Scriptures He has spoken through the minds of holy men of old in a revelation which enables us to interpret all the others. But all Scripture is not the same Scripture. One book has not the same value as another book, nor one passage as another passage. The Book of Ecclesiastes does not stand on the same level as the Gospel of St. John; nor the Book of Esther as the Acts of the Apostles; nor the Levitic system as the Epistles of St. Paul. "One star differeth from another star in glory." If the Jews said that the whole law was equally precious and sacred from "in the beginning God made the world" to "their five sockets were of brass," that was a part of the degraded superstition which provoked the Nemesis of reaction, and ended in their rudely dishonouring the very letter which they professed to worship. The word of God was given πολυμέρως καὶ πολυτρόπως, fragmentarily and multifariously. It was given fragmentarily, one fragment to Adam, another to Noah, another to Abraham, another to Moses, another to the Prophets. Now the doctrine of the Unity of God; now the dawn of the Messianic promise; now the grandeur of the moral Law; then the more spiritual ideal of Prophecy; lastly the full doctrine of immortality and the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

And it was given multifariously, by experience, by discovery, by history, by the voice of conscience, by art, by men of many conditions and many minds; now by a Gentile sorcerer, now by a suffering king, now by a gatherer of sycamore fruit,—until at last He who had spoken to the fathers by the Prophets spoke in these last days to us by His Son. And though amid this diversity there is a Divine unity, yet to put all these different utterances on the same level; to speak as though human peculiarities were obliterated; to assume that a precept, which had a special and a temporal reference to Israel in one dispensation, is to be made a final guide to England under another; to hold up as a moral example the deed of Jael, and to give strange typical significance to the aberrations of Samson, is to violate every rule of tenable criticism; to introduce into religion a monstrous casuistry; to crush the very life out of an intelligent and honest faith. More than this, it is to run counter to the plainest principles laid down both by the Prophets and by Christ Himself. The Law was holy and just and good, yet St. Peter spoke of it as a yoke which neither they nor their fathers were able to bear: St. Paul characterised its ordinances as "beggarly elements," and our blessed Lord Himself contrasted what had been said to them of old time with what He said, and declared that Moses had suffered things not intrinsically desirable because of the hardness of their hearts. And yet the method of treating all Scripture as if every word of it were equally divine, though disclaimed in words, is pursued in fact alike by the learned and by the ignorant; and you may see whole commentaries written even in these days on the tacit assumption that Scripture is a talisman, "equipollent in all its parts," of which even the most incompetent tacitly claim the power of infallible interpretation. My brethren, as one who loves and honours the Bible with all his heart; who would echo from his heart every word of the glorious thanksgiving for God's Law of the 119th Psalm; who would willingly devote his life to make known its truths, and to help clear their interpretation from centuries of error, I still say that no man can love the Bible aright who asserts for it more than it ever claims, and much that its whole structure and history, as well as its own express utterances, discountenance. No man can be its wise interpreter, who, mainly on the strength of a single mistranslated text, stretched to the extremest limit of impossible and unnatural inference—asserts the equal supernatural inspiration of every word, syllable, and letter; no man who does not admit that it can only be interpreted by the rules which govern all human language; who does not see the meaning of the wise principle which even the Jews theoretically accepted, that "the law speaks in the tongue of the sons of men."

It is one thing to be true to the Bible, and quite another to be true to the masses of traditional systems which crowd the commentaries upon it; and he, who dreads above all things the pestilent air of religious insincerity, must refuse to act like those Churches and sects, and parties, who, in many different epochs, and in many different manners, have as it were betrayed the Bible with a kiss.

Now is it, I ask you, possible, without the blindest prejudice, to deny that in all ages incredible harm has been done to mankind by false claims of infallible literalism? For great moral principles, for the Divine Teaching of the Spirit of God, for the revelation of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, we all turn, we can but turn to the Holy Book. It is one of God's most precious gifts to man. But if corruptio optimi pessima, ought we not to deplore with all our hearts the misuse of that Book to the serious injury of mankind? Ought we not to strive with all our hearts, that we, in our generation, may not be of the number of those who so abuse the light of heaven as therewith to lead astray the souls of men? Ought we not to be very humble in our use of Scripture; to take solemn warning from the flagrant instances of error in its interpretation, and sin in its abuse, by which God, who shews all things in the slow history of their ripening, would teach us better and wiser courses, as we study the history of the Church and of the world?

I can of course do no justice to this great and solemn theme. To do so would require a volume, nor do I pretend to the learning, nor have I one hundreth part of the leisure, which would be needed for its composition. All I can do is to touch on one or two points; only praying to God that, if my words be mistaken, He may enable you to see their error, but if they be true, as it seems to me, with such light as He has given me, they are irrefragably true, then He may make them bring forth good fruit hereafter for the blessing of the world.

Take one instance, then, of the way in which the Bible has been grievously misused by the perversion of its isolated expressions to arrest the beneficent progress of Science. The unholy antithesis between science and religion should alone be a shame to us. True religion can never come into collision with true science, though true science, to the great blessing of mankind, has often flung to the four winds the arrogant errors of a false theology. How can science, which means a right knowledge of the laws and phenomena of nature, ever clash with religion, which means established truth respecting the relations between God and man? Religion has, alas, been too often identified with the views and practice of this or that party or sect,—walls of untempered mortar which the progress of science has left in hopeless ruins. And since the positive results of science, those even which have in their origin been most fiercely denounced as heretical, have been an inestimable blessing to mankind; what a disgrace to false religious assumptions have been the martyrdoms of science; what an insult to mankind has been the sight of

"Blind authority, beating with his staff
The child that might have led him"!

Is there no significance in the fact that science should have utterly slumbered during those long ages in which it was falsely assumed that the Church and the Bible were the only sources of scientific truth? Is there no warning against the assumption of an ignorant infallibility in such names as those of Virgilius, Roger Bacon, Copernicus, Campanella, Vanini, Columbus, Vesalius, Galileo, Kepler, Descartes? What was it that led St. Ambrose to assert with indignation the existence of a solid sky? that made the whole orthodox world of the early centuries deny as irreligous the existence of the antipodes? which entangled physicists in all sorts of erroneous hypotheses? which originated the portentous theories of crowds of religious pamphleteers? which made the clergy, in an overwhelming majority, oppose the inauguration of the Royal Society? which, in the suspected dawn of every nascent science, has led those who sheltered themselves under mis-application of texts to sadden the hearts—which God had not made sad—of the benefactors of mankind? What led in the early days of geology to sentences like this on the pages of the clerical and university author of "Popular Geology subversive of Divine Religion?" "What," he wrote, "was God doing before the first of the six days of creation? He was preparing from everlasting a hell for all infidel enquirers." We may profess to blush for such language now, but in its day it was welcomed with unbounded applause as an uncompromising anathema of sinful error. All this wrong and ingratitude, and retardation of the progress of mankind has been due to the blindness and folly of men, who preferred to claim a monopoly of the private interpretation of scripture—the sin of Priests and Pharisees—dogmatising about that of which they did not understand so much as the very rudiments; professing to hold the key of knowledge while they neither went in themselves, nor suffered others to enter. Few follies have been so unfortunate in their issues as the presumptuous deification of their own opinion, by those who "imposed the senses of men upon the words of God, the special senses of men upon the general words of God, and laid them upon men's consciences together, under the equal penalty of 'death and damnation'"?

And yet, disastrous as have been the negative consequences of thus perverting scripture to purposes for which it never was intended, they are as nothing to the positive evils which the persistent aggressiveness of this error has inflicted upon mankind. By the fruits of this practice you shall know it. The greatest of all the boons which the progress of the ages has brought to us have been connected with the cause of freedom, of toleration, and of enlightenment. We might have learnt from the spirit of scripture those glorious lessons. Past ages, by rightly understanding the principles of scripture, might have enjoyed them. But the letter of scripture has been used to murder its spirit, and its eternal principles have been strangled for centuries by the misappropriation of its chance expressions. Alas that slavery, alas that persecution, alas that superstition should have drawn their deadliest engine from the perversion of Scripture texts! Does it not furnish us with but too melancholy a proof that "The Devil can quote Scripture for his purpose." And again that in religion

"What damned error but some sober brow
Will bless it, and approve it with a text,
Hiding the grossness with fair ornament?"

In the name of Christ, in the name of all that He taught, in the name of all for whom He died, I do esteem it a matter of extreme importance that you should early be put on your guard against courses which have been so dangerous to mankind. Many of you will be clergymen. All the more earnest of you will grow up to exercise a religious influence. Those only who, ostrichlike, hide their heads in the sand of their own party, can be unaware of the extent to which wisdom and candour are needed to prevent a widespread alienation from religious truth among the foremost intellectual classes. Now by Pharisaic hardness, by obstinate prejudice, by stiff-necked and unwarrantable dogmatism, by the ignorant presumption which leads men to rush at once into anathemas of every opinion not their own, you may indeed gain earthly success and become the idols of a party, and go about as others do, slandering others as heretics, and saying of your brethren and your betters that they are "dangerous" and "pernicious" and "do not preach Christ." In the conceit of a usurped infallibility you may sit in the high places and rail at those who are truer saints of God than you:—but, by so doing, however loudly your partisans may sound your praises, you will but have hindered the work of God. Your work will be foredoomed to worthlessness and sterility. You will have done far more harm by your narrow bitterness, than you fancy yourself to have done good by your "uncompromising orthodoxy." You may be forgiven, because you have done it ignorantly; but your work will be as chaff in the consuming fire. Think not that it is saying "Lord, Lord" which will save you; you may boast your familiarity with His name; you may claim to have preached nothing but Him crucified; but the cloke of "Evangelical" or of "Churchman" will not hide the sins of the Pharisee, nor will the iteration of angry Shibboleths about the divinity of your Saviour excuse the habitual violation of His new commandment. If you use texts as a goad to theologic hatred, and a hindrance to human thought, the whole spirit of the Scriptures will rise up in the Day of Judgment against you and condemn you for the wrongs which you inflict from your idolatry of its letter.

And yet to how terrible an extent has this been done. If I were to ask you which are the most thrilling pages in the whole history of Europe, you would probably answer, those which narrate to us the achievement of civil liberty. Now the spirit of the Bible from end to end is a spirit of liberty; and in the very earliest books of the Bible you may read some of the very noblest pæans to liberty which were ever sung. And yet did not the most crushing tyrannies—social, ecclesiastical, and civil—build the stronghold of which they boasted as of an impregnable fortress, in the habitual misuse of isolated texts? Take civil liberty first, and suffer me to ask you two questions. First, Are even the rudiments of civil liberty permanently possible to a people which, accepting the slavish doctrines of non-resistance and passive obedience, suppose that God has created man to be the footstool of a few families? And next, did these two slavish doctrines ever put forth even a pretention to exist, other than they derived from an array of texts—multitudinous enough, I admit, but interpreted and applied not only with no reference to the general spirit of the Bible, and no reference to the continuous enlightenment of the Church by the Spirit of God, but in flagrant violation of all rules of historic circumstance and of common sense? Undoubtedly scripture wisely teaches the rule of obedience to kings, and uses such expressions as 'the Lord's anointed'; but since alike the common sense and the religious instinct have taught us that such texts, however unlimited their statement, are not to be so used as to subject millions of mankind to the intolerable wickedness of one who, like a Nero, a Domitian, may be the vilest of their race, this ought alone to teach us that texts of Scripture are not to be thus wrested to the perdition of national happiness. Yet how was Scripture used in the great contests of England for civil liberty? For one sermon preached on faith and repentance, three were preached on the divine right of kings; and "'Tis hard to say," writes a contemporary, "whether Jesus Christ or King Charles the First were oftener mentioned and magnified": "the theory of government," as the historian tells us, "which had long been taught by the clergy, was so absurd that it could lead to nothing but absurdity." And yet though the clergy had taught, so long and so persistently, that passive obedience was enjoined, without restriction or exception, by the divine law, so hollow was the belief inspired by a false scriptural method that Oxford itself, the headquarters of the doctrine of non-resistance, had to be kept down by sword and carbine when their theories were put to the test of practice. And if after all this 'double cloak of loyalty' was, 'well lined with the fox-fur of hypocrisy,' what was the cause why the teachings of the clergy were heart and soul on the side of tyranny? Why was it that they so long hindered the cause of progress when the nation was fighting for its just and necessary liberty? The mischief was due, not to dishonesty, not to baseness of nature, but simply and solely to wrong methods, to baseless dogmas, to unintelligent literalism in the interpretation of isolated texts.

Again, consider what a wrong to Europe, what a shame to Christianity, was the ecclesiastical despotism of the Middle Ages. On what was it built? Why were the Popes able to impose on the free conscience of mankind that crushing yoke? How came the nations to tolerate for a single moment the portentous pretentions of the Bulls Ausculta fili and Unam sanctam? What made the horrified world submit to the domination of five such monsters in succession as Paul II., Sixtus IV., Innocent VIII., Alexander VI., and Julius II.? What can the whole system even pretend to be, except an inverted pyramid of false inferences resting upon its apex in a misapplied text? Christ said to His apostle, "Thou art Peter and on this rock will I build my Church." The exact meaning of the words must ever remain uncertain; but though all the subsequent history shews that it conferred on Peter no primacy whatever; though he was not even Bishop of Jerusalem; though beyond all question he did not found the Church of Rome; though it is not even historically demonstrable (however probable) that he ever was in Rome at all; yet by this single text, which they have blazoned as the very charter of their usurpation round the great dome of St. Peter's, the Roman Bishops first asserted for Peter a spiritual supremacy which he never possessed; then stretched this imaginary spiritual supremacy into a claim for the supreme arbitrament of infallible inspiration; then by a monstrous leap of inference asserted an impossible extension of this supposed supremacy of Peter as the inalienable right of all his supposed successors; then, by another monstrous leap of inference, claimed that the spiritual supremacy thus daringly usurped involved also the feudal supremacy, till in the days when Rome had made the world drunk with the wine of her fornication, the Popes in great swelling words of vanity claimed to be treated as gods on earth; the abused deluded world could gaze calmly on such spectacles of sacerdotal tyranny as Henry IV., of Germany shivering half-naked for three wintry days in the castle court at Canossa, and Barbarossa receiving on his neck the foot of the proud pontiff, till at last when the priest had 'turned Atheist as did Eli's sons, who filled with lust and violence the house of God,' the sense and the scorn and the genius of Luther shook the whole baseless fabric in ruins to the ground.

Take again the institution of slavery itself. "Would you come between a man and his freehold"? said a supporter of the slave trade to O'Connell. "I started," said the great orator, "as if something unholy had trampled on my father's grave, and I exclaimed with horror, "A freehold in a human being!" Yet this claim to "freeholds in human beings," this violation, by deeds of cruelty for purposes of greed, of the very primary rights of man—was regarded as positively religious, because it could be defended by the rude letter worship which thinks it sufficient to uphold any folly however glaring, and any wrong however gross, if it can pretend to be sheltered under the cover of a text. You may profess to blush for such use of Scripture, you may profess to repudiate it now; but what was it, which, until the conscience of England was once fairly roused, made even respectable men fight hard in this conspiracy against the first laws of righteousness? Can you give me any other answer than that it was because, misled by false dogmas, they blinded themselves by a misuse of texts. Why was it that when, here at Cambridge, in the year 1785, the subject was set for an essay, "Is it lawful to enslave people against their will?" that subject was regarded an open question. Never was the setting of a subject so prolific of blessing. It touched to the quick the conscience of Clarkson, who won the Essay Prize; and so led, twenty-two years after, to the abolition of the slave trade, and forty-eight years after, to the emancipation of 800,000 souls. By that time men had got to call the slave trade by its true name—"guilt, oppression, the open sore of the world"; but when the fight of the abolitionists began, this guilty traffic in flesh and blood was regarded as a pious and scriptural institution, consecrated by the wisdom of our ancestors, and dear to the heart of George III. But why did the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel once derive a part of its income from slaves? Why did John Newton say he had never had such heavenly hours as when he was the master of a slave-ship? Why did George Whitefield reckon slavery, after carts and horses, as part of the property of his orphanage in Georgia? Why, but because, by one of those grotesque perversions of which other specimens, nearly, if not quite as bad, still pass current as reverence for scripture, God was supposed to have ordained slavery, because Ham had behaved wickedly towards his drunken father? "I draw my warrant from Scripture to hold the slave in bondage," wrote one American clergyman, "the principle of holding the heathen in bondage is recognised by God." "Dear Christian brethren," wrote another to a certain presbytery, "if there be any minister among you, tainted with the dangerous principles of Abolitionism, let him be ferreted out, silenced, excommunicated, and left to the public to dispose of in other respects." "From its inherent nature," said Bishop Hopkins of Vermont, "slavery has been a curse and blight wherever it exists; yet it is warranted in the Bible. Therefore, as slavery is recognised by the Bible, every man has a right to own slaves, provided they are not treated with unnecessary cruelty." Who shall say that, on the premisses which they adopted, such vile arguments were not perfectly logical? The slave owner only did as thousands do to this day: they picked from scripture the texts which sanctioned their hatred or their greed, ignored all which told against them; murdered the spirit by the letter; and used texts, ignorantly misapplied, to trample on the instinctive feelings of mankind. Rarely has fiction rendered a nobler service than when it helped to overthrow the supposed scriptural formation of the covenant with sin and death. You have doubtless read the scene of which I here quote but one or two sentences. "'It is undoubtedly the intention of Providence that the African race should be servants, kept in a low condition,' said a grave-looking gentleman in black, a clergyman, seated by the cabin door. "Cursed be Canaan, a servant of servants shall he be," the scripture says. The brutal slave owner listens to the argument with delight. 'All things, whatsoever ye would that men would do unto you, do ye even so unto them.' "I suppose that is scripture as much as 'Cursed be Canaan,'" replies another clergyman who is present. "I say now," said the drover," (pardon my language, my brethren, for the sake of the thought which lies behind it), "'there's difference in parsons, ain't there. 'Cursed be Canaan' doesn't seem to go down with this one, does it? And that isn't the worst of it; maybe it won't go down with the Lord neither, when we come to settle with Him one of these days, as all of us must I reckon." But once again I say that this vast crime against humanity, in spite of the horrors with which it was accompanied, and against which Turner preached his lurid sermon of the slave ship, was defended, and solely defended, by the abuse of scripture texts; and it is but this month that a voice from America has accounted for the failure and acidity of the Pulpit of the South, because, when it has touched on earthly affairs at all, it has exhausted its logic and passion upon apologies for slavery, and because the last printed form of piety, which the church of the Southern States sent forth over the world, was an argument that the bondage of the Negro to the white race was a relationship natural and valuable, and that it must for ever be esteemed and preserved.

Again, what ever has been, what is at this moment a greater curse to the Church and the world than a cruel and brutal intolerance? The whole scope of the teaching of Christ is in favour of tolerance. He was tolerant to the Sadducees; tolerant to the Samaritans; tolerant even to the arch-intolerance of the Pharisees. Their whole religion had curdled into a religion of shibboleths and ceremonies, of hatred and contempt. The very spirit of His Gospel was that of gentleness, forbearance, and long suffering. We are told that once when Omar was preaching an aged Christian ventured to make some humble objection. "If that old man speak again strikes off his head," said Omar, and quietly continued his sermon. It is impossible to conceive words more alien to the spirit of Christianity; yet they have been practically used again and again, not only by Popes, but by Reformers, by Synods, by Presbyterians, and by Councils. And that is why, from the page of History, the names of Fra Dolcino, Savonarola, Huss, Jerome of Prague, Servetus, Cranmer, Hooper, Ridley, Latimer, and so many more of that noble army of martyrs, plead trumpet-tongued against the "deep damnation of their taking off." Why was there all this persecution, burning, cursing, scourging, strangling, torturing, imprisoning of men for not subscribing to the words of men as the words of God? Why for so many centuries was tyranny the devil's instrument to support error and superstition? Why has not 'Love,' but "Anathema Maranatha," been so often the watchword for Propagandists? What made even John Knox revel in such exhortations to pitiless persecution that one has called him the "great Apostle of murder?" Why did Cortes weave blue and white flames on the banner with which he advanced to the conquest of Mexico? Why does the reek of Smithfield still seem to blow across whole reigns of English History? Why did a Pope solemnly return thanks to Heaven for the massacre of St. Bartholomew? Why did a triumphant Sacerdotalism enforce its own private interpretations by that Inquisition, which cannot even be mentioned without execration, abhorrence, and disgust? Why is it impossible to read about Arnold of Citeaux, bidding his foul crusaders at Berien 'Slay them all, God will know his own,' without groaning aloud, "Oh Religion, what infamies are committed in thy name?" But what was it which drugged men's conscience to contemplate such horrors without revolt? It was mainly the letter which killeth; mainly the perversion of Scripture texts. "Compel them to come in." What mattered it that the compulsion implied in the Parable is merciful, not sanguinary,—a compulsion to inward acceptance, not to outward conformity, and employed to overcome the humble despair of the penitent, not the proud resistance of the heretic? "Compel,"—there the word stood,—that was enough; and to that fetish of the grossly perverted letters hecatombs of human victims were burnt alive. 'Men cast them into the fire, and they are burned.' What mattered it that the words are purely metaphorical; that they are but the physical imagery of the general picture? that, even if theology is to be built on the imagery of parables, they refer only to the world beyond? that the previous part of the verse does not even refer to future consequences, but to necessary laws? Et ardent—those two words, we are told, let us say rather their shameful and ignorant misapplication were enough to turn whole countries into valleys of Hinnom, in which their noblest sons were burnt alive to the Moloch of superstition; to kindle fires of death of which the ashes have ever since been to many nations as a boil breaking forth with blains on man and beast.

What need is there to multiply evidence that in age after age the letter killeth? Do you or do you not believe in witchcraft? Was it sensible that because of a word of dubious meaning mankind should be half maddened with ignorant terrors? Was it right that wherever clerical influence predominated in the middle ages the persecution of witches raged with fearful intensity, 7000 being burnt at Treves, 800 in a single year at Wurtzburg, 1000 in a single year at Como? Was the Church of Rome right to strain every nerve in stimulating the persecution, and to support it with the whole stress of her infallibility? What was it that caused that chapter of horrors, so that those who disbelieved in witches were branded with the charge of stupid infidels and obdurate Sadducees, but the text in Leviticus "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live," even when some argued that the word in Leviticus rendered "witch" should be rendered "poisoner." The persecution was weakened, and in spite of Wesley's remark (which ought to teach us a new lesson of caution) that giving up witchcraft is in effect giving up the Bible, a belief in witchcraft in these days is set down as the grossest superstition, and a source of unspeakable agony has been swept away by the liberation of mankind from the letter that killeth—from the perversion of isolated texts.

These are but instances, a few out of multitudes. It was the letter that killeth which led to "decretum, horribile fateor, attamen verum" of Calvin; to the superstition of the mass; to the decision that all infants dying unbaptized were damned; to the representation of God in a manner to revolt the conscience of mankind; to theories of the Atonement which were little less than a blasphemy against the love of our Father in Heaven. There is hardly a heresy of sect or party, hardly an usurpation of kings or priests, hardly an error in sociology or science, which has not appealed to, or relied upon, the abuse of texts. Every burning for opinions which history records, every imprisonment, every persecution, every falsely attached stigma of infidelity, every slander of theological hatred, every endeavour to kindle in the supposed cause of religion the blind passions of the mob, every attempt to degrade Scripture into a wrangling ground for sectarian differences, and to split it up into missiles to be used in fierce battle against our brethren in the Church of God, are but so many illustrations furnished to impress on us the neglected warning that the letter killeth; are but so many lessons to shew us the peril of following the mass of theologians,—all the more unlearned from their asserted knowledge, and all the more ignorant from their assumed infallibility—who have wrested the Scriptures of God, not to their own injury only, but also to the perdition of mankind.

Time forbids me to shew you how this method of exegesis, which atttaches a false reverence to the letter, while it neglects the eternal teaching of the spirit, began among the Jews after the exile when the devil of apostacy had been cast out, but the seven other devils of formalism, superstition, and intolerance came in and dwelt there, how it began in the days when there was no Prophet more, and the light flashed no longer on the Urim's graven gems; how the scribes, with superfluous superstition, counted that there were 815,200 letters in the Pentateuch, and that the middle letter occurs in Leviticus xi., 42; how there arose first 7, then 31, then 49 rules of interpretation; and then the rule that every Rabbi should explain a verse in a multitude of different ways as a hammer dashes a rock into many fragments; how this false type of goodness and false type of orthodoxy led to a boundless hypocrisy and a murderous hatred; how the Pharisaism which murdered the Christ was followed by the Rabbinism which accepted Bar Kosiba; how the very system which professed the abject bondage to articulate or written vocables, and invented the Kabbalistic and numerical system which professed to find a mystery in every horn and curl of a letter, was yet ready impudently to falsify the text, and impudently to set aside its clearest meanings. Nor would it be difficult to shew you that there has always been this tendency of priests and interpreters, first to degrade by unintelligent fetichism and then to supersede, as of secondary importance, the sacred books which they profess to reverence, and that this Jewish method, so fruitless and so dangerous, has continued almost in full force through Fathers, through schoolmen, through reformers, through Anglicans, Nonconformists, commentators of all kinds, down to this present day.

But it is time for me to conclude, and I will conclude by exhorting and entreating you to think deeply over what you have heard this afternoon; if it be untenable, reject it; but if it be true, I would urge you for your own sakes, for the sake of the Church, for the sake of the world,—you whose lives are before you—you who will have no small influence hereafter in helping or hindering the religion of the future,—you who (such poor blind creatures are we at the best) may for all but your own little clique of partisans irretrievably injure religion by the very methods which you rashly imagined to be taken in its defence,—I entreat you to consider what ways of interpreting Scripture have been, and what ways have not been, fruitful and blessed for the happiness of mankind. If—(alas, and shame to us that it should be so)—if the Scriptures have been cited, have been perverted in defence of tyranny, of cunning, of assassination, of slavery, of persecution, of cruel repressions, of dangerous customs, of exterminating wars; if (alas and shame to us!) they have been quoted to slander the Apostle, to crush the Reformer, to discourage the student, to break the hearts of the Saints of God,—then the more you love, the more you reverence Scripture, the more you find in it for your own souls the bread of life, the more I entreat you to beware how you thus distort its use and violate its majesty. We shall find therein all that is necessary for the salvation of our own souls; we shall find therein, as nowhere else, the few great moral principles which are enough whereby to live; and whenever we are using it to make men better and purer, and more loving; whenever we are using it to stimulate the energy, to alleviate the misery, to promote the happiness of mankind; whenever its words become in our own hands as arrows of lightnings to pierce the Python of corruption, or to shatter the strongholds of oppression, robbery, and wrong, then we are using it for purposes consonant with its own spirit, and indubitably and indisputably right. But when we are wielding it in fierce anathemas against good and holy men, who only differ from ourselves, when we go to it to stimulate hatred, or check progress, or to buttress up the oppressions and restrictions of selfish power; then we are following in the crooked bypaths of those who pervert it to perdition. Oh Pharisaism is easy! It is easy to join sects and parties. It is easy to steer "through the channel of no meaning between the Scylla and Charybdis of Yes and No." Do this, and you will be safe men, the hope and the pride of the Church, and if ever you make a mistake all your sect and all your party will run to throw their shields over you, while they will blow all their trumpets for your smallest deed of good. But if you are men enough to stand alone, if you dare to run counter to popular opinion in the cause of truth, if you ever have the courage "to smite the hoary head of inveterate abuse;" then expect to share hatred and opposition with all the Saints of God. But remember:

"He's a slave who would not be
In the right with two or three;
He's a slave who would not choose
Hatred, slander, and abuse,
Rather than in silence shrink
From the truth he needs must think."

If you are to be really noble this you must bear, and God's word will help you.

"He loved the world which hated him; the tear
Which dropped upon his Bible was sincere;
Assailed by slander and the tongue of strife,
His only answer was a blameless life,
And he that forged, and he that threw the dart,
Had each a brother's interest in his heart.

Aye, there is the secret—love to God and man. Go to your Bibles, not as blind infallible Pharisees, but with the humble prayer—'Open thou mine eyes;' go to them in the spirit of love and meekness, and then God will speak to you out of every page, until duty seems no longer difficult, and abuse may be borne, and every bitter thing is sweet. One little golden key will open every lock of Scripture difficulty, and make every ponderous word fly back, and admit you to the path, in which you may have God's two great Angels of Reason and Conscience for your guides into the inmost spirit of the word of God. It is the golden key of love; it is the rule "Never rejoice, but when you can look on the face of your brother in love." Read the book of God in the spirit of the Pharisee, in the unnatural glare flung on it by the turbulent arrogance of theological hatred, and you will most certainly wrest it to your own perdition; but read it with love and humbleness and earnest prayer, and it will not be long before every doubt and every difficulty will vanish before you, and you will be able to say with David;

"The Law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul;
The testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple;
The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart;
The commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes.
The fear of the Lord is clean, enduring for ever,
The judgments of the Lord are true, and righteous altogether;
More to be desired are they than gold, yea than much fine gold;
Sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb,"

A JOURNAL OF UNIVERSITY LIFE AND THOUGHT.

No.20.] WEDNESDAY, MAY 5, 1880. [PRICE SIXPENCE.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

The sad deaths of Stephen Eddy, of Pembroke College, and his brother Charles, of Clifton College, who was on a visit to him for a few days, have cast a gloom over the whole University, but especially over Pembroke, where he was much beloved. We are sure that the feeling of sympathy with the parents' terrible loss will be deepened when it is known that these were their only children. After the inquest on Friday the bodies were brought into College and on Saturday evening, previous to their removal to Skipton where they were buried on Tuesday, a funeral service was held over them in the Chapel, at which the parents and some of the relatives were present. The service was attended by the whole College and after it the tutor and chaplain, with a large number of those undergraduates to whom Stephen Eddy was best known, followed to the station.

We regret to announce that Professor Birks still continues in a very critical state.

The Board of Legal Studies have been defeated in their proposal to award the Chancellor's Law Medal on the results of a selected part of the Law Tripos, the rights of Bachelors of Arts or Law to compete still being reserved to them. On their report being brought up for the sanction of the Senate, it was non-placeted by Mr. Oscar Browning and Mr. T. J. Lawrence, the division shewing—Placets, 16; non-placets, 38. The report was thus thrown out.

On Friday last a discussion on the Report of the "Greek Syndicate," was held in the Arts' School. A large majority of the speakers united in commending the action of the Syndicate. The most prominent dissentient was Mr. Latham, of Trinity Hall, who feared that the adoption of the Report would lead to the abandonment of the Study of Greek.

Canon Farrar occupied the University Pulpit for the second time last Sunday, and preached on the same subject as before:—"the perversion of Scripture texts." Every available space was filled by an attentive audience; many were unable to gain admittance. It is not often that a University preacher succeeds in combining instruction with amusement, as Canon Farrar undoubtedly did, if we are to judge by the not inaudible outbursts of laughter, which greeted some of his best points. If the size of the audience at Great St. Mary's may be taken as a criterion, Canon Farrar's popularity as a preacher has greatly increased since his famous Temperance Sermon delivered on March 11th, 1877. This is doubtless in great measure due to "Eternal Hope" and "The Life and Work of St. Paul."

At the University of Glasgow, the Honorary Degree of LL.D. has been conferred upon Mr. E. J. Routh, formerly Fellow of Peterhouse, and Dr. Michael Foster, the Trinity Praelector in Physiology.

On Saturday last, at St. Paul's Cathedral, the Rev. J. B. Pearson, LL.D., late Fellow of St. John's, was consecrated Bishop of Newcastle, Australia.

A large number of Cambridge men hold positions in the newly formed Ministry. In the Cabinet, Earl Spencer is Lord President of the Council, the Marquis of Hartington, Secretary of State for India, and Sir William Vernon Harcourt Home Secretary, Professor Fawcett is Postmaster General, and Sir Charles Dilke Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Earl Sydney is Lord High Steward, Lord Frederic Cavendish Financial Secretary to the Treasury and Lord R. Grosvenor, Patronage Secretary. Mr. Shaw Lefevre is Secretary to the Admiralty.

The Freshmen's and Senior's match have both been played: and from the form exhibited in them it is possible to get some idea of whom our representative eleven may be composed. The place of the wicket-keep is a difficult one to fill: and there are several candidates of almost equal merits. Perhaps C. W. Foley has as yet most distinguished himself this term. Both the batting and bowling of C. T. Studd and P. J. Henery among the Freshmen were especially good: several of the Seniors played good innings, Stutfield's figures being remarkable, while Lancashire kept up his reputation: and Napier, Exham and Christian deserve notice for their performances.

CAMBRIDGE PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY.

At the meeting held on Monday, May 3, Professor Newton, President, in the chair, E. B. Tawney, M.A., (Honorary) Trinity College, assistant to the Professor of Geology, was elected fellow of the Society.

The following communications were read:—

(1). By W. KEEPING, M.A., Christ's College, "The included pebbles of Neocomian deposits of Potton and Upware and their bearing upon the physical features of the Lower Cretaceous period."

(2). By A. SEDGWICK, B.A., Trinity College, "On the development of the structure known as the glomerulus of the head kidney of the chick."

THE CAMBRIDGE MEDICAL SCHOOL.

Our University Medical School has an excellent Hospital in Addenbrooke's, possessed of first rate sanitary appliances, and with a good nursing system. The Hospital is a sweet and wholesome building. The institution suffers perhaps to some extent from a too precarious income, and from the fact that two-guinea annual subscribers are governors, and these are often ill-qualified to judge in questions of hospital management. Despite these drawbacks, the medical officers have a large and influential share in determining the action of the entire Governing Board.

The staff of Physicians and Surgeons is a most worthy and able one. Some members of it have a marked individuality and great reputation, as practical men, as truly scientific workers, and as men of tact.

Preliminary medical studies are well cared for in most respects. The distinctive feature of Cambridge, as a University, achieving much with little expense, progressing momentarily rather than waiting for big hauls, is well seen in the schools of anatomy, physiology and chemistry. In these subjects also we have teachers of very high scientific rank.

But can Cambridge ever have not only a great medical examining faculty (about the possibility of which there can be no doubt), but also a great and complete medical school? Here we may be met by the question: What do you understand by a great Medical School? Do you mean necessarily one highly endowed? or one having very many students? one that is so remarkable that its fame extends through all parts of the world? one that gives many prizes, and whose diplomas and examinations rank high for wisdom and practicality?

Great Medical Schools are to be found, doubtless, possessing some, perhaps all, of these characteristics. Yet not one of them is absolutely essential: they are often merely the consequences of greatness.

Teachers make scholars: great clinical teachers make sound physicians and surgeons. Clinical teaching depends, in the first instance, on Anatomy, Physiology, and Chemistry, no doubt; then upon Pathology, the knowledge of the structure of the living body in disease, and the processes by which disease kills, or terminates in recovery; and on therapeutics and hygiene, the scientific result of the study of health-restoring, and health-preserving agencies.

But further than this, the great medical teacher is an enthusiast at heart, and imparts this enthusiasm; he sees into the human frame by instinct; he has an indubitable insight into most cases that he has a chance of studying. He has the arts of suggesting and enforcing work upon the student, of teaching by questioning his pupils, of bringing home to them, by simple and apt illustrations, the analogies he perceives. He is a first-rate psychologist, whether he knows it or not. His influence will encourage, not discourage effort.

It is thus that great medical schools are formed, both by the right zeal for knowledge, and by the sympathy which cannot bear the sight of pain and weakness, without seeking to remedy them.

The Cambridge Medical School lacks completeness in its teaching appointments in several respects. In most of the great London schools, a Dean is now appointed from among the junior staff, doing much of the work unfairly thrust on the Professors, and especially on the Regius Professor of Medicine. If Cambridge is to have a great Medical School, a qualified Dean to advise and supervise and direct all the students will become more and more necessary.

There are many other drawbacks to the Cambridge Medical School; it suffers from the lack of regular appointments as reporters and dressers in the Hospital; and from the irregularity and incidental character of the Cambridge terms. Most of the students are men who have spent, or are spending, a large sum yearly for their college and private tuition, which never comes into the Exchequer of the Medical School. Moreover, a great school is hardly likely to rise without many contributories; and a man's principal expenditure in Cambridge is not in acquiring professional knowledge, which may bring him great pecuniary profit afterwards, but in personal, travelling, and collegiate expenses, for which there is for the most part but a moderate return. Many a man who would be caught by an enthusiastic and complete medical school runs away to London, Manchester, or Edinburgh, having only the remembrance of Addenbrooke's as a place he would have been forced to attend for one year before gaining a sound knowledge of Anatomy and Physiology, unless he wished to add that year to his two years of study elsewhere.

Granted that the great clinical teacher is paid properly for his teaching, there will be no fear of his not getting sufficient practice wherever he may be. If he is a born teacher, he will not have inclination to become merely a fashionable or popular practitioner.

What the University can do is to secure adequate pay for its professors or teachers, and to show equal respect to all its Faculties. It may be that the great success of the Medical School is to follow, not precede, that of the Natural Science School. And the provision of buildings, of pay, and of respect and appreciation being well made, there is no doubt the University will have done its best to make, at Cambridge, a great Medical School.

My idea is that those men who are determined to become medical practitioners, and do not seek high honours in Natural Science will do best to enter as Non-Collegiates, and remain as such, for there are few scholarships and many expenses in College. Those who now take the Cambridge M.B. and M.C. need fear no competition; also the candidates for examination include men from many schools. The criterion by which Cambridge stamps men is "nine terms' residence at some period, together with examinations," while London University requires attendance at lectures and study after passing particular examinations, so as greatly to penalise would-be candidates who did not matriculate early.

I am aware that this article only travels over part of the ground, but it may be useful in stirring up thought among intending students of medicine, as well as giving material for discussion among residents.

AN ENGLISH TRIPOS.

At a time when examinations are being multiplied and remodelled by the action of the University itself, while from outside a Parliamentary commission is tardily evolving, with the unconcern of Epicurean gods, a variety of reforms for the most part impracticable, it may seem inopportune to add to the existing bewilderment by proposing, or even hinting at, the establishment of a new tripos. Yet none, at least of those who regard a University as a place where every branch of learning should be acknowledged and fostered, will contend that the all but absolute exclusion of the English language and literature from the studies of the University can be defended on any principle of sound reasoning. Is it too much to hope that among the readers of this Review there may be some few possessed of such a measure of enthusiasm for the magnificent literature that extends in almost unbroken continuity from Beowulf to the latest production of the Victorian age as may prompt them to use their best efforts to found an English School? Something has been done lately in this direction by the establishment of an Anglo-Saxon Professorship—if we may claim any merit to ourselves for merely accepting a gift from Oxford—but there is no examination in Anglo-Saxon to induce any number of students to attend the new Professor's lectures, though he is as willing as he is able to teach. An examination in Anglo-Saxon alone would of course be far too restricted to be of much practical use; what is wanted is an English tripos as broad and comprehensive as the Classical tripos. It should demand, besides a thorough knowledge of Anglo-Saxon, some slight acquaintance with Gothic and perhaps with Keltic, together with a general knowledge of the philology of the Teutonic group of languages. The student would then have to trace the development of the language from its early stages through the so-called Middle English to the English of to-day. Besides understanding the structure and development of the language, he should be required to study the literature as far as possible as a whole, though the vastness of the subject would probably necessitate the choice of some selected books or authors, which might be regarded as typical of particular stages of the nation's intellectual progress; and, as in the classical tripos as at present constituted, certain philosophical works are recommended for study, so it might be advisable to require an acquaintance with some period of English philosophical thought. The examination might also include an essay or essays on subjects of a general character such as the influence of one generation of writers on another, and various other topics which will readily suggest themselves. A tripos of the kind here briefly and most inadequately sketched would be sure to attract students in time; and the recognition of English as one of the principal studies of the University would save us from the reproach so often heard that we have to be taught our own language by foreigners. Who does not experience a feeling of shame when he reads that the best history of English literature is that now being written by Professor Ten-Brink, or that if one wants to have an intimate acquaintance with English Grammar one must go to Koch or Mätzner? Who can read unmoved of the services rendered to early English literature by Dr. Horstmann, whose indefatigable and truly Teutonic industry makes Hercules himself appear but an indolent trifler?* However grateful we may feel to these scholars and to many others, among whom we may mention Professors Zupitza, Müllenhof and Wülcker, we would far rather see the same work done by our fellow-countrymen, and we feel sure that the foundation of an English Tripos would in due time produce a generation of scholars who would strengthen the hands of the few able Englishmen now striving amid much discouragement to promote the study of their own language. We are glad to see from the Report of the Greek Syndicate published in the University Reporter of April 9th, that one or two schoolmasters recognise the value of the study of English. The Master of Haileybury proposes as one of the subjects for the Previous Examination "the historical study of English, starting from Anglo-Saxon, and English literature." The Master of Sherborne also suggests English (Language and Literature), remarking "surely a man's own language is the most important thing for him to know." Whether it would be advisable to substitute English for Greek in the Previous Examination is a question fairly open to doubt, but there is in our opinion no doubt whatever that an ungrudging recognition of the claims of English and its adoption as one of our main studies would to an incalculable degree extend the usefulness and increase the reputation of the University, and we conclude by once more urging all who value their country's literature to endeavour to bring about so desirable a result.

EGOISTICAL ESSAYS.—No. III.

FRIENDS AND NEIGHBOURS.

I have long felt that there is a great blank in my University life. I want a true friend. I want someone on whose shoulder I can lay my head—height must not exceed five feet three or four—and say, "Be my friend; let us swear eternal confidence; be you to me even as I to you; let your goods be my goods, and your secrets my secrets; we will be even as brothers, yea, and more so." And then amid the gathering silences of the gloaming, broken only by the intermittent shouts of the merry revellers returning from some far-off, and by us, uncared-for orgy, there will be cemented a bond of union such as the pale moon loves to smile on from her overhead course, and two young hearts will become one for the future of an unravelled destiny. Then of course it will be all right; we shall get along famously, have lots of adventures—he will always be conveniently at hand when I am in need, come to the rescue with his purse and all when I am brought to the verge of ruin by the fraudulent intrigues of ruthless creditors; etcetera, etcetera—and finally we shall end up by my marrying his sister, while he takes my—well, I haven't got any sisters of my own, and my female cousins have all got brothers, who will want them for their bosom friends, I suppose—he will have to marry one of my maiden aunts—we shall settle down and live very happily ever afterwards.

But though, like Diogenes of old in search of his honest man, I have been wandering up and down the paths of life looking for a true friend, I have not as yet been able to find the required article. It is not for want of acquaintances, for I suppose I have as large an average of that sort of thing as anyone up here, not only from a tendency to a cosmopolitan disposition but from matters of pure necessity. Indeed I have many acquaintances whose names I do not even know, but whom I have to address as "Look here," or "I say," for now that I have known them so long I feel a certain sort of shyness in asking them their names, and it might appear ridiculous if I were to enquire of some third person who was the man that I had just come in with from a long walk. When I was in my former rooms, and used to come up to College, I very often found it as well to make a day of it, and depend to a great extent on the hospitality of anyone who would take me in. That is, of course, I did not say "Give me lunch," or "I desire tea," but I adopted a strategic method of proceedure, and would suddenly remark that I must now go and seek some secluded spot to eat the sandwiches and drink the contents of the flask that I had brought up in my pocket, or I would ask by the way if anyone knew which might be the best eating-house in the town. The result was invariably an invitation. Cambridge is hospitable, if she is nothing else. Owing to a certain delicate feeling, and also out of regard for the fact that it is possible to give people too much of a good thing, I would not favour one set in particular too much, but adopted a system of letting them have a little of me all round. Besides this there was added a wish to study men and manners, for if one does not know a person how is one to form any estimate of his qualities? I was looking for a true friend and I must spare no pains in my search.

It was partly in pursuit of the same end that I issued a standing invitation to all my former hosts to drop in whenever they pleased, and I felt that I could not do more. By this means I calculated that I should get a large assortment on trial, and thereby be enabled to make a more deliberate choice. But why it should have occurred to them all to choose the same afternoon for putting themselves on view as they did, goodness only knows. Perhaps, it was because it was a rainy day, and rainy days tend to reduce all species of men, athletic or otherwise, to resort to the same occupations.

It was the day before yesterday, and I was sitting revolving great things in my mind, and considering on which of my new stock of books I should begin; should I seize the opportunity offered by a wet afternoon, and get through an amazing quantity of reading? should I read the last new poem that everybody was talking about, so as not to be behindhand in the talk of the more intellectual circle of my neighbours? or should I, yes, should I, indulge in a yellow-back? I hesitated; duty said "Read;" pleasure said "This is the time you generally devote to exercise and fresh air; exercise and fresh air are out of the question; take the yellow-back." Pleasure seemed to have reason on its side. My "Scheme of how to pass the day," had nothing about "reading" for the hours then under consideration; nor did it say anything about "Literary recreation" which was the heading under which the poems would properly come; I took the yellow-back. . . . . .

It was a very tame yellow-back, and I had almost decided to leave it and take to reading as an alternative to pass the time; I might perhaps thus earn myself an extra holiday at some future time, under more favourable climatic circumstances, when there came a knock at the door, and in walked three neighbours. Three of the reading sort; hitherto unknown to fame, but they will no doubt rank in future ages amongst the greatest scholars of the time —they will be the Porson, the Newton, and the Hume of our generation.

They mentioned incidentally that their object in coming was to see me, sat down on the respective edges of three chairs, and then waited a little. We began an intellectual conversation; about the weather. Discussion, and resolution put and carried; that it was beastly—no, we didn't say beastly,—inclement. Adapting myself to my company, I called upon the future Porson for a quotation from Aristophanes, or Aristotle, or someone, about the weather. When we had had that, we got a general sketch of the climate in the earlier periods of English history out of Hume, and finally worked round to a most interesting discussion with Newton on the —want of precision in the equinoctial gales, I think it was, but I know it had something to go with astronomy and mathematics in general. I allow that the conversation was inclined to be shoppy, but it was better than sitting and gazing silently at each other. So far we were getting on very tolerably, and it became late enough to suggest tea. We had got through one brew, and the three great minds were recreating themselves with cake, when there came another knock at the door, rather louder this time.

Three more acquaintances, of the professional-caller kind, whose great object always appears to be to get through the day somehow without any fixed rule. The same preliminaries were gone through; they had come in to see me, horrible weather, yes, thanks, they would have some tea; and they sat down and made themselves at home at once. I had to come down a little from the lofty state of mind to which I had attained during the last half hour, and utilize my stock of small talk as much as possible. I introduced them to the three other men, but the two elements did not fuse readily. I was sorry to see that the reading men were at a slight disadvantage, for as the chief part of the conversation was now upon the current affairs of the day, and they knew practically very little of anything that had happened within the last four or five centuries, their tribute to the general exchange of news would naturally have been rather stale. However I did my best, and every now and then, where I could, suited the topics under consideration to their respective faculties, and so I hope they did not feel themselves entirely left out in the cold. Porson kept a judicious silence and looked as if he knew all about everything that was being talked of; Hume was more bold, and drew analogies between the new information he was gathering and the results of his historical reading; and Newton even got so far as to volunteer a flat contradiction based on strictly mathematical grounds, of a facetious theory propounded by one of the second lot of comers concerning the velocity of cricket-balls. This produced a reaction for the moment, and the reading set came to the front.

We had had a second brew of tea, and the cake was finished, when there came not a knock, nor a kick, but a plunge at my door, and in fell two more specimens.

These were of the purely "ballyragging"—(derivation unknown)—description. The scene instantly changed. They did not wait to be asked to sit down, but flung themselves into chairs, and burst out laughing immediately without any apparent reason. Then they shoved each other over; and then, it probably having struck them that it would be more polite to account for this somewhat remarkable entrance, said they had come to knock me up, and laughed more. When they had at last recovered themselves and become calmed a little, they began to be aware that there were some other persons in the room and made an incoherent attempt to explain that it was not at them that they were laughing, which did not seem altogether to improve the position. Having made this what appeared to them sufficient apology, they said that since I hadn't asked them, they would prefer wine to tea; they took to juggling with the cake knife for want of any cake to cut with it; pulled down all my books and explored the private arrangements of my writing-table drawers; but things were in such a state of general confusion in such a short time, that I have really a very vague recollection of what they did or didn't do. The reading set were too nervous to summon up courage to fly, and the moderate set stayed to gather materials for some future gossip about what extraordinary people I entertained in my rooms, so I had to be constantly shifting my mental condition from one phase to the other, according to the sober or lively disposition of the individual members of my company, to show them that I had kept my head and not forgotten them. If Hall-time had not opportunely arrived, I do not know how far I should have advanced to a state of idiotcy, owing to the unwonted strain on my intellect. It wasn't my fault; it is bad to mix one's spirits, I know; but if the spirits will come and mix themselves, how can I help it?

However, it was quite clear that any of these were too far gone in their own ways to be worked up to the required standard, and perhaps we know each other all to well to enter into an everlasting compact; if I wanted my true friend, I must get him in the rough and manipulate him into shape for myself. I considered that I could not better begin than recommence my search near home, the nearer the better, as then I could always have my friend under my eye, and take care he didn't go contracting eternal alliances with someone else. I therefore turned my investigation to my immediate neighbours.

Of my two next-door neighbours I know very little, but judging from what I hear of them, the one on the right is fond of pictures, and especially of putting them up, while the one on the left loves music, and composes oratorios set for one finger to a harmonium of three Cathedral-organ power that he has set up against the partition wall of our semi-detached house, and which excites my fears for my bookshelf every time he performs. I catch occasional glimpses of them, as the one on the right goes every morning to chapel on the left, and the one on the left goes to chapel on the right, so that I can see them passing my window as I sit at breakfast. But their external appearance belies them; the man who thumps is a little man with a big head who wants his hair cutting, and looks entirely musical; while the musical one is a big burly man who looks as if he could thump.

Still, such an acquaintance, though sufficient for ordinary purposes, is hardly close enough to authorize further advances, and there but remain my two fellow-lodgers. They are, I believe, members of the same College. One keeps over me. and spends his time in practising his steps in anticipation of the balls of May week. He has friends who also dance. He is not of that festive aspect that I should suppose that he would frequent many balls, but I have got so used by this time to being disappointed in any conclusions drawn from appearance, that I am inclined to go to the other extreme and always judge by contraries. Beyond this I know nothing more of him. He has not been to call upon me, and he being a second year man, etiquette forbids that I should begin. I do not wish to press myself on him, except that I think I should like an opportunity of requesting him not to agitate my chandelier quite so much till further notice. I may not be of a too mercurial disposition, but I do not require to be kept in this constant state of stimulation.

The other is more sociable, and came to call upon me at an early opportunity; I was out, so he left a card. I returned his call; he was out, so I left a card. Then he came again next day, and left another card; I retaliated by another, and so on for the best part of a week. Meanwhile, I used constantly to be meeting him in the passage, but I wasn't quite sure yet which was one and which was the other, and if he had been one and I had addressed him as the other, we should both have been put into an awkward position; I should have had to explain that he wasn't at all the person ought to be speaking to, and perhaps he in his private heart might have reasons for objecting to be taken for his fellow collegian. So I found it best suddenly to remember something and go back to my room to see what it was. And I never liked to go upstairs directly after either of them, and so make sure of him, as in the first place, it is not the usual way of making a call to pursue a man to his door and knock at it directly it is shut in one's face, and in the second, not being certain of their identity, I did not know if I should be following the right one after all.

Judging of him from the liberal manner in which he showered his cards on me, I thought I should like to know him, but I had gathered all that was available from the style and character of his name, and if I wanted to analyse him thoroughly it must be by a personal interview. I accordingly lay in ambush in my room in the evening until I had heard both of them safe indoors, and then, after the proper interval, I went upstairs and ran him to ground just as he was going to bed. I said How-d'ye-do, and remarked that I had observed he had left his card on me, and then I begged that he would in no way put himself out for me if he wished to retire. He narrowly escaped lock-jawing himself in stifling a yawn, said that nothing had been further from his thoughts than going to bed, and asked me to stop and talk. Of course I would have something? No, I would rather not have anything; but I felt that now I I had not only broken the ice, but gone right in head over ears, so I decided that it would be better to stop. He recommended a particular chair—a favourite of his, he said. As a rule I disapprove of favourite chairs; usually there is something wrong with them, a broken spring or other similar defect which has adapted itself by use to the owner himself but to no one else; however, I will allow that this chair was a comfortable one. I sat down first cautiously to test it, and then gradually more confidently as my distrust subsided, and we coversed. Seeing a few pots stuck about in conspicuous places I hazarded a conjecture that he did something in the athletic line. He seemed a little embarrassed, and modestly replied, yes, something—in fact, he had his Blues. This was a terrible shock. Here I had caught a Celebrity at Home and I didn't know it. But I congratulate myself that I kept my presence of mind admirably. I began to recollect having seen his name in print somewhere, so I said, "Oh, really; well, of course, I never put two and two together; to fancy my keeping in the same house: I always thought it was the other one." It was very prettily done, and I followed up my success with, "You men often look so different when you're changed." My reputation was saved.

We talked on some time, and I racked my braine for everything that I could think of in the Athletic line, and worked it in very creditably, relevant or not. So passed the evening, or rather a great deal of the night, and when we had both nearly dropped asleep twice the meeting adjourned.

Last night I hailed him as he went by my door, and he came in to have some tea. I think he has been foraging about for information about me. He said he had been by our cricket ground and seen me playing lawn tennis. I rather wished he hadn't, as I felt I hadn't been in form at all, and my performances perhaps had not raised me much in his estimation. However, I put it on the heaviness of the ground and the inferiority of my racket, which I must get changed. If he had not been too polite, he would probably have remarked something about bad workmen. But though we are on the high road to being bosom friends, we are not yet quite on those terms.

Still we are getting on, and I perceive that I shall like him very much. We have already got so far that he has conceived a scheme for me to attract a crowd to my ground floor window on Sunday afternoon, while he pours water from above, but I think that this requires consideration of who is to be responsible for any consequences. He has a large capacity for tea, and now he is not in training, he smokes. I must go and get him some cigarettes. Then I shall begin to mould him.

PROPOSED SWIMMING BATH.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—The sad recurrence on Thursday last of one of the periodical accidents on the Cam above Newnham, which has so rudely shaken us out of our fancied freehold of life, and rendered an English home childless at a stroke, forces our attention to this subject. The present University rules appear stringent enough on paper, but it needs, we imagine, but a slight acquaintance with boating to know that the risk of losing one's balance and falling overboard while standing up in a wide boat is almost as great to a novice as that of upsetting in a narrow one, and that the only real safeguard is ability to swim. Eton men tell us that since the present rules were made, thirty-eight years ago (that no one may boat till he can swim), not a single life has been lost there.

Now, so far as we can learn, there is no provision for the practice of swimming in this great centre of Education, except the bathing sheds above Newnham, practically available in the May Term alone, and then only to those whose time is not absorbed by other exercises. Many of our Public Schools have some means of teaching, or at least, encouraging swimming, more efficient than ours, and why should Cambridge, so forward in practical as well as theoretical usefulness, be behind them in this great matter? Can we feel that Alma Mater is doing her whole duty, when her sons, living in a small island, with ships and colonies all over the world, are allowed to leave her walls bachelors and masters of many a learned and useful art, but without the mastery of this simple one, so easily and quickly learnt, so delightful and healthy, so impossible to forget? Indeed, if there were no such responsibility resting upon us, would it not be desirable for seniors and juniors alike, and worth some trouble and expense, to have a monster swimming bath with the most approved accessories and system of teaching, in some such central position as the upper end of Midsummer Common, near Park Street, or Christ's Piece, available in all seasons and weathers?

Without actual information as to existing baths elsewhere, it is impossible to form an opinion as to the probabilities of commercial success, which, of course, would be highly desirable; but on the face of it, considering the amount of patronage it would be sure to receive, if well managed, and the exceptionally abundant water supply of the neighbourhood, it does not seem unreasonable to suppose that it might pay at least ordinary interest on capital.

Granted moreover some sufficient and available means of learning to swim, in whatever way provided, there seems no good reason why systematic teaching and examination in this vital art should not some day become as much a part of the University course as the Little-go. The time necessary to become a fair swimmer would then be infinitesimal, and the pleasure added to many lives afterwards not easily conceived. For how can any one thoroughly enjoy being on the water who does not feel that he would be as much at home in it, and who that knows the fresh delight of a swim in no matter what depth of river or sea, would give it up for oceans of other more expensive pleasures, to say nothing of the ever to-be-coveted happiness of saving another's life?

At any rate it does seem to be a subject worth discussing at this time, and if members of the University, especially the influential officers of the C.U.S.C. and of the various boating and athletic clubs, to whom the University already owes so much, would give it the benefit of their earnest consideration and debate, and send a note of their several opinions to the Editor of this paper during the present week, with suggestions as to the steps to be taken, the result might be that which we feel would be no less a solid gain to the University, than one of the most practical earthly consolations to those whose overwhelming calamity has touched us all so deeply.

A ZOOLOGICAL STATION ON THE ENGLISH COAST.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—Any one glancing over the history of the various branches of learning which are taught and professed in this or any other University, cannot fail to be struck with the remarkable progress and change of tone that the study of Natural Science has made during its whole life time. Mathematics and Classics are taught now in very much the same way as they have been for years past, and Law, History, and Theology cannot claim to have made such material advance either in their matter or modes of teaching. Natural science, however, has been continually on the change; new sciences and sub-divisions of the existing sciences have been introduced; new materials, classifications, and theories have sprung up, and new museums, laboratories, and lecture rooms have been built to meet the requirements of the ever-increasing number of students.

Zoology might be taken as an example of a branch of natural science in which progress and expanse have, of late years been exceedingly well-marked. Within comparatively recent years, within the memory of many an M.A. now in residence, any practical or field work in this subject, under the guidance of the professor or his assistants was entirely unheard of, and the student, wise enough in the lecture room or study, was as ignorant of zoology in the field or at the seaside, as the untutored savage or a country child. Since then, however, a great change has come over the scene, a change which though gradually introduced but finally accomplished means a great step forward. Among other things what is known under the general term "practical work" has been introduced both into our studies and examinations. The student now becomes practically acquainted with animals, organs, and tissues, which formerly he knew only from bad descriptions, inferior engravings or lithographs, or generally worse sketches on the black board. His knowledge is now of some real value to him when he takes his walks abroad; the practical acquaintance he has made with one or two genera of each class in the laboratory enables him to recognise their neighbours in the ponds and fields, and roughly to classify them; and he now uses that faculty which practical work alone can develope, and the development of which forms the chief value of a scientific educa ion—the faculty of observation. But there is a still more important addition to the working of our Natural Science school. There are continually at work, here in our laboratories at Cambridge and elsewhere, a certain number of students who, having already acquired a certain knowledge of those facts and phenomena of their science which are already known, are devoting the greater part of their time and thought to original investigations into those parts of their subject which are not so well known.

I have said that this is a still more important addition, nor do I use these words unadvisedly; for the scientific reputation of a University in modern times must be more dependent on the original work it produces than upon its examinations, its laboratories or even its lectures. Moreover a reputation, such as this is, must be more permanent than any other, for it is to be remembered that we have not got here a large and compact accumulation of knowledge let out on loan to students preparing for triposes, M.B.'s and other examinations, but we have a branch of learning which is continually advancing and expanding and searching into the innermost secrets of the hidden paths and by-ways of the world we live in. This search after the unknown is, in fact, the real object of our science.

Notwithstanding all these improvements of late years, there is still a great and urgent need for the study of Zoology and Comparative Anatomy; a need, or even a necessity which other nations of Europe and America have already seen and remedied in their own countries. England alone of all the great nations of the civilized world has not yet made any attempt to remedy it. Perhaps her wealth has been so absorbed in constructing huge guns to knock down her most expensive targets or sink her finest ships, in determining how much gunpowder and shot will be sufficient to burst completely the aforesaid huge and expensive guns, or in scientific experiments on frontiers and so on, that she cannot afford it; yet the fact remains that she alone has no Zoological station on her own coasts, and, notwithstanding all the great Zoologists she has produced, contributes, comparatively speaking, the smallest share towards the expenses of Dr. Dohrn's International Zoological station at Naples.

A Zoological station on our own coasts, properly and efficiently conducted, as, in Meteorology, is the station at Greenwich, would be of incalculable value to English science, and now that our nation has got in power a government that can consider home affairs in a rational spirit, she ought to acknowledge that it is an urgent need and take some steps to meet it.

For the sake of those who are not well versed in the workings of a Zoological School, but are interested in the general welfare of Science in England, I will rapidly run through some of the functions which such a station would perform. It is becoming a matter of considerable difficulty for the demonstrators, or those who have charge of the practical classes of Comparative Anatomy and Zoology, to be always ready with fresh animals for dissection or observation when the time arrives. Now-a-days they are obliged to depend for their specimens on fishmongers or professional naturalists, and consequently the supplies are generally too late or too soon, and sometimes do not turn up at all The difficulty, which is so great in the case of the common typical animals which are used in the classes, is increased ten-fold in the case of men engaged in original research. If a Zoologist requires a few specimens of an animal that is tolerably common on the sea-coast, for instance, it is necessary for him either to go to the trouble and expense of going to the sea-side himself, or trust to a local naturalist to send him the right species in good condition. In the former case, he has probably little or no experience as to the best localities for finding them, and no implements whereby he may catch them; and in the latter case he has to rely on a very imperfect scientific knowledge, he cannot be certain of obtaining the exact species he wants, and it is utterly hopeless for him to give any instructions as to the preservation or hardening of the animal tissues or organs he is engaged in examining.

A Zoological station would remove these difficulties, entirely in the case of the marine forms, and to a great extent also in the case of terrestrial forms. There would be a staff of men who could, at the shortest notice, send the animals to the various laboratories throughout the kingdom, and instructions sent as to the treatment of the animal, or his liver, or his kidney, or his eye, with alcohol, osmic acid, or Müller's fluid, would be faithfully and accurately carried out.

In a station such as this, the Zoologist proper will be able to draw up much more complete accounts of the habits and anatomy of the various genera and species of the animal kingdom. The botanist too will be there to study the various forms of vegetable life inhabiting our seas. There will be aquaria, tables, instruments, and reagents for men engaged in original research, where they will be able to study many details of Anatomy and development which they cannot possibly do in the University laboratories. Finally there should be special officials stationed there to examine and report on the migrations and general habits of those fish that are valuable in the market.

But besides those advantages, which we can see now, there must be many which can only come to light when the station has been fairly started. As Professor Lankester has pointed out in a recent article in Nature, what are now regarded as the rarest and most out-of-the-way animals at any station would, when the locality is thoroughly well-known to the naturalists who frequent it, be fished up at five minutes notice: and so, in the abstract, many a branch of Science, now rarely dealt with or touched upon, would, when the means and scope are thus enlarged, develope into a great and important study.

Of course there are many who have noticed this remarkable absence amongst the institutions of Great Britain, and would willingly lend their influence in the promotion of such an establishment on our own coasts, but nevertheless are overwhelmed by the natural pecuniary difficulty. As a national instititution where all persons who are properly qualified will be able, at a small expense, to carry on their studies, it would be naturally expected that the greater part of the funds would be provided by the Government. These, however, can hardly be expected to arise spontaneously, for the Government is always very loth to support a scheme of this sort, until it has been well and carefully thought out by our influential men, and an independent start already made.

Consequently, it seems to me that a committee of the leading Zoologists and Comparative Anatomists should be formed as soon as possible, that subscriptions should be raised from private individuals and corporate bodies, and then when it has been plainly shewn that they are determined to make an effort to prevent English Science from becoming a mere parasite on that of America and the Continent, the English Government must and will step in to raise a structure worthy of the countrymen of Darwin and of Huxley.

Before I leave this important subject there is one more suggestion I should like to make. We have still living amongst us the greatest Zoologist the world has ever produced, and at the same time the author and leader of the greatest revolution in scientific thought since time began. Charles Darwin, the author of the 'Origin of Species,' is still enjoying what Virgil calls 'a green old age.'

Would it not be a fit tes'imony of the debt of gratitude that all thinking men, throughout the world, be they Zoologists or Philosophers or Theologians, or what not, owe to him that a national institution, devoted to his science, and bearing, if necessary, his name should be founded in his honour by his fellow-countrymen? Can we forget that his thought and spirit are guiding us, and will guide us for years to come, in all our researches into the cause of things; and shall we leave it, as we have so often left it before in the case of our greatest men, for foreigners to study the finer details and consequences of his work, to reap the first fruits of his noble thought and piercing intellect, and to first raise their temples to his honour and glory?

I remain, &c.
Sidney J. Hickson.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Sirs,—Every one must sympathize with the object of Mr. Spencer Hill's article on "Poor Students," but he does not to my mind point out the manner in which the evil may best be remedied. The expense of a Cambridge career does not lie in the cost of teaching. Unless expensive "coaches" are required, the whole training necessary for the highest places in several of the Triposes may be obtained at the cost of the tuition fee, that is, £18 or £20 a year. In fact education costs less at the University than at any other period of life. The cost of University life lies in the expense of living; what we want for poor students are cheap lodging-houses and cheap food. I believe that if a company were started in Cambridge for building cheap and convenient lodgings for students, for providing table d'hôte, breakfast, and dinner, at the rates of a Coffee Palace, or a Maison Duval, or the dining rooms of a German University we should diminish the necessary costs of a student's career, far more effectually than by granting eleemosynary help. Large sums of money are now wasted in the University by bribing students to enter particular colleges, and some of this would be spent to better advantage in the way I have directed.

If some one with a better head for business than myself would set such a scheme on foot I would give it my heartiest cooperation.

I am, yours faithfully,
OSCAR BROWNING.

COLLEGE CORRESPONDENCE.

ST. PETER'S.

Our well-known Mathematical Lecturer, Mr. E. J. Routh, F.R.S., has, along with Dr. Michael Foster, just received the honorary degree of LL.D. from the University of Glasgow, a well merited distinction at which his past and present pupils will no doubt heartily rejoice.

The flowers round our second court, which last May term and the one before added so much to its appearance, have been again put up, and promise well.

We have played five cricket matches. The first, with St. John's II, on the 20th, resulted in a draw, our men making 130 runs against 60 for five wickets. On Wednesday and Thursday last we played Emmanuel, and scored 134 and 99 in the two innings to their 109 and 80 for three wickets. We have also lost matches with Pembroke, Clare and Caius. Our best men of last year have hitherto been singularly unfortunate in their batting, as with the exception of the captain's 59 against Pembroke, any large scores have been made by the freshmen, of whom Laxton, Gray, and Pilkington deserve especial mention.

Seven of last term's crew are rowing in the first boat, the only vacancy being at number two, where G. Bird is rowing just now.

A lawn tennis match has been arranged with Caius for the 14th.

It was resolved at the first meeting of the Sexcentenary Club to hold no debates this term, and their place has been taken by Shakespeare readings on the Saturday evenings, which have been tolerably successful.

CLARE.

The first boat has gone into training for the May races. The crew will most probably row as follows: Bow, J. R. Wardale; 2, W. M. Cann; 3, W. Keess; 4, S. J. S. Banks, or W. T. Lawson; 5, F. J. Wardale; 6, P. L. Jones-Bateman; 7, A. E. Campbell; Stroke, H. Roberson; Cox, J. F. Gaskell. Of these the occupants of bow and four are the only ones not members of last year's eight. The boat is indebted for some excellent coaching to several well-known oars from other colleges.

Four Cricket Matches have been played this week. On Thursday, 29th April, we had a draw with a strong team representing the Crusaders. Scores: Clare, 179, (O. Puckridge, 64, W. H. Alderson, 19, E. O. Ormerod, 16). Crusaders, 128 for 6 wickets, (F. M. Lucas, 61, F. E. Lacey, 24, F. Moore, 17). Jesus College won the match on Friday, the 30th. Through some mistake the whole match was not entered in the Clare scoring book. Of our total of 115, G. King made 48 and J. A. Sidgwick 15. On Saturday, King's with the aid of A. F. J. Ford, who scored 104 and bowled well, beat us pretty easily. King's 197, Clare 128, (W. H. Alderson, 48). The Pembroke match on our own ground, on Monday, resulted in a win for the visitors, by 139 against 101 runs. For Pembroke, T. W. Wright 26, G. H. Tunnicliffe 25, and E. W. Sturges 17, were the highest scores, while for Clare, E. W. Mulliner made 26, and E. O. Omerod 17.

PEMBROKE.

The boat has been making fair progress during the past week, though it has had the misfortune to lose the services of Collison, who was rowing 4, and who has been unable to row through illness, but whose assistance we hope to have in the races. We cannot, however, say that we have as yet experienced that self-satisfaction which Land and Water attributes to us, and as to the statement which appeared in last week's Review, that we are intending to send a boat to Henley, we beg to state that the report is without foundation, as the Boat Club, as yet, has not thought of such a contingency.

On Monday, the 26th, our Second Eleven played the Johnian Second Eleven, on their ground; the batting on both sides proved too strong for the bowling opposed to it; the Johnians, going first to the wickets, made 217, of which Coleman contributed 81. Pembroke going in then, time was called when 62 had been scored for the loss of one wicket.

On Friday last we played Christ's, on the Amalgamation Ground. Christ's went in first, but were disposed of for 44, the bowling of Finch and Hewett being apparently too much for them. Off the former especially they found it very hard to make runs. Pembroke then went in, and the score had reached 251 before they could all be got rid of. Hitchcock's score of 92 was the most noticeable feature of the innings.

The Lawn Tennis Tournament is still in progress, the second round having just been finished.

GONVILLE AND CAIUS.

At a meeting of the Debating Society held on Wednesday evening, the following officers were elected for next term: J. Mackern, president; R. Gordon Dill, vice-president; and E. Francis, secretary.

A considerable amount of aquatic interest reigns in the College at present. As regards our first boat there is not very much to record; they have been making trial trips in a new boat built by Winter. The general performance of the crew is not quite so satisfactory as might be desired; they are not as yet as well together as they should be at this stage of practice. We hope seven will soon be all right again, and able to do full justice in the way of work to his fine physique. The second boat of course cannot be permanently fixed until the places in the first boat are finally allotted. Under the very efficient administration of one of our old captains, the Rev. R. Riley, they have made very considerable improvement during the past week.

Our cricket team have atoned for their dilatoriness in commencing operations by winning their first match triumphantly. They defeated Peterhouse on Saturday by 218 to 37 runs. Francis and Mackern were the chief run-getters.

CORPUS CHRISTI.

The Ven. Archdeacon Emery, a former Tutor, preached in the College Chapel last Sunday morning.

Our First Boat seems definitely settled, Bartlett and Holland rowing bow and 2; in other respects the crew is constituted as last term; they went into training on Monday last.

Our Cricket Eleven has been fairly successful. On Tuesday, April 27th, we made 101 for 3 wickets, against Christ's. Owen played admirably for 58, not out; they made 168. Against John's we were most unfortunate, only making 93. Owen and Richardson played well for 30 and 38 respectively. We beat Queens' easily on Saturday, Owen again playing a grand innings of 84. And on Monday we defeated Caius; they made 90, and we scored 158 for 7 wickets. Mosse played excellent cricket for 52 not out. Greenland bowled very well for us, taking 7 wickets.

KING'S.

On Saturday we played a match with Clare, and, though not fully represented, we succeeded in winning by 59 runs. Clare got 138, the principal score being Alderson's, who got a good 48: we made 197, of which A. F. J. Ford got 104, M. S. Dimsdale 21, E. Impey 15, G. Searle 14, W. R. Inge 13: again we owe our victory principally to A. Ford.

The boat has been out regularly during the past week, and is going fairly well at present.

We hear there are Lawn Tennis matches arranged with Caius and the Mayflies: it seems there is some difficulty in settling who shall be our representatives.

QUEENS'.

We have played two cricket matches this week. We sustained a defeat at Cavendish, on April 29th: for our opponents, Tench made 41 (not out) and E. D. Robinson 27: for us, Hodgson made more than half the total and at the close was, not out, 29. Of the bowlers Brandram was the most successful. On May 1st, Corpus proved too strong for us, Owen making 84 in fine style. Hodgson again proved our mainstay with a well-played 31; he went in first, his being the last wicket to fall. Brandram again had most of the wickets to his name. Our indifferent performance in these matches is to be attributed in great measure to the fact that several of our cricketing members (including the captain) are rowing in the boat, and were not able to play.

ST. CATHARINE'S.

The boat is out practising daily: five places are occupied by old oars, but the new material is decidedly weak. On the whole the men are better together than they were last term.

Our swimming bath is now open, and will prove very acceptable if last week's warm weather should continue. As yet, however, it has not been much used.

The Lawn Tennis Courts are extensively patronised, and appear to give general satisfaction.

JESUS.

The first boat is at present made up as follows:—Prest, stroke; Jackson, Baillie, Armytage, M. Hutchinson, Atkin, Jones, Stokes, bow. Hockin is to come up, but when exactly is uncertain. The eleven have beaten Clare and Magdalen, and the second eleven were too much for the Hall second team.

TRINITY HALL.

There is but little news to chronicle this week. A Lawn Tennis Tournament has been started; on Monday the entries were drawn in twelve pairs, several of them appear to be of pretty uniform merit, and the issue is therefore wrapped in a pleasing uncertainty. The vigorous batting of H. M. Stutfield was a noteworthy feature of the Seniors' match last week. H.M. Stutfield was not out, in each innings; he put together upwards of 100 runs in both essays, and in faster time than usual.

The first boat made a trip to Clayhithe on Saturday; the voyage was an expeditious one, and occupied little more than the ordinary time to Baitsbite and back. The crew remains unchanged. The second boat is composed as follows:—bow, T. A. Milne; 2, F. M. Brodie; 3, N. W. Sibley; 4, H. T. Trevor-Jones; 5. H. M. Ramus; 6, A. Pattullo; 7, G. King; stroke, A. D. Wilde; cox., A. O. Penny, It will be seen that the whole boat, with the exception of stroke and bow, is taken from last term's successful third boat. Heape, however, is working with undiminised ardour at the new material in the third boat, and his crew already exhibits marked improvement.

CHRIST'S.

C. A. Vince, 5th Classics, 1878, has been elected Fellow of this College.

C.C.C.C.—On Tuesday, April 27th, we played Corpus, the match resulting in a draw. We went in and made 168, of which Howell obtained 76. Corpus made 101 for the loss of three wickets. On Friday, April 30th, we played Pembroke, but failed to get more than 44. Pembroke made 234. In the second innings we made 58 for four wickets. The absence of H. S. Cooper, who was playing in the Freshmen's Match on the former day, and A. S. Pereira, who was playing for the Seniors, on the latter day, may in some way account for these figures.

On Tuesday, May 3rd, we played Trinity, showing a decided improvement, though we unfortunately lost the services of A. St. H. Gibbons, who broke a finger in the Pembroke match. Trinity went in and made 213. We made 146, of which Howell made 52, and Cooper 31.

C.C.L.T.C.—On Saturday three pairs played three pairs of the Trinity May Flies. Score:—1st round, May Flies 2; Christ's 1; 2nd round, May Flies 3; Christ's 0; 3rd round, May Flies 2; Christ's 1; Total—May Flies 7; Christ's 2.

ST. JOHN'S.

At a meeting of the L.M.B.C. last Wednesday, the following were elected officers for the present term: President, Rev. A. F. Torry; 1st Captain, W. Barton; 2nd Captain, G. M. Kingston; Treasurer, A. Hawkins; Secretary, B. S. Clarke; 3rd Captain, B. E. Wand; 4th Captain, G. G. Wilkinson; 5th Captain, W. P. Mayor. The Freshmen's Sculls were fixed for 28th and 29th of May, and the Pairs for May 31st and June 1st.

In Cricket we have had the following matches this term. The Eleven v. Eighteen Freshmen, played on April 19th, and resulted in an easy victory for the Eleven, who made 170 for 6 wickets, (of which J. A. Bevan made 52, not out, P. T. Wrigley 29, F. L. Thompson 27, P. G. Exham 27, R. Thorman 20), while the Eighteen only mustered 67, of which J. S. Wiseman contributed 22. On April 20th our second Eleven played Peterhouse, the match resulting in a draw: Peterhouse 163, St. John's 53 for 4 wickets, of which S. G. Craig made 26, and J. Coleman 18 not out. On April 22nd we played Christ's on our ground; owing to the rain a draw was the result, as Christ's did not bat, and only 8 of our wickets were down for 206, of which P. G. Exham made 78, J. Colman 34, J. A. Bevan 33. On April 29th we played Corpus on our ground and scored an easy victory, getting our opponents out for 93, while we had made 207, (of which P. G. Exham claimed 107 not out, J. A. Bevan 58, A. R. Aspinall 25), and still had some wickets to fall. In the University Freshmen's Match, R. Spencer distinguished himself, as also did P. G. Exham and F. D. Gaddum in the Seniors' Match. We are glad to announce that at last a long-standing grievance has been removed by the Master and Seniors having at length granted us permission to wear our blazers in passing through the College Courts, instead of being, as we hitherto have been, obliged to hide them under overcoats and ulsters.

The Rev. J. B. Pearson, Bishop Elect of Newcastle, New South Wales, late fellow of this college, was presented by Mr. Sandys, the Orator, for the Honorary Degree of D.D. on Thursday last, and on Saturday last he was consecrated in St. Paul's.

MAGDALENE.

During the last week our eleven has played one match and has again been defeated, this time by Trinity. We began the batting and at first things looked well, 50 being on the telegraph for one wicket. R. Hunt made 23, and W. N. Roe 30. Our innings closed for 103. The first wicket of Trinity gave us great trouble, as Henery made 82 and Studd 51. When the stumps were drawn Trinity had obtained more than 200 for three wickets.

As regards the boat we are glad to say that Watson-Taylor has returned to his old place. The eight went into training on Monday.

TRINITY.

T.B.C.—The first boat is at present manned by the following men:—Bow, F. Keyser, 2. F. G. A. Hitchcock, 3, B. S. Biram, 4, J. H. L. White, 5, R. D. Davis, 6, A. Nimmo, 7, R. Lehman, 8, J. H. Gubbins, cox, R. Blaythwaite.

On Friday last they got into their light ship, and on Saturday went in her to Clayhithe, rowing a course below locks on their way down, and a course above on the return journey. On Monday they went into training. The other boats will go into training on Wednesday.

The M. and S. met on Friday, April 30, to discuss the motion "that some concessions should be made to the Home Rule party." J. A. Duncan proposed, F. F. Cox opposed the motion: the latter gentleman found that eight out of the 16 members who voted were of his way of thinking.

H. Chester was elected a member, the maximum number of 70 is by this election made up.

Mayflies L.T.C.—This club represented by F. G. Barclay, B. F. Buxton, H. R. Foster, T. Gill, C. P. Harvey, and R. A. Pelly played a double handed match on Saturday last v. Christ's C.L.T.C., scoring an easy victory by 7 sets to 2.

The Mayflies, no doubt tempted out early by the charming weather we are having now and then, are in a flutter of excitement over double and single handed tournaments.

The Club is prepared to take up challenges.

The Irregulars.—On Thursday evening the Irregulars met to discuss the question of compulsory military drill in our schools and colleges. The peace party were in the majority.

EMMANUEL.

The first boat has been improving during the week. They went out in their light ship for the first time on Friday and commenced training on Monday.

The scratch Lawn Tennis ties are now being played. There are eighteen entries.

At a meeting of the Debating Society next Saturday, B. H. Jones will move "that in the opinion of this house, the condition of women, educational, social and political is in urgent need of reform."

The first eleven played their first match against Peterhouse on Wednesday and Thursday, which resulted in a draw. On Monday we played Trinity Hall, who scored 89 to our 150, of which 49 were made by Shipton. We are again fortunate in having Mr. C. H. Allcock to play for us.

SIDNEY.

Our Cricket Match against Cavendish resulted in our favour by a few runs. Our success was mainly due to the batting of Goodchild, who carried his bat for 30. Ostrehan bowled three wickets in an over. Of the score of our opponents, about a third consisted of byes, a fact in a great measure due to the unevenness of the recently laid turf.

In the Seniors' Match, A. F. Ostrehan made 15, and R. S. Goodchild 6. In their absence our Secretary wrote to St. John's to put off our proposed match; unfortunately, however, his letter was, by some mistake at St. John's, kept for the Captain, though addressed "Hon. Sec.," and the Captain being down, the letter was left unopened. And so, greatly to our regret, the St. John's eleven awaited our arrival on their ground.

Bye term Freshman:—J. Mitchell, 12, Malcolm Street.

DOWNING.

Our boat went into training on Wednesday last, and appears to be getting on well. The crew, as at presented constituted, consists of bow, Robson; 2, J. H. Beaumont; 3, Hickson; 4, Yetts; 5, Bradshaw; 6, Schreiner; 7, Logan; stroke, Brinton; Cox., Alison.

The Lawn Tennis Club held another meeting on Thursday last, to consider the rules for the Attwood and Buckmaster Cups.

NON-COLLEGIATE.

Cavendish College.—Our Debating Society tried an extempore debate, for the first time, on Thursday, 22nd ult. A good many subjects were discussed, and the speeches were amusing, if not very brilliant. On the 29th R. C. Hitchcock proposed a motion condemning Local Option, which was carried, after a lively debate, by 14 votes to 9; an amendment, proposed by W. T. Whitley, being thrown out by two votes.

Our cricket team played two matches last week, both on our own ground. On Wednesday Sidney beat us in the first innings by 5 runs, scoring 62 against our 57. On Thursday we played Queens', and defeated them by 144 to 50. Our best scores were—Tench 41 (not out); and E. D. Robinson 27.

CRICKET.

THE SENIOR'S MATCH.

The second of the usual trial matches on the University Ground was favoured by far better weather than the first (the freshmen's) had been: still on both days there was but a scant attendance, showing that the cricket was interesting only to those personally concerned in the match. A few batsmen not as yet known to fame at Fenners made their mark, viz Exham, who played well in both innings, more especially in the first; Stutfield, who twice made a good score, though in a peculiar style of his own, due to his own good eye, more than to any coaching he may have received at school; Napier, Christian and Moore. Lancashire too played a couple of steady innings, but his form has already for two seasons been seen on the University cricket field. Of the bowlers the best performers were Wilson, Gaddum, and Pereira. The former, who three years ago played for Marlborough, is a very straight and steady medium paced trundler; in the first innings he obtained no less than eight wickets; Gaddum, late of Rugby, is a slow left-handed bowler and was also very successful; Pereira who made his reputation two Long Vacations back, is a fast bowler and on a bumpy ground likely to prove very dangerous, if not to the wicket, at all events to the persons of the batsmen opposed to him. The fielding on the whole was not brilliant; it was often very slovenly; however, Napier, Exham, Lancashire, Wilson and Ostrehan are good fields and safe catches. The wicket-keeping of Christian and Foley was good.

On Steel's side in the first innings no one did much, with the exception of Lancashire, who played very steadily until Exham came in: the latter batted exceedingly well, and carried his bat for 55 runs. No other batsman's play calls for any comment.

On the other side going in, Christian made a decided stand, and batted really well for 59. He found an able supporter in Stutfield, who sent the ball in all directions, and scored with great rapidity, eventually carrying his bat for 63. This side headed their opponents by 37.

In the second innings of Steel's side Pereira was at first on the spot, and captured the first four wickets, including Lancashire, who again played well. Napier's innings was the chief feature of the side; his hitting was clean and vigorous, and was unluckily cut short by a fine catch at point.

Towards the close of the innings Moore and Gaddum made runs at a great pace, and between them scored 48 and 24, leaving their side with a total of 206, 169 runs ahead of their adversaries.

Bligh's side lost four wickets in their second innings for 73 out of the required 169. Had time permitted, there was every chance of a close finish: as it was, they had still 96 to make and seven wickets to fall. Stutfield again did well, scoring 43 and not out: he made his runs very fast and hit well.

THE RIVER.

The truth of the proverb "'tis an ill wind that blows no one any good" can hardly ever have been more strikingly exemplified than it has during the past week; whatever harm has been done to our orchards by the cold winds of the past week, the good done to the rowing has been incalculable. Boats, which a week ago seemed "all abroad" are now presenting something like evenness, and though this improvement must be partly put down to the trouble and pains taken by the various crews, yet most of it is due to the rough weather we have lately experienced. This may be said of many boats, but some few have missed much of the profit to be obtained from a strong wind, by taking to their light ship too soon. There is indeed nothing like a gale for knocking a crew together, and the tough task of forcing a boat through rough water against wind and whatever stream the Cam can boast of, necessitates not only a strong pull and a long pull, but a pull altogether, and woe betide the crew which omits the last part of that recipe for success, since aching arms and tired legs will be their only reward. Most of the old oars who intend coming up to row are now up, and the boats ought to be nearly settled. As to the places of the individual boats we think there ought to be no change in the "Head of the River," though it is to be hoped that Jesus will add to the evenness, which they are rapidly obtaining, a little more spirit than at present characterises their rowing. Hockin is expected up shortly, when he will of course go seven, to the exclusion of Jackson, who, though a pretty oar, seems hardly powerful enough for a boat which has to keep away from Caius I. It was a cheery sight to see Gurdon up again, though it be only for a day or so.

L.M.B.C. I. are still weak and scratchy, and in their light boat appear anything but comfortable; the whole crew, except perhaps 7 and 4, appear afraid of some awful result which might attend a sharp beginning.

Caius I. are coming on well, and at present are the best boat on the river; they are a strong lot on the whole, though bow and stroke do not come up to the rest in point of physique, and the whole crew want plenty of hard work; with the good coaching which they are sure to get if they can persuade their present visitors to remain with them.

First Trinity are indeed fortunate in having again secured the services of Mr. R. C. Lehmann, who has been rowing seven for the last few days. Judging from the time he has devoted to the study of rowing, he ought to be of great service to his boat. His pluck is undoubted, if we may draw our conclusions from the way in which he has bravely represented a club, during a time when it was chiefly remarkable for its want of success.

Third 1st are, in their usual style, rowing with plenty of smartness, but without much attempt at covering their blades or doing much leg work, but they will doubtless easily keep their place by the aid of their regularity of swing and quickness of stroke.

Hall I. are rowing somewhat after the Third Trinity style, but hardly with as much success, they are decidedly "scratchy," and, though well together, do not look like making many bumps.

Caius II are at present uneven and do not seem to like their light ship, to which they apparently have taken before they were fit for it, they must improve more if they wish to keep their place.

Clare I has improved as much as any boat during the last week, and if they go on as they are now will stand a fair chance of catching Caius II. Jones-Bateman, one of the frozen-out heroes of last year's "trials," has come up to row.

First Trinity II is heavy and lethargic; there seems a want of leg work throughout, their hands come away fairly from their chest but there is not as great an amount of work resulting from this virtue as there ought to be.

Lady Margaret II are exactly what we should expect—a weak edition of Lady Margaret I—and they do not make full use even of what strength they have.

Pembroke I. are unfortunate: they were getting on well, when Collison, one of their best men was taken ill; and, though we hope soon to see him at his old place, yet the absence of one of their chief pillars during such an important period of practice, cannot but be regretted. They are, however, going fairly well, but want more honest rowing; their style being without that deep grip of the water which does so much to propel a boat.

Emmanuel I. are, for their position, a very fair boat: they are getting on well together, and did not make at all a bad start in their light ship.

First Trinity III are very little, if at all, inferior to First Trinity II; the style of rowing in the two boats being very much alike and shewing an absurd similarity in faults.

Sidney I. are coming on much better than it seemed likely at the beginning of the term. Their first attempt in their racing boat was attended with disaster, but since then they have gone much better; and if stroke could be persuaded to put a little more life into his rowing, they might make two bumps.

Jesus 2nd are not quite what might be expected of them after their rowing of last term; but Jesus boats have a knack of getting into shape just before the races, so that we may yet expect to see them up to their usual standard, especially as one man is to come to them out of the first boat.

Of the other boats St. Catharine's are the worst; and Downing probably the best. The latter are fast, and get along in a way best known to themselves. Queens' are right to be proud of their two "blues," but why should this prevent some of the boat from adding their little quota of work? Surely "imitation is the sincerest flattery."

Watson-Taylor has at last resumed his place as stroke in the Magdalene boat; but at present it does not seem as if they would repeat their last year's success.

C. U. R. V.

The terminal Scratch Fours came off on the 20th ult, and were productive of some very fair shooting. Eight fours were drawn, one containing three 'blues,' but although the most fancied, this quartette came to grief most signally: the winning four consisted of

Lieut. Castle...	... ...	72 points.
Col.-Sergt. Dove	... ...	72 ,,
Pte. Bomford	... ...	73 ,,
Pte. Poyser ...	... ...	53 ,,
		270

The individual prize for top score was won by Sergt. A. P. Humphry with a score of 73 points, Pte. Bomford having been counted out at the longest range.

On Tuesday, the 27th ult., an interesting match took place between eight from F. (Trinity) Company, and eight chosen from the rest of the Battalion. The members of the F. Company have of late been shooting up wonderfully well, and feeling themselves strong enough to cope with all the other companies together, they issued a challenge. The day appointed for the match was not a favourable one for shooting, there being a strong wind blowing across the range from right to left, and it was evident that whichever team had the right hand target at the short range would have a great advantage. F. Company lost the toss and consequently shot at the left hand target at 200 yds in the full force of the wind. In spite of this, however, the scoring on both sides was very even, there being only 4 pts. difference between the teams.

F. Company.		Rest of Battalion.

	213		217

Both teams then proceeded to the 500 yds, range, F. Company being 4 pts, to the bad: at this distance there was little, if any, difference in the targets. The F. Company men were evidently bent on reducing the lead of the other team, and by careful shooting managed to wipe off 3 pts, being still a single point in arrears:—

Lieut. Lea	24	Private Thomson	20
Corpl. Donovan	14	Capt. Craig	16
Corpl. Penhall	8	Private Bomford	16
	175.		172

At this juncture it was evidently anyone's match and as each rifle cracked anxious was the gaze that followed the bullet targetwards, while every ear was strained to catch the welcome ring of the lead on the iron mark. A stream of sunlight on the faces of those shooting made it all the more difficult to hit the target at what is always acknowledged to be a hard range with the Snider. Great was the excitement whilst Messrs. Goddard and Dove, and Humphry and Lea, the last pair of each team, were shooting, as the latter were fast scoring away from the former, but although they gained 18 pts. between them over their opponents, 4 points were still wanting to save F. Company from defeat; the scores at 600 yds, were:—

Some years have passed since a similar match took place between F. Company and the Battalion, and on that occasion victory rested with the single Company; it is somewhat worthy of remark that the F. Company is the only one that has ever dared to tackle the Battalion single-handed. We hope the return match, which we believe is to come off very shortly, will prove as interesting and well-contested as that of Tuesday last.

On Saturday evening a meeting was held to elect officers for F. Company. Lieutenant Lea was unanimously chosen Captain, vice Capt. Hamilton resigned, while Sergt. A. W. Stallard and Corpl J. G. Lindsay were elected Lieutenants in place of Lieut Lea promoted and Lieut. Castle resigned.

OXFORD LETTER.

The eights are now all about as good as they will be, seeing the races commence on Wednesday. Balliol have somewhat improved lately, but are still very bad for a head of the river, and must go down four places at least. Magdalen are fast, and between them and B.N.C. lies the struggle for the headship. There seems little to choose between the two, but I fancy Magdalen will hold their own, and finish head for the first time on record. University do not go so fast as they ought, judging by their appearance. Pembroke and Christ Church are very slow, and must both fall. The same may be said of Keble, though they have a promising man at No. 6. Hertford are very strong, but are not going steadily; when they get together, however, they are fast, and ought to rise a few places. Exeter are at present the fastest boat on the river, but the men seem rather likely to be over-trained. Worcester are fairly fast but have not continued to improve lately as they should. Of the rest Lincoln are better than they have been for some years, and St. Mary Hall have a creditable boat. St. John's are slow, though they have a powerful and celebrated athlete rowing six. The Unattached and St. Edmund Hall are very bad. The Eights start in the following order:—

Balliol	St. John's
Magdalen	Worcester
University	Queens'
Pembroke	St. Mary Hall
B. N. C.	Oriel
New Coll.	Lincoln
Ch. Ch.	Merton
Hertford	Unattached
Keble	Jesus
Exeter	St. Edmund Hall.
Corpus

It is rumoured that the eights will be enlivened this year by an election. We hope not. Fighting has begun already: and threatens to get worse. On Saturday Sir William Harcourt made a lively speech with a very touching exhortation to peace and unity. It ended of course in the Liberal band encountering a phalanx of Conservative sandwich-men, with the usual result. We are unfortunately limited to a passive interest: a circular has been sent round to all the colleges informing us that attendance at any political meeting will cost the offender £5, and "any further penalty which may seem good to the proctor and Vice-Chancellor." The warning is needed perhaps, as several Undergraduates made themselves tolerably conspicuous at the end of last term.

There is certainly no lack of political zeal. The debate in the Union, on "the sincere regret" with which the house "viewed the issue of the late election," was twice adjourned. It was opened very ably by the Hon. G. N. Curzon, of Balliol; whose tone of mild and dignified remonstrance incited Mr. Cook to a somewhat ferocious attack on him. The eleven reasons on which Mr. Curzon based his "regret" were each the object of his searching criticism and of the tender solicitude of Mr. Dawson who followed. The next debate was also a remarkable one. The new room was crowded—it is said there were upwards of a thousand people present: and certainly they had good reasons for coming. Do you at Cambridge go in for metaphors? Here they bloom and flourish and increase and multiply; one premier we saw like a rattle-snake reading Homer on the top of the Rocky Mountains: another we beheld with regret between the horns of a disreputable dilemma; while, like a skilful horticulturist, Providence was employed in manuring beneath the glass-shade of liberalism, the tender seed of the new conservatism with the "ruins" of the old. One interesting incident was the mention of Mr. Bradlaugh, whose name was received with howls, and his history with cheering. For this the President was responsible, who fresh from athletics, seemed to leap with renewed ardour into the arena of politics. The debate ended on Thursday with a house tumultuously impatient to hear Mr. Curzon's reply, which indeed was well worth hearing. He carried his audience completely with him, and his motion by a considerable majority.

The other day I saw a number of black coats and white ties about the streets unusual even for Oxford. I heard afterwards that a proposal was being made to give natural science men a degree without Greek: a compromise was come to by which they were to have a degree, only it was to be called by another name, but the compromise was rejected. The Church would have nothing to do with science even unveiled: and science did not seem to think the degree called B.N.S. would smell as sweet.

Cricket has now made a fair start and there have been divers college matches. I notice that Worcester made the large score of 20 the other day against Trinity who made 138. In the Freshmen's match Peake of Oriel distinguished himself by bowling eleven wickets, while Evelyn of the same college batted in very fair form. In the Seniors' match some large scores were made. They failed to finish the game in three days, the total scores being:—Knight's side, 1st innings, 213; 2nd innings, 229. Horner's side, 1st innings, 388. Trevor of Corpus made 142 in first-class style, while Patterson of Pembroke made 54 and 81 and bowled five wickets. Eyre of Christ Church made 76 (not out), and Hodson of Hertford played very nicely for his score of 42.

On the morning of May the 1st we were all awakened by the usual blowing of horns. Countless small boys were engaged busily up and down the town in making a beautiful morning hideous. In desperation a good many of us got up and went down to Magdalen to hear the "Hymnus Eucharisticus" sung from the top of the tower. The bridge is crowded with people in all qualities and quantities of clothing: for one cannot hear beneath the tower, and has to stand at some distance away. As the sun rose the horns ceased, and a faint, very faint song was heard from above. At last it stopped: and suddenly from above fell a little flock of surplices fluttering down, with a black gown sailing slowly after: the time-honoured termination of the proceedings. To those Cambridge men who care for King's Chapel it might be interesting to know that we owe the design of our chief ornament to the same man to whom, in great measure, Cambridge owes hers. We are both much indebted to Bishop Waynflete. The Tower, we hear, was completed by Wolsey, bursar of Magdalen, who was so intent on his work that he spent on it what ought to have been spent on the keep of the fellows. We will hope that the present generation makes up for past starvation. The horns, we also hear, are the survival of a mediæval custom; it was so our ancestors were accustomed to exorcise the devil, who fled at the sound. Indeed one can easily believe it.

The Bishop designate of Liverpool preached last Sunday, at the University Church. A contemporary regrets that "so well known a controversialist should have been so little polemical." He made up for the omission elsewhere. A well-known building opposite the gates of Christ Church resounded with words that did not fail on the side of mildness, at any rate. Was it the neighbourhood of the father of the unfaithful that roused him? Those of Dr. Pusey's disciples who heard him are not unconverted for lack of enlightenment. The Bampton lecturer continues his work of demolition. Mr. Wordsworth, who succeeds him, will have plenty of cleared ground to build upon.

There is to be a society started for the collection and observation of Oxford flowers. We have, I believe many rare ones—not only of rhetoric, but the purely botanical sorts. Anything which will introduce men to the beautiful country round is a desirable addition. Has anyone written about Oxford walks or Cambridge Grinds? Surely the subject would be an interesting one. Six couples running passed me here, all in spectacles, and all talking about Greats, except one that was talking about Mods.

The Stanhope Prize has been won by Mr. L. C. Sanders, of Christ Church.

Mr. Gladstone's first private Secretary, Mr. J. A. Godley, was a scholar of Balliol, and Fellow of Hertford: in fact, our connection with the political world seems to be growing. We read with pleasure that the member for Southwark adorned alone the Treasury Bench. Balliol is confidently expecting to see again two of her sons, whom she has very lately parted with, swell the new Parliament: and Keble can fairly boast that lecturing to Keble men is the best training for young politicians.

Peace and war are both present in our minds in their most striking aspects, for we not only have our election, but we have a review of yeomanry. The rival bands occasionally meet, and we can see for ourselves that piece and war are very far from harmonizing. I have noticed that Conservatives are very fond of playing "God Save the Prince of Wales," while the Liberals have a weakness for "Rule Britannia." Sir William himself (we can hardly believe it) is said to have started the chorus, "We soon shall hear of discord in the Spheres."

Last week there was an alarm of fire in Balliol. The crowd outside expressed considerable interest in it, and when they were informed that it was extinguished (we hear the master himself arrived in cap and gown), consoled themselves by sending at once for the fire engine. It is certainly wonderful that none of our colleges should burn, as being some of them fitted from top to bottom with old wood, they would blaze up with great rapidity.

The Championship Athletic Meeting is to be held, as arranged at Oxford, in the beginning of the Long: but what Oxford men will appear has not transpired. Mr. Spearman, of John's, is talked of as going to enter.

Does it interest anyone to know that there are two vacancies in the Treasury, to be filled up by open competition? The Universities have hitherto distinguished themselves in these examinations, and we will hope, will continue to do so.

We boast a Lawn Tennis Club here, which again boasts a magnificence livery of red and black. The grounds are beyond the Parks, and are said to be very good. Last year they held a championship meeting, and are going to do so this year too.

On Wednesday next the Oxford Choral Society are to give their concert in the Sheldonian Theatre, when Handel's "Israel in Egypt" is to be performed, and on Tuesday, May 11th, Mr. Brandram is to recite the "Tempest," in the same place. Which will be more popular it is difficult to say; but we will hope both will draw large audiences. Mr. Brandram is reciting on behalf of the Home for Nurses, which we have no doubt will be an additional incentive to Oxford Undergraduates, and it would be a pity if "Israel in Egypt" were sung in a wilderness. But the election has certainly brought home to us one of the finest passages—we have already our plague of this.

RENAN.

Ernest Renan was born in the year 1823, in Trégueir, of Brittany, and it was there he received his earliest education. When he was 14 years old he was sent to the seminary of S. Nicolas in Paris.. Five years later he went to Issy to continue his preparation for the church to which he was already destined. Here he first made his acquaintance with the philosophy which has moulded all his later life and writings. It happened that at that time his elder sister was living in Germany. A lady of high culture and well acquainted with the modern German school, she communicated to her brother her sympathy with the writings of Fichte Schelling and Hegel. With this stimulus Renan rapidly acquired a knowledge of German and philosophy; and along with this, doubts of the truth of the orthodox Catholic faith. However, these doubts were not yet sufficient to induce him to abandon his intentions of becoming a priest, and he left Issy for S. Sulpice to complete his theological studies. In this latter seminary he learnt Hebrew under the care of the Abbé Le Hir, a celebrated scholar of the time. But his increasing objections to Christianity soon made a rupture inevitable. Already he had received the tonsure and passed through the lower orders and was shortly to have taken the decisive step of becoming a sub-deacon. Recoiling from this prospect he communicated his doubts to the most enlightened of the professors. They were alarmed and required him instantly to leave the seminary. The few years that followed were the most difficult part of Renan's life. He had to pursue his studies amidst an incessant struggle with poverty, until in 1847 he won the Volney prize by an essay "on the Semitic Language." From that time his success has with but short exceptions been uninterrupted. He became a contributorto the "Journal des Debats," and received in return the support of that most influential French paper. In 1860 he was sent by the French government on a scientific expedition to Syria, for the purpose of inquiring into Phaenician antiquities. It was there that he conceived and almost completed his celebrated "Life of Jesus." In his own words, "the scientific mission that I directed in 1860 and 1861 compelled me to reside on the frontiers of Galilee and often to travel there. I have crossed in all directions the province of the gospels, scarcely any important locality connected with the life of Jesus has escaped me. All the history, which at a distance seemed to float in the clouds of an unreal world, now acquired a substance, a solidity that astonished me. The striking agreement of the texts and the places, the marvellous harmony of the evangelical ideal with the country which served for its frame-work; all this was for me a true revelation. I had before my eyes a fifth gospel mutilated but still legible, and henceforth underlying the stories of Matthew and Mark, instead of an abstract being that might be thought never to have existed, I saw an admirable figure live and move."

After returning from Syria Renan was appointed to the chair of Hebrew at the College of France. A numerous audience attended his opening lecture, attracted by the widely-spread reputation of the professor for the heterodoxy. The subject was "the influence of the Semitic races on the civilization of the world." In such a lecture it was impossible to avoid mentioning Jesus, equally impossible for anyone holding Renan's views to treat him otherwise than as a man. For the moment Renan achieved a great success. He was listened to with complete attention, and the students followed him with applause to his own house. But naturally this success increased the indignation of the orthodox, and they succeeded in persuading the Emperor to put a stop to the course and afterwards to abolishing the chair.

Excepting the successive appearance of his books these are the only public events of importance in the life of M. Renan. To complete our account of him it will only be necessary to add that he married the sister of the celebrated painter Ary Scheffer, and with that striking inconsistency which ranks him among "those hateful to God and to his enemies" wrote a submissive letter to the Archbishop of Paris, asking him to be married as a good catholic, and later on allowed his first child to be baptised, acts of weakness which cannot be too severely blamed. For the rest he bears an irreproachable private character, has been a kind brother and always shewn the deepest affection to his mother, an orthodox Breton Catholic.

Before proceeding to give an account of Renan's philosophy we must remind the reader of what has been already said that it is derived with but slight modification from Fichte Schelling and Hegel. According to Hegel, as far as we can make out—for it would be impertinent for an outsider to profess to understand him—men and the world, all objects, animate or inanimate, are in a state of mutual interdependence and cannot exist apart from one another. The whole they form is the only reality, the individual is a mere abstraction. This complex whole is called the idea or god. The idea contains in itself from the beginning all the elements of which the universe is formed. All the phenomena and laws of the material universe are only the results of its development. They are only the explicit manifestation of what was already implicit, just as in mathematics, all theorems, however striking they may seem, are already contained in the original axioms. Hence every event is linked to every other event by a chain of necessary connection, and is only so far real as it forms part of this chain. A miracle is according to this theory impossible and unreal. This necessity applies to history also. At each period the corresponding philosophy is the highest yet attained expression of the idea. But after the mighty mind, the Aristotle or Leibnitz which conceived this philosophy in its fulness has passed away, the men who follow are incapable of comprehending the idea as a whole. The idea now becomes broken up or negatived, and can only become complete again by a negation of the negations when some new philosopher again combines the scattered thoughts of his time. It then returns into itself, but now enriched and amplified. Such is the eternal process which, according to Hegel, sums up all history. It was necessary to point it out, even though but roughly and inaccurately, in order to see whence Renan derives his views and the little originality there is in them. In his works passages like the following are constantly occurring: "The world is enveloped in darkness; but yet it is ever drawing nearer towards God." We shall now see what is meant by such phrases. Read the following, "Everything is born of matter, but it is the idea which animates all things and which by aspiring to realize itself sets life agoing. This is God. God is the hidden which urges all things into life and shapes them into harmony." Or this again: "The business of all living things is to make God perfect, to contribute to that grand ultimate resultant which will establish universal unity. Hitherto this work has been accomplished in the dark by the secret instinct of all living creatures; some future day reason will take the task in hand, and after having organised humanity, will organise God." Thus with Renan, as with Hegel, God is the idea, existing even from the beginning, but only becoming conscious of himself in philosophy, and even approaching more and more towards perfection. This would appear still more clearly if we had space to quote additional passages in illustration. But the believing Christian may ask "Why call this myth, this shadow, God? This is not the God who is our Father, the God in whom we have hoped and to whom we have prayed. Why conceal denial under an illusory appearance of assent?" M. Renan has an answer ready. "If we are asked why we retain the word of God, we reply, that no word appeals to the feelings as well as this. If you speak to a peasant of God, he will understand you and sympathize with you at once. Besides the word has been used in beautiful poetry." That philosphers should mould their language so as not to shock popular belief, is an idea which occurs several times in our author's writings, but the following passage deserves quotation for the characteristic plainness with which it is asserted: "Thoughts good for those, who are preserved by their nobility of character from all moral danger, may not be when applied without ill effects on those who are surrounded by baseness. Let us enjoy the liberty of the sons of God, but let us take care not to be accomplices in the diminution of virtue that would threaten our societies if Christianity were to be enfeebled." So it appears that M. Renan attaches no great value to truth in itself. In fact, according to him the love of truth is a sign of a somewhat brutal mind. Every assertion melts into its contrary by imperceptible shades and only men wanting delicacy and discrimination will fail to perceive these shades and will answer any question by a blunt Yes or No! We shall see as we go on that he believes all great results to have been achieved by a system of deceit on the part of nature and great men, including Jesus among them.

This will appear at once in his explanations of the destiny of the world to which we now return. It must be premised that Renan is incapable of appreciating, far less applying, the vigour of scientific method. With an extensive knowledge of literature and language, he seems to have no acquaintance with science of any kind. While rejecting the conclusion of the theology he was brought up in, he has never been able to free himself from the methods. His hypotheses are entirely metaphysical, and have that delightful characteristic of all metaphysics; they are incapable either of proof or of disproof. The only difference is that, while the catholic theologian accepted theories without proof because they were beautiful and elevating, Renan accepts theories without proof because they are hideous and degrading. To begin with, love and truth are illusions, but as these illusions are necessary to man's existence, nature, the old metaphysical entity pressed into new service, cheats man into believing them. If he were ever to succeed in shaking off this belief his life would come to an end and this may perhaps account for the fact that some of the planets are uninhabited. We are not parodying, let us read M. Renan's own words: "Man is ensnared by certain artful devices of nature, such as religion, love, the attraction towards the good and true, all of which instincts, as far as our mere personal interest is concerned, beguile us onward to an end external to ourselves. Man, by the progress of reflection, detects these guiles with ever greater clearness, and demolishes religion, love, truth and goodness by his criticism." In a similar way Nature deludes us into desiring objects useless as soon as they are obtained. "Every desire is illusory; but things are disposed in such a way that the emptiness of the desire is only felt when the desire has been satisfied! There is not an object which attracts us but what reveals its worthlessness when once we have obtained it. Ever since the world began, this law has been invariable. No matter, those who are aware of it keep on desiring all the same; and though Ecclesiastes should for ever preach his disappointed old bachelor's philosophy, everybody will admit him to be right, but will continue to as before." Thus the universe is from beginning to end a large lie, an organised system of deceit. And for what purpose? For the purpose of attaining self-consciousness, the ultimate result to which the world is tending. This is the end of all noble actions and all desires. Useless though they be for the individual, they have their purpose in the economy of the whole; and when once the end is attained, all that has contributed to that end will live again; in the consciousness of the whole, the consciousness of all parts will revive. The philosopher as well as the Christian may take for his epitaph "Beatam resurrectionem expectans." It is only fair, however, to add that about this last part M. Renan is not quite sure. The universal deceit he considers a certainty, the future life only a possibility.

Leaving now cosmical speculation, we will look at Renan's views on history. They are avowedly borrowed from German sources. According to him Germany created history; all France produced was "the philosophy of the 18th century, the final expression of a superficial good sense, without method, without possibility of progress." Nor is England any better. Englishmen have been successful in science, but the English nature is too brutal, too unsympathetic to possess any aptitude for history. Before passing on we must note Renan's complete want of appreciation of the greatest of his own countrymen. To anyone who knows the profound influence Diderot has had on all later speculations, who has seen in his writings the germs of Positivism and of the evolution theory, it is startling to hear that all he possessed was a "superficial good sense without possibility of progress." It is still more startling to be told that neither Bossuet, Montesquieu, Condorcet, De Maistre, nor Robertson, Gibbon, and Hume knew anything about history. However, it is too habitual now to depreciate the 18th century, and to suppose that the world was in outer darkness till Germany chose to enlighten it, for any writer to be blamed for accepting this view. Taking then M. Renan at his own word, as a borrower from German history as well as from German philosophy, we shall find that all he adds to the results of Baur and Strauss is an art of story-telling, a kind of romantic manner that reminds us turn by turn of "René" and of "Paul and Virginia." But we will lay before the reader a short summary of the "Vie de Jesus," and leave him to judge for himself.

The Jesus, then, of the 5th gospel, was a young man possessed of noble thoughts and charming manners. By the inimitable grace and beauty of his disposition he attracted round many disciples, who were thirsting for a higher religion than that of the Jewish orthodoxy. Many happy days were now passed by the master and his followers, in the "smiling plains of Galilee." Life was for them a joyful dream, which no care for the future was allowed to disturb. Like the birds and the flowers they lived, without anxiety for food and clothing. From time to time Jesus would utter one of His exquisite aphorisms or parables, breathing "the perfume of the fields." The reverence of the disciples for their master was unbounded. They attributed to him supernatural powers, they pretended he was born at Bethlehem, and even invented genealogies to trace his descent to David. Did Jesus take any part in these "innocent fictions?" We cannot tell. "It is impossible to distinguish the miracles which have been attributed to Jesus by popular opinion, from those in which he has consented to play an active part. Above all it is impossible to know whether the repulsive incidents of struggling, of groaning, and other characteristics, seeming to indicate jugglery, are historical, or are due to the belief of the compilers." However, Renan is perfectly certain that Jesus allowed Himself to be called the son of David, while well knowing that he had no claim to such a title. And yet, believing this, he concludes his book by saying "among the sons of men, no greater has been born than Jesus." We are forced to ask: "If, as you say, Jesus allowed untruths concerning himself to circulate, perhaps took an active part in their propagation, can he be considered the greatest and best of men? Can he even be considered a man worthy of respect?" But this question is founded on a misunderstanding of Renan's philosophy. As we have already seen, he teaches us that nature is working out her ends by a system of deceit. We shall now find that by deceit all the great results of history have been accomplished. In such cases the only fault is due to humanity that choose to be deceived. The motto of every great man must be "Populus vult decipi, decipiatur." "It is easy for us, powerless as we are, to call this falsehood, and proud of our timid honesty to treat with disdain the heroes who accepted, under other conditions, the struggle of life. When we have accomplished with our scruples what they accomplished with their falsehoods we shall have the right to be severe on them." So much for the miracles. We need not delay with Renan's account of Jesus' teaching, it will be sufficient to say that he attributes to him a sort of Hegelian pantheism.

But these happy days in Gallilee passed away. Jesus was induced to go to Jerusalem, and there He encountered more and more opposition. At the same time His character was changed. Though He still gave utterance from time to time to thoughts of the deepest profundity, he no longer possessed that inimitable grace and charm of manner which had once drawn all men to him. He became harsh and irritable. He now began to look forward to an approaching interposition of the Divine power on his behalf. God was to come, attended by his angels, with Jesus on his right hand, and thenceforth Jesus was to reign for ever and ever. "Let us forgive Him this momentary fanaticism which never reached His great soul, and which His death will soon expiate." However, the expected intervention was not forthcoming, and Jesus was put to death by the Jewish rulers. With this the "Life of Jesus" ends. For the resurrection we must look to the "Apostles." We are then told how the madwoman, Mary Magdalene, went to the tomb and fancied she saw her risen Lord; and then by degrees communicated her belief to the other disciples. The whole of Christianity is thus made to depend on the illusions of madness, and M. Renan, far from being surprised at his result, or considering it a greater miracle than any recorded in the gospels, is delighted and moved almost to poetry. "The glory of the resurrection belong to Mary of Magdala. Next to Jesus, it is Mary who has done most to found Christianity. Do not let us apply a cold analysis to this master work of idealism and love. What wise man has given to the world so much joy as the mad Mary of Magdala?"

We will take to ourselves M. Renan's last advice. We will not apply any longer a cold analysis to his master work of idealism and love. Perhaps, after this last instance of his historical judgment, further analysis is unnecessary. Surely we may say in conclusion there never has been such an utter hopeless scepticism as that of Renan's books. It is a scepticism which has become sceptical even of itself. Bernard and Bossuet believed; they were wrong. Diderot and Condorcet denied; they were wrong. The true philosopher neither believes nor denies, he uses old words from which all meaning has been taken away; he clings to illusions, knowing all the while that they are illusions. Such is the tone throughout Renan's writings. The only book we can compare them to, for complete agonism and despair, is Ecclesiastes. Ecclesiastes, as we know, did not long precede the great religious revolutions of the European race. Perhaps, too, this nineteenth century, with all its doubt and despondency, may be only the prelude to a new era of faith and hope.

ALLITERATION.

Among the many tendencies which are in great measure the outcome of that new factor is modern life, known to its detractors by the somewhat depreciatory title of "high-artism," one of the most marked and at the same time the least healthy is a habit of exaggerating the importance of details at the expense of the due proportions of the whole. Many of the followers of this school would seem to be incapable of taking a general view of anything. They work at the subordinate parts with a minuteness and subtlety of workmanship which demand our admiration, but in their loving elaboration they often lose sight of the fact that what they have spent a lifetime in perfecting is after all destined to be but a small part of a whole whose beauty and symmetry are marred by an undue preponderance of any one detail.

But our complaint against them does not rest here. Not content with committing this error themselves, they would have us admire in the works of the mightiest masters of days gone by, not the grand conception, but the perfect execution. They would crown with laurels the brows, not of the epic or the tragic poet, but of some writer of dainty and delicate lyrics; especially if such lyrist be the author of but one fragment; they would have us forget all the poets whom we have been taught to honour as the chief glories of French literature in blind reverence and concentrated admiration for the singers of love lays. Nay, some there are who look on Shakespeare's dramas as mere settings for his songs, who commend in Coleridge only his alliteration.

And because all men admire the marvellous effect of occasional assonances, from the "flammantia moenia mundi" of Lucretius to Mr. Swinburne's "multitudinous walls of wandering wave," they insist that it is the alliteration of these writers which constitutes their chief and only charm. Therefore these critics never write a line themselves without repeating the same letter half a score of times. For whereas there are but few who can reach the spirit beneath, full many can fasten on the outer form, can catch the trick of utterance, and by reproducing the manner delude themselves into the belief that they have preserved the matter too.

Hence it is that we cannot now take up a new poem, a novel, even a political pamplet, without finding innumerable passages where sense is deliberately sacrificed to sound, a less appropriate substituted for a better word, merely because the writer wishes to "assail his audience with the allurements of alliteration." In a case where the outward form is at least as important as the inner meaning, this habit is more pardonable, for in the hands of a master, assonance and alliteration are," as Mr. Swinburne has said, "forces, requisite components of high and ample "harmony, witness once for all the divine passage which "begins

'Five miles meandering with a mazy motion'"

But just in proportion to the vividness of the pleasure we derive from alliteration thus used, is the keenness of the pang we feel when it is abused, when instead of the art being the medium whereby we attain to the knowledge of the beauty of the spirit beyond, we are so conscious of the art as to fail to pierce through it to the beauty.

If then such is the effect of too constant alliteration in a poem or purely literary work, what are we to think when we find the same thing in a serious political article, an election address, or a public speech? Is it indeed true, have we so utterly lost that love for plain speaking and true dealing whereof our forefathers were justly proud, that we cannot heed a fact, listen to a man's earnest convictions on the most vital questions of practical life, unless they be presented to us in a form that will not offend our fastidious ear? Has the tyrant culture gained so complete a mastery over our souls, honest Englishmen though we be that we can follow none save "men of light and leading," nay, that we cannot hearken to the voice of truth herself if she speak not in alliterative accents?

Surely this is not so, surely this prevailing love of assonance is but a passing phrase. The average Englishman may be by nature a Philistine, as the phrase runs in the cant of aestheticism, but there are worse things than Philistinism, and the time, we hope, is at hand when we shall arise and refuse to be any longer trammeled by the name, when we have already shaken us free of the thing, by our emphatic condemnation of the policy of "brag and bluster."

POETRY.

THE GREAT GOD CRAM.

(Parodied from Mrs. E. B. Browning's "Musical Instrument.")

What is he doing, the great god Cram,
Down in the schools by the river?
Trampling on learning and fostering sham,
Grinding the brains of men under his "coach,"
Worshipped and honoured in spite of reproach,
Master and lord by the river.

He chose out a youth, did the great god Cram,
A youth from the youths by the river,
"This one," he said, "is a promising lamb,
Meet to be cleared of superfluous brain,
Fattened and cared-for and led in my train
To the sacrifice down by the river."

Then he sat on his throne, did the great god Cram,
High on his throne by the river,
And measured the wits of the "promising lamb,"
And hacked and hewed and pruned at his mind
Till there was not a wrack of a thought behind
To prove him fresh from the river.

And he took the brain, did the great god Cram,
(So fine when it came to the river!)
And drew the pith without shrinking or qualm
Steadily forth from its quivering bed,
And filled the poor dry empty head
With sand from the shoals of the river.

"This is the way," laughed the great god Cram, (Laughed as he sat by the river)
"The only way for a human lamb
To be rendered meet for my sacrifice.
When they win my favour, this is the price
They pay in the schools by the river."

Sweet, sweet, sweet, O Cram!
Passing sweet by the river!
The men in the boats forgot to row,
The sluggish stream began to flow,
When the smoke rose up by the river.

Yet half a beast is the great god Cram,
To laugh as he sits by the river,
Turning a man into less than a lamb—
The true gods sigh for the cost and the pain,
For the mind that will never think again
As it thought when it came to the river.

THE PAPER-KNIFE.

Poems. By William Hurrell Mallock. (Chatto and Windus, 1880.)

This book is unfortunately prefaced by a common excuse of incapacity. The importunity of private friendship is so generally urged as a reason for annoying a public audience, that we did not anticipate any unusual degree of pleasure from an examination of Mr. Mallock's new pretensions. It has been an agreeable surprise to us to discover that the friends of Mr. Mallock are exceptionally reasonable. He appears to considerably greater advantage in analysing and relating his own impressions than in attempting to regulate the mental habits of his neighbours.

Digitized by Google

If these poems had been published anonymously, the name of Mr. Mallock would perhaps have been suggested to us by a very characteristic mark of self-consciousness. There are not many grown men who would be at the pains to add for our information such words as "an. æt., 13" "an. æt., 17" etc., at the end of each production as regularly (to use Macaulay's expression) as the Gloria Patri at the end of a Psalm. Strange though it may seem to him, Mr. Mallock is really not yet one of the select few whose writings are made interesting by the mere fact of their authorship, —whose nonsense is more generally cherished than the sense of ordinary men. The implication intended is, of course, the remarkable precocity of the boyhood of this great author, and if the names of Pope and Cowley suggest themselves in this connection, that is entirely the critic's own business. We have a prejudice in favour of learning these interesting details from the "friends" who have rescued them from oblivion—not from the modest author who has been reluctantly compelled to publish. That the two worthless "love-songs" at the beginning of the book were written at the ages of eight and thirteen respectively, is no excuse at all for their public appearance.

The merit of Mr. Mallock's poems, considered as a whole, is however, far more conspicuous than their defects. Without any striking originality of conception, there is no want of the humbler originality by which ideas not yet familiar enough to have become common-place are expressed in new and graceful forms. This originality of the second order, as it may be called, is well exemplified in the following lines "on Lake Como":—

"The stars are o'er our heads in hollow skies,
In hollow skies the stars beneath our boat,
Betwixt the stars of two infinities,
Midway upon a gleaming film, we float.

My lips are on the sounding horn;
The sounding horn with music fills,
Faint echoes backwards from the world are borne,
Tongued by yon dusky zone of slumbering hills.
The world spreads wide on every side,
But dark and cold it seems to me,
What care I, on this charmed tide,
For aught save those far stars and thee?"

These are some of the best lines in the book, but can anyone affirm that they contain a single image of indisputable pretensions to novelty? They certainly afford, as thus expressed, a new pleasure; they are a happy medium between originality and commonplace, combined with unusual excellence of form. This is about all that can be truly said in their favour, but of how many poems written at eighteen could be said as much? On the other hand, there is no want of the special shortcomings which poetic immaturity commonly exhibits. There is the usual excess of morbid introspection, and a liberal use of such affectations as "foamy moonlight," "aching moon," "spongy East," "whisperings of crisp light," and the like, to which no definite meaning can be assigned Here is the worst metaphor which we have had the misfortune to encounter for many a day:—

"Ah, on that morning how I cursed the light!
Let it be nameless—all the shameless night.
The spent fleet pleasure—fanged by hound-swift pain.
The pitiless morning smote my aching sight,
And would not let me hide in sleep again."

For all that these poems disclose, Mr. Mallock has yet to acquire the two prime essentials of a real poetic eminence. The first is that vivid though indefinable personality which we unhesitatingly assign to a great author, without having in our mind a single line of his writings. There are too many vague reminiscences of Tennyson and Swinburne to allow such a personality to emerge from Mr. Mallock's present effusions. Nor has the equally essential mark of continuous development and progress been, as yet, sufficiently evidenced. But if to these characteristics be added the attainment of a uniform, as well as a high level of workmanship, Mr. Mallock need have few apprehensions of ultimate failure. His present performance is, in many respects, so far beyond the average of boyhood that his success is mainly a question of his capacity to maintain, at the age of forty, something like a proportionate superiority. Should this capacity appear, he will be one of the first writers of his time of the egoistic, sentimental, self-conscious order: we should expect from him great delicacy of touch, and considerable tenderness, and subtlety of feeling, with very little manliness or social sympathy of any kind.

We cannot conclude without a protest against the tone already adopted by experienced journalists towards Mr. Mallock's pretensions, in evident ignorance of what his own interests and the interests of his readers alike require. Thus we find more than one allusion to the "eminence" which our author has already attained, with a general deference of criticism to which he he has made good no claim whatever. Such language can do no good, and will probably do much harm. The question of immediate consequence is not the encouragement of a promising writer—of which he has had enough in all conscience—but the reduction of preposterous vanity to reasonable dimensions. The encouragement may be resumed when Mr. Mallock has applied himself in earnest to his poetic vocation, and when he has ceased to trifle with religious and philosophic problems.

Poems and Parodies; by two Undergrads. Oxford, B. H. Blackwell. 1880. Price One Shilling.

As regarding the title of this little work, we are happy to say that on the whole it is not difficult to settle which of the contents are meant for "Poems" and which for "Parodies." It is only concerning the longest piece in the book that we are in doubt under which head to class it. It is an "Oxford Tale," told in very Tennysonian blank verse, and here it is hard to decide whether the Laureate's rhythm is imitated in flattery, or in derision. The undoubted parodies are that of the opening to Mr. Morris's "Earthly Paradise," a very Swinburnian rendering of the story of "Jack and Jill," and a practical application in doubtful taste of one of the songs in the "Princess" to proctors, bull-dogs and freshmen. Of the poems there is little to be said for good or for bad. There is an antique directness about the following lines, which deserves quotation. The friend of a certain Andrea del Castagno has invented some brilliant paints, whereupon

"Him with kind speeches Andrea sought,
And won his secret: then he thought,
'No man but I shall use these new Bright colours;' so his friend he slew."

But the tragic character of this narrative is possibly eclipsed by that of a certain Sainte Margerie, who, being in that mysterious state of mind in which "little she recked of dule or teen," sent away her natural bed, and with fivepence in her hand, lay down on "dank straw," on which the "flagrant swine," whatever breed they may have belonged to, had reposed before her. This, however, may possibly be meant for a travestie of Mr. Rossetti.

As regards the work generally, it is probably of considerable interest to the family circles of the two undergraduates in question; it has the merit of being fairly grammatical, rhythmical, and in good rhyme; it is as verses go now-a-days, a good shillings worth; and a still greater merit, it is not pretentious. The authors do not anticipate laurel wreaths, either now or from posterity; they do not liken themselves unto great souls that parch with poetic fervour in an ungrateful world, they are not "intense." In the words of their first piece, which, with the last, may be considered the best in the book:

"We liken them" (their verses) "unto no flower that grows;
We do not offer them to wreath the hair
Of Mother Oxford, or to bind her brows,
(There are so many faded garlands there).
For praise or blame we do not greatly care;
Yet have we sought to please you in our rhymes,
We idle singers of these idle times."

In the May number of the "Portfolio" the series of Cambridge etchings is continued. The subject, King's College Chapel, is treated of in an imaginative style, quite appreciative of the mystic grandeur of the building and of its Middle Age associations. We think however that the prosaic congregation of towns-people in the foreground, suggestive of an afternoon promenade rather than deep devotion, hardly adds to the lofty feeling of the picture.

We understand that Mr. Julian Home's "In memoriam" to the late Prince Louis Napoleon is being translated into French by M. Le Fleming.

Mr. Bradshaw, Head Librarian, has just acquired for the University Library the rare book entitled "Papyrii Gemini Eleatis Hermathena seu de Eloquentiæ Victoria," Cambridge, 1522.

WRESTING THE SCRIPTURES.

"Which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, to their own perdition."—2 Peter iii., 16.

It is not always possible, my brethren, for a preacher to choose his own topic. It may often happen that subjects not specially pleasing to him are forced upon his attention, and he is imperiously bidden by the inward voice to follow their guidance. It is so with me. I would far rather have spoken to you of the law of duty; of the power of the human will; of pureness and kindness, "the two great wings" with which a true religion winnows the world. I would far rather have spoken to you of the many ways which are open to us for the amelioration of mankind, and have inspired you, so far as I could, to strive to rise not only out of the coarser depths of the sensuous life, but out of the dead levels of Pharisaic profession or money-getting selfishness, to be among the number of those who have sacrificed themselves utterly for the good of their fellows, those "who stretched out their strong arms to bring down heaven upon our earth." Nay, I should have even preferred to urge upon you specially the cause of that noble and needful charity for which to-day your contributions are invited, and to which—though I cannot at all plead for it—I trust that you will give from more permanent motives, and will give with all the generosity of youth. But I dare not abandon the subject which I began last Sunday. While the strife of tongues is so bitter and so base; while the ambitions and the unscrupulousness of party are so rife; while religion is so often presented to the world in its meanest, narrowest, and most repellent guise; while I know how many are alienated from the church of Christ by the tyranny of opinions which neither they nor their fathers were able to bear; I think it preeminently necessary to urge you rightly to study the Holy Scriptures, and to do your part in aiding another generation to abandon that misuse of them, which, as I shewed you last Sunday, has deluged Europe with misery, and been the weapon of a fatal conspiracy against the social, the civil and the religious liberty of mankind. It is of transcendent importance to the maintenance of sound learning and religious education, that there should flourish among us a school of thought which has an unfeigned contempt for feeble heresy-hunting, ignorant intolerance, and petty spite; which has a genuine sympathy with all that is large-hearted, generous, and free. If, as we are told so often, we are passing through a period of transition, the only way to secure that its issue shall be the establishment of a pure religious spirit, is to cling to the old rule In necessariis Unitas, in dubiis Libertas, in omnibus Caritas. In the seventeenth century there was in this University a small but admirable body of theologians known as the Cambridge Platonists, who, as Burnett tells us, "studied to propagate better thoughts, to take men off from being in parties, or from narrow notions, superstitious conceits, and fierceness about opinions." It is their special glory that they were tolerant while the advocacy of toleration was still unpopular and dangerous, and that not one of them soiled their pens with vituperative abuse, and that kind of advocacy which insinuates evil motives in an opponent instead of replying to his arguments. On one side of them was the school of Laud, with its Star-chamber and its doctrine of passive obedience; on the other side were the Puritans with their notions about reprobation and election; and beyond the pale of both were the powerful but sceptical thinkers who were repelled and disgusted by the arrogant narrowness of the one, and the gloomy fanaticism of the other. Against all these schools, in quietness and confidence, hated—to their great honour—by the fanatics of all parties, the Cambridge Platonists upheld the views of the divine love which is very pith of the Evangel, and the reality of the divine life, which is the very basis of all religious truth. They set their faces, as Hooker had done, against a credulous and exaggerated Bibliolatry; they maintained against the Puritans the indefeasible rights of the natural reason; they maintained against the school of Laud the suicidal folly of a narrow ecclesiasticism: they maintained against the sceptics the reality of a supernatural faith. But they were charitable to all from whom they differed, and while they were abused as 'Latitudinarians' and 'Sadducees,' they were the very best defenders of the faith, and clung to all that was of eternal import in the views of those from whom they stood aloof. Their candour, their charity, their unsectarian breadth, have been rewarded by "a religious isolation of two centuries"; but it is something that they inspired the noble catholicity of Tillotson, and influenced the saintly heart of Wilson, and lived again in the deep wisdom of Butler; and if we are ever to enjoy a relief from the "unhappy divisions" against which we offer that prayer which is too often the prelude to scenes of the most rancorous bitterness, it can only be by a revival of their spirit. Oh for an ever-growing school of Cambridge Platonists; men of whom we cannot ever conceive as interested in petty and transitory questions; men incapable of the juvenile pseudo-theological conceit of our young clerical reviewers; men who scorn to lend their countenance to ignorant outcries and false extremes! Nor is there any service which such a school could render more blessed and more permanent than to rescue the Bible from the tyranny of those interpreters who have abused its holy teaching to the misery and oppression of mankind.

How this tyranny began with the Scribes, who, joining gross superstition as to the letter, with boundless levity as to the spirit, made the whole Law of none effect by their traditions; how it developed among the Pharisees, against whom alone the words of Christ seem to burn with unquenchable indignation; how it culminated among the Rabbis, who, having degraded the Bible into an idol, naturally superseded it by another idol of their own making; how, solely in consequence of these errors, the Bible, the divinest book ever written, was degraded into, and superseded by, the Talmud, which is one of the emptiest and most wretched,—I have now no time to tell you. But we may well grieve and be astonished, that in spite of the whole spirit of the teachings of Christ, Jewish Rabbis handed on their methods to Christian fathers; and they too learnt the processes by which the light of heaven may be quenched under the dust-heaps of idle exegesis. Not for one moment would I echo the scornful language about the fathers used by Milton or by Middleton, yet it is a simple fact, that they too were misled by mere Rabbinic methods. If Hillel had his seven, and R. Akhibva his forty-two rules of interpretation, Origen also had his two-fold sense and his fourfold explanation. If the Rabbis had their numerical mysteries, their Gematria and their Notarikon, the pseudo-Barnabas argues that Abraham's 318 servants were a type of Christ on the Cross, because 318 is represented by the Greek letters $\tau\iota\eta$, of which τ stands for the Cross, and $\iota\eta$ for the name Jesus. It was this false method that led to the chiliasm of Justin Martyr; to the argument of Irenæus, that 666 must be the Number of the Beast, because Noah was 600 years old when he entered the ark, and the statue of Nebuchadnezzar was 66 feet high; to St. Hilary's explanation of those exquisitely tender and simple words of our Lord about the two sparrows sold for one farthing, as meaning the bodies and souls of sinners, who sell themselves for mere trifles, so that the soul thickens into the body; and to his explanation of the 146th Psalm, in which the clouds are the Prophets, and the mountains the Apostles, and the beasts men, and the young ravens Gentiles; with the appended remark (ah! how false to the spirit of Scripture, and how accordant with the conceit of theologians!) that to understand the Psalm literally is not only erroneous but irreligious! "Haec ita intelligere non dicam erroris sed irreligiositatis est."

It would only weary you were I to show that these and similar Rabbinic methods—untenable and dangerous as they have ever proved themselves—have continued in unbroken continuity down even to the present day. May I give you an instance? It would need, one would think, no great insight to see that though there were heroic elements of motive in the grim act of Jael,—and though no one would dream of judging by Christian standards a Bedouin chieftainess of more than 1000 years before our Lord,—and though ignorance may be pardoned, and the specks of golden motive accepted amid the dross of mingled actions,—yet that God never did and never could approve of bold lying and cold-blooded assassination. It was because they assumed that the very foundations of morality could be lightly overturned by the assumption of divine impulses, that Christian Popes have given their sanction to regicide, and Christian casuists to equivocation and falsehood. Yet I turn to the commentary of a most learned and most estimable living prelate, whom I reverence for himself no less than for his office—and what do I find? First the reiterated, and to many minds deeply-painful, assertion or invention that Jael was supernaturally inspired to commit that act; secondly, a declaration that the act was itself clearly miraculous; thirdly, a parallel between the tent-peg with which she shattered the brain of Sisera to the stake by which the Gentiles enlarge the Church; fourthly a comparison (borrowed from Origen and Augustine) of this tent-peg to the Cross; fifthly, an elaborate comparison of Jael to the Blessed Virgin Mary; sixthly, a discovery that there is a mystery in the words, "the tent of Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite," while nothing is said of Heber taking any part in the work; because, to quote the actual words of this learned commentary—"The tent in which the Lord of all took our nature, and tabernacled in us was the Blessed Virgin, and she was the wife of Joseph,—yet Joseph had no part in the work by which our enemy was destroyed." I do not quote this as an exceptional instance. The Commentary to which I allude abounds in such—what shall I call them?—well, I will only call them private interpretations: and I say that be they Rabbinic, or be they Patristic, or be they what they will, they are unwarrantable fancies which are not in the most distant degree binding on any human being, and that, however harmless and even edifying they may sometimes be, they are neither true nor tenable, and may in other hands degenerate very rapidly and very perniciously into "adulterating" and "handling deceitfully" the Word of God.

I shewed you last Sunday some of the terrible fruits of this superstitious misapplication of the mere vocables of Scripture. I shewed you that Scripture had been quoted against Galileo and Columbus, that on misapplications of "Honour the king" had been built the ruinous opposition to national freedom; on the misapplication of "Tu es Petrus" the colossal usurpation of Papal tyranny; on misapplications of "Cursed be Canaan" the shameful iniquities of the slave trade; on misapplications of "Compel them to come in" the hideous crimes of the Inquisition; on misapplications of "Thou shall not suffer a witch to live" the infuriated butchery of thousands of wretched women. They were but casual and obvious illustrations. When Ravaillac stabbed Henri IV. the Jesuits were ready to applaud and defend him by the example of Ehud, and the so-called Popish plot was a not unnatural nemesis on the sanction which from time to time had been accorded in the name of Scripture to an Anthony Babington and an Everard Digby. When Innocent III. was giving to the Abbot of Citeaux his infamous advice to entrap the Count of Toulouse to his ruin, he wrote, "We advise you, according to the precepts of the Apostle, to use cunning in your dealings with the Count of Toulouse, treating him with a wise dissimulation, in order that the other heretics may be more easily destroyed." "According to the precepts of the Apostle!"—and indeed says the historian, "it is remarkable that when the Roman Pontiffs, especially Gregory VII. and Innocent III., had any pernicious design to recommend, they were lavish in their appeals to Scripture, as if they had studied the Bible merely to find an excuse for sacrilege." I say—I cannot say too strongly—that such methods are totally false; they are to enter a holier sanctuary only to commit a deadlier sacrilege, to stand in the sunlight only to cast a blacker and chiller shadow. I say further that all such methods are fatal to Scripture, that if anything at all resembling them is persisted in, they will be utterly fatal to the nation's religious life. I say further still that though men have grown more wary to avoid the most grievous applications of this false method, they still theoretically cling to it, and that in consequence thereof to this day—and that in thousands of instances—the Scriptures are abused to support false reasoning in morals and bad inferences in matters of faith.

How then would I urge you to avoid these dangers of professing to honour the word of God while yet you degrade it to purposes which may easily become most alien to its spirit? Suffer me to offer you one or two suggestions.

1. First I would say study the scriptures. I am not speaking now of your private use of them as Christians for the guidance of your own souls; for, in that path,—if he be sincere, if he pray for the help of the Holy Spirit of God,—the wayfaring man though a fool shall not err. I am speaking now of your public, your controversial, your dogmatic—alas! also your party use of them; and I say that in this use too many of us are ignorant of their true meaning, and with rash arrogance build our inferences on that which never was the meaning. We smile when we hear of unlettered Roman Catholics supposing that the second verse of the 24th Psalm means "Thou hast founded the world" not "super maria" upon the seas, but "super Maria" on the Virgin Mary; or of ignorant Calvinists seriously arguing that they need not repent, because "the gift and calling of God are without repentance"; or of the English Archbishop before the reformation who argued that the authority of St. Peter and his successors was implied by "Thou shalt be called Kephas," "because we all know," he said "that Kephas" (which he confused with Κεφαλή) "means a head" yet a similar ignorance is so common, that a truly astonishing amount of what passes as scriptural quotation is a mere play on words. It is not only that the evidence of the MSS is ignored, so that we have sermons on the Three Heavenly Witnesses; or on the Angel stirring the Pool at Bethesda; but also that preachers and controversialists often shut their eyes to the first principles of right translation. Who have not heard sermons about "accepting Christ" preached on the text "Kiss the Son lest he be angry"; or on the Atonement, from "I know that my Redeemer liveth;" or on the Incarnation, from "He took on Him the seed of Abraham;" or on high sacramental doctrines on "We have an altar"; without so much as a suspicion that, in the first two instances, the meaning is to say the least far from certain, and in the last two entirely different from that in which it is applied? Who again has not heard the text "knowing therefore the terror of the Lord we persuade men" used as a plea for I know not what lurid and Apocalyptic pictures, though the text only means "Because I fear God, I am free from double dealing." Such errors may be comparatively harmless when they are used to sanction some piece of ritual, like the mistranslation of "At the name of Jesus every knee should bow"; or in slighter matters, as when a church dignitary very recently in an elaborate paper urged the text, "Let your moderation be known unto all men" in discredit of total abstinence as though ἐπιείκεια meant moderation in eating and drinking; but it is more serious when "Take no thought for the morrow", which means "do not be over anxious for to-morrow", is made the excuse for an immoral carelessness; when "I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy" is quoted to shew the duty of the acrid dissidence of churchmanship and of dissent; or as when the most common acts of Christian courtesy towards those from whom we differ are denounced by the text "A man that is a heretic reject" by those whose whole lives are αἱρέσεις or factious self assertions of error; or when the whole forensic and vicarious aspect of the Atonement is rested on "even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you" though there the English mistranslation "for Christ's sake" has no shadow of justification from the original ὁ Θεὸς ἐν Χριστῷ "God in Christ." And most serious is it of all when a text is made to cause deep and needless agony to human souls "He found no place for repentance though he sought it earnestly with tears;"—that text we are told was to the early struggles of John Bunyan "like a flaming sword, barring to him the way of the tree of life." How was it that there was none to tell him that, even if the text do not imply "no room to change his father's decision," still one text, were it never so plain, can never give the lie to that majestic unanimity of scripture which has proclaimed to us that "All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men," and that

"Who with repentance is not satisfied
Is not of heaven nor earth."

2. Then again what a source of endless mischief is a rude and blind Literalism. Is it needful to point out that "Sell all that thou hast" was not a sufficient ground for establishing the mendicant orders that "woe unto them that draw iniquity with cords of vanity" was not, as the Rabbis made it, a malediction on Church bells? that when John Bunyan was tormented by his want of faith in being unable to make the road puddles dry up at a word, he was mistaking metaphor for prose? "This is my body"—oh! the strange theories of transubstantiation, and transaccidentation, and consubstantiation; Oh! the volumes and libraries of controversy; Oh! the burnings, and hatred and schisms, and recriminations with which men have fought with each other, and anathematised each other, about those words of love! Is there no one to say that they are but an application of that simple and forcible figure of Jewish thought by which "eating" was but a type of closest incorporation—by which they said that Moses on Sinai fed on the music of the spheres, and that the just eat of the glory of the Shechinah?

Digitized by Google

3. And if Literalism be dangerous, may not Allegorising be made even more so? Is a text never to have its own proper meaning? Are we always to be packing into it a number of other meanings which it cannot by any possibility have originally conveyed? How perverse is the remark of St. Jerome, that to trace the literal sense is to eat the dust like the serpent! What is to become of the holy simplicity of Scripture, if Jacob is to be made a type of Christ, in 17 particulars, and Moses in 40, and Joseph in 44? And yet the Rabbis and the Fathers, and the Schoolmen, and the Reformers, and the Puritans, and Anglican divines are full of these allegorisings, and spiritualisings, and typologies. According to St. Hilary, to "divide the hoof" must be interpreted to mean belief in the Father and the Son, and to "chew the cud" is to meditate on His law, and that was the reason for the distinction of clean and unclean animals. According to another, "the lion shall eat straw like the ox," was the faithful and the wicked alike receiving in the Eucharist the body of Christ. Read the commentaries on the Parables, and you will see to what tasteless riot this false system of exegesis has run. Happy for us if it were merely tasteless: happy if it had not led to masses of inferences of most false theology. It cannot be too loudly proclaimed that, except so far as this method is permitted as a dubious play of fancy to such as like it, it should be utterly discouraged. It has not, it ought not to have, the faintest shadow of binding authority. It is to reduce the Bible to one vast sea of uncertainty, in which anything may mean everything. It is to make the saved but reflect every hue of fancy and every shade of belief in those who assume the office of interpreters. When Archbishop Sancroft made "Sirs, ye should not have loosed from Crete" the text of a sermon against the dissenters, because Crete was an Episcopal Church, or when the Jacobites referred to the pale horse of the Apocalypse, as a taunt against the white horse of the House of Hanover, they were not in earnest: but Innocent III. was in deadly earnest when he made "Lord, here are two swords" a sign that he possessed the temporal as well as the spiritual authority; or spoke of himself as the greater light to rule the day, and the German Emperor as the lesser light to rule the night. Such a style of exegesis is but a survival of Rabbinism, when it had run to its last dregs of feeble decadence in the frivolous scholasticism of Rabbi Akhiva Of how little value it is we may see in the fact that it was rife among the Pharisees, who crucified the Christ, and among the Rabbis, who accepted Bar Kosiba. Rabbi Akhiva was one the chief of those who professed to draw the rules of living from every curl and twist of a Hebrew letter, and yet the Rabbis themselves rebuked Akhiva for his unblushing arbitrariness, and represented Moses himself as standing aghast at the inferences by which again and again he nullified the plain meaning of the Law which he pretended to explain.

4. Again, look at the ravage wrought in the use of Scripture by utter neglect of the context, by making its isolated words the talisman to conjure with, while we profanely ignore their proper application. "There is nothing secret that shall not be revealed"; "As thy days, so shall thy strength be"; "Secret things belong unto God"; "I have trodden the wine press alone"; "No man can redeem his brother"; "He shall drink of the brook by the way"; neither these texts, nor scores of others, have originally the sense is which they are daily quoted. Except so far as inaccurate use of Scripture is always to be deprecated, those misquotations may do no great mischief; we have only to remember that though the words are those of prophet or evangelist it is the "speaker or preacher who is standing behind them, and adapting them to his own purpose." But, again, it is very mischievous when texts so misapplied are made the basis or the bulwark of sectarian dogmas. "The whole head is sick, and the whole heart is faint":—how often has the text been used as a proof of what is called the doctrine of "total corruption," whereas it merely describes the results of fruitless punishment. "To me who am the chief of sinners," with what strained, and often with what hypocritic exaggeration, have many applied those words to themselves, while they would indignantly repudiate the faintest breath of even friendly censure, merely from not observing that St. Paul is there speaking solely of the fact that he had once been (what they too often are even while they say it) a pitiless inquisitor. "Which among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?" Is it honest to quote that in proof of endless torments when the sole reference is to the Assyrian invasion? "Where the tree falleth, there it shall lie." Is it not intolerable that that verse should still be relied on as a proof that there cannot be for any sinner any gleam of hope beyond the grave, when, in the first place, the metaphor, even if it had to do with the future at all, could not possibly contain the inference, and when in the second it has not so much as the faintest reference to the future' but is merely an exhortation to be diligent and trustful amid the unknown workings of the Providence of God.

5. Alas the whole field of Biblical exegesis is only too rich in error. Rhetoric has been turned into logic; and the fluid words of poetry into the rigid metaphysics of dogma, and the obiter dicta auctoris aliud agentis into supernatural decisions, and chance allusions to the popular notions of three thousand years ago into barriers against the mighty tide of scientific progress, and warnings of temporal calamity into menaces of everlasting woe. I must leave untouched that influence of bias, often unconscious bias, which leads men to Scripture, not to find truth, but to force out of it some semblance of support for the errors which they bring to it ready made; the bias which led to the taunt that men treated the Scripture like a leaden rule to be twisted in any direction which they desired; which gave rise to the bitter epigram

"Hic liber est in quo quaerit sua dogmata quisque, Invenit et pariter dogmata quisque sua."

I must pass over, too, that fragmentary way of treating texts, that insistence upon them, apart from the plain meaning of other scriptures, which has ever been in favour among those who would sluice away the ocean of Divine truth into a few puddles of party tradition, and which enables men so to manipulate a string of texts, as by it to prove anything they will. It is thus that the antinomies of Scripture have been neglected and ignored, and churches have tried to force upon their votaries untenable, because purely partial and one-sided, aspects of eternal truth. And here our Lord has given us the aid of His own Divine Wisdom, for when the Devil came to Him with that "It is written"—which has been in all ages the favourite method of that devil who wears phylacteries and repeats party watchwords, and walks in churches under the disguise of an angel of zeal and light—our Lord met and mastered him,—not by disputing his "It is written;" not by showing that these were (as is usual in such cases) mere garbled and misinterpreted quotations, but by simply opposing to them an "It is written again." And when, in an instance but too typical, the Sons of Thunder, excusing their human passion under Scripture precedent, wish to flash down fire from heaven, Jesus simply warns them (in a passage, which perhaps for this very reason has been tampered with) that the Elijah spirit is not the Christ spirit, and that the crude desire for vengeance shows how little they had realised the difference between Carmel and the Mountain of Beatitudes. The guide for moral conduct is to be found in the spirit and unity of Scripture teaching, not in this or that precedent or text. "By what law would you justify the atrocity you would commit?" asks the young soldier in a great work of fiction. "If thou art ignorant of it," replied Burley, "thy companion is well aware of the law which gave the men of Jericho to the sword of Joshua the son of Nun." Yes, "but we," answered the divine, "live under a better dispensation, which instructeth us to return good for evil, and to pray for those who despitefully use us and persecute us." My brethren, never let us forget that "it is written again."

6. And lastly, let us be sternly on our guard against that inferential method—that "ever-widening spiral ergo out of the narrow aperture of single texts" against which Coleridge warned the Church so long ago. Surely the recklessness of this method ought long ago to have been exposed by the enormous differences of opinion urged out of the same text by different expositors. Take for instance such a passage as the Parable of the unjust steward,—where in the steward some have seen the Pharisees, some the Publicans, some Judas Iscariot, some Satan, some the Apostle Paul—and one modern writer (such is the boundless futility of which exegesis is capable though it has often claimed for itself such arrogant infallibility) one modern writer argues that by the unjust steward the Lord meant Himself! Could you have a better proof of our right to refuse all adherence, all allegiance, and in very many instances all shadow of respect to the attempts which are still daily made to force "the senses of men upon the words of God, the special senses of men upon the general words of God, and laying them upon men's consciences together under the equal penalty of death and damnation?" The general teaching of Scripture on all things necessary is plain and clear enough, and if we were not all as narrow, and as fierce, and as ignorant as we are, we might all draw water together in peace from those wells of salvation. But if we are called upon to believe the doctrine of Papal infallibility by inferences from the text, "I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not;" and the doctrine of works of supererogation from "That which is behind of the afflictions of Christ;" and from the words "predestination" and "elect," all the arid scholasticisms and ponderous afterthoughts of a pitiless and repellent theology, then in the name of honest and true learning, no less than in the name of all the best instincts of our human hearts, it is time to protest that to enforce such inferences from Scripture is to be of those who, because they are unlearned and unstable, wrest—στρεβλοῦσι—torture Scripture, wrench it, strain it as with a windlass, stretch it upon the rack, to wring out of it, not its meaning, but their own meanings, to the perdition of the faith and the happiness of mankind. They wrest and rack it to their own perdition—aye, and still more to that of others. "Perdition," "reprobation," and all that they involve—it is ever in this direction that men pervert the Scriptures most; and they dwell so much on their stretching of the metaphor that "God is a consuming fire," that they have never realised the fact that it is written again that "God is Love." Again I say that Love, not Hatred, is the key to open the difficulties of Scripture. If you prefer hatred and anathema and fire from heaven, and the repeated declaration of theologians that the joys of the blessed will be enhanced into a warmer glow by contemplating the sufferings of the lost; if you prefer to read this in Scripture, and to infer this from Scripture, keep it for yourself; enjoy your doctrine for yourself; be happy if you can in your terrible conviction; I neither argue nor reclaim against you, but I only say that I for one do not envy your happiness, or the mood from which it springs.

Ah, my brethren, it is scarcely an hour ago that my heart was saddened by hearing of those two deaths which have cast over this University so deep a gloom. Had I heard it before I could hardly, I think, have spoken on any other subject. And yet, alas! such events are not so rare. Over and over again have I seen the young—over and over again have I seen young boys at school, not saints, not, in theological sense, "converted": but just like any other English boys, cut off as in a moment, touched by the solemn finger of death, before they even dreamt that death was near;—cut off in the very midst of their common lives, in the very midst of their ordinary thoughts and of their ordinary words, and of their ordinary pleasures. And when we thus see the rustling masquerade of life, brushed by the hard reality of death, while we each solemnly ask ourselves rather "Am I fit to live?" than "Am I fit to die?" shall we dare by the dead bodies of the young who have been snatched from us in a moment to use that stern and unscriptural language of a bitter orthodoxy, which has in it no remorse of equity, and no touch of love or hope—or shall even a heathen teach us to say that "they are taken to the mercy of the merciful?" For myself I will say that > "——My human hands are weak,

> To hold your iron creeds;
> Against the words ye bid me speak
> My heart within me pleads.
> I walk with bare hushed feet the ground
> Ye tread with boldness shod;
> I dare not mete with mark and bound
> The love and power of God.
> I know not where His islands lift
> Their fronded palms in air,
> I only know I cannot drift
> Beyond His love and care.
> And Thou, Oh God, by Whom are seen
> All creatures as they be,
> Forgive me, if too close I lean
> My human heart on Thee."

And here I must end, though I have given you but stray illustrations of a vast subject. But I end as I began, by bidding you, in God's name, humbly, lovingly, courageously, prayerfully, to study the Scriptures. "As it is owned the whole scheme of Scripture is not yet understood, so if it ever comes to be understood, before the revelation of all things, and without miraculous interposition, it must be in the same way as natural knowledge is come at, by the continuing and progress of learning and liberty." To such learning, to such liberty, I would call you. I do not say it will cost you nothing. I am far from sure that it will lead you to any earthly rewards. I am quite sure that it may expose you, as it has exposed, in succession, all the truest and bravest of the Saints of God, to the beatitude of malediction. But is not truth precious? is not self-sacrifice the sole way of nobleness? "When a Campanella . . . is seven times stretched upon the rack, and for twenty-seven years consigned to Neapolitan dungeons from which at any moment he might have bought deliverance by a lie, we can understand, on simply human grounds, the indomitable refusal to betray innocent men." But truth is ever more precious to mankind than the lives of a few men; and if "when the infuriated hosts of organised ignorance rushed to sweep him from the field, the martyr of science found it impossible to purchase liberty and life by a few false words which would betray nobody, and concern only the moon or the atmosphere which would make no complaints," ought we, with so many noble examples before us, to palter with sacred convictions, for the sake of a little ease, or a little popularity, or a little earthly success, and to give unchecked play to the fierceness and the dominance of popular ignorance or party assertions? It was not so that the Prophets, it was not so that the Apostles, it was not so that the Reformers, it was not so that the early Evangelicals dealt with the errors in which the religious world of their day was steeped. And why? Because it was not so that their Lord and Master had dealt with the errors in which the religious world of this day was steeped. Many, as they wander in the scorching deserts of scholastic inference and controversial theology, are sighing from their hearts "Oh that one would give me to drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem!"—From the wells of holy Scripture—pure of alien influxes, undefiled by human adulterations, you may, both for the souls of others and for your own, supply that need; they who drink it shall thirst no more, for Christ will give it them, and it shall be in them a well of water, springing up to eternal life. "Search the Scriptures," as He bade you; and if you do so in that spirit of love which never has been and is not now the spirit of party religionists, but which is alone His spirit, you will find therein that good news of God which is the sole secret of individual salvation, and of the progress, the blessing and the amelioration of the Church and of the world.

Love is the fulfilling of the law. By your gifts—I hope your generous gifts—to the sick and the suffering to-day, shew that you have learnt that lesson, and, as you offer those gifts, vow that you will abjure for ever the hardness and the party spirit of the Rabbi, the Pharisee, and the Inquisitor, and will devote free, and manly, and pure, and truthful lives to the service and the amelioration of mankind.

The Cambridge Review:

A JOURNAL OF UNIVERSITY LIFE AND THOUGHT.

No. 21.] WEDNESDAY, MAY 12, 1880. [PRICE SIXPENCE.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

Our readers will find in the supplement the report of a lecture by Professor Palmer, on the Koran, given under the auspices of the Cambridge Mission Aid Association. To this lecture, apart from its intrinsic excellence, we venture to attach considerable importance, hoping that some other Professors will be emboldened by the success of the Professor of Arabic to attempt a similar experiment. Popular evening lectures by Professor Skeat, on Early English Literature, by Professor Cowell, on the Vedas, and many others we might mention would, without doubt, be well attended. We believe that entertainments of this kind are more frequent at the sister University; where only the other day the Professor of Anglo-Saxon delivered a lecture on the Faery Queen. Perhaps "a little learning is a dangerous thing;" yet this age of Primers and easy roads to knowledge has long ago dispensed with this maxim.

The originators of the Memorial to the late Professor Clerk Maxwell have decided upon a bust and a collected edition of his scientific works. On these objects it will be necessary to spend £700. If an additional £200 can be collected, a distinguished artist will be asked to undertake a portrait of the Professor.

No decided change has taken place in Professor Birks' state during the past few days. We are glad to announce that the indisposition which has prevented Professor Hughes from lecturing is but of a temporary nature.

The Council of the Senate met on Monday to consider the petition lately sent in on the subject of the admission of women to degrees in this University. Besides this memorial (which we published in full, with an analysis of the signatures, a fortnight ago), there were two memorials before the Council, from the Executive Committee of Girton College and of the Cambridge Association for the Higher Education of Women (with which Newnham Hall is connected). These memorials give that acknowledgment of the benefit of the present informal system which was conspicuously absent from the petition circulated by Mrs. Aldis. The Girton Committee, however, petition for full admission to the degrees: whilst Newnham asks only for "a more formal and stable footing."

The University sermon at St. Mary's last Sunday afternoon was preached by the Rev. C. E. Searle, the tutor of Pembroke College, and made a deep impression on all who were fortunate enough to hear it. It is long, we should think, since so simple and manly a discourse has been delivered at the University Church.

Some excitement was caused last Saturday by the opening of the "Cambridge Arcade," on the North side of Downing Street. This building, which occupies the site of the Old Corn Exchange, contains a dozen roomy shops, assigned, amongst others, to a florist, stationer, fishmonger, and two butchers. But, to prevent our having too much of a good thing, near the last stands "the Reform Food Store" of the Vegetarian Society; over which are to be seen the mystic hieroglyphics ΜΗΔΕΝ ΑΓΑΝ. These words are apparently addressed to the carnivorous British public; but would not some of the more enthusiastic Vegetarians do well to learn the lesson of "Moderation in all things"? We may mention by the way that a great Vegetarian Banquet will be held to-morrow evening. Those who are interested in the spread of Pythagoreanism in Cambridge should take an early opportunity of going to the Arcade and purchasing the Dietetic Reformer for May, which contains an autobiography of Professor J. E. B. Mayor, an interesting account of the first Fruit Banquet, and a condemnation of flesh eating from the pen of the late Archdeacon Paley, author of the Evidences of Christianity.

A volume of poems has just made its appearance. Its title is "A Wreath of Songs," and it is stated to be entirely the work of resident undergraduates, six of whom seem to have furnished contributions. The volume is dedicated to Mr. Oscar Browning, and without anticipating any detailed criticism, we may give the poems a hearty welcome.

The University Musical Society put their new orchestra of members of the Society to the test last Wednesday, when the usual popular concert was given in the large room of the Guildhall. The orchestra was strong in numbers, the violins especially making an imposing show: and a large audience gave vigorous expressions to their approval. At the same time a glee society, "Concordia," took part in one of these concerts for the first time, with decided success.

Now that there is no further need for the entrance of carts into the court of Pembroke, the aperture hitherto used for that purpose has been faced over with stone, and the building is progressing rapidly. At present the contrast between the old and new stonework is rather startling, but the ingenuity of the British workman has apparently devised some compound which being daily poured upon the more recently erected part, is gradually reducing it to harmony with the rest of the frontage.

A great feature of cricket during the present term have been unusually long scores made in College matches. L. Bury, of Trinity, and F. E. Lacey, of Caius, have each scored over two hundred against Clare: while A. F. J. Ford, of King's, has, we believe, an average of about 200 for his College. At Fenner's the first century of the season has been compiled by the Hon. Ivo Bligh. The want of a wicket-keep and another fast bowler will make it a difficult task to choose a representative University eleven: the latter post may be filled by A. S. Pereira, of Christ's.

THE FUTURE OF COLLEGE LECTURES.

Among all the questions which interest us up here, that of College and University teaching will soon be coming to the front, and will require a thorough discussion in all its bearings. As being anxious to provoke such a discussion in the pages of the Review, rather than in any way to attempt to exhaust the subject, I should like to say something in defence of the College system, and make one or two suggestions as to possible improvements in it.

By University teaching we mean, of course, teaching by large classes as opposed to the system now in vogue, by which each College has its own teaching staff and professes to give sufficient instruction at any rate in classics and mathematics. It is urged that this system is useless and extravagant, and that it would be far better that the honour teaching for the two great triposes should be taken by the University, leaving the Poll men to be dealt with by the College. Have we any reasonable ground for considering that such a plan would do away with the imperfections of the College system, or that the plan of teaching by large classes would be so eminently satisfactory as its advocates think?

It might be urged that we have a priori no right to expect that a University reader would be more likely than a University professor to attract large classes. It is notorious that, as a rule, the lectures of professors are not well attended, except in individual cases; and even there the motive for attendance is not always thirst for knowledge pure and simple. And this is in no sense the fault of the professors, most of whom are able lecturers as well as eminent men. It is rather the outcome of the system itself. For before lectures to large classes can be profitable many conditions must be fulfilled. First we must have a lecturer who has the rare faculty of attracting and interesting a large body of men for an hour at a stretch. He must also be able to maintain discipline and see that no member of his class is indulging in a surreptitious novel. Further, if he is lecturing in classics, he must have the power and the will to compel the men who come to him to prepare their work beforehand, for otherwise they will not be able to profit as they should. And then the class should be composed of men fairly equal in abilities and standing, or else some may follow the lecturer, while others will not be able to understand him; and lastly, all the members of the class should know and practise the art of taking notes properly, which is not so easy as is generally supposed. These have been felt to be difficulties by all who teach large classes, and the result has been that, with some brilliant exceptions, lectures to large classes have not been successful. Of course in the case of a professor this is not of very great importance, as he is expected to engage in original investigation and literary work, and lecturing is not really the principal or even the most important part of his duties; but when the proposal is seriously made that the chief part of the teaching in the University should be given through a system of large classes, it becomes a most important question whether or no such a plan would be likely to work. Besides the difficulties already noticed, there is this fatal objection to teaching by large classes—that the average man requires individual attention. The reason why an undergraduate goes to private tutors is not necessarily that his College lecturer is incompetent, but that from his private tutor he will get a recognition of his individuality, with the personal help and even sympathy which he cannot always get from his College teacher. No doubt "coaching" is far less general now than it has been, and this arises from the fact that a step in the right direction has been taken by the College lecturers, who are beginning to look upon their posts as something more than so many sources of income, and devote a very large part of their time to their special duties. But if even under the present improved state of things a man still craves individual help, what will be the result when in the course of time University readers shall be everywhere substituted for College lecturers? Not only will a man's identity be lost, but his College will be merged in his University, and in sheer despair he will, if he can afford it, get the assistance of a private tutor; if not, he will be content to drift on in a hopeless fashion, a mere unit floating onward towards a class list, where he will at length appear among other units "arranged in alphabetical order."

If, then, it is in any degree true that there is rather a need for more individual teaching than any desire whatever for centralization and large classes, it will be easy to see how the College system may be improved still further, at any rate so far as Classical teaching is concerned, of which alone I can venture to speak with any weight of experience. It may be taken for granted that the preparation for the first part of the new Classical Tripos will be for the present taken by College teachers, while the candidates for that rather heterogeneous assemblage of subjects, the second part, will probably be handed over to the University Reader or the Inter-Collegiate Lecturer. And it may further be assumed, that each College Lecturer will have under his special care twelve or fourteen candidates for the first part. Let these be divided into small classes of three or four, each class, as far as may be, composed of men of equal ability, and thus it will be possible for the Lecturer to adopt the plan of the private tutor; that is to say, he will be able to see that each man prepares his work and will insist on his construing it. He might with advantage adopt a less formal, and more colloquial method of teaching than that at present in vogue, and find out which are the exact difficulties and weaknesses of each member of his class. I believe some such plan as that sketched above would not only give the Lecturer a great power of supervision over his class, but would also make Lecturing interesting and pleasant both to himself and to the men under him. Of course it would take considerably more time than the lecture of an hour three times a week, but it would be time well spent if it obviated, as it would, the need for private tutors for men who could ill afford them, and at the same time give candidates a thorough and sufficient preparation for their pure Scholarship examination.

I hope that nothing said will be construed into a wholesale condemnation of the system of University Readerships. They are almost a necessity, now that the range of subjects studied in Cambridge has been so greatly widened. Whether this widening be altogether judicious; whether the undergraduates of the future will not be rather learned than educated; whether the object of University teaching be not rather to give men a solid foundation on which to build, than a slight acquaintance with a multitude of subjects, any one of which would require a life time for its thorough mastery—all these are questions with which we are not directly concerned now, though they may become serious and pressing hereafter. But if the appointment of University Readers is the first step towards the abolition of college teaching altogether, and if the undergraduates even of the remote future are "to receive the cup of knowledge from the hands of the University Reader instead of the College Lecturer" as was stated lately on good authority, then the establishment of Readerships seems to be a movement in the wrong direction, which, I believe, will end in a definite loss of teaching power and a grievous injury to Cambridge Scholarships.

LADIES' COLLEGES AND DEGREES.

The desire of women for knowledge is of venerable antiquity, dating from the days of Eve; and possibly the unhappy zeal of our ancestress is responsible for some of the prejudices against the admission of her daughters to the higher regions of culture which have survived to our own times. The Queen of Sheba seems to have been an enthusiastic disciple of the wise man; and the ancients have bequeathed us a few, very few, names of equal celebrity.

It is not surprising that in the dark ages, when learning struggled for a bare existence, it was for the most part unattainable by women, though we are not without records of certain Prioresses whose light shone forth from convent walls, among whom Hilda of Whitby holds high place. With the Renaissance a whole cluster of ladies rose into fame, receiving and giving forth the wonderful enthusiasm that marked the devotees of the New Learning. Notable among these is Olympia Morata, pupil of her father, a professor at the University of Ferrara, whose pen would one day turn the Psalms of David into Pindaric Odes, and the next detail to a friend in fluent Latin her housekeeping troubles, and the gossiping propensities of her maid Barbara, and wind up the narration with a wish, common apparently to women of various countries and ages, that she could do all the work herself, and dispense with servants altogether. Italy produced many such women, and in Italy their connection with Universities in any capacity other than that of endowment—bestowing fairly began. In 1794 Clotilde Tambroni was appointed Professor of Greek at Bologna. Her lectures, we are told, were well attended. Laura Bassi in the eighteenth century contrived at the same University to combine the profession of lecturer on physics with the duties of wife, and mother of twelve children. Her contemporary and friend, Maria Agnesi, was nominated by the Pope to fill her father's chair of Mathematics, also at Bologna, when he vacated it through illness; she, after a useful life, found a home in the convent of Blue Nuns at Milan. Padua boasts of a similar celebrity, and retains to this day a statue of Elena Cernaro, and an inscription in honour of her linguistic and other attainments. The fact that in isolated cases genius and even talent should rise into eminence at a time when the world was smaller than it is now, is not surprising; but such examples were of little use to the girl of average intellect either in Italy or elsewhere. Erasmus had said "Girls, too, ought to have a liberal education," and schools were provided for them in the countries of Western Europe, from the Reformation days downward; schools but nothing more.

The idea of a college proper for women presented itself, it is true, to Dr. Johnson, but in the light of an admirable —dream. In the closing chapter of Rasselas we are told that, after the varied experiences of the prince and his sister in quest of the most satisfactory life, "The princess thought that of all sublunary things knowledge was the best; she desired first to learn all sciences, and then proposed to found a college of learned women in which she would preside."

Dr. Arnold, writing to Mr. Justice Coleridge in 1841, says "I feel quite as strongly as you do the extreme difficulty of giving to girls what really deserves the name of education intellectually. When —— was young, I used to teach her some Latin with her brothers, and that has been, I think, of real use to her, and she feels it now in reading and translating German. . . . . But there is nothing for girls like the Degree Examination, which concentrates one's reading so beautifully, and makes one master a certain number of books perfectly. . . . Seriously I do not see how we can supply sufficient encouragement for systematic and laborious reading, or how we can insure many things being retained at once fully in the mind, when we are wholly without the machinery which we have for our boys."

Mr. Trevelyan in his Life of Macaulay, writing of the years 1847-9, tells how "One of his nieces, unable to forecast the future of her sex, had expressed a regret that she could never hope to go in for a college examination. Macaulay thereupon produced what he was pleased to call a paper of questions in Divinity." About twelve years later the question of examinations and degrees for women began to be raised in earnest, finding one of its earliest supporters in Mr. Grote. It would be tedious to review the whole history of the movement; the opening of the Cambridge local examinations to girls in 1865, in spite of the forebodings embodied in a memorial from the Liverpool Local Committee "that the scheme in question might tend to expose to ridicule the existing examinations, and therefore cause them to be avoided by many of the most promising candidates," was the first success; the provision that women shall be eligible to all degrees of the Royal University of Ireland is the latest. The University of London will be the first in this country to have women graduates. It was empowered by special charter in 1878 to admit women to all its examinations; accordingly 51 matriculated last July, and 12 who have passed the first B.A. examination are fairly two-thirds of the way on the road to a degree.

The examinations for which at the present time women can enter fall into two classes; those specially organized with a view to what they should, or do, study; and those not adapted to feminine weaknesses or strong points, but originally constituted on broader principles. The most popular of the former is the Cambridge Higher Local, which gives a wide choice of subjects and unlimited time; and it is not likely that the number of candidates for this will be much affected, at any rate for some time to come, if Cambridge degrees are made formally attainable. The University of London has proceeded on a tentative system. It held for some years a "General Examination for Women" "equal to" the matriculation, but substituting botany—which, thanks to the poetical association of women and flowers, is always counted a "feminine" subject—for chemistry; and requiring more "English" and less mathematics. About 30 candidates were wont in late years to present themselves for this quasi-matriculation, but when the real one was opened the numbers rose instantly to 68. In London itself Queen's College, the oldest institution of the kind, founded more than thirty years ago by the late Professor Maurice and others, has come forward to meet this new condition of affairs, and prepares students for the London examinations: the Bedford College for Ladies does the same.

The desire to provide not only preparation for degree examinations, but in addition, all practicable advantages of college life as carried on in the elder Universities, led to the establishment of the well-known college which began at Hitchin in 1869 and removed to Girton in 1873. At Girton College students are not admitted without an entrance examination, and do not obtain "degree certificates" unless they have observed the exact conditions as to length of residence and preliminary examinations imposed by the University on its own members. It is not compulsory on a Girtonian to work for the degree certificate, though as a matter of fact at present they all do. They are united by a quiet but forcible esprit de corps; which, hardly suspected by the outside world, makes one of the strongest impressions that a student in her first term receives. The existence of a collegiate spirit shews itself in many ways. Old students have an association, and social as well as business meetings. Past and present students have contributed, not only to the building fund, and to the gymnasium, but also to the resources of the college in the shape of scholarships, and of minor gifts of books and apparatus, and have lately united in handing down for the pleasure of future generations a portrait of Miss Emily Davies, the founder. The Choral Society with weekly practices and occasional private concerts to which it welcomes honorary members, i.e. those who on leaving college shew by a small subscription their permanent interest in the fortunes of music within its walls, is another link between past and present Girtonians.

The way in which the "non-official" tripos and other examinations came about, and are still carried on, must delight every patriotic mind, despite its inconveniences for all concerned; it is so thoroughly English, so suggestive of the British constitution. Before the Cambridge local examinations had been extended to girls, some eminent supporters of the proposal arranged for an experiment, by which at only six weeks' notice 83 girls were examined in the same papers, an extra supply being obtained by the courtesy of the examiners, tacitly sanctioned by the University, on the same days as the boys. The reports of this experiment were favourable; and two years later the University had authorized the formal admission of girls at every centre where a ladies' committee could undertake the superintendence.

Here then was a precedent. So when the advocates of the "higher education of women" had duly gathered together and prepared a few students at Hitchin, they made a similar application with regard to the Previous Examination of December, 1870, and met with a similar response. There for the present the analogy is at a standstill. Since that time the goodwill and generosity which have been shewn not in mere words but in practical help from the numerous members of the University who have lectured and examined for the college have never failed; but the success achieved may almost be said to threaten its own destruction. Obviously, as the number of women candidates becomes greater, the difficulty of looking over their papers in the time in which no allowance is made for them increases. It is calculated that in three years' time the candidates from Girton for a certain examination will equal one sixth of the average number sent in by the seventeen colleges of the University. On the other hand, that a system which is in its tenth year should fall through owing to the large numbers it attracts would be so unprecedented, that we hope that the University of Cambridge will come to the rescue, and not allow the University of London to be more than two or three years ahead of it in dealing with a matter on which hitherto the two bodies seem to have shewn a generous emulation.

Candidates, too, have their grievances. It is a little hard for them to be deprived of the British privilege of grumbling; for whatever the eccentricities of a paper, if you are examined by courtesy, and at the voluntary inconvenience of an examiner, the most that can be done is to "Rest and be thankful" that you have been admitted at all. Again the exact force of the word "private" is a source of trouble to delicate consciences. When the class and occasionally even the place, of a woman student leaks out in a private, informal, non-official communication, is she justified in spreading it among the more trustworthy of her friends, or ought she to lock it securely in her own breast? We do not wish to over-estimate these little drawbacks, for of course the interest and advantage of having work tested by a well understood standard far outweighs them.

On the general subject it is often asked "Is it desirable for the health of women that they should be encouraged to take part in the severe competitions which are not infrequently injurious to men"? The candid inquirer finds that on this point doctors differ, nor are there as yet enough facts before the public to justify very strong assertions on either side. The University of London long hesitated to open degrees on this very ground,—danger to health. The Senate, on which medical opinion is largely represented, has seen reason to alter this decision. The possible evil has not, then, been overlooked; but the good is considered to outweigh it. It must not be forgotten how much languor, hysteria, and ill health prevail among girls who in leaving school find themselves with nothing to do, and who pass from studies guided and controlled at every turn to an independence which means helplessness in the matter of how and at what to work. An intermediate stage in which habits of self help are gradually acquired would often be the means of introducing them to a useful womanhood. Again, women are supposed to be highly conscientious, and if our teachers of morality would speak more of the duty of self-preservation, of keeping body and mind in the condition most calculated for their mutual activity, if once it were recognized that self-neglect is a negative form of selfishness entailing very positive inconveniences on others, the danger would be very considerably lessened.

Courses of lectures to girls in schools on the laws of health have already exerted a favourable influence, and there is reason to hope that the current of good sense and educated good principle is daily flowing stronger in this direction. Moreover, to a woman, unless she is going to teach, her position in a Tripos is of somewhat less importance than to a man of the same age, so that the anxiety about it will probably be less; while by prolonging the period of education we lessen the pressure on girls of active mind, who too often are over-stimulated by the reflection that all that they will be able to learn must be crowded into the few short years that lie between them and the so-called "finish" at eighteen. There can be no doubt but that work at college is done with far less friction, and therefore with less strain on the nervous system, than at home. The amiable daughter and sister has a thousand and one claims on her time, which are not limited to any one part of the day, but come like the torture of the Inquisition, drop by drop. To whatever is on foot in the family circle, from a bazaar to a birthday present, her help seems indispensable, though her absence by no means proves fatal to such undertakings. The struggle to respond cheerfully to all calls makes four hours' work at home more tiring than eight at college. Sometimes a kind of compromise is effected by which the other members of the family make good natured attempts to dispense with the constant society and services of the one, and she has a quiet disturbed by an uneasy consciousness of seeming very selfish and disagreeable. Of course some people must study at home if they do so at all; but the work is far easier under conditions which make it the right thing in the right place.

A second question is often raised, viz., "Is the present course of education for men as carried out at the School and the University so good that women do well to adopt it instead of using their freedom to frame a better one? "Let natural science be more universally studied" is one recommendation, "give modern languages and literature a more prominent place" is another: "let logic replace mathematics" a third. Among these conflicting suggestions women, conservative in their very reforms, do not feel called upon to decide. No one aims at uniformity,—such uniformity as prevailed till lately, when girls, as has been well remarked, were invariably taught modern languages, as if to fit them for travelling, while boys ignored them for classics, as if they were to be the stay-at-home part of the community; girls not intended to meddle with politics gave much time to English history; boys, future legislators and electors, but little. At present excellent teaching in all the subjects proposed is to be had by any one who chooses, not only in London but in nearly all large cities and University towns. What women need now is the solidity and accuracy which have not heretofore been enforced on them; and as to subjects they prefer to be followers rather than leaders in educational reform. "What is good enough for men is good enough for us," is the homely expression of the feeling on the point. Mr. Grote, in 1862, advocating the opening of the degrees of the University of London said "Every woman has a right to choose for herself among the various types of education; if among these she prefers that which coincides with our curriculum, we ought to be the last to discredit her for so doing."

It may be worth while, in conclusion, to notice that the "higher education of women," to use a phrase now so trite that any one who will replace it will be a public benefactor, is contemporary with several other expressions of energy aroused in different directions. The busy spirit of the age, combined with practical science, is responsible for a School of Cookery and its classes established all over the country, and, again, for the large increase in the number of trained lady nurses, the value of whose services can hardly be estimated except by their patients, while it has prompted the artistic revival of decorative needlework, china painting, and various other industries of cultivated eyes and hands. In two of these arts some at least of the ladies who come to Cambridge for educational purposes are not unskilled; more than one Girton student is a duly qualified cook, with a South Kensington Certificate, nor is the artistic needlework of the occupant an infrequent decoration of mantelpiece, table, or chair.

In general terms the facts are these:—The activity of the nineteenth century is irresistible, and the more sensitive an organisation the more it is affected by the surrounding mental atmosphere. With the desire to be doing coexists a desire to do what is done, as well as possible, and a revolt against superficiality. Women then desiring to be helpful in the ever-increasing work of the world, and believing that an enlightened and trained understanding will forward their usefulness in all relations of life, desire to profit by the best general education yet known in England. They desire also authoritative recognition of that education; and if some of them over-estimate the value of such recognition it must be remembered that we are all apt to over-estimate the value of that from which we are excluded; and if again it seems unreasonable to wish for degrees instead of being satisfied with certificates or even degree-certificates, it is an unreasonableness with which Mr. Lowe once expressed his sympathy by saying—"they want to be paid in current coin, and I think it right that they should."

AN ENGLISH TRIPOS.

It is indeed high time that "something should be done" towards founding an English School in England, and I think that, if it is to be done, Cambridge should take a prominent position, if not the foremost one. At present, London would appear to be the place where English is most encouraged, though it is not unknown, as a subject, in the Scotch Universities and in Dublin. Still, if a man wishes to become a good English Scholar, he will probably do best, as matters now stand, to leave the country altogether, and go to Berlin, where Professor Zupitza has classes of a hundred students in Anglo-Saxon, or to America, where Professor March is teaching Anglo-Saxon, and advocating Spelling Reform on the express ground that it would not greatly interfere with etymology, and where Professor Child brings up (as he tells me) large classes of students of Shakespeare upon books written here in Cambridge.

Whether the establishment of an English Tripos would be satisfactory, I am in some doubt. The mere planting of a Tripos will not make subjects grow, unless something more be done. It seems rather cruel treatment of a subject to establish a Tripos in it, and then leave it to take its chance, as if we had washed our hands of the matter, and had no more to do. The new Triposes are beginning at last to shew progress, but some of them are remarkably weak in their attraction for students. I find that, in 1879, the whole number of candidates for seven triposes, namely, in Moral Sciences, Natural Sciences, Theology, Law, History, Semitic Languages, and Indian Languages was 106; of which only 21 attained to a first class, giving an average of three first-class men apiece. I suspect that the reason is simply this—that, whilst the University recognises a subject, the Colleges usually do not, and the cleverer men naturally select a subject which will probably lead to a fellowship, in preference to one which may do so, but probably will not. It would be a great gain if any one, with a turn for statistics, would carefully compile a list, shewing (1) how many candidates have passed in all the triposes since 1851; (2) how many of these have gained a first class; (3) how many of these last have gained fellowships, and at which colleges; and (4) how many men who have been thus successful have not gone out either in Classical or Mathematical honours. I think such a table would be very instructive, and would shew us what progress we are making; we should have some statistics to guide us in estimating the chances of success of a tenth tripos, and whether there is any chance that the colleges would assist the University in encouraging it, instead of merely tolerating it. This is a practical view of the matter, and deserves to be seriously considered.

At present, the teaching of English seems hardly possible, from a sheer lack of students. Many a student has a dim idea that it is his neighbour's duty to read Shakespeare, but there are, I fear, not many who get much beyond this, and we actually find, in practice, this remarkable result, that the only subject of which everybody is supposed to know something is precisely that one which is never definitely taught, after the mysteries of spelling have once been conquered by sheer effort of memory, undirected by any such aids as the art of a true teacher could supply. The man who would learn more has to educate himself.

What we really want is something more than an English Tripos, with (probably) one man in the first class for the first two or three years, and a sprinkling of five or six second-rate men in the second and third classes. We want a general recognition of the subject in some much more effective way. That it would be found to be a good subject for the Previous Examination and for General or Special Examinations, I firmly believe. It ought to be introduced on its own merits, not through the demerits (so to speak) of Greek. Of course the great objection to any such scheme is that we already ask too much in many cases, and it does not mend matters to ask for more, unless there be at the same time some relief in another quarter.

I find there is a paper on Shakespeare in the General Examination; but it is purely additional, and altogether a voluntary subject. I should like to know why.

If, at any time, an English Tripos is established, I hope it will not be made too severe. There is great danger of this, due to the notion that there is not much to be learnt; but only consider how much has to be unlearnt! At present some of the triposes are, in my opinion, extremely exacting. We give men four years work to do, and allow them three years to do it in; much as if we were to determine the best men in a four-mile race, by registering their places at the end of the first twelve minutes.

There is a great deal more to be said, but another opportunity may be more fitting.

EGOISTICAL ESSAYS.—No. IV.

LECTURES.

These thoughts are not the mere hasty conclusions of an ill-balanced mental constitution, actuated by the ephemeral impulses of passing circumstances; they are the mature results of much well-regulated consideration, aided by the resources afforded by a gradual accumulation of much valuable learning. My opinions are not of that kind that come showering out like water from the rose of a watering pot; I was too early instructed as to the wickedness of waste, especially of what is valuable; I reserve them for only very great occasions.

I have been holding a Symposium. That is, if my ideas of what a Symposium ought to be are right; they are associated with the remains of banquets and fair forms strewn about in graceful attitudes on couches. I fancy I got the notion from a picture I saw some time since at the Burlington Gallery. In the present case the remains of the banquet are represented by some cheese-rind and a few biscuit crumbs; which, with half a bottle of claret and some butter, are what is left of the frugal lunch of which I have just been partaking. There is only one fair form in the question, and that is reclining on a sofa with one of its legs over the back; the attitude when described perhaps does not suggest grace, but it requires to be seen to be properly appreciated.

I feel generally limp; I have been to four lectures running this morning, and now I am not fit for anything. Lectures take more out of one with less result than the whole of the rest of one's work put together; I have said it; and let who will deny it.

The dons say otherwise; but then they are dons. Perhaps it may have been otherwise when they were not dons; or perhaps becoming one effects a violent revolution of nature, and changes the whole of one's opinions in some peculiar fashion. Maybe if it is so, when I am a don I shall one day suddenly come to myself and find myself impressing the undergraduate mind with a sense of the advantages of lectures; but judging from my present views I should say that that state of things is very far off,—that it would not come to pass until I am Master, at least—more probably, Vice-Chancellor.

If these Parliamentary Commissioners, who seem so fond of investigating the order of things and upsetting the glorious old institutions of the University in general, were only to devote some of their time to an enquiry into the system of lectures, I should be glad to give them all the fair and impartial evidence in my power. I do not wish to bias them in any way. Only let them look at my note-book and contrast it with the industrious frame of mind in which I habitually am, and I ask no more of them.

I thought well over it last night and great were the struggles within me. I was arranging my plans for to-day and trying to make my various engagements fit into each other so as not to lose a particle of time. A voice within me said, "Why not cut lectures; they are a waste of time; you will profit much better by reading your books in your own room." Then another voice said, "Lectures are good; the dons say so; they give the lectures, so they ought to know; you must not cut lectures." One of these voices was of course my good angel and the other my bad one, but which was which I didn't know; so I was still undecided. Then I finally tossed up: "Heads," I should go, "Tails," I shouldn't. It came "Heads;" so this morning, firm in my resolution, I got up, dressed, fortified my inner man and proceeded to the conflict.

First lecture; 9.0. a.m., to 10.0. a.m. I was in time, the lecturer wasn't; so I let my thoughts go for a little exercise round the room after breakfast. First they went off to inspect a man who was sitting opposite me and who had brought in a large collection of various coloured pencils, which he was sharpening in preparation for action. I became much interested in this man. I longed to ask him what his system of note-taking was. The idea of note-taking in different colours struck me as just the sort of thing that I had long been looking about for; and I should like to have known how he arranged his colours, and how he managed to remember which was the particular shade he ought to use in particular places; and if it didn't fidget him when he got a blue and a green next to each other, and a great many things of that kind . . . . . and before I could get my thoughts to return and behave themselves the lecturer had arrived and was well into the middle of his subject. Even then they had become unruly and stopped on the way back on one of the window-sills to consider if it was any person's business to dust it, and if so, how long it might be since he had done so. I had to make a spurt then; first, of course, I had to find out the correct way to spell the lecturer's name, so as not to make any offensive mistakes if ever I had occasion to address any documents in the way of questions or notes to him; also I had to ascertain if he was Reverend or not; and these necessary proceedings took up at least ten minutes, as the man next me wrote so abominably badly that all the screwing of my neck in the world couldn't enable me to make certain what he had put down. However, at last I was able to concentrate myself to business.

The chief impression conveyed to me by the lecturer's style was that he had a supreme contempt for his subject and that he wished us fully to understand that it was no doubt very kind and well-intentioned of the authorities whom he cited to have taken all the trouble they had, but if they had only waited for him he could have settled the difficulty in a few minutes. However, it would be a shame for him to deprive them of the satisfaction of thinking that their labours had not been without some results and so he reserved his opinion. Still, for a consideration, he would be glad to tell anyone what his private ideas were on the subject and—any gentleman who had brought their tickets would kindly let him have them. The lecture was over before he had said anything that I thought he wanted us to put down.

It was already five minutes past ten and I had another Inter-Collegiate lecture at the other end of Cambridge, so off I had to rush, without any time to change my note-book or anything, straight into the middle of about the third paragraph of lecture No. 2. My faculties having only just settled themselves into a fitting state to imbibe the elements of Jurisprudence, now had to be entirely re-arranged to suit themselves to the solution of Problems of Political Economy. All the seats were filled up, but a man I knew made room for me and then let me squint at his note book so as to see how far the lecture was advanced. He had taken a page and a half of notes already. And such neat notes too! He had another system; something like the balance-sheet that they publish at the end of the Railway Companies' annual reports, with lines and hands all pointing about in different directions: it seemed a very good system and worthy of remembrance—combined with the variegated-pencil system, I might organize something of my own which should embrace all the advantages of any pre-existent ones. I couldn't, however, quite make out what things went down to the credit, and what to the debtor's side of the account, but of course that would all have to be worked out.

When I had extracted the pith of what he had put down and I had caught up the lecturer, I started to take notes independently. I put everything down; not a word was missed; and I had completely worn the lead of my pencil into the wood, and had to stop to sharpen it, when he said; "all this, of course you will understand, was a mere fallacy; and with such exploded ideas we have nothing to do; you will find the true statement expressed in a few words in such and such a chapter of — some book—" but I couldn't catch the name of the author, and by the time my pencil was in a fit condition to write we were well into another subject, and my friend wasn't certain if he had the reference down right—so that now I shall have to go about making vague inquiries of everybody until I find out. Then the lecturer said, "any gentlemen"—but I knew what was coming, and I had another lecture, so I left hurriedly.

I was just in time, and I did manage to get a respectable quantum of notes. My thoughts had now become so exhausted that they were no longer restive, and more easily kept under control. The notes are somewhat entangled, but I think I can make something out of them. This third lecturer seemed really trying to make his subject interesting. I did not feel it like a lesson: it was not as if he was trying to instruct us and that he thought himself superior to us, and that we must take all that he said for granted, whether we liked it or not. No, he only told us facts and let us form our own independent opinions. I have read somewhere that a good teacher should make himself one with his disciples. This lecturer did. He seemed as if he were one of us, and only finding out about these things for the first time. Of course he was only pretending, but he did it very well. He would bend over his book, knit his brow, and then suddenly pop up from behind his desk with a smile of agreeable surprise, and announce his discovery in the tone of, though not exactly the words "O look here! this is jolly; see what I've found; here's an old king been and gone and done it; tried to squash the free-born English subject; not they; they weren't going to stand it; got together, and sat upon him; he had to sign Magna Charta A.D., 1215." Or else leaning over his desk, till I began to fear that the whole thing would topple forward with a bang into the middle of the room, with a confidential expression in his right eyebrow; "it is not everyone that knows that Richard III. was a most estimable character; there was a person who wrote plays called Shakespere who made out that he was a most awful blackguard; but I have just found in this book that some one else has discovered a private letter from his housemaid to his cook, and that clears up the whole thing and shows that in his domestic life there was nothing further to be desired. But mind you don't tell anybody." This was combining instruction with amusement—balance rather in favour of amusement.

Then there was an interval of fifteen minutes. The last lectures were purely voluntary, but I like them, as I meet several friends there and there is no absolute need to take notes, as the general impression with the public seems to be that they are so clearly expressed that every word sticks. I think I am entering fully into the spirit of these lectures. Their object is to enforce on the mind how vast and inexplicable is the problem which history lays before us. I am certainly realizing that the more history I read, the vaster and inexplicabler the problem becomes. What I am to do with it all when I have finished I don't know. I suppose this is all right. The first thing to be done is to master the facts, the lecturer says, and then to turn the attention to unravelling the network presented by the many combinations and intricacies of the various states of the world. The party with the pencils attends these lectures. He must find ample opportunity for employing all of them here. At the present rate of procedure it will be about the year 1900, or probably later, when we have finished with the facts and are at leisure to proceed to the solution of the problem; perhaps then things may have changed and it will devolve on my descendants to perplex the descendants of the lecturer with the enunciation of their theories. Revenge is sweet!

I returned about an hour and a half ago from these lectures and have been in a state of mental collapse ever since. I have been trying to separate my ideas as gathered from one lecturer from those as gathered from another, but they are as mixed as my notes. And what with thoughts and notes when I am to get any private reading done, I don't know. I give it up; I am incapable of thinking any more; I shall go and hang myself up to a peg like my cap and gown and abandon myself to vacancy.

A PHOTOGRAPHIC SOCIETY.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—In a recent number I noticed an able article on "Clubs and Cliques," in which the writer vividly brought before our notice what a number of Clubs there are in the various Colleges; there is one which appears to me to be conspicuous by its absence, viz.:—"A Photographic Society." Surely such a society would be very useful and beneficial to the many men who I feel sure are unable to do photography up here, on account of their having none of the conveniences necessary.

I can see no reason why such a society should not be formed, and with as little delay as possible. Hoping this will meet the eyes of many who are interested in photography, and that something may be done to remedy this present want,

Believe me, yours truly,

HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN.—THE RECENT MEMORIAL.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

DEAR SIRS,—I have been wondering ever since last week what could have been in the minds of the people who drew up the Memorial you then printed as to the admission of women to degrees. My first idea about it, gallantly enough, was that it was serious. There was a prosiness about it that bespake business intentions. If so, then a fair cause has been urged by as weak a set of reasons as I remember seeing for some time. If the University had been asked to help the Higher Education of Women, and Admission to Degrees had been indicated as a means, and no more had been said, I could have understood the memorial. But as it professes to give reasons, one could not but think of Lord Mansfield and the young judge. They have two arguments; (1) Women desire training and examination, and (2), they have been informally examined by private courtesy of individuals; there are no more reasons;—the "therefore" rushes straight upon us, therefore—they should be admitted to Tripos examinations and Degrees. In short, the whole system of the University as to residence, terms, supervision, preliminary examinations, &c., should give way because there are people who desire it. But, Sirs, is this a world where fructification is the normal consequent of the existence of desires? And are there not many people besides women who also observe this? For example, do not the whole body of men, able and otherwise, who yearly graduate at London, also desire Oxford or Cambridge degrees, without therefore memorialising about them? And amongst women, is it that the local situation of Girton and Newnham gives claims above Cheltenham and Bedford Colleges? Perhaps, in the phrase "sound learning" there is a gentle insinuation of flattery into the bosoms of Members of the Senate, intimating that this is to be found nowhere but within the sacred precincts of Cambridge? As it stands, a desire for privileges and a private and behind-scenes admission to some of them are made to form the basis of argument for an Academic Revolution.

For some time I was lost in vain surmises as to who had composed this wonderful memorial. Could it be one of the eleven members of the Cloth-workers' Company, or one of the 250 medical practitioners; or was it one of those thoughtful Dublin Professors or Fellows who seem to urge upon others what they don't do themselves?

At last, Sirs, I think I have a solution. The hand of some humourist (say, Professor Blackie) is with them in all this. There has been a plot. Under guise of an argument there is an appeal to our sympathies. The "women" have been advised to come in formâ pauperis, bringing a specimen of their intellectual poverty in their hands. And certainly about the strongest argument for the necessity of something being done for higher education in women which has been presented of late is the ingenious illogicality of the Memorial in which they urge their claims.

Yours obediently, SPECTATOR.

THE GRANTCHESTER ACCIDENT.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—With reference to that sad accident which occurred in the Grantchester, commonly known as the Fresher's, River, on April 30, I find no notice has been taken of the heroic attempt made by Mr. Graham, of Caius College. Twice he dived at the imminent risk of his life, the weeds catching him under the chin and nearly holding him down, in his most praiseworthy endeavour to succour the unfortunate men.

I remain, Sirs, your obedient Servant,

AN UNDERGRAD.

THE MAY WEEK.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

DEAR SIRS,—Would you kindly allow me through your columns to suggest the following novel attraction for visitors to Cambridge in the May week, viz., to hold a Loan Exhibition of pictures which are the bona fide property of undergraduates; to insure the success of such a scheme it will be necessary to form a committee of management, to be supported by a certain number of promises. I would, therefore, ask anyone who thinks the plan feasible to communicate with me as soon as possible, in order that it may be carried into effect this May.

Yours truly, J. A. DUNCAN.

POOR STUDENTS.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—It is with great diffidence that I venture to differ from such an authority on University matters as Mr. Oscar Browning, but the proposal he makes in this week's Review, for the assistance of "Poor Students" is open, as I conceive, to a serious objection, and is calculated rather to injure than to help them. His plan to start cheap lodging-houses and cheap eating-houses for their especial use, would, I fear, ultimately if not immediately, reduce all who availed themselves of it to the condition of a separate caste,—to use a rather invidious but very expressive term,—and it would certainly to a large extent cut them off from that free society and converse with their fellow undergraduates which is perhaps the greatest advantage of college life, and which "poor students" more than any others require. I feel as much as anyone the desirability of cheapening as far as possible the expenses of living at Cambridge, but I believe that this should be done by the colleges in such a manner as not to separate openly or officially one class from another. They will separate quite enough of themselves, and if in addition to this natural distinction poor students are marked off from the others, as were the sizars and servitors of former days, little real good will be done to them. It appears to me indispensable that in all such arrangements no official distinction should be made between the two classes, and it is because Mr. Browning's plan seems to fail in this essential requisite that I have addressed to you these remarks.

There is also a remark of Mr. Browning's which requires a word or two. I hardly see how education, which costs at Cambridge £18 or £20 for six months' tuition, can be called cheaper than public school education, which on an average, I believe, costs no more for nine month's teaching, to say nothing of the much longer duration of the hours of instruction. But this is a mere detail: the point I wish to emphasise is this, that in all arrangements and schemes for the assistance of poor students, the greatest care must be taken not to form them into a separate class, but rather to introduce them as far as possible to full association with their fellow students in College. Apologising for trespassing so much on your space,

I am, Sirs, yours faithfully,

St. John's College, May 7th, 1880. J. Spencer Hill.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Sirs,—Mr. Oscar Browning has pointed out that what the poor student—and I would add every other student—wants, is cheapness of food and lodging. With regard to the first I will say nothing, except that there appears to me to be no reason in the nature of things, why College kitchens should not supply ordinary food at ordinary prices.

With regard to the question of lodging, I should like to ask why it is an established principle at Cambridge, that every undergraduate should have a separate sitting-room. Many men go in inseparable pairs, and most have one or two friends with whom they could club together, without clashing in habits or tastes. As a fact there are several undergraduates, both in lodgings and in college, who make indiscriminate use of each other's property. At home, again, we generally have to sit in a room with others, and do not, so far as I know, find it any particular discomfort.

It may, perhaps, be objected that a reading man wants a place to himself. We certainly often hear men say that they cannot read when anyone else is present. This, I believe, is simply a habit, which could easily be shaken off. We have learnt to regard any second person in the room as a visitor, and we naturally feel obliged to talk and not read. A few weeks, or days, in which we were obliged to read with another person present, would rid us of this instinct. My own experience, both at school and on reading parties, is that two people reading together in a room keep each other steady and attentive.

With regard to the practical working of the scheme, I cannot see any real difficulty. A very little alteration would convert a few sitting-rooms, both in college and lodging-houses, into double the number of bed-rooms. Of course this joint system need not in any way be compulsory. In fact the college authorities would probably find it desirable to prohibit some men from clubbing together. But that there are some impecunious students, of tolerably similar tastes and friends, who would be willing to share their rooms and thus economise rent, furniture, firing, and lights, I do not for a moment doubt.

Yours truly,

F. H. Colson.

THE TRINITY ORGAN RECITALS.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Dear Sirs,—I could not help being struck, at the Organ recital at Trinity last Tuesday, by the very irreverent way in which the people rushed into the chapel. Surely this could be prevented by opening the doors sooner. By not doing so till a quarter of an hour before the recital begins, a large crowd collects outside, and naturally there is a rush when the doors are opened; but surely by opening them half an hour before, the people would come in quietly and take their seats: those who come first would then get the best seats, instead of the rudest and most irreverent, as the rule seems to be now.

Reverence in the House of God is a thing which we cannot guard too jealously.

Yours, &c., X. Y. Z.

A meeting is announced for next Thursday at which Professor F. W. Newman will deliver and address on Local Option; Mr. Oscar Browning will take the chair, and several of the younger members of the University are expected to speak.

COLLEGE CORRESPONDENCE.

ST. PETER'S.

Since last week we have played three matches; on Thursday we made a good stand against Trinity, and lost only by three runs, making 118 to 121. On Saturday our match with Queens' resulted in a draw, as also did the one on Monday with Corpus.

A change has been made in the boat, H. A. Watson going to 2 in place of Bird, and Dickenson to 3.

CLARE.

We understand that E. Harrison, B.A., of this College, 1st Class, Natural Science Tripos, 1878-9, is to be appointed a Demonstrator in Anatomy.

The first boat have taken to their light ship for some time, and find that she gives every satisfaction. They continue to shew good improvement. S. J. S. Banks is now permanently installed at 4, and W. T. Lawson, besides being spare man for the boat, makes himself useful in the eleven.

Our want of good bowling has led to but poor success at cricket this week. The rain disappointed us of our match with Corpus, on Wednesday, May 5th, and next day we played Trinity. Of our score of 67, E. W. Mulliner made 23. Our opponents then went in and ran up a total of 380. L. Bury's score of 256 was a magnificent exhibition of batting, and very interesting—from a Trinity point of view. On Friday we played Emmanuel, who went in first and scored 150, W. T. Shipton 40, E. B. Cotton 31, and A. Hewetson, being the principal contributors. Our innings, owing to the absence of H. J. Ford (who was playing at Fenners for the Next Sixteen against the Eleven),only amounted to 101, C. F. Weston 30, W. H. Alderson 17 not out, J. B. Maul 16. On Monday Caius gave us an afternoon's leather hunting, by scoring 449 for 4 wickets (Lacey 271).

After a series of ties to decide the election of lawn tennis representatives for the College, R. F. S. Colvill and J. C. McConnel, both freshmen, succeeded in beating A. H. Kingsley and J. A. Sidgwick. On Saturday they played a match against the Jesus College representatives, but after some close games were beaten.

The third year, according to the usual custom, have been photographed together.

PEMBROKE.

During last week the first boat was unfortunately deprived of the services of Collison and Stack, the former through illness, the latter owing to a strained wrist. Collison, however, on Monday was able again to take his place, while Stack will probably be unable to row in the races. The constitution of the first boat is as follows:—Walker, bow; Rundall, Taylor, Collison, Morton, Lambert, Burnside, Ainslie, stroke; Bullock, cox. The second boat has been going fairly well, it is as follows:—Grindrod, bow; Ashwin, Torkington, Dundas, Firminger, Carter, Phipps, Buss, stroke; Fox, cox.

On Monday, May 10th, we played St. John's, on their own ground, the result being a draw. The Johnians went first to the wickets, and were not disposed of until their score had reached the total of 204, Armstrong's 68 and Colman's 65 being the principal contributions. Pembroke then went in, and when time was called had scored 74 for a loss of five wickets, Wright being not out for 34.

We are now at the fourth round of the Lawn Tennis Tournament, four pairs being left in, which are drawn as follows:—Finch and Betts v. Eden and Willink; Sturges and Jones v. Fraser and Hales.

GONVILLE AND CAIUS.

We have not much to record about the boats. The first crew have finally decided to discard their new boat, which has been specially built for them by Winter, but which has proved not up to their weight. Some further changes have been made in the boat, Swift has been obliged to cease rowing for the present, owing to illness, while seven takes Swift's place, Tapp being promoted from the second boat to seven in the first.

The unfortunate second boat suffers grievously by the fluctuations in the first. However, we must be fairly content with their progress all things considered. We trust that before the races stroke will succeed in getting more "go" into his boat, as this is at present their chief desideratum. They are benefitting largely by getting the reversion of the new boat from the first crew, which suits them admirably.

The third boat are rough, but contains some good material, which ought to develope into something good by next year.

Last week's Cricket has been somewhat disastrous to say the least of it, as our team was defeated by Corpus, Trinity, and Jesus. Good or even moderate bowling is at present at a high premium in Caius.

There was a meeting held by the Universities Missions to Centra

Africa in our Hall on Sunday night. Two returned Missionaries sought to enlist the enthusiasm of a hall full of undergraduates in following up the work of Mackenzie.

TRINITY HALL.

The first ties in the Lawn Tennis tournament have nearly all been decided. The results are as follows: A. G. Steel and H. Shearburn beat J. Anderson and Drinkwater-Lawe. E. Barclay and T. L. Lomax beat A. Pattullo and W. Kettle. G. Pole-Carew, and F. A. Roberts beat A. B. Walford and A. Keir. H. M. Stutfield and H. Jeddere-Fisher beat H. E. Simonds and N. How. A. T. Cairnes and W. H. Murphy beat J. T. Steele and J. B. Firth. The only remaining tie in the first round is that of G. King and G. Sanders v. R. E. Alexander and L. G. Reed.

There is no news from the cricketers this week: a match was played on Monday, the 3rd inst., against Emmanuel; the game at one time looked well for us, but an obstinate stand towards the close of their innings turned the issue in their favour.

The crews have been in training since Monday, the 3rd. No changes have taken place in the boats; the third is thus composed: bow, G. Pole-Carew; 2, H. E. Simonds; 3, Puckle; 4, Drinkwater-Lawe; 5, E. Harper; 6, R. Alexander; 7, Gausden; stroke, Palmer; cox, J. P. Watt.

CORPUS CHRISTI.

The Rev. Canon Prescott, formerly a fellow of the Collee, preached in our chapel last Sunday morning.

Our first boat is composed as follows:—Bow L. Bartlett, 2, J. T. Halland, 3, W. M. Selwyn, 4, J. R. Burgess, 5, T. A. M. Shepherd, 6, R. Nicholson, 7, F. Tugwell, stroke, H. Everingham, cox, J. T. Fox.

Last Saturday our Cricket eleven played Magdalene; they went in first, and three figures appeared on the telegraph before the fall of the first wicket, however so well did Greenland and Brown bowl that they were all disposed of for 132. We made 153, Richardson played well for 34, as also Owen and Brown for 31 and 24 respectively, and Isaacs made 20.

On Monday we played Peterhouse, and kept them out all the afternoon, making 283. Owen played a grand innings of 116, without a chance, Richardson played well for 51; Isaacs and Hough made 20 and 22 respectively. On Friday our 2nd eleven played the Johnian 2nd, who beat us with two or three wickets to spare.

KING'S.

On Wednesday last we played Emmanuel: after getting them out for 142 we got 230 for five wickets (A. Ford 179 not out): their highest individual score was 43 made by C. H. Allcock. On Saturday we were beaten by Old Carthusians, who got 254 to our 233: it is only fair to say that on this occasion we played without A. Ford: and C. W. Foley was not able to keep wicket for us. For King's Searle made 62, Foley 53, and most of the eleven double figures.

On Saturday a lawn tennis match was played against the Mayflies, three pairs on either side:—only one out of our three representative pairs was victorious. We notice that the volune of poetry by "the Lotus Club" of Cambridge undergraduates is dedicated to Mr. Oscar Browning: it is darkly hinted that some of the contributors are members of this College.

QUEENS'.

The boat is constituted as follows:—Walker, bow; Thompson, 2; Wildman, 3; Anderson, 4; Hind, 5; Gray, 6; Prior, 7; Warlow, stroke; Kidd, cox.

We played Peterhouse on the Amalgamation Ground on Saturday, May 10th. They won the toss and went in first, scoring 143, Kelly and Gray being the principal contributors. We had obtained 94 for the loss of 5 wickets when time was called, so that the game was left drawn in our favour: the chief scores on our side were Ashmall 30, Butler, (not out), 19, Hodgson 17, Bolton 16.

ST. CATHARINE'S.

J. P. Hubbersty, 15th Classic in the last Tripos, has obtained a mastership at Loretto School, Musselburgh.

L.T.C.—A double handed tournament has been arranged, for which there have been a fair number of entries. A match is also to be played with Christ's.

CHRIST'S.

C.C.B.C.—The boat is now made up as follows:—Bow, Stephenson; 2, Jameson; 3, Parkyn; 4, Holman; 5, Moore; 6, Davidson; 7, Thompson; stroke, Hill; cox., Wooding. The crew are not so well together as they should be so soon before the races, as some of the members have been temporarily absent. They are a strongish lot of men, and if well together should go up two or three places.

C.C.L.T.C.—Matches have been arranged with Peterhouse for 12th inst., and with Corpus for the 14th.

C.C.C.C.—On Thursday, May 6th, we played Emmanuel, the match resulting in a draw. Emmanuel went in first, and owing to our somewhat slack bowling scored 276 runs. We lost three wickets for 81 runs, Howell making 44 not out. On the 7th we played Jesus, but the match was left unfinished, as they went in and made over 400 for the loss of nine wickets.

C.C.M.S.—The Musical Society will give their concert on Friday, 28th inst. This will be the first concert in the new Hall of the College, and the friends of the Society will have an opportunity of judging its acoustic merits.

ST. JOHN'S.

Last Thursday was our annual commemoration of Benefactors. The sermon at the special service in Chapel was preached by Professor Churchill Babington.

The lawn tennis ties to select our representatives in out-College matches are proceeding and will probably be completed this week.

Among the recently appointed examiners of London University we notice the following members of this College:—Mr. H. S. Foxwell, M.A., in Political Economy; Mr. W. Garnett, M.A., and Professor W. G. Adams, F.R.S., in Experimental Physics; and Mr. A. M. Marshall, M.A., in Comparative Anatomy and Zoology.

MAGDALENE.

During the last week we played five matches, against Jesus, St. John's, Sidney, Caius and Corpus. Against Caius we obtained 191 runs: Knott making 62 in good style, Sheriffe and Waller making 29 and 21 respectively. Caius made 114 for five wickets. Against Corpus Knott and Hillyer made 105 before a wicket fell, Hillyer making 35 and Knott 64. A strange collapse, however, happened and the whole eleven were dismissed for 132. Corpus scored 153.

The Boat has been out regularly and we are very glad to see that Hockin is again coaching it. It is composed as follows, Bow, C. Smith. 2. J. A. Waller. 3. R. M. Nason. 4. T. E. B. Thompson. 5. H. Biddell. 6. C. Hughes. 7. A. T. Holmes. Stroke J. A. Watson-Taylor. Cox. H. P. Blencowe.

TRINITY.

The M. and S. met at 10 p.m. on Friday, May 7th. H. L. Stephen proposed "That in the opinion of this House the extension of the Ballot Act would be undesirable." H. J. Wade opposed the motion, which was lost by a majority of 19 in a house of 23.

The Irregulars met on Thursday to discuss the extension of the franchise. Only one members spoke in favour of the motion, and he quite failed to convince the meeting.

On May 8th, the May Flies L.T.C. played a match against King's. The scoring was as follows:—

May Flies L.T.C. King's L.T.C.

C. P. Harvey and M. C. Gibb beat C. W. Foley and W. F. B. Thynne by 3 sets to 1.

B F. Buxton and T. Gill lost to H. E. Ryle and N. L. Hallward by 1 set to 3.

S. H. C. Wright and R. A. Pelly beat E. C. Perry and F. L. Tuck by 3 sets to 0.

Thus the May Flies won by 7 sets to 4.

Third Trinity have very bad luck in losing the services of Pilkington: at present Gridley is rowing stroke in their First boat.

There are many changes in the constitution of T.B.C. First Boat. Biram has been tried at stroke, Fellowes at four, Gubbins at two, while Hutchinson seems settled at three.

EMMANUEL.

The new ship built by Winter was tried for the first time on Friday. She carries the crew very steadily and well. The boat is now fixed:—Bow, Jukes; 2, Bulstrode; 3, Kneale; 4, Durrant; 5, Thornton; 6, Whelpton; 7, Oakes (Captain); stroke, Hopkinson; cox., Hall.

The Burton Pairs have been fixed for May 29th.

The first eleven were defeated by King's on Wednesday, and on Thursday and Saturday drew with Christ's and John's. Against the latter we made 143, with the loss of only one wicket, owing to the excellent batting of C. H. Allcock and Cotton.

On Friday we beat Clare, and on Monday the Hawks, Cotton scoring 102, not out.

The motion of B. H. Jones Advocating the improvement of the position of women was carried by a majority of two.

SIDNEY.

Naters, having been allowed to row, has taken his place at stroke in our boat, and Logan is moved up to 2; a change that has created an improvement in the crew.

We have only played one Cricket match this week, which was against Magdalene. We were again successful, scoring 119 against the 77 of our opponents. Goodchild made 27, Mallinson 59, and Edwards 16, not out, while Ostrehan, as usual, took most of the wickets.

DOWNING.

College news is scarce this week. With the exception of the Shakespeare Society, which draws a select literary circle fortnightly, College societies are for the present in abeyance.

The boat continues to make good progress, and will, we hope, cut a figure in the races.

Lawn Tennis has also many devotees; and the average play of the members has much improved this term. A challenge has been accepted from Christ's College L.T.C., which will be played on the 28th of May, and will add zest to the practice during the next fortnight.

NON-COLLEGIATE.

N.C. Bible Union.—The meetings in connection with this Society are held on Sundays at 3 p.m. The subject at present under discussion is the Book of Joshua. J. Denton Thompson, the Hon. Sec., will supply any information to those desirous of joining the Union.

C.U.M.S.

Wednesday (April 28) was the first concert for a long time at which we have heard an undergraduate quartet. We are glad to welcome newly awakened energies in our violinists, and hope that we shall find quartets a more frequent item in our programmes in future. The quartet played was Haydn's in D minor (Op. 76, No. 2), the executants, Messrs. Crowder, Girdlestone, Crichton, and Capel Cure, and although the quartet has not been long enough formed to allow one to expect much finish, the music was very fairly played. Speaking more particularly of the quartet, we thought the first movement, and the minuet in canon best played, the latter being decidedly spirited. The Rev. L. Borissow and Mr. Cobb next sang Mendelssohn's two well-known duets, "Autumn Song," and "Oh, wert thou in the cauld cauld blast." We have never heard a more polished rendering of these duets, which are old friends to every one, and although they are, we suppose, meant for "soprani," they went admirably for tenor and baritone. Mr. Fuller-Maitland played Chopin's Barcarolle in F sharp exquisitely, and receiving a determined and undeniable encore, played subsequently an 'Etude' of the same author's. Mr. Fuller-Maitland's playing has been much missed in Cambridge since he went down, and the audience was evidently delighted to see him at the piano again. Another duet by Messrs. Borissow and Cobb followed, from Brahms, the words being a translation of the English song "Over the mountains." It was also extremely well rendered, the second part being the most pleasing. The concert concluded with a sonata for Violin and Pianoforte in A minor, Op. 105, by Schumann. It was performed by Herr R. Gompertz and Mr. J. A. Fuller-Maitland. It is a magnificent work, and we need scarcely say was suitably rendered.

THE RIVER.

"Tempora mutantur." Now the time must be changed. Now the slow stroke must give place to the quick one. Though at the beginning of the present term we urged upon the various College Captains the necessity of maintaining a slow stroke, yet now, as the time fixed for the May Races draws near, we feel that we must warn all those, who hold the sway in rowing matters, that our advice was only intended as a suggestion for the first month of practising, and that, if a boat intends to do well in the coming struggle, it is high time for it to try a quick stroke. By a quick stroke for sliding eights we mean an average of thirty-six per minute over the course, and a boat which cna maintain as quick a stroke as this without getting flurried and without "bucketing," ought to have no fear of any pursuer during the races. Though we wish to offer our congratulations to all Captains who have delayed taking to their quick stroke till now, we must say we shall not feel inclined to condole with any of the less wise, who have been too eager in their change to a rapid stroke, and may in consequence come to grief.

The weather during the past week has been cool and most suitable for the earlier training of a crew, and there can be no excuse for any boats to become over-trained or stale, a catastrophe which must in a May Term like this be brought about mainly by a too hurried stroke at a too early stage of practice.

Jesus I. have been doing well during the past week. On Wednesday they were fortunate enough to gain the services of Hockin, who at once took his place at No. 7 thwart, to the exclusion as we anticipated, of Jackson; the latter accordingly has gone 5 of Jesus II. Although the condition of this, their latest acquisition, cannot be said to be such as a rowing man ought to possess at a period when the races are so near at hand, yet a marked improvement has of late taken place in the Jesus boat; so much so, indeed, that there seems now no need of anxiety, lest the black and red should be caught by Caius. Bow appears uncomfortable, in fact he seems too lengthy in build to find stowage room at bow, but perhaps he is put there on the principle of multum in parvo.

Lady Margaret I. have not improved as was expected. At the beginning of the term we expressed an opinion that, although a weak boat, they would pull together in some manner or other. In this we have been disappointed, as, instead of improving, they have become worse since taking to their light ship; their swing is very bad, especially that of No. 2. Their stroke is rowing with all his old faults, and, we must add, with few of his old virtues; but this may be, perhaps, because he has so few good men to back him up. There is yet time, however, for them to improve, and if they will only swing straight and together they may avoid going down very far after all.

Caius I. have fallen off in the most lamentable manner. A week or ten days ago they promised to be the best boat on the river; but since then their late captain has retired for good, and No. 4 has had an indisposition which has prevented him from rowing during the last few days. These changes, however, do not account for the way in which the boat has deteriorated, a great want of unity in the rowing, and not a lack of work lies at the root of the evil. It is impossible for a boat to get along unless the men in it row together, and in a light ship unity is a greater virtue than hard work. At present Caius are decidedly inferior to Jesus in pace, and therefore, unless this week brings a marked improvement, they must give up all hopes of catching Jesus, remembering the very wise saying that "a stern chase" is always "a long chase."

First Trinity I are the victims of so many changes that to speculate with any certainty as to their fate is not within the power of mortal man. Hitchcock, who has been rowing at No. 2, has been removed to stroke of the second boat—this, with other late changes, however desirable, is somewhat late in the day, and we recommend the Trinity authorities to have done with change as soon as possible.

Third Trinity First are rowing fairly well but we are sorry to see that Pilkington, who was so useful last term in rousing up the University boat, is unable to give his boat the advantage of his "smartness." Gridley has taken his place.

Trinity Hall are rapidly coming to the front, and unless the fact that they have come to maturity too early presages a future decline; we should say that they would prove one of the fastest boats on the river. The whole crew are rowing well, and have at last learned to get a good and deep hold of the water. They should go up, but how many places, depends on the comparative improvement in the boats above them.

Caius II. have suffered with their first boat lately, since, to fill up the vacancies which have so unfortunately occurred to their best boat, the second boat has been compelled to yield pro. tem. some of its best men. In spite, however, of their troubles, they have improved and with better luck may still puzzle the boats below them.

Clare has a good stroke in Roberson, he needs, however, to be sharper with his beginning and his swing forward is at times uncertain, which last fault inclines the whole boat to hang on him. There is great need for all the bow side to get their feather cleaner, 7 and 3 are the chief offenders in this respect. The men seem to be a strong lot and all the better for the hard work they have had during the past week. What they want most is some good coaching.

First Trinity II. have sent their stroke to the corresponding position in the first boat, while Hitchcock, who was rowing 2, has taken his place, Gubbins going to the thwart vacated by Hitchcock. The boat is not going so badly as might have been expected from the frequent changes in it.

Lady Margaret II. are improving slightly; but are falling back in comparison with the other boats. There is not enough life and dash to make them a success.

Pembroke I. have at last got Collison back again, and went out yesterday in their right order. They do not seem much the worse for their mishap, and by the time the races come on, they will probably be all the better for their accident.

Emmanuel I. are becoming a very fair crew, and should repeat their success of last year. We hope, however, that they will also profit by their misfortunes, and not bump a boat merely to allow themselves to be caught on the following night.

First Trinity III. are much the same as last week.

Sidney might improve if stroke would only put his oar fairly into the water, and attempt to do some work. At present the whole crew are very much afraid of their light ship.

Jesus II. have got Jackson rowing 5 for them; but apparently the second boat does not suit him so well as the first. Like the boat in front of them, they are rather unhappy when in their rigger.

Third Trinity II are naturally much weaker than they were last term, and this will not also apply to the boats which are behind them so they must row hard to be safe for the earlier part of the races.

Trinity Hall II are in the main the same crew that did so well last Lent. Nothing succeeds like success, and so they should do well.

Were a prize offered to the boat which could combine the greatest eccentricities of swing with the maximum of velocity, the Corpus first boat would be "facile princeps." Scissors are a joke to them.

Downing are strong and hearty at present, but we recommend them to be careful not to overdo it lest they fall to pieces before the time arrives for the crucial test.

A week ago St. Catharine's first boat were dreadful, and no doubt startled by our remark in our last number, have discovered another "day of rest" in the week besides the ordinary and legitimate Sunday.

Queens' have been trying what a little re-arrangement would do; but we fear that the benefit is not very apparent. There is, however, a distinct improvement in the pace of the boat, and they should be at least equal to the task of gaining some of the places they lost in the Lent, if they can only turn some of the luggage they at present carry into serviceable material.

First Trinity IV. pay too much attention to their finish, and too little to beginning, swing, and work.

King's are well together, but weak; and the change of stroke has not brought about the change of pace which was no doubt expected. The remedy is simply—more work.

Magdalene have twice changed their stroke. Watson-Taylor at first occupied that post; he was changed for Holmes, whose place he took at number seven; but this arrangement apparently not being satisfactory, Watson-Taylor again returned to stroke; but from his "form" we are afraid he neglected to practice rowing during his absence. The King's men will have a tough race to keep away from Magdalene, unless they can catch the Trinity boat in front of them.

Lady Margaret Third are very weak for their position, and are sure to have an unpleasant meeting with Christ's before the races are over.

Caius Third are not bad, and ought to make short work with the boat above them. Christ's have several men from their second boat, and are certain to go up; they have good useful oars at stroke and seven, and back them up fairly well.

We have tried to discover which is the First Trinity fifth boat, but, we are sorry to say, hitherto in vain.

Trinity Hall Third, the boat whose success last term was so triumphant, are necessarily feeling the want of their old comrades who have been removed into the second boat; but in spite of being somewhat new to their work they get along fairly well.

Of Pembroke II and Peterhouse we can hardly make up our mind which is the better; it seems, however, probable that the latter will prove victorious in the time race to see which is to be represented in the coming May Races.

OXFORD LETTER.

April 8.

The eights began on Wednesday in very fair weather. The attendance, however, of strangers seems to have been prejudicially affected by the elections, as there certainly was a marked decrease in the number of ladies on the Barges. The boats started in the following order, the brackets denoting the bumps on the first night.

FIRST DIVISION.

(Balliol	(Christ Church
⟨ Magdalen	⟨ Hertford
University	(Keble
(Pembroke	⟨ Exeter
⟨ B.N.C.	Trinity
New

SECOND DIVISION.

Trinity	(Oriel
Corpus	⟨ Lincoln
(St. John's	Merton
⟨ Worcester	St. Catherine's (Unattached)
) Queen's	Jesus
) St. Mary Hall	St. Edmund Hall

On Thursday, strange to say, there was no bump made in the 2nd division.

In the 1st division. University caught Balliol, New bumped Pembroke very early, Exeter caught Ch. Ch, and Trinity made very short work of Keble.

On Friday, Balliol again fell, their conquerors this time being B.N.C. Hertford caught Pembroke, Trinity caught Ch. Ch.—Corpus bumped Keble. St. John's having made an advantageous change in their boat succeeded in re-bumping Worcester after a good race. Lincoln caught Queen's, and St. Edmund Hall caught Jesus.

On Saturday there was no change in the positions of the first three. New College caught Balliol, Exeter caught Pembroke, Corpus bumped Christ Church, St. John's bumped Keble, Oriel bumped Queens, and after Oriel had made their bump Merton ran hard into them, evidently imagining them still to be racing; Merton were therefore caught by St. Catherine's. Jesus re-bumped St. Edmund Hall.

On Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday the Eleven were occupied in playing sixteen Freshmen. The Freshmen made 165 1st innings, and 200 in the 2nd innings, while the Eleven made 204 in the one innings which they brought to a conclusion.—

Hodgson (Hertford) made the best score for the eleven 52 not out, while Green (Exeter), the captain, made 49 and Trevor (Corpus) 45.

For the Freshmen, Evelyn (Oriel) batted remarkably well, making 70 and 79. Wethey (B.N.C.) made 31 in the first innings, while in 2nd innings Walker (Trinity) made 26 and Stirling (University) 29. Evans for the Eleven distinguished himself with the ball by bowling nine wickets 1st innings.

The red coats of the lawn tennis club very frequently enliven the streets of Oxford, and remind us of a third branch of athletic exercises. Rumour says that we are to see red trousers as well: the socks have already blushed defiance to the coat. What an effect of lawn tennis! Go on and prosper, if you will; go and

"The multitudinous seas incardinadine, Turning the green one red."

The Union on Friday was the scene of an exciting debate on a proctor who was said to have trespassed on the Union precincts and torn his prey from the very horns of the altar. Many suggestions were given with regard to the treatment this "Pampered Menial" (sic) ought to receive. He was to be prosecuted for trespass, turned out of the Union, made to apologize, fined, &c., &c. Was he not liable to a fine, some one asked, if he introduced his attendants, under the rule which excluded the canine species? The president replied that his predecessors had been accustomed to answer that particular question in the negative. The matter was finally referred to the committee.

The proctors have drawn a good deal of attention to themselves by forbidding undergraduates to take part in the election. As however it was dangerous for them to venture into the mob, they handed over their power to the police, who discharged their trust with the utmost energy and fidelity. A meeting at the Martyr's Memorial was interfered with by a detachment from the House, who spent the evening partly in shouting, "Hall for ever," and, the latter half, in solitary confinement. A Brasenose man was carried fainting into the Liberal committee room, where he was revived, gasping "vote for Hall."

The Election has been the great event of the week even to us. But though the result has satisfied the desire of the University, great disappointment was felt in the long expected Saturday night. Orders had been issued forbidding undergraduates to go out after seven; policemen had been sent for from outlying districts; all windows looking out on the street were to be closed; and after all nothing happened. Strict enquiry brought to light only one serious encounter. A butcher rolling down a street swinging his stick and shouting "Hup with the squire," in his ardour knocked off his own hat; upon which he turned on a well-known tailor, walking near, and avenged the accident on him. The publishing of the result of the election took place just before seven, as the crowd was coming up from the races. After long waiting a window opened and the wished-for placard appeared. The crowd consisted mainly of undergraduates, publicans, street-boys, and clergymen. Above the town hall various men were stationed, like the statues on Trinity library, waving blue flags: opposite, the windows were full of blue ladies, and the crowd below was almost entirely blue. So the excitement was both intense and unanimous. The colleges took it up. Peckwater was placarded all over, except where a solitary liberal living in an upper story had cleared the wall below him with hot water from above. Balliol being pretty equally divided was the scene of fierce and sometimes sanguinary conflicts. All Souls was inscribed in large white letters with "Vanity, saith the preacher, Hall is vanity" and on the opposite side with an enormous "Home sweet Home," closer inspection showing a little "office" under each "Home." The crowd on one side shout "'All or nothink" to which the others reply "'Eark at 'im." Altogether we have lost a good deal of excitement with the election, and the rest of the term will seem rather dull after it.

Your printer is rather hard on me. The plague I talked of, as coming with the election, was 'the plague of flies,' not of 'this.' Had your printer been at Oxford, with rooms near a main street, he would not have made the mistake.

The Bampton lecturer continued his series on Sunday morning. He treated of the development of the Early Church with more than his usual eloquence. The congregation (which included Canon Liddon) was a large one. But perhaps some fair strangers, who innocently came to hear a University sermon, were rather surprised. There are a good many here who firmly believe Byron was at Christ Church, and kept a bear in mercury: it would not be hard to persuade many more that Gibbon was a Bampton lecturer.

LONDON POSITIVISM.

In the quiet part of London near Gray's Inn Road, where the rattling bustle of the thoroughfares is lulled, is situated Chapel Street. In this street, in a window, may be read a notice headed, "Positivist School," and bearing some such announcement as "The Sunday Morning Services begin at at 11.15 a.m. precisely. On the 1st of Charlemagne (Wednesday, June 18th), and on the 1st of Descartes (Wednesday, October 8th), there will be Social Meetings in the School, at 8 p.m." If we enter and walk along a short passage, we find ourselves in a good-sized room, adorned with busts, portraits, and illuminated quotations from Dante and the Bible. The grave features of Moses, Aristotle, St. Paul, Shakespeare, and ten others, including the founder himself, Auguste Comte, look benignly on us. At the head of the room is a stone tablet, engraved with the words :—"Religion of Humanity,—Love our Principle, Order the Basis, Progress the end,—Live for others :" above this a photograph of the Sistine Madonna, who, clad in grace and dignity, represents Humanity.

This then is the sanctuary of the new religion. As the notice says, services are held here every Sunday morning. Dr. Congreve is the priest: the audience is small but earnest. A 'prayer' is first read, apostrophising Humanity, and breathing aspirirations for a more righteous life. This is followed by a reading from the "Imitatio Christi" of the devout Thomas à Kempis. Then comes the sermon—a discourse on a great man, prescribed by the Positivist Calendar, and a social subject, such as the relation of master and man, or the duty of our all learning French, as making us better social beings. A reading from Comte or a poet follows, and the service concludes with another prayer to Humanity.

An explanation and criticism are here necessary. By 'prayer,' the Positivist means aspiration and adoration: with most Theists, however, it involves petition, if not for a special manipulation of the laws of nature to suit one's own interests, at least for the exertion of supernatural power in moulding the character for good; in other words, something more than aspiration and adoration is meant. But to use the expression : "We pray thee, Humanity," infallibly suggests petition and sounds ludicrous. In like manner Mr. Frederick Harrison writes about "Immortality," when all he means is either the recollection of a man by his friends, or the permanent trace of his actions in the future of the race. This is clothing old words with new and feebler meanings. It suggests as its object to make easier the transition from Christianity to Positivism, by disguising the sacrifices that must be made. Let its language boldly confess the different position it takes concerning these great questions!

But to return to the London Positivists, for we have not yet made the acquaintance of them all. Two years ago we need not have gone beyond Chapel Street; now (alas for the unity of Humanity!) they are in two sections. Paul and Barnabas could not agree on which countries they should first convert, and they separated : Dr. Congreve and Messrs. Harrison, Beesly, and Bridges differed on the method of teaching Positivism, and they have separated.

The other group of London Positivists are best known to the public by two courses of lectures they have given explanatory of their views. The former was an exposition of Positivism; the latter was cast in a historical form, and concluded last Easter with an address by Mr. Frederick Harrison. The attendance has been some 200, an audience highly interesting for the artist or student of well-marked types of mankind. We meet with what the biologists would call "highly specialised forms:" old men with grey hair waving over their shoulders, foreigners with eccentric neckties, physicians, professors, lawyers, artists, young men with eager faces, matrons, and beautiful girls. It is evening—the churches in the suburbs are pouring forth swarms of respectable people; the streets are full of the poor, dressed in their best, enjoying an evening walk; the gleaming gin-palaces are crammed; along the Euston Road street-preachers have collected small groups, and are thundering at them on death and salvation: all this is going on outside—London, with its life, its clergy, its sin—while the little body in the Cavendish Rooms, Mortimer Street, listens to a lecturer who shews how to attack and conquer the great forces of evil, and sketches out the glorious future of Humanity.

Now and then he will allude to their French co-labourers; of them, therefore, we must say something. The chief priest, the successor Comte appointed to himself, is M. Laffite, an elderly man of high attainments—his christian name is Pierre. A hundred Parisian working men, some of good ability, are members, and exercise a restraining influence on the Communist gatherings of the ouvriers. The house where Comte lived is piously preserved in the state in which he left it, and a small club of Positivists meets in the room where the Philosophie Positive was written. This club includes members from Austria, Chili, and Brazil. There are Positivist gatherings also in New York, and Positivists in Sweden and Italy, so that the movement has already attained something of cosmopolitan character.

What then is the basis of this new religion dawning on the world? The word "Positivist" means that the only knowledge considered reliable is Positive Science : that no sure results can be obtained from Metaphysics : that our knowledge is confined to the phenomenal, and cannot grasp the noumenal. But it may be objected that Science herself is founded upon metaphysical assumptions. The physicist believes in the existence of matter and the possibility of its being known by a subject. We will not stop to discuss whether science could get on without supposing the existence of matter, but only say that all are satisfied with the rigour of the method she pursues.

The word Positivism means then Agnosticism. However on enquiring further we learn that the aim of the new religion is "to reorganise society by the systematic worship of Humanity."

Can there then be a religion of Humanity? We propose to discuss this, the fundamental proposition of the Positivists, without adhering strictly to their method, nor, while using their arguments in the main, depending for our matter solely on the works of Comte.

Comte defined religion as a regulative power which brings about harmony of thought, feeling, and action,—which is in fact the guide of life. Without pledging ourselves to this definition we shall find it convenient to look at "Humanity" from the points of view suggested by it.

As a guide to Action we are told to work for the "Progress" of Humanity. But what is Progress? Harmony reigning in the social organism, and the higher perfection of its individuals. To bring about the former we have the good old maxim to rule one's conduct for the greatest happiness of the greatest number; to which add the notion that some kinds of present happiness are superior to others if they are steps to greater future happiness. Thus when a couple of primitive men were seated together, equally happy, the one scratching on a bone a rude drawing of a mammoth, and the other gnawing the meat from another bone, the former should be encouraged to continue, for from such slight beginnings has the race developed the marvellous pleasures derived from Art, whereas the appetite for meat is probably no keener now than it was then, or even less keen, to judge from some University banquets. Progress consists of more evolution; more far-sighted or noble actions, more subtle and enchanting feelings, higher ranges of thought. It widens the gap between a man and a monkey. The ethical aim therefore of the Positivist is to throw himself heart and soul into all that promotes the welfare of the race. The Theist, if he have risen above selfish motives, loves to fight under the banner of his Lord. The Positivist also, except that he has an advantage in the tangibleness of the service he can do. It is hardly necessary to say that all this applies to thousands who reject the term Positivist; men and women whose whole lives are devoted to this great end.

But if we would seek whether there can be a Religion of Humanity we must ask, can it give us strong motives for doing good? and can it fill us with religious emotion? Humanity regarded merely as a mass of men cannot, and for this reason people are apt to pass a hasty judgment on Positivism. Suppose a spectator standing on the Monument, and suddenly the vast fabric of London houses swept away, leaving the three million inhabitants, little black specks crawling on the ground: would he feel an overwhelming gush of reverence? But if we think over the life of the human race, how it has struggled upwards from savagery, the acts of heroism it has performed, the stores of knowledge and art it has accumulated, then we may feel something of pride, a sort of cosmopolitan patriotism. Patriotism is a feeling strong enough to urge thousands to sacrifice their lives—may not this Humanitarianism be as strong? Is the leap from Patriotism to Humanitarianism greater than that from clanship to Patriotism?

However, to satisfy the devotional nature of man, "Humanity" must be invested with a new meaning—the ideal man—the outline of a noble being uniting all great qualities into which we should try to shape our character. This is not a momentary creation of the mind. It is of course useless to say to a child or man with his feelings uncultured "Lo! here is the ideal Christ—a combination of Mahomet, Confucius, Descartes, Luther, and Mill; fall down and adore him! Wash and be clean!" The ideal should be formed by studying the great and good; first those personally known, secondly, the records of history. By this study the grand emotion of reverence will spontaneously arise and fill the soul with joy. Reverence for a great man, some glorious child of Humanity, has formed a large element in most religions. Protestants, especially now-a-days, adore Christ; Mahometans, Mahomet; Buddhists, the Buddha; Roman Catholics, the Virgin Mary, the type of purity and tenderness in woman.

But the key-note of the Religion of Humanity is Love—a deep and true attachment to a few, a feeling less intense for the many. Love adds depth to every enjoyment, and in periods of great affliction is almost the only solace. How can a man learn worthily to love? By the magic aid of Sympathy. The germs of Sympathy lie in all; by our actions we aid or retard their growth. Sympathy is strengthened by deeds of kindness to the poor, the sick, and the wretched. "It is more blessed to give than to receive." There are times when the world appears terrible in its mystery: then Sympathy is all in all. Thus sustained by deep feeling in those moments when our mental currents run deepest, life loses that hollowness many experience after the loss of the beautiful visions and kind Father. Nor should we reserve our sympathy for a few: we should try to make it as all-embracing as possible; all men have their humanity in common; certain great feelings which are crusted over by the conventionalism of society. At times the flood-gates are loosed: do we not see the haughty aristocrat shaking hands with the publican at an election? It is the noble spirit of the brotherhood of man that inspires the Socialist, unworkable though his schemes may be. How cramping are class prejudices! How petty are often personal dislikes! The great lesson is now as it was eighteen centuries ago "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you."

But we should not be dogmatic in offering one Summum bonum to all. Here and there an ardent spirit is found, to whom the pursuit of Truth as Science or Philosophy is a glorious self-sufficient aim; or another, a real artist, who will devote his life to Beauty; or a third who is absorbed in Politics. These all, however, tend to bind men together by their work, and themselves know well the pleasures of sympathy.

Have we yet exhausted all aspects of religion? On the contrary, one at least of the most fundamental has been left untouched. "The essential ingredient of all religion," says Strauss, "is the sentiment of unconditional dependence." Now it is true we are very dependent on Humanity—for our language, our houses, our clothes, our life itself; true also that a man cannot live long in entire opposition to his fellows; he can to some extent, however, on which account we rarely feel a lively sense of our dependence on Humanity. This leads us to what we must regard as a defect in Positivism; for there is a reality which impresses on all a profound feeling of dependence and resignation when human effort is vain—this is the Cosmos. Science, stepping forward and embracing all phenomena, physical and mental, shews us that the laws of the Cosmos are inflexible. They work on, "without the untruth of a single second." So grand, so sublime is this Universe that many think they see an all-wise Personality behind natural law. We listen in wonder to the astronomer telling of thousands of worlds far off in the heavens, or the biologist narrating the history of some animal. In the face of this marvellous nature we gaze in delight and awe, and this emotion is truly religious.

We have briefly reviewed the relation of 'Humanity' to Action and Feeling: it remains to say a word about Thought. Comte fancied he had an important announcement to make when he said that science should be followed only in so far as its results furthered the good of man. He tried to define its bounds, but failed. The progress of Science is in fact better secured by working at it as an end in itself. It is almost impossible to say what knowledge will, and what will not, be ultimately turned to useful account. Besides which, any fresh plunge into the secrets of nature is highly refreshing. Now and then it might be well to keep Comte's caution in view. Mathematics should be valued as the great weapon for attacking Physics and Engineering, and not as a curious invention whose chief value is the ease with which it adapts itself to examination papers.

In conclusion let us make another criticism. Comte was the most dogmatic writer imaginable. He worked out schemes for government, business, art, and religious rites, public and private: he settled the length of a man's education, and the age at which he was to retire from business: he altered the calendar, and renamed the months. This may have some value in shewing how enormous a power a new religion could wield; but his ardent followers take him at his word, and insist, more or less, on these details. Comte's writings are taken as a sort of Bible, or new Deuteronomy, and the noble spirit of free thought is stifled. Were stress laid only on the main principles of reverence, love, and working for mankind, we cannot doubt but that the meetings of the Positivists would be filled with many young men and others, who, sad in the dreary decay of their old beliefs and faltering in their principles of right and wrong, would warmly grasp the outstretched hand of human sympathy.

PRE-HISTORIC TEETOTALERS.

Many and many a year ago, before ever such luxuries as dress had been thought of, men and women lived with a simple and guileless livelihood, undisturbed by the "demon alcohol." It was the time called by less happy mortals the golden age. Acorns and common nuts were the delicious fare of the dwellers of the earth, which they washed down with sparkling beakers of clear spring water, for Water Bills in those unsophisticated days there were none. Old father Kronos was then the "powers that were," and all things went on well and peaceably. But it was not to be for long. There was revolution in Olympus: father Kronos was expelled with ignominy from his throne, and one Zeus, his over ambitious son, reigned in his stead. At first the new broom swept clean: the slow days of old Father K. were gone, and fine doings were coming. But all this tall talk—as much elevated language before and since—went off in mere idle wind and vapour—the chief result of the new regime was the appearance in Olympus, and, alas! but too frequently on earth, of a shoal of meddling, officious, quarrelsome "gods," who wrought a deal of mischief wherever they showed their godlike faces.

But what about the teetotalism? Why, up till this time every mortal man in Greece and in her isles (or shall we say in the 'isles of Hellas' in deference to modern scholarship?) was a teetotaler from principle and practice, and that for the best of good reasons. There was never a drop of anything but water to drink, unless indeed one frequented the higher circle on Olympus, where all kinds of good things edible and drinkable were going. But this time of universal Good-Templarism could not last for ever. A son was born to Zeus, by no means his first, but one who was to make a terrible stir in the poor innocent old world. The wine-god with his flushed and jolly face made his appearance among her denizens. We are told by great authorities that the worship of this deity was introduced from Egypt, or some other part of the degraded East, and indeed it seems not unlikely: at any rate, however it was, a large portion of the community set to work at the new and pleasing rites with all the zeal of a miner on Saturday night. However there were not wanting even in those reckless days grave and serious persons to oppose the god's triumphant march; and indeed when one thinks what a highly disreputable object he himself must have been to meet, it is hardly to be wondered at. Fancy meeting the god suffering all the anguish of ΚΡΑΙΠΑΛΗ and 'titub'-ating about the country with that fearful drunken old lout of a Silenus following, with his legs dangling down the sides of his preposterously small donkey. No wonder, I repeat, that there were found grave and conscientious persons to try and quell this kind of thing. It appears that the original teetotaler, that is the first of all teetotalers who was not so from reasons of physical necessity, was Lukourgos, a gentleman who at that time had the honour of ruling over a select tribe of Thracian barbarians. Were it not well for us modern abstainers, that is such of us as are, to try and rescue this estimable sovereign's name and fame from nothingness? But little, alas! little came of his gallant uprising against vinous tyranny. History gives us not a very exact account of his fate; all we know is this, that he came to some bitter end, and that his death put a summary check to Thracian Good-Templarism. But there was not wanting another king bold enough to take upon him the dangerous task. Pentheus of Thebes (the first of that name), had noticed with grief and pain the terrible behaviour of the womankind of his kingdom. Nothing short of total abstinence would suit his imperious mood. No Gottenburg system for him. Starting a plan of private local option on his sole responsibility, he determined that never a pint should be sold within his walls. But mark his bitter end. The god was by no means to be trifled with like this. It needed no Conservative majority, no organisation of victuallers, licensed or unlicensed, to accomplish his ends: the unyielding king is decoyed from his palace to a mountain not far off, and there under the influence of Dionysiac inspiration, three highly respected relatives, to wit his mother and his maiden aunts, did him to death, while the son of Zeus looked on with a bitter smile at the accomplishment of his rather too practical joke. It was in vain for the poor deluded ladies, on the morrow, to wish they had never done it, The deed was wrought, and Theban teetotalism was once for all stamped out beneath the heavy tread of King Dionysus.

Two other sets of martyrs were there to the cause of temperance. The first would appear to have been rather a disreputable body. We are told, and therefore must needs believe, that it chanced soon after Bacchus' birth that for reasons best known to himself he was holding a revel on a lonely island. Now there passed that way a Tyrrhene galley. The crew landed to get them water: an important point this; while engaged on this innocent search they discover the young god lying about on the cold ground, and taking him doubtless for some Caliban, and with a laudable desire to turn an honest penny by exhibiting him mid painted tyrants at the village fair, they carried him off. Now had their project succeeded all wine and alcoholic drink would have disappeared from use, and would have been a mere laughing-stock and ridicule for men. But this was not to be. Even on that ship there was found a "pious" shipman who with tears in his eye declared his reverence for the brown Jug personified. And his virtue was rewarded, the scoffs of those wicked mates being turned to bitter groans—if such creatures can groan—when in the twinkling of an eye they were turned into as fine a shoal of porpoises as ever one would wish to see, while the accursed ship was turned by a simple process of metamorphosis into a kind of glorified gin-palace. The tears of that steersman together with the maudlin idiotcy of the Cyclops show us what fine drink their wine must have been in those days, at least according to their ways of thinking. It may be that the Tyrrhene crew get rather more than their due when we speak of them as of the protomartyrs in a way of total abstinence. But what can we say of such highly respectable persons as Alkithoé and her sisters, who were so staunch in the cause that instead of going out where the good drink was, they stayed at home beguiling the hours with unseasonable needlework (intempestivâ Minervâ) and 'World'-like gossip. No one surely would doubt the excellence of their motives? Yet, what was their end?—The poor dears were turned into 'bats.' It may be well for us that the licensed victuallers are now out of power, and cannot turn some of us into bats or anything else obnoxious. And what is the moral of all this? Well, I think a temperance man would say that there isn't one, and that it is all nonsense, and maybe that temperance man is right.

THE PAPER-KNIFE.

The Electrical Researches of the Honourable Henry Cavendish, F.R.S., written between 1771 and 1781, Edited from the original manuscripts in the possession of the Duke of Devonshire, K.G., by J. Clerk Maxwell, F.R.S.

Few men have made such important discoveries in such different branches of Natural Philosophy as Cavendish, of whom Cuvier wrote "he weighed the earth, he rendered the air navigable, he deprived water of the quality of an element, and he denied to fire the character of a substance." The book before us shews that in addition he was the discoverer of some of the most important of the laws of electricity. But while an account of his chemical researches is in every text-book of chemistry, and his method of determining the density of the earth has the honour of being one of the stock pieces of book-work got up by all candidates for the Mathematical Tripos, his electrical researches were so little known that in Maxwell's Electricity and Magnetism, published in 1873, not a single reference is made to them. For some reason or another Cavendish never published his most important electrical researches. Prof. Maxwell, in the introduction to this book writes "Cavendish cared more for investigation than for publication. He would undertake the most laborious researches in order to clear up a difficulty which no one but himself could appreciate or was even aware of, and we cannot doubt that the result of his enquiries when successful, gave him a certain degree of satisfaction. But it did not excite in him that desire to communicate the discovery to others which, in the case of ordinary men of science, generally ensures the publication of their results." This does not seem, however, to be a complete explanation, for as far as we know, Cavendish published his chemical researches, and he had written out some of the electrical researches in a form evidently intended for publication. Perhaps another element in the explanation may be, that his caution was so great, that, in dealing with an intricate subject like electricity, he was never quite sure that he had taken into account all the circumstances which could influence the phenomena. The book before us contains Cavendish's writings on electricity; these were written between 1771 and 1781, and consist of two parts; one part being evidently intended for publication as a book, and not as a paper for the Royal Society, the other part consisting of laboratory notes. The first paper (published in the Phil. Trans. for 1771) is a very complete working out of the one fluid theory of electricity which Cavendish invented independently of, though a few years later than Epinus. Whatever may be thought of the theory we must recognise in the way it is worked out that clearness and definiteness of conception which is so conspicuous in all Cavendish's writings. The paper also contains the first idea of what is now called "potential," though Cavendish calls it "degree of electrification," and which is perhaps now the most important conception in electrical science. The next paper, which is now published for the first time, contains the experimental research by which Cavendish proved that the law of electric repulsion was the inverse square. Prof. Maxwell calls his account of the experiment one of the most perfect examples of scientific exposition. It shows that Cavendish had proved this law ten years before it was proved independently in quite a different way by Coulomb, to whom, as is natural, since Cavendish never published his experiment, it is universally assigned. It is remarkable that when more than a century later an investigation on the same subject was made in the laboratory which bears his name, the method which was adopted in preference to all others was essentially the same as the original one. The succeeding papers contain researches on the charges of bodies, what would now be called determinations of capacity; and we find that Cavendish discovered that property of bodies which is now called specific inductive capacity, and determined its numerical value for several substances.

A paper on the Torpedo (published in the Phil. Trans. for 1776), finishes the papers which were written out for publication. In the laboratory notes, perhaps the most interesting feature is his method of measuring currents. Cavendish had, in 1776, stated the resistances of a few substances. But, until the publication of these notes, no one understood how he had obtained them, as it was forty years before the invention of the galvanometer. These notes shew, as Professor Maxwell says, that "Cavendish was his own galvanometer. In order to compare the intensity of currents he caused them to pass through his own body, and by comparing the intensity of the sensations he felt in his wrists and elbows he estimated which of the two shocks was the more powerful." In all these researches of Cavendish the intensely mathematical nature of his mind is very apparent. He seems never to have been satisfied with having merely discovered some phenomenon; he never rested until he had measured it. The notes at the end of the book, which will always have a melancholy interest as being about the last work of the late Professor Maxwell, consist for the most part of mathematical investigations by him of those capacities which Cavendish determined experimentally, and are so good that perhaps the highest tribute which could be paid to the body of the book is that the interest is not chiefly confined to the appendix.

Illustrated Biographies of the Great Artists: Raphael, Tintoret, Holbein, Rubens, Rembrant, Van Dyk, Franz Hals. The Little Masters of Germany. By various authors. (London, Sampson Low. 1879.)

These volumes form part of a series intended to give ordinary readers a concise account of the life and work of the great artists of Europe. Publications of this kind, which to be generally accessible must also be cheap, inevitably labour under many disadvantages, and complete success in overcoming them must not be expected. The illustrations must always be somewhat rough, and if the text is good, we ought to be satisfied. It is impossible for two or three shillings to reproduce perfectly the finest pictures of a great master. Thus in the present case many of the illustrations have been reproduced from Dr. Dohme's great work on art and artists, and where the stereotype blocks used in the German work have been used in the reproduction, much of the delicacy of the original woodcuts has been sacrificed. It has also been necessary to cut about some of the illustrations in order to bring them within the limits of a smaller sheet; thus in the Sposalizio of Raphael the whole upper part of the temple is omitted, and the proportions of the picture disappear. But in spite of these defects, the illustrations may do good service in recalling the outlines of pictures to those who have already seen them, and they will give those readers who have no completer source of information some conception at least of the original works. The letterpress, of course, varies considerably, the volumes devoted to Rubens and Holbein being the most successful; they are simply and clearly written, and are, perhaps, the best English accounts of these two painters. Mr. Scott, in his "Little Masters of Germany," has treated a favourite subject with masterly skill, and though the claims for these painter-engravers which he advances may be challenged, no one can fail to do justice to the care and the enthusiasm manifested in his work. Taken as a whole, the series is certainly valuable, and should do good service in extending knowledge on art subjects.

We notice that in a forthcoming volume of the Encyclopædia articles will appear on Greek Literature by Professors Jebb and Donaldson: on Greek History by the same: on Henry I-VI of England by Mr. Prothero: on Harmonic Analysis by the late Professor Clerk Maxwell: on Heat by Sir W. Thomson.

POETRY.

TO ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE.

O strong vile singer, whose hot verse enshrineth
Cursing and bitterness and life-long woe,
Scorching the secret places where it shineth
With fire of hell lit by the fiends below,

Did God assign thee this high gift of singing,
That thou should turn His blessing to a bane?
About thy neck His vesture was He flinging,
That thou shouldst soil it with a shameful stain?

Or doth some spirit from the Kingdom banished,
Fain to bring low pure souls, and smirch their wings,
Hating the light that from his eyes hath vanished,
Prompt thy glib tongue with lewd imaginings?

Love's house is vacant, dim his early splendour,
No worshippers are gathered at his gate:
His hallowed rites, so chaste and true and tender,
Like old-world garbs are worn and out of date.

And echoeth harsh a grim lascivious laughter
Mocking his fall, deriding his disgrace;
While from the gaze of those that follow after
With his white wings he covereth his face.

For like the Mænads of the ancient story,
A reeling rout intoxicate and wild
Chanteth a pæan to the new god's glory,
Hymneth the holiness of the defiled.

Matrons unmatronly with love-locks flying,
Maidens unmaidenly with eyes afire,
Bear they in triumph upon roses lying
Their delicate wanton deity Desire.

Out on the rabble! English sons and brothers,
Will ye not speak your minds like honest men?
Up, for the sake of sisters and of mothers,
Hunt the sleek Satyr to his charnel den!

Then lest Love go, his face with blushes burning,
Pray him with tears to stay his upward flight:
Crown him anew, and welcome his returning
Ye who have stood and striven for the right!

And thou, lust's laureate, from our shores betake thee
To lands where innocence is nothing worth:
There from thy dreams shall no reproaches wake thee,
No English curses mar thy dainty mirth.

Yet haply when night cometh, and the ending
Of thy mad life, wild poet, draweth near,
From the grey glooms of the abyss ascending
A sad-eyed band of sinners shall appear;

And though their lips may frame no word to chide thee,
And though their wasted arms may strike no blow,
Yet with such escort of thy slain to guide thee
I envy not the road that thou must go!

The shooting members of our corps have been untiring in their practice of late, owing to the near approach of the valuable prizes always shot for in the May term, most coveted of which is the Prince of Wales's Grand Challenge Cup. We were glad to see a large number engaged on the class targets on Saturday, as it is best to get that part of efficiency over as early in the year as possible. The Wimbledon competitions are now finished, and have resulted as follows for the Bronze Medal team:—

Capt. Lea, F Company	82	71	73	63	79	368
Sergt. Humphry, F Company	65	71	65	72	81	354
Corp. Penhall, F Company...	66	66	73	67	79	351
Lieut. Goddard, E Company	60	68	69	64	75	336
Lieut. Harvey, D Company	67	62	65	64	73	331
Lieut. Lindsay, F Company	65	73	56	62	71	327
Pte. Fellowes, F Company ...	60	70	70	68	59	327
Pte. Pollock, F Company ...	59	65	75	71	57	327

It will thus be seen that Captain Lea is the winner of the £5 for highest aggregate score, while there are three bracketed for the sixth place. The time for the match is not definitely settled, as what will suit the Oxford men does not seem to suit us, and vice versa. The match with the Inns of Court, fifteen a side, will take place on Monday next, occupying nearly the whole of the day. We were glad to notice the names of Captain Hamilton and Lieut. Castle, of the F (Trinity) Company, amongst those presented at Court on Friday last.

SUPPLEMENT TO

The Cambridge Review.

No. 21. WEDNESDAY, May 12, 1880.

Sunday, May 9.

Sermon by Rev. C. E. Searle, M.A.

"I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that thou shouldest keep them from the evil."—St. John xvii. 15.

When Jesus had made His ascension into heaven, the apostles remained gazing on the track where He had gone up. It is likely that they would have lingered long in that attitude, for the spot where His feet last rested was holy ground, and they might think also that if they waited He would appear again. But the two men in white apparel presently reminded them of their duty and remitted them to it by saying, "Why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." These are words of correction for all time, for to gaze into heaven and watch for His return is not really the best way of preparation for it, and a life of contemplative piety is not to be indulged when there is work to be done for Christ; and they seem by anticipation to show how vain is the attempt to localize the presence of Christ, and to invest any one place more than another with peculiar sanctity; for if we could dwell among the scenes of His earthly life continually, if our feet could stand on Olivet in the very print of His feet, we should find Him no nearer to us, because He is only found by those who have in heart ascended with Him and by their holy lives consecrate every place. What then was said on Thursday of the believer gazing into heaven after his ascended Lord with longing eyes to pierce the veil, and see more of the place where He is, and to know more of the occupation in which He is employed, needs to be balanced by a consideration of the duty that is owing to this lower world, in which each one's principal business for the present lies; and this world, however much we aspire to reach the higher, does have its claims, which no emotional religion can set aside, no spiritual raptures should allow to be disregarded. But at the outset a man purposing to live after the rule of Christ will find himself in hostile relationship to the world, and he will be, so to say, in an enemy's country. For Jesus Himself is represented in conflict with it from the beginning. His first active temptation is the offer of its glory. The Prince of this World is His great adversary, and the kingdom He sets up is to overcome the world, which in turn hates Him and His disciples also. It cannot receive the Spirit of Truth when He cometh, for it seeth Him not, neither knoweth Him. Each apostle, like the Master himself, takes up the attitude of antagonism. One reminds us that he is crucified to the world and the world to him. Another declares the friendship of the world enmity with God—intercourse with it spiritual adultery. Another addressing his converts as elect, that is, chosen out of the world, terms them strangers and pilgrims; while the disciple who has most of the love and spirit of the Master condemns it in one broad sentence, "The whole world lieth in wickedness." No wonder with such an indictment the Church should declare its hostility and demand of every member a pledge of the same, compelling each one at his admission to say of the world, its pomp and vanities, "I renounce them all."

These severe judgments on the world produced their effect. Understood literally, there seemed no safe method but isolation from it. The converts of Thessalonica in the expectation, perhaps in the hope, of its immediate doom, quitted the business of the world and professed to be looking for Christ's return, though herein they were censured as walking disorderly and not after the true tradition of the apostle. As Christ did not appear as the Restorer of all things, and times got worse, the hermit and the monk sought a retreat in some solitude or desert where no contact with the world could imperil their spiritual life. Church history abounds in stories, some very grotesque, of the attempts men made to escape from the world, but they were not all ridiculous, for this godly jealousy over themselves, this suspicion lest they should be untrue to Him, has seized hold of earnest men and women in all ages, even of those who view religion in most contrary ways; for while the puritan and the quaker, mistaken if you will, but still aiming at a higher life, have lived in the world by protest and marked themselves off from it by distinctness of dress and phraseology, the same idea prevails in the Roman communion, and only a person who has joined an order is called a "religious."

But is this sharp distinction, is this clean avoidance, the true interpretation of the mind of Christ? Can it be, we might argue, in the nature of the case, that God should place us in the world like Tantalus to desire it and not have it? Can it be that He offers a gift such as life is, that we should loathe it and give it back with its possibilities untasted and untried? Is it becoming in a soldier placed on duty to ask at once for his discharge; or in a labourer to demand his pay before he has borne the burden and heat of the day? Or if natural instincts be appealed to, who is there that is healthy in body, and not morbid in mind, that does not in his heart love life and wish to see good days? Or who has ever seen young life abruptly shortened without an inward revolt, a half-uttered reproach of the unkindness of the Heavenly Father? —There is, indeed, an old Grecian story of extreme beauty, in which two youths drew their aged mother, the priestess, to the temple, and when she prayed Heaven to bestow its best gift upon their piety, her prayer was presently answered by their dying that night in their sleep. But where is the mother in these days that would accept at once such a boon as a gift of love, unless endowed with a supernatural gift of resignation and trust? That story is touching evidence of the darkness of the old world in its melancholy view of life, in thinking it better to die than to live; but it must be remembered that Christ had not then lived His human life on earth, and brought out not merely its nobility and its sweetness, but its safety also.

Much of our modern religious teaching favours withdrawal from the world, and even encourages the wish for an early death. In the story books of childhood the little saints are hurried off the scene of this naughty world, content themselves and contenting others if they are saved;—in many of our popular hymns the ruling thought is safety in the arms of Jesus, rest in Paradise; nothing is said of labour, which they must undergo who claim rest, nothing of that conflict with the world, which alone makes it a place of probation. It needs little argument to prove which is the more correct, to pray to live or to pray to die: when Moses, Elijah, and Jonah requested for themselves to die, they erred; and if it still be a doubtful point,—Christ's prayer that the Apostles should be kept in the world for its good and His glory, that they should mix in its society, and yet be free from its contamination through the sanctification of His Spirit, that not yet, not until they had thus been His witnesses, should they come to Him and behold His glory, is conclusive, as it agrees with the feelings of nature and the dictates of reason.

It being then a necessity as well as part of our religion to be in the world, a right adjustment of claims has to be made between the extremes of over much fondness for it and entire neglect of it. This is no easy task, and there is no precise method for resolution of doubts; the art of living well in the world is often long in attainment, and often never reached at all. It is easy on the one hand to be perfectly heedless of the dangers which surround modern society, and to ignore the Baptismal vow in every sense: yet on the other hand to carry out the conscientious belief that all that Christ and the Apostles have said has still its full literal force, and to frame rules of life accordingly, makes life burdensome to ourselves and no small inconvenience to others. What then are we to adopt as a principle? What portion of its pleasure, if any, are we to take, if we go into the world? The first principle of safety I would lay down is the recognition that the world,—for which I might read polite society,—is still full of danger for those who devote themselves to it in earnest. Though we soften the Bible sentences, and allow for a gradual leavening of modern society by the Gospel, yet its tone is distinctly irreligious,—quite removed from the New Testament ideal. God is not in all its thoughts. Christ is not the object of its faith or its love. The Holy Spirit does not dictate its conversation or moderate its fashions. Grant that there is some attention to external religion,—that there is no rampant indecency or vice,—(though fuller acquaintance would reveal much)—the world for the most part in which we have to move is in opposition to God. A recent Indian convert, now a minister of the Church, gave not long ago his impressions of English society in these words at Oxford: "The Hindoo's religion is a reality to him. He lives up to his light, he worships, he performs his devotions many times in the day. But how often does the Christian pray? If he prays morning and evening and goes to Church on Sunday, he thinks he does a great deal. The temples of the Hindoos are always open. He fasts, he gives alms, he practices self-denial. He sees little of this among Christians, nothing but luxury and self-indulgence." The speaker gathered his ideas probably from the Christianity he saw in India, but they would not be more favourable if he drew his sketch from the average Protestant at home of the upper or well-to-do middle class. What is his religion really to him? Is it his consolation? Is he utterly "comfortless" without it, as the Collect, which he will say to-day, represents him to be. Is not his profession often a question of worldly policy? Is it not a civility to his clergyman that he attends his church, subscribes a small sum to the charities, makes reluctantly a speech for a mission, and pities the irreligous lower orders, who are often tenfold nearer to God than he is. Look at a rich man's luxury, and judge by such evident signs "of the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life," whether the love of the Father has any place in his heart. A life passed in eating, drinking, visiting, dressing, flitting from one pleasure to another pleasure,—till pleasure is a surfeit,—such frivolity, vanity, waste, forgetfulness of God,—is it a Christian's life at all? It must have been such lives Christ witnessed,—though their excess could not have equalled our times—when he said "Woe unto you that are rich, for ye have received your consolation;" or such as Laodicea showed in His sight, when neither hot nor cold, neither openly affirming nor positively denying Him, she said, "I am rich and increased with goods and have need of nothing." And yet this is the world, though so manifestly in opposition to God, that we court; this is the society that scarcely ever names the name of God that we affect, and are wholly miserable if we are left out of it. Behaving in this respect like the man of God who came from Judah with a message, religious people allow themselves to be seduced and go into the banquet, although the very world itself will condemn those who relax their strictness and high profession to please it, but will pay enforced respect, like Herod to John, to severe virtue and honest consistency. To give a local colouring to these general strictures seems ungracious, but it is a time when at least the occasion serves, and one of the undoubted evils of the Cambridge world, that should be restrained, is its pleasure in excess, its expensive delights. This is the season of our May gaieties. Year by year we add to them. Serious work for weeks together can hardly be pursued, for the term is spent in arranging programmes for entertainments that make so long a list, that, if we were to dispose of our time amongst them, we could not attend half. There are graver evils in the back ground. Habits of prayer in the family and private devotion are stopped; our chapels are never so badly attended, (except where they are show places); our communions dwindle. Parties carried into the night imperil the sobriety of servants; the wild rush of gaiety sweeping by draws in those of lower rank than our own; the young man of the town and young woman will decline to do their ten or twelve hours' drudgery, when their masters and mistresses are always at play; and they ask with some show of reason why they should not have a share in the dissipation, though it must be bought not seldom at the price of honesty and honour. For of such things as these I speak from actual knowledge. Some of us have these pleasures at an expense we cannot afford; but if we can afford, is it the best expenditure? Are there not nobler objects? There is a model Hospital, the most perfect of such institutions, always straitened for money; there are schools of famous reputation always appealing; there are three churches of brick, where our forefathers would have used stone, that are wanting their bays and towers, and one poor wooden church, like a shanty in the back woods, all unworthy of Cambridge; there are missions, such as to Delhi and Central Africa, with special claims for University support, receiving an income less than what one college spends on cook's and butler's bills this term; less, I believe, than the cost of one of the public balls. There must be curtailment and reform; I believe it would be very welcome to many, both old and young, for many do those things for fear of not doing them, one half of the world being always in slavery to the opinion of the other half; and one step should, I think, be in the direction of keeping it strictly to one week of pleasure when all the examinations are over, and some relaxation might be legitimately claimed.

I have been using greater boldness in speaking of this excess of amusement and expenditure, because one of our body, himself a famous athlete, has ventured to deal with it as a growing evil in our public schools: but what applies to the sports of a school will also apply to the pastimes of a University. His paper, written for a public review, regarded the matter as a moral and a social question;—I may raise it to the higher platform of Christian concern.

Before I pass from this, I make another remark upon the character of amusements themselves, for it is always being asked, "what may we go to, what must we not? Are there not some that draw the converted? are there not others that affix the stamp of the wordly and unconverted upon those who frequent them?" I care not to make nice distinctions. I know no place that may not be the world, where you can bar the entry of Satan: I know few places that may not be safe and pure to those who will be pure. We may charitably believe of many pleasure seekers that they are not feasting themselves but others; that they are making concessions to the young, that they do not think it worth while to be singular, where no great principle of truth is at stake, that they dread to be censorious or pharasaical and count such sins as worse than frivolity or vanity.

Some are never contaminated; they pass through the fire without being burnt, like the holy children in the furnace. One such case I select. It is of Mrs. Godolphin at the Court of Charles II., whose saintly life has been written by her friend, John Evelyn, and there is a scene when she was a Maid of Honour about the age of 16 or 17. She is acting in a comedy. "Amidst all this splendid folly, while the rest were acting, and her part was sometimes to go off, as the scenes required, into the retiring room, where several ladies, her companions, were railing with the gallants (triflingly enough) till they were called to re-enter, she under pretence of conning her next part was retired into a corner, reading her book of devotion, without at all concerning herself or mingling with the young company; as if she had no further part to act, who was the principal person of the comedy, nor this with the least discernible affectation, but to divert and take off her thoughts from the present vanity which her soul abhorred." Now here we have found the test, as it seems to me, and when asked the question, what amusements we may safely frequent and what we must avoid; to this I answer, that if in the midst of any game, party, ball, theatre, or such like diversion, we could silently name to ourselves the name of Jesus and think for an instant or two upon Him; if after it is over we can retire to our prayers calmly and collectedly, then indeed each feast is a sacrifice, each amusement is an act of religion, for of all the rules of conduct, and I have read many books to find them, I know none so comprehensive, so perfect, in its simplicity as this one, "Do all in the name of the Lord Jesus." Col. iii., 17.

But as no preacher, who has undertaken to speak freely of the evils which surround a University life, could fail to denounce its undue love of pleasure, so in fairness he would have to name a contrary danger that besets a select few, if indeed it is only the fault of a few; I mean its undue glorification of intellect, the exaggerated belief in mere culture as a power to regenerate the human soul, and purify the life. It is no new phenomenon to find that where this world's wisdom has been made an absorbing pursuit, and what is called an enlarged view of things obtained, it has been at the sacrifice of faith in a revelation, and as this is a form of gaining the world and losing the soul, I cannot pass it over, though for a moment one may seem to disparage the studies of the place. Far be it from me, however, to be guilty of any narrow impertinence such as it would be if I used this pulpit to denounce freedom of thought or courage in research, for a place of learning has its very existence in their encouragement, and the intelligent believer knows how to lay all their results under contribution to adorn and amplify the Faith. The Caliph burnt the Alexandrian library because the books did not all contain the Name of God;—but we, better instructed, can read that Name in all secular knowledge, and are sure that by expelling from the world its literary, scientific, or art treasures, we should make it a very wilderness, and deprive human life of its chief employment and solace, to the great detriment of religion. But yet there is a danger that with an ever broadening view of the philosophies and religions which men investigate, they should become enamoured of them, and from the toleration of them become their patrons and professors. Take a typical case. Solomon, removed as some would say from the narrow range of Jewish learning and religion, seeking in his own words to "intermeddle with all wisdom," not merely by the affinity of marriage, but by sympathy of culture, gained a great extension of mind and opinion. This latitudinarianism first tolerated the false system, and then embraced them; for though he did not dare to displace Jehovah, he made Him whose Fame is jealous share the honours of a temple with Milcom, and Chemosh, and other deities rightly called "abominations;"— doubtless recognising himself the wonder-working powers of nature where the common people saw and practised the rites of a filthy worship. It was no justification to him that he saw further than they; and thus the wisest of the Jewish kings, led astray less by lust than by wisdom, prepared the disruption of the kingdom and the downfall of the house of David. Is it not an approach to the same apostacy, and has it not the same tendency, to lower morality (for whatever does relax the paramount claim of the Bible Revelation, must in time weaken the duty of men to the one true God, and the one Lord Jesus) if our wise men of modern times view all religions impartially and welcome false systems as parts of and helps to the science of religion, and coordinate them with Christianity? It is little indeed that they give her the first place, for it is a place in a class to which she will not consent to belong and it is no honour to Jesus that he should be invited to occupy a Pantheon where Buddha, Mahomet, Confucius, and Plato, have their pedestals; and His Apostles and prophets, inspired by the One Holy Spirit, proceeding from the Father and the Son, disdain a rank with poets and philosophers, ancient or modern, Greek or German, who never knew or perhaps rejected deliberately that Spirit. This sympathy with unbelief or misbelief might be formulated as varying inversely with loyalty to Christ. If the profession of a strict orthodoxy be in contempt amongst the learned, and a sign that you are in intellectual bondage by reason of your holding so strictly the Catholic faith, for my part I only see in this contempt that the offence of the Cross has not ceased, and that we have still to bear Christ's reproach. Let us still hold the creeds, "those rails," as Professor Blunt calls them, and though we shall often be told that there "lives more faith in honest doubt," that need not disturb us, for happily it is not the saying of inspiration. The model apostle is not St. Thomas;— his doubting was reproved; and not until his plain confession of honest belief, "My Lord and My God" shewed he had renounced the doubter's part, had he the blessing which was forfeited by "Except I see, I will not believe." Our danger nowadays is not intolerance; indeed I doubt whether persecution could find its victims, so slack and feeble are the convictions of men, but it lies in excess of toleration, in the patronage of the sceptical state, in the admiration for it. For we treat it with every courteous concession, allow it to be the sign of a higher moral nature, a clearer insight, a keener sensibility. I doubt whether active unbelief is spreading here, but I am certainly of opinion that the assertion of Christianity is weaker than it was, as if somehow after eighteen centuries it had become less true and obligatory than when men sealed their faith in its truth with their blood, and as if there was less need for an earnest contention for it now. But, my friends in Christ, old or young, there are still some things we hold in possession for ourselves and in trust for others that we must never let go. One is the distinct Christian character of this place, as a place not only of sound learning, but of religious education and definite belief. Dread the results if ever it should be otherwise. Have no hand in erasing the name of God from the College statutes or in stopping the Chapel services, or in proclaiming neutrality in religion; for you cannot live without a profession of faith, still less can you die. Whatever the feelings or motives may be of those who promote such schemes, oppose them, for they would be destructive of all our good;—they would reduce the University to a mere Book-City, such as there was among the old Canaanites, Kirjath Sepher by name, the site as some suppose of the oldest University town—but it came under Joshua's commission to destroy it utterly for the abominations which its learning and higher civilisation could not hold in check.

But I have travelled from my purpose. I accepted the office of preacher to-day, and dared to confront the "awful auditory," as Fuller calls the University Church, well knowing that I had none of the claims of the great divines and orators that have gone before me in it, but could simply make my contribution as a resident Tutor and speak out of a practical experience of the helps and hindrances that each member of our body receives here in his religious life. My principal thought is this, how vast an influence we senior members may have over the younger, in raising their tone: how truly we are set for the rise or fall of many. May I then with every apology address the older members first, and specially those who have a like heavy charge with myself. Only you that have borne this charge know what it is, but only you know its surpassing interest and reward. Our fault is reticence; not want of sympathy with our pupils, but the ready expression of it. Partly from shyness, partly from that dread of criticism—which we ourselves too much indulge towards others,—we choose to be ignorant of what is passing in the recesses of those young hearts, which we might help in their struggles, if we would be the first to break through our reserve. Yet no one, I think, has ever seized the opportunity and has regretted when he has cast off the Don, and by some slight alteration of tone and manner has established a confidence, and as a father with his son, or as an elder brother with a younger, has opened his heart to speak and to hear of things that are closest to it, for we never shew this loving confidence without receiving manifold more in return.

Times come to us afterwards when we wish we had done this. A year ago this Church was the scene of a very pathetic leave-taking when the Bishop of Durham addressed from this pulpit, not only the younger members of our body, but the graduates and his equals in age, and that which I remembered and applied most was the expression of regret that as Fellow and Tutor of the largest and most influential college he had not spoken more freely, and was not more accessible. You will gladly hear his words again. "I dwell with a sad regret on the great opportunities which this place affords, of influence for good, opportunities neglected at the time, only because they were not realised. How little would it have cost to overcome the indolence and shake off the reserve, to express the sympathy which was felt, and to put in words the deeper thoughts which seethed in the heart, but never rose to the lips: the value which younger men attach to such sympathy is altogether unsuspected at the time." Alas, such opportunities, when we have had any great chance given us by God, are afterwards brought home to us in vivid ways that shew us our responsibility in using them. It may happen to you—my sad experience is scarcely more than a week old—to lose one of these boys, for it is the privilege of middle life to call them sons—and indeed we have no sons besides these—and then amidst the afflicting grief, that wrings the heart, as you gaze on the dead form to which you vainly wish you could speak once more, or take your last look and kneel by the open coffin, you will call to mind the past in thoughts like these, and say—"Did I do all for him, while I had him." "What did I say at the end of last term, when he went down, or at the beginning of this, when he came up, or at my last interview when I sent for him?" "How much more I would have said, if I had forseen this would be the last." Thank God, I could recall such words as these: "I am so glad I can speak to you as a religious man;" for so in truth he was. Or there will be occasion for closer self-questioning and perhaps greater self-reproach, when we sit as judges on some one's misconduct, and by an act of necessary sternness are banishing him from our society, who has proved unworthy to remain in it. Our hearts may then remind us that we saw him slipping away from virtue, and made no remonstrance; that he came to us with principles unsteady and wavering, not fixedly bad, but finding the spirit of the place against him, and unsupported by any help from the right quarter, forsook all outward aids of religion, the Chapel and the Table of the Lord; and then associating with the least worthy members of the community came under open condemnation. Or again it may be something even worse than a temporary moral failure, when the whole faith of the man is shipwrecked. And for this how are we not responsible, if it never could be gathered from our own conversation that we believed in Christ; whose name was never in our lips, and whose service was rendered evidently as a matter of daily routine and constraint rather than of free and full belief? Our scholars, believe me, will not resent it as interference if we care for them in other ways than pushing them into high places in an examination, and the reflex benefit to ourselves is incalculable. In dealing with so great a variety of men, taught in so many schools of thought, we shall have to encounter extravagance in religion in one direction or another that may be distasteful to us, for young people's zeal outruns their knowledge; but be it far from us to sneer at it, or crush it if it be real. Let us rather deal tenderly with each case—with this one whose obvious bent is to fanaticism and superstition, or with that one, whose piety is too effusive,—for at least each state is better than indifference, and most of us in middle life may regretfully desire that our own zeal was less philosophically calm, and may see in these young earnest souls a picture of a time when in an unreasoning ardour we served God more warmly than now. Or we shall have to deal with men, who either conceal their religion, or have it not; and though these sometimes are the most attractive, the most manly, the most free from convention and cant; yet as we love them, we must seek occasion, which seldom will fail to come if watched for, when, with open face, we may tell them that true godliness is the crown of every perfect life, and that though we behold them and love them as the Saviour does, so we will not refrain from expressing our solicitude in His own words:—"One thing thou lackest." And in season and out of season we have vehemently to contend against that wordly doctrine of success as the aim and end in life, and correct its fallacy by assuring our students that some things besides those that pay are worth acquiring, that a success or failure cannot be measured by what it immediately brings or fails to bring, that a success early achieved, in which a man rests and takes licence to work no more and to look scornfully on all who have fallen behind it, is a fatal achievement, by no means to be envied or copied; while what is thought at the time a failure often turns out the truest gain, because on a foundation of humility, the only foundation on which solid success will rest, there is raised up an after-work of patient labour and enduring worth, that stands through this life and far beyond into all time.

To those of the gallery I may offer advice with less apology, for my life for ten years has been one of concentrated attention to the things which concern an undergraduate's life, and my heart is enlarged in appealing to them.

The world is before you now in all its seductiveness. You are looking at it with eager interest as it wears the aspect that may best beguile you to become its votary—whether it shall be a play ground for your feats of strength,—a platform for the display of your gifts of intellect,—a school of art for sensuous delight,—or a paradise of love and effeminate ease. The feast looks rich; like a child among baubles you know not what to choose, and are little thinking that whatever the determination of these early years will be, not your present life, but your eternal, will be fixed by it. Amidst all these things that allure, a voice speaks that you must hear, "Lovest thou Me, lovest thou Me more than these?" more than these nets of entanglement, in which if your soul be once caught it may never escape. It is the voice of your Lord, who claims to speak to you, as one that has tried the world, and though offered all its pomp and glory by free choice forsook it, that the choice might be easier to you; and He draws you by the cords of a man to side with Himself. But He makes no disguises,—"Not as the world giveth give I unto you," is the same rule of bestowal as it was 1800 years ago. If you would follow Christ you must be well persuaded that it involves the refusal of many pleasures, profits, ambitious schemes, which by devoting yourself to the world you could have and enjoy; and, even in things lawful, for His sake you will have to restrain your liberty. It may not be while here that you will have to carry into action in any marked manner your decisions of self-denial, or to do any great thing for Him; here you will be forming the principles and making your present work a preparation for after life. And as there is no such preparation as a strenuous purpose to do whatever duty lies before you, I urge you to be one of the genuine workers here, such as do exist; so that before you leave, whether with honours or without, you will have learnt the art of doing things punctually, persistently and accurately; for this is a real Cambridge education, that carries its priceless value everywhere. I will presume, then, you are doing your ordinary work so conscientiously that no one can speak a word of reproach, and that on no pretence of a call to more Christian or higher work are you neglecting duty. What next your work will be will be shown you, if while you say "Lord I will follow thee," you add, "What wilt thou have me to do"? Then wherever He leads you must go; though the world that you will forsake will be probably different for each of you. Moses, for instance, was called in leaving Egypt to abandon a king's court and a high-class literary society in order to be leader of a band of degraded slaves, and bear their manners in the desert; while Elisha on the contrary in his decision to serve God was called out of a country village, whose significant name Abel Meholah, "the meadow of the dance," bespeaks humble joys and modest employments, to stand before kings,—yet in leaving these he was equally forsaking the world. To these Old Testament illustrations from the prophets I add two from the New Testament of those called to be apostles. St. Matthew's world was the gainful business, but St. Paul's world was the leadership of a religious sect; the wrench being in each case from what each loved best and clung to most. These varying examples I quote to shew that when with growing seriousness, such as becomes advancing years, you give up play and put away childish things for Christ, He may ask still more and more of you, and whether it be a literary occupation that enchains you, a country living that awaits you, a lucrative partnership, or attachment to a party, you must be willing to surrender it for Him. A solitary, selfish conversion will not suffice. You are not doing enough for Christ, if you merely shun the world: rather you must go into it, pass as one of it, ("for the Lord knoweth them that are His,") possibly be much occupied in it, yet without imbibing its spirit. It will come to be attractive to you in a sense that you would not expect until you approached it with the deeper insight into Christ's purposes concerning it; for it is His Creation; He is the Light of it and you a light-bearer; He has loved it and redeemed it to reconsecrate it to Himself, and you who know it are to proclaim that love, that ministry of reconciliation. As a good physician never shrinks from the sight of an ulcerating sore, because he brings relief or remedy to it; so the darkest parts of the earth may be approached by any one who comes to shew Christ's mercy to them with all cheerfulness. And as Christ came not to condemn the world, but to save the world, so you must not scold it or judge it, but do what you can to improve it. Its faults, open or hidden, are so many wounds for you to dress, so many irregularities for you to amend. Upon its insincerity and falseness you will bring to bear God's truth, which you have learnt to speak and act without swerving from it, and this truth you will be always ready to speak in love. Upon its licence you will bring to bear your trained self-control; who so good as you to shew an example of discipline, who have so wisely been subjected to it here? Upon its rudeness and repelling hardness you will bring your refinement of speech and manner; who so fitted as you, who are born as you pride yourself a gentleman and have had only for daily companions the picked examples of English manhood? Upon its unamiable, unornamented life, as the life of the masses is, you will bring the contact of your culture; who so good as you who have passed three years and more in the most highly cultivated society in the world? Upon its discontent and despair and secularism you can come down with your bright hopes of Heaven, and clear knowledge of the way; who could do it so well as one, who has been from childhood imbued with religious faith and has been brought near to God, and tasted of the heavenly gift and powers of the world to come?

This is work that is inviting for its own sake, and though laborious and at times painful, it will still be overflowing with pleasure and thankfulness to God. It is made easier by joining with others,—(this you have already learnt in your religious partnerships, your Jesus Lane School, your Church Society, your District Visiting Society, your Guilds), and the toilers with you will not be of one profession, nor of one sex, nor of one denomination, for we must try and join hands with all that name Christ and are looking for His appearing. It will be made easier, as I said on Thursday, by knowing that He is looking on, and whatever we do is done in His sight. The youthful prince fought the more bravely at Crecy, because the king, his father, did not appear in person on the field, but upon the hill watched the battle, and not unkindly left him to win his spurs and overcome, as he himself overcame. And the recollection that He is very near, and will not suffer us to be overstrained is an incentive to prove ourselves men and be strong. One source of weakness I just glance at to dispose of by a word, the thought that you are disqualified, because of some sin or weakness of your own still remaining, which suggests that it is hypocrisy for you to set yourself up above the world to correct it. Perhaps you own you are a man of unclean lips, and dwell with a people of unclean lips, that you once talked the world's talk, led the world's life, and have not yet stripped off your worldliness. But you are not disqualified if now your soul no longer cleaves to the dust, and has broken the cords that once tied it to the earth,—the small profits, the small pleasures, the small aims, the small applauses of petty-minded men and women,—and has taken its flight to where Jesus sits at the right hand of God, and has drawn its lofty aspirations from Him. Now converted, you are a fit apostle to strengthen your brethren.

This is a programme for life, and very worthy of it. If you hesitate to adopt it, consider how near is the next world,—verily not a step between you and it,—and with its nearness its vastness will appear and quite absorb you with its importance, and make you quick in being about your Father's business. You will ask Him no doubt to give you time to carry it out, to prolong your days until you have fulfilled your part—until you have requited the care of loving parents, and given them back something for their love—until you have proved yourself worthy of the college and school which sent you forth to your field of labour and trained you for it—until you have done some good in the Church or commonwealth which stand in need of every saint, of every good citizen; until finally you have shewn that the life of Jesus in you was not in word only, but in deed and in truth,—and you will not ask amiss. But I do not promise that you will have literally all that you ask; but you shall have your petition notwithstanding; for there is a seed of immortality in that life, and it shall never die. Your time of work is in God's hand; it may be very short, and yet your reward will be long. For "he asked life of Thee and Thou gavest it him: even length of days for ever and ever."—Psalm xxi. 4.

PROFESSOR PALMER ON THE KORAN.

On Wednesday, May 5th, Professor Palmer, the Lord Almoner's Professor of Arabic, delivered a lecture on the Koran, in the large room at the Divinity Schools. The chair was taken by the Regius Professor of Divinity. About 200 undergraduates were present. Prayer having been offered by the Rev. A. F. Kirkpatrick, the chairman briefly introduced the Lecturer. We are able to give the following summary of the lecture, which of course has lost much of its force and eloquence in process of condensation.

PROFESSOR PALMER: There is an old maxim which tells us that soldiers should not despise the enemy's forces; in like manner missionaries, the soldiers of the Church Militant, should learn something of the Faith of Islam, contained in the Koran, the book of the Prophet of Arabic. Sabaeanism, the early Arabian religion, which came from Chaldaea, had in the time of Mohammed become overlaid with a multitude of meaningless ceremonies; and the Kaaba, or shrine of Mecca was now filled with 365 idols. Among them was the Stone of Paradise, originally white, but now blackened by the kisses of its worshippers. How was it that a citizen of an obscure town succeeded in establishing a new religion in the face of this deeply-rooted superstition? The secret of Mohammed's success was enthusiasm combined with patriotism. He believed in himself as working for the good of his countrymen. He was determined to stop internecine wars and to promote national unity by common religious feelings, or rather by common customs and common superstitions; which he found ready to hand—especially such institutions as the great fairs held periodically at Mecca. Mohammed's great work was centralisation. Many Arabian Prophets like "the Veiled Prophet of Khorassan" failed, because they missed these opportunities which were seized by Mohammed. His success must not therefore be set down to imposture or enthusiasm alone. The early portion of the Koran is the work of an enthusiast; while the later chapters bear the impress of pious frauds, introduced in order to prove the truth of the earlier message. At first Mohammed turned to the Jews and appealed to the Jewish Scriptures; but, disappointed in this, he afterwards treated them with the utmost rigour. Throughout his later career he cared nought for either Jews or Christians—calling himself by a title, which signifies either "Illiterate Prophet" or "Prophet of the Gentiles." Yet in spite of this we find Jewish and Christian legends, current in Arabia, as well as the old folk lore of Persian tales, and the oral traditions of the Arabs, incorporated in the Koran. Mohammed told them afresh with additional particulars; and appealed to their presence in the Koran as evidence of its divine origin. Further the Koran refers to the prophecies of the Old Testament, and even to the promise of the Paraclete as testimony to the truth of Mohammed's mission. This he accomplished by altering παράκλητος into περικλυτός which represents the etymology of the name "Mohammed."

The key-word of Mohammedanism is THERE IS NO GOD BUT GOD. This cry appeared to the conservative idolaters of Mecca radical and revolutionary; which accounts for the fact that, during the first three years of his mission, Mohammed made only 14 converts. But a message so grand, so simple, and so true could not but captivate the minds of men. It would appear to the Arabs more spiritual than the Judaism and Christianity of the time. Besides which it harmonised with the Semitic belief in a Messiah—a belief, we must remember, not confined to Israel. Its central truth was nothing new, but merely, as Mohammed said, "The Faith of Abraham." The great difference between Mohammedanism and Judaism lies in this; that the former is non-exclusive and proselytising; the Arab propagates his creed THERE IS NO GOD BUT GOD. If men will not accept it, they must be forced to do so. But it may be asked; why did not Mohammed take Judaism or Christianity as his basis, instead of founding a new religion? To this it may be answered that Judaism in his day was effete and overgrown with Rabbinism; while Christianity was corrupt, being split up into numerous sects such as the Homöousians, Homoiousians, &c. To the Arabs the Trinity meant a Tritheism, consisting of God, the Virgin Mother and the Son. It is true that Mohammed speaks of Christ as "The Spirit and Word of God" and "The Apostle of God." But he looks at his own religion as a further fulfilment of Christianity. The Koran, though displaying many contradictions, yet possesses in itself a certain unity—Mohammed having ever before his mind a fixed idea of God. By virtue of his Prophetic office he could decree rites and ceremonies—e.g. prayer and fasting; but he could not abolish the pilgrimages to Mecca, so burdensome to the Mohammedans of to-day, but then so necessary for national unity. At Mecca he found a shrine—the one thing the Arabs had in common—cleared it of idols and dedicated it to the service of God. His religion was striking, new and original, setting forward the worship of God, formerly obscured by fetishism. The only miracle to which he laid claim was the incomparable eloquence of the Koran. His famous challenge to his hearers:—"Then bring a chapter like it," &c., evidently refers rather to the subject than to the style of his message.

The word KORAN means "a reading." Each chapter is called a SURA, which signifies "a course of bricks," doubtless referring to the elaborate system of rhyming, which is a characteristic of the Arab language. Every "sura" has prefixed to it the words MECCA or MEDINA, according to the place at which it was revealed. The Koran thus naturally falls into two divisions: (1) those chapters delivered at Mecca, which describe the development of the Prophetic office: (2) those delivered at Medina, which relate Mohammed's career as a leader and reformer. The chapters of the first period consist mostly of stirring appeals to the feelings. He calls nature to bear witness to the presence of God. Again he cries:

"There is one God alone—
God the Eternal;
He begetteth not neither is begotten,
And there is none like unto him."

Or he lays stress on the happiness in store for the good and the everlasting torments of the wicked. The language is curt, grand and almost sublime; but sometimes dim and confused, showing the mental excitement of the speaker. It should be noticed that towards the end of the Meccan period Mohammed called God by a new name—"The Merciful." But, seeing that his followers supposed thereby that they were to worship two Gods, he returned to the name "Allah." The portions of the Koran promulgated at Medina relate to the time when Mohammed had become a military leader and Prince. His followers now consisted of three classes; (a) the original believers of the tribe of Kuraish; (b) the inhabitants of cities, who joined him later, and (c) a large mass called in the Koran, "The Hypocrites," who went over to the Prophet through fear. To these the second part of the Koran is addressed. One of the greatest blots in the whole system is the degradation of women. Mohammed ameliorated their condition, it is true; but, accepting as he did the prevailing beliefs of the time, he did not go far enough in this direction. Then, again, he improved the condition of slaves, but never dreamed of slavery being wrong.

Critics and lexicographers have regarded the Koran as the standard of style for the literature of Arabia. But, from an unbiassed point of view, its style would seem to be that of an Arab of the Desert, possessing no literary culture, but only the rude, fierce eloquence of every-day life. Its only rhetorical ornament is rhyming—a necessary outcome of the old Arab tongue. Mohammed always speaks with a living voice. We can picture his attitude, when, after some story or glorious promise, he cries:—"These are true stories: there is no god but God; and yet they turn away." The Koran, when divested of its native eloquence, is doubtless dull; and its teaching far inferior to that of Christianity. Yet we should recognise Mohammedanism as a religion well adapted to the requirements of Eastern peoples. Let us teach Christian virtues out of Mohammedanism. Let us preach Christ by all means, but let us not forget the true basis of Christianity.

PROFESSOR WESTCOTT proposed a vote of thanks to Professor Palmer for his admirable lecture on a religion, iron in its faith, iron in its ritual, and iron in its social development: a religion of intense importance to Englishmen, especially after the news lately received of the great spread of Islam in India and China. He heartily thanked Professor Palmer on behalf of the CAMBRIDGE MISSION AID ASSOCIATION for having given information especially valuable to intending Missionaries. The vote of thanks was carried by acclamation.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

About 200 members of the University were entertained at the annual breakfast given in connection with the University branch of this Society.

The chair was taken by the Bishop of Mauritius, and among those present were: Revs. E. H. Perowne, J. Sharpe, A. W. W. Steel, R. B. Somerset, W. Emery, J. T. Lang, A. W. Streane, R. Appleton, A. F. Kirkpatrick, J. Barton, H. Trotter, J. Martin, A. P. Woodhouse, W. T. Stores, W. H. K. Soames, J. I. Routh, C. W. Moule, Esq., J. Hough, Esq., F. C. Marshall, Esq., and others.

The Rev. A. W. W. Steel was glad to announce that the contributions from the University had increased during the past year, but thought that the older society had larger claims on men's liberality than many newer kindred societies. Collectors were wanted for King's and Downing Colleges.

The Rev. Arthur E. Moule, (Chinese Missionary), read and expounded 2 Thess. iii. 1—10, and gave a very interesting account of his experience in China and of the way in which it had been opened up to Missionary enterprise. He mentioned the voluntary evidence of many Chinese to the excellence of Christianity, and alluded to the baneful effects of the opium trade.

The proceedings terminated with prayer by the Bishop.

COMPULSORY GREEK.

DISCUSSION IN THE ARTS SCHOOLS.

Last week's Reporter contained a very important discussion on the Report of the Syndicate on the above subject, an account of which we recently gave.

The Master of Trinity, on being called upon by the Vice-Chancellor to open the discussion, deprecated the remission of Greek except in the case of sincere students of Natural Science and Mathematics, a concession which even German Universities grant. He did not consider the average schoolboy a real student: but even his backwardness was owing to the faulty system of education in our schools.

Professor Skeat advanced the claims of English as more profitable than either French or German.

Mr. Freeman maintained that Translation only without composition was not sufficient.

Mr. Jackson sketched the growth of the report historically. He pointed out the high authority on which the Memorials rested, including that of several headmasters. The Syndicate had come to the conclusion that the case for the Remission of Greek was made out for Honour men, but not for Pass men. Part II of the Report was a sieve to sift the Honour men. Personally he would have Greek remitted even in the case of Pass men. "The Pass man learned some bad English, and learned to know by sight the Greek to which it belonged, and he learned no more."

Mr. Vansittart sided with Dr. Thompson, but would confine the concession to first-class men: he preferred English to either French or German, to "relieve Cambridge from the disgrace of having no English Tripos."

Dr. Pearson defended Greek as the best test of intellectual power in the department of literature. He quoted Holinshed's remark "no Greek no grace."

Mr. Stoddart pointed out the importance of Greek for taking Orders.

Mr. Stanton drew attention to the great disturbance the extension of the remission to Poll men would cause in our schools. Natural Science men would find French and German useful for their subject.

Mr. Browning would rather see English an essential than alternative subject. He considered the relief given by the Report sufficient. The question of French and German or French or German was very important.

Mr. H. M. Taylor would have the questions put in the following order. (1) Remission of Greek generally. (2) Restriction of the Remission to Honour men. (3) The French and German question. His personal experience was that the amount of Greek required was useless.

The Vice-Chancellor could not sign the Report. He pointed to the adverse evidence of a number of Headmasters, and observed that an Honour man ought to have sufficient mental calibre to get up the amount of Greek required. He thought that the country generally was in danger of looking on education as a means of making money, and they must not forget that it was not for Head-Masters to say to the University "we are forced to do so, and so you will have to meet our requirements;" it was for the University, being free from the pressure the Masters felt, to decide calmly what was best, and to expect the schools to acquiesce.

Mr. Verrall objected to I. (4) viz., the substitution of a Divinity Question Paper for the Greek Testament. On the general question he had no fear of the proposal of the Syndicate, and only hoped that it might go far enough. The claims of Greek on the attention of students would always be sufficiently great.

Mr. Latham felt generally with the Vice-Chancellor; he wholly disagreed with the previous speaker as to the result of the proposed change. Oxford would retain Greek, which would tend to produce a class distinction between the educational systems of the two Universities. As regards the substitution of French and German the amount required would be just as useless as the Greek.

Mr. Hill disapproved of Part II.: he would leave the Honour and Pass men to discriminate themselves.

Mr. Jackson replied that it would make the Examiners too lenient in the case of men near the line.

Mr. Heitland joined Mr. Verrall in his objection to I (4). He considered the Greek required of Pass men of some value: as to the possibility of finding a substitute of greater value he could not express an opinion.

Mr. Campbell would add to II. (2) Logic and Moral Science for the benefit of the Law, History, and Moral Science Triposes.

Mr. Jackson pointed out that the candidates for these Triposes had not been studying their special subjects at school, and therefore could take up one of the other subjects mentioned in II. (2.)

Mr. S. Taylor would have Greek remitted in all cases.

Mr. Trotter would like the remission extended to all, but would accept the report as a compromise. Honour men who were at present kept away by Greek were much more important than any Poll men who were kept away. There were he believed, a considerable number of men of intellectual taste who were now kept away from the University. He considered II. (2) cumbrous, and would leave the discrimination to the Tripos Examiners as at present.

Mr. Archer Hind objected to the Tripos Examiners being made machines for helping Poll men to degrees. He too protested against the preposterous Question Paper in I (4).

Mr. Jackson would prefer a paper in the Vulgate to I (4).

After some further conversation the discussion ended.

GIRTON COLLEGE.

The following statement has been sent by the executive committee of Girton College to the Vice-Chancellor, to be laid before the council of the senate of the University of Cambridge :—The executive committee of Girton College, having being informed that a memorial, in the promotion of which the college has taken no part, has been presented to the vice-chancellor, specially referring to this college in connection with a prayer for the admission of women to degrees, beg leave to lay before the council a brief statement as to the present position of the college in regard to the question thus raised. The committee desire to remind the council that in November, 1870, a year after the opening of this college, the committee, being desirous of testing the applicability of the Cambridge B.A. degree examinations to the education of women, applied to the council for permission to make use of the papers to be issued for the then approaching previous examination, and to make a private arrangement with the examiners for looking over and reporting upon the answers, and for conducting the vivâ voce part of the examination. A reply was received to the effect that the council did not consider it within their province to give such permission, but that they did not disapprove of such a private arrangement being made with the examiners, if practicable. The committee thereupon communicated with the examiners, and an examination was held, in strict conformity with university regulations and reported upon according to the university standard. Two years later students of the college were similarly examined for the mathematical and classical triposes. An informal system of degree examinations having thus been initiated, it has been carried on by the friendly co-operation of members of the senate, for nearly ten years. Up to the present date seventy-eight students have in this manner passed the previous examination, and sixty-one in the additional subjects; thirteen have passed in the general and ten in one or other of the special examination for the ordinary degree. Of the triposes eleven students have passed in classics, nine in mathematics, seven in natural science, three in moral science, and one in history. In all cases the candidates for honours have been ascertained to be duly qualified in point of standing, and as having passed the previous examination according to the rules prescribed for it, and similar care has been taken to secure the observance of university regulations by the candidates for the several examinations for the ordinary degree. Forty-one students thus substantially qualified for the B.A. degree have received from the college degree certificates, and fifty-three others, now resident in the college, are studying with the same object in view. The committee submit that by this experiment the practical working of degree examinations as regards students of Girton College, has been sufficiently tested to justify the University in taking their case into serious consideration, with a view to their formal admission to the B.A. degree. The committee wish to point out that the certificate given by the college, though to a great extent recognised as substantially equivalent to a degree, can only be regarded as a temporary resource. It lacks the official sanction of the University; it confers no title such as can be conveniently used to indicate the holder's real position; and it fails to constitute a formal qualification for educational work. The committee desire to state further, that in case the University should see fit to make provision for the admission of properly qualified women to the B.A. degree, they will be prepared to offer all such guarantees as may be deemed expedient for the maintenance of the government and administration of Girton College in such a manner as to justify its recognition by the University as a fit place of residence and instruction for female undergraduates. They believe that by thus formally and officially recognising the claims of women to a share in the highest education of the time, the University would do an important public service and would add to the gratitude and loyalty already so largely called forth by former measures in the same direction.

CRICKET.

THE FIRST TWELVE AND THE NEXT SIXTEEN.

This match was commenced on Thursday May 6th, and continued during the two following days. The weather was fine throughout, but there was a very cold wind blowing from the North East during the whole of Friday. The match was chiefly remarkable for the meagre score made by the twelve in their first innings, and for the contrast they showed in batting in their second.

The sixteen may think themselves lucky to have disposed of such strong batsmen as composed the twelve for the small total of 86. They suffered, too, the misfortune of losing two of their few bowlers (Henery and Ostrehan): still all credit is due to Gaddum and Spencer for their performance in the first innings and to the former again for the plucky manner in which he kept up the bowling at his end during the long time when no wickets fell.

The Sixteen won the toss and sent in Barrett and Christian to the bowling of Steel and Pereira (pavilion end). The play was very steady at first; the ground being rough and bumpy made Pereira rather dangerous. Roe was very unlucky in being magnificently caught at long leg by Bligh off a good hit. The fieldsman had to run back some way and only could reach the ball with one hand. Foley played carefully and made three good cuts off Pereira. He made 21 and Capron, who followed soon after, 19, including a splendid drive to the Pavilion which was worth quite six or seven. Nothing remarkable characterised the play, till the younger Ford came in. He began hitting about in the family manner and, though he was once missed in the long field off his brother, his innings was fairly good. He carried out his bat for 44 and it was chiefly his innings that made the total 167.

The best bowlers were Studd (the younger) who took six wickets and Ford who took five. Wilson was very straight but not exactly difficult, while the captain seemed somewhat stiff and did not manage to secure a single victim.

The Twelve on proceeding to bat performed very tamely. Gaddum had a nasty wind behind him and with a rough wicket to help him, he proved very difficult. No one was at all at home except Steel, who played with great confidence, and did his utmost, though without success, to save his side following on; 86 runs were all that the Twelve could muster. However in their second innings Bligh and Whitfeld, who went first to the wickets, put a very different aspect on the state of affairs. They both thoroughly mastered the bowling and before the first (Whitfeld) retired, they had made more than 150—Whitfeld played very steadily throughout, and made his runs faster than is his usual custom. Steel was this time unsuccessful; but C. T. Studd stayed with Bligh until the latter had compiled the fine score of 124: he only gave one actual chance, and that was in the long field, and when he had made about 80; he hit extremely hard and made some very clean drives. A better innings, we should think, has seldom been seen on the University Ground; it was made too, with sixteen men in the field. The younger Studd made 21 and the elder 28, both good innings:

the latter player was unusually steady, and his hitting very clean and well timed. At the close of the innings Napier hit well, making no less than five fours in his 25 runs. The innings closed on Saturday morning for the large total of 319, leaving the other side 238 to win.

Gaddum again bowled well, taking five wickets; Spencer this time only secured one: he was very straight, but at the same time very short and consequently, though he bowled a number of maidens, he did not prove difficult.

On Saturday morning the Sixteen with over 200 to make to win, commenced their second innings with the same batsmen as before. Barrett was well caught at long leg, but Foley and Roe made a long stand, and between them put on 50 runs. The former made 25 and the latter batted, very well for 44. Spencer also played good cricket for his score of 21. Only small scores were made during the rest of the innings, Steel having got well on to the wicket and proving very difficult. The Sixteen's innings closed for 197, leaving them in a minority of 41. Thus contrary to general expectation after the first innings of the Twelve, victory rested with them after a very good match.

A JOURNAL OF UNIVERSITY LIFE AND THOUGHT.

No. 22.] WEDNESDAY, MAY 19, 1880. [PRICE SIXPENCE.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

Mr. R. C. Jebb, late Fellow of Trinity College, now Professor of Greek in Glasgow University, is delivering during this month a course of lectures on the Œdipus Rex of Sophocles, in the hall of New College, Oxford. Prof. Jebb has been engaged for some time upon an edition of Sophocles.

We regret to announce the death of Sir John Goss, Mus. Doc., of Trinity College. He was born in the year 1800, and in 1811 became a chorister at the Chapel Royal; after which he studied under Thomas Attwood, whom he succeeded as organist of St. Paul's in 1838. He was knighted in 1872, and in the same year resigned his post at St. Paul's, being succeeded by Dr. Stainer. Sir John Goss was highly esteemed as a composer of church music, glees, and part-songs.

A notice in the London Gazette states that the powers of the University Commissioners have been extended to the 31st day of December, 1881.

Mr. Charles Niven, formerly Fellow of Trinity, has been appointed Professor of Mathematics in the University of Glasgow.

Prof. Dewar has been re-appointed Fullerian Professor of Chemistry at the Royal Institution.

At a General Meeting of Newnham College held on the 8th inst., Professor Caley was unanimously elected President, and the following members of the Council:—Prof. Adams, Mr. Archer Hind, Mr. A. J. Balfour, M.P., Mrs. Bateson, Miss Clough, Mr. A. Dicey, Mrs. A. Dicey, Miss Ewart, Mr. Ferrers, Mr. Hammond, Mr. Hudson, Miss J. Kennedy, Mrs. Peile, Mr. Prothero, Mr. Sidgwick, Mr. Trotter, Mrs. S. Winkworth, Mr. R. T. Wright.

The following members of the University spoke at the inaugural dinner of the Junior Liberal Club, on Tuesday week:—Prof. Palmer, Rev. T. J. Lawrence, Messrs. O. Browning, A. W. W. Dale, E. J. C. Morton, and H. Cox.

It is proposed to hold in the small room over the Corn Exchange, on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, May 25th, 26th, 27th, a Loan Exhibition of Pictures belonging to junior members of the University. The exhibition will be open from 11 o'clock till 6, and again from 7.30 to 9.30 at reduced prices. The proceeds, after payment of expenses, will be devoted to the funds of Addenbrooke's Hospital.

The second meeting of the University Church Society was held on Wednesday last, Mr. A. J. Wallis, Fellow of Corpus, and President of the Society, in the chair. A paper was read by the Rev. E. C. Selwyn, Dean of King's College, on "The Atonement." The paper was followed by a discussion, in which R. St. John Parry, J. O. F. Murray, J. H. Battersby, and other gentlemen took part. The reader of the paper in replying said that the upshot of the discussion seemed to be that the Society generally preferred the Representation theory to that of Substitution.

The tower of Fen Ditton Church, which has been found to be insecure, is in process of demolition. A new tower will be erected after the design of the old. The rectory paddock will be open as usual to visitors during the race week; and the money paid for admission will be added to the Church Restoration Fund.

The success of our Eleven at Fenner's has not been as yet great enough to justify any fear of their falling off: in fact any change that takes place in their play must be a change for the better. Nor can we reassure ourselves by any extraordinary strength in the teams opposed to them: in fact the M.C.C. Eleven was far from strong in batting, and yet could get very respectable scores against our famous slow bowling. The only good innings against good bowling has been that of A. G. Steel in the last match.

The Great Eastern Railway Company give notice that on and after the first of June they will import tubs of sea-water into Cambridge at the rate of sixpence per bath; which will include all expenses. The water is to come from Lowestoft.

Mr. W. W. R. Ball, Fellow of Trinity, has reprinted in a pamphlet form his three articles on the origin and history of the Mathematical Tripos, which appeared in numbers 10, 11 and 12 of the Review. We notice a valuable addition in the shape of an appendix, containing specimens of "exercises" in the schools, together with the problem papers of 1801. The pamphlet is published by Mr. Elijah Johnson.

The race between Peterhouse and Pembroke II. for the last place in the Second Division came off on Tuesday afternoon. The authorities had decided that it should be a time race. Pembroke had first station, and gained slightly at first, perhaps at First Post Corner they were a quarter of a length to the good; however round the corners, and especially round Ditton, Peterhouse gained, and the boats keeping very much the same distance between them all up the Long Reach, Peterhouse won by two seconds.

 A special number of the "Cambridge Review" will be published on Saturday, May 22, containing special reports of the Boat Races and the Concerts.

THE MEDICAL STUDENT AT CAMBRIDGE.

If a medical student has to decide how he will prepare himself for his profession, the first step is the only one not surrounded by difficulties. Registration can be accomplished for the sum of one half-penny. This done, the case is quite different, there being about thirty qualifications to practice in England, and of roads to reach these different goals who shall say how many? The would-be doctor may well be dismayed at the prospect, for no gentle Cook whispers words of guidance in his ear, no omniscient Bradshaw forges an iron net with which to snare whole continents and make them yield their charms to the traveller. On the contrary, he sees advertisements of different hospitals, each with its hundreds of beds, and is surrounded by official and unofficial friends who declare that theirs is the only orthodox doctor-factory, where anatomy is a pleasing diversion, and where the mystic passes by which disease is exorcised are practised by the most accomplished physicians. So at least it appears to the student, who can seldom have a clear idea of the nature of the profession to which he is devoting himself. To him it seems an art, not a science; success is to depend on the number of diseases he can cure, and it must be better to see a disease cured than to learn volumes about the physiology of the organs it attacks and the way in which they are affected. Alas! the disenchantment soon comes; medicine is not a conjurer's art, nor can it be acquired at a thousand beds, but the student must almost lose sight of the end in patient and close labour in the dissecting-room and laboratory. The senior physician at one of the great London hospitals commenced his course of lectures this session by saying "The best text book of medicine is Foster's Physiology." Practically it comes to this, the student's career is divided into two parts, the study of the animal mechanism in health, and the study of the same mechanism in disease. For the first there is no place in the world like Cambridge; for the second any other town with an equally well appointed hospital would be better, just in proportion as it is larger. Mr. Bettany in the Cambridge Review for May 5 asks, but does not answer, the question, "Can Cambridge have a great and complete medical school?" That she has a great medical school seems to me an indisputable fact, proved by the number of Cambridge men among the eminent surgeons and physicians of the present day; but to make it complete would be the most certain way of destroying its greatness. Addenbrooke's presents admirable opportunities for the beginner to acquire what Dr. Foster calls "the medical instinct;" better, I think, than a large London hospital, where the student is only confused by the innumerable beds. At Addenbrooke's he feels that he can make himself master of one or two wards, and may at any time see the commonest and most typical maladies; while my experience of two London hospitals, as well as the hospitals of Paris, leads me to believe that there is no labour so unproductive for the beginner as "walking the wards." Often have I watched the first and second year's men, pouring into the ward, getting in the way of the dressers and clerks and even of the surgeon or physician himself, and, when not engaged in reading the notices relating to the regulation of patients and nurses and so forth, peering over the heads of the crowd in front of them to catch sight of a wound, made they know not how, and elaborately wrapped up in calico, flannel or even pink and white gauze, for the sake as far as they can tell of effect only. Their interest usually varies directly as what Toddy would call its "blugginess," and, although they have never seen it before, they are gratified to hear that it looks better, and are sorry if it looks worse. If the wards are not too crowded the facies of disease may be learnt by following the staff on their rounds; but to do real work it is necessary to clerk or dress in the wards, and then, when the morning has been spent at a few bedsides, and the student has thought out the cases for himself, he is in a position to appreciate the remarks of his surgeon or physician. This cannot be done till after the second M.B., the time between which and the third should, I think, be spent in a metropolis.

What are the advantages which Cambridge offers to the Medical? Foremost we must place admirable scientific training. At many London schools Physiology and the other sciences are taught by busy Physicians and Surgeons, who supplement their incomes by lecturing on subjects with which they are physically unable to keep up. Many men would have come to Cambridge if they had known, before they paid the heavy fees which make it impossible for them afterwards to move, how distinct the two parts of their education are. There are few men who having paid £130 in advance can afford to move to another hospital where the fees will have to be paid over again, and yet why should they be tied down to a particular school? Medicine is a science which wears much the same face at Westminster as at Whitechapel, and there is not now the material difference of opinion that there was in the middle ages, when one school taught that in cases of sword-wound, the salve should be applied to the sword, and the wound carefully left alone, while the other taught that it was the wound that needed to be dressed. Nor has the student to choose between the humoralists, who regard all acute diseases as the result of the migration of the atra bilis and flava bilis from the spleen (supra renal capsules) and liver to the brain, pleura, pericardium, &c., and the solidists who trace disease to the abnormal opening or closing of the pores. For the study of his profession the student requires, firstly patients, which only a large town can supply in abundance, and secondly, a good teacher, whose individuality will probably leave its mark through the whole of his subsequent career. Surely there are many advantages in the system adopted in Paris, where the fees are paid and most of the lectures given at the Ecole de Médicine and the government Ecole D'anatomie (Clamart) while the student is free to follow the clinics at any hospital and under any teacher.

Another advantage of Cambridge is the opportunity it affords for choosing one's friends and the culture which varied intercourse brings. In London a man's friends are all medical and often determined by the street in which he happens to live, and I regret to say that there are, at some London Medical Schools, men, who hanging about the dissecting room year after year, have one article of faith in common, to wit, they all abhor examiners, but for the rest their creeds vary much among themselves, and are for the most part at issue with those of the more respectable part of the community. While admitting the existence of such unpleasant fellow students, I would not have it supposed that I think the reputation of the main body is at all deserved; the Classical Medical student of the police courts is to a great extent a mythical personage. I am told on the best authority that it is a common practice for draper's assistants and others who find themselves at variance with the law, to avoid the consequences which might ensue if it reached their master's ear, by writing themselves down "Medical Students." And again a comparison of the number who register as students with the number who register as qualified men (2,009 against 987 in 1879) shows that, allowing for the increase of competitors for all professions, a process of natural selection goes on by which many acolytes disappear from the temple of Æsculapius.

One more advantage of Cambridge, think of the unhealthiness of the London student's life! His lodgings probably not lying in the most open or salubrious district, there is nothing for him to do when his day at the hospital is over, but walk home along the flags, and if in the evening he finds life all too monotonous, he can recreate himself with a visit to the theatre or a game at Loo. True there are football clubs, and cricket clubs, and rowing clubs, but an hour on the Underground makes these pastimes hardly worth the effort, besides adding immensely to their cost both in money and time. Yet there is only one way in which we can get our brains to do good work, and that is by supplying them with bright arterial blood, and not with blood that is stagnant and venous and loaded with smoke and waste.

ALEX. HILL.

FEN-LAND.

"Canaux, Canards, Canaille."—Voltaire.

There is, perhaps, no part of England which has been so neglected and so disparaged as the Fens. Almost every county prides itself on some particular excellence in its products, some especial beauty in its scenery, but the inhabitants of the flat country, known as the Fens, or the Bedford Level, never venture to put forward any such claim on behalf of their home, and never hear it mentioned by others without a sneer. Macaulay, in his history, speaks of it as 'that dreary region, wet with the drainage of thirteen counties,' and informs us, I know not on what authority, that the inhabitants were a peculiar species of human beings, known as 'Breedlings.' Carlyle, in his 'Cromwell,' in describing how his hero walked beside the Ouse, in the Fen near St. Ives, thinks it necessary to add that 'the heavenly skies and infernal abysses, over-arched and under-arched him,' there as elsewhere. Charles Kingsley alone, of modern writers, could enjoy the Fen scenery and Fen life, and did not yield to the modern craze which regards a mountain as a primary necessity of existence. This worship of high places, however, distressing as its symptoms are to the present writer, is a disease of comparatively modern growth. Our ancestors had no Alpine Club, and knew nothing of 'The Mountain Glory' and 'The Mountain Gloom'; but this did not make them like the Fens the better. They were regarded as the abode of fever, and ague, and 'all the infections which the sun sucks up,' &c. Guide books, published less than a century ago, describe Cambridgeshire as a healthy county, except towards the north, where the air is 'distempered by the noxious vapours arising from the marshes.' The same people who admired Holland were unable to perceive that in England one region possessed at least, equal natural advantages, if they were equally improved.

Considering how large a number of Cambridge undergraduates take all their exercise in term time upon the Cam, it is strange that so few know where it goes to, and what a network of rivers can be reached from it. Their acquaintance with it is generally limited to an excursion or two up the 'Freshman's River,' a very beautiful journey when the 'May' is in flower; to an occasional visit to Clayhithe, or to taking their sisters, their cousins, and their aunts for a row through the 'Backs of the Colleges.' The barges and occasional steamers which they meet never seem to excite their curiosity, either as to whence they come, or by whatever manner of men they are navigated. Yet both these subjects may be investigated with interest and not without advantage.

The voyager, on arriving at Clayhithe, may perhaps have observed the sign of the large public-house there, 'The House of Lords.' If so, probably he is not aware that it is so named, not in honour of the Lords spiritual and temporal of this realm, but because it was once the place of meeting of the nobles of the kingdom of Upware. And what, asks the reader, is the kingdom of Upware? Come a little further down the river, and I will explain.

Some years ago, men did not think it necessary to go so far afield for their pleasures as nowadays. The late genial host of the House of Lords (late, I am happy to say, only in the sense that he has retired,) used often to tell us how Dr. Jeremie, and Professor Sedgwick, and other Cambridge magnates would, in the summer time, come down to Clayhithe in a house-boat, dine there, and return in the cool of the evening to Cambridge. Sedgwick, on these occasions, always insisted on going to sit by the great wood and peat fire, which used to burn on an open hearth without any fire place, and delighted in stirring the embers with a stick, as he had once done in his simple Yorkshire home. And in winter the fens had other attractions. Snipe were to be found in great plenty; skating was and still is a specialty of the district, and Whittlesea Mere has not long been drained. I cannot tell the exact year, or the month of the year, in which a collection of choice spirits, assembled under the great tree at Upware, were moved to hail one of their number as King. His Majesty, I have been informed by those present, at once proceeded to order one of the company to kneel, and with the long clay pipe which he was smoking, conferred upon him the honour of knighthood. Of the many merry days which were spent there in harmless tomfoolery, especially of the comic Irishman who was given the title of the Royal Ferryman, his sole duties being to take his Majesty across the river, which it is said he was sometimes too drunk to accomplish, some records may still be found in the whitewashed public house named by his Majesty "Five miles from anywhere." The annals of the kingdom are not uneventful. Some bold men, who in after life distinguished themselves greatly in other ways, seized the opportunity of the temporary absence of their sovereign to establish a Republic, of which they constituted themselves First and Second Consuls. Their names may be found by diligent perusal of the archives of the kingdom, at Upware. Suffice it to say that Victor I. on his return, put down this revolutionary movement with a strong hand, and yet seems not to have been implacable in his resentment, as we find that one of the conspirators was afterwards raised to the peerage (of Upware), by the title of Viscount Annesdale.

In my own younger days, it was not unusual for men, towards the end of term, to take a few days holiday down the river. They generally equipped themselves for these "expeditions," as they were emphatically termed, with a revolver, a large knife, and a frying pan, and prepared for them by a diligent perusal of Fenimore Cooper's novels. Their attempts to sleep inside a canoe, to construct a tent out of a boat's sail, and to cook in the dark over a fire of purloined sticks, were immensely amusing (to themselves), and stimulated others to endeavour to follow their example with greater success. I shall never forget a fortnight which I spent in an open boat with an enthusiastic fisherman for my companion. We were accompanied for the first two days by a friend, who has since attained to immortality as the "Cigarette" of "An Inland Voyage," a work with which I presume all boating men are familiar. On this occasion he paddled a canoe of his own invention, made of leather, which combined all the advantages of a canoe with those of a bathing machine, for she leaked so much that we had to stop several times to empty the water out of her. He seemed indifferent to this peculiarity of his craft. In the evening we rigged a tent, and devoured a miscellaneous meal, after which he took a walk by the river bank, clothed in a flowered dressing-gown, with a fez on his head, and a large silver cup in his hand.

It was at Denver Sluice that I first made the acquaintance of His Majesty, who wrote many of his poems there, and has left memorials of himself in a series of very well executed carvings on wood. But let it not be supposed that he remained fixed in one place. There is scarcely a village or hamlet in the fens, provided it be near some navigable water, and that it produces good liquor, which has not been at some time or other graced by his presence. The broad arrow, the badge of the kingdom, is found far and wide. It may be traced, rather faintly now, in the beautiful photograph of "Ely Cathedral from the river," on a wall near the Cutter Inn, and I recently discovered an iron specimen of the same symbol over the hearth in the little inn at Pentney Mills, on the almost unexplored river Nar. If it were generally known that a most interesting gatehouse, which originally belonged to a large Benedictine monastery, exists here almost entire: that good troutfishing may be had without asking leave of any one, and that reasonably comfortable quarters, with plenty of fresh milk and cream, &c., can be had for little or nothing, I should not expect it to be as deserted as at present it is. But it is a long way from Denver Sluice, the last place mentioned in this discursive narrative.

Denver Sluice may be said to be the metropolis of bargeedom. Here exist a superior class, known as "berthsmen," whose trade it is to act as pilot and extra hand on board the "gangs of lighters' as they are termed, in the difficult and dangerous journey over the tidal water between Lynn and the Sluice. Their names, e.g. Bogy, Swidge, Hookums, &c.; their picturesque blue plush waistcoats with sleeves; the poverty and forcible nature of their language; their consumption of beer; and their childish improvidence and trust in their landlady, might supply materials for a prolonged essay; but space forbids me to embark on so fascinating a theme: I will confine myself to stating that the poker used to be chained to the hearth, lest it should be used as a weapon in the heat of some argument. I had wished also to say somewhat about the big pike at Southrey: about my old friend at the "Branch," with his fund of stories about the undergraduate freaks of persons now holding high office both in church and state: about the late sluice-keeper at Denver, whose stories of smugglers and press-gangs were spicier than anything but the very best parts of Marryat's novels: about the sign of an inn at Downham Market, which still hangs from a whale's jawbone, and recalls the time when whale ships from Greenland landed their oil at the place, even now called Blubber House Corner. But I must leave off, with the recommendation to those who wish to learn more about the Fens, to go and find it out for themselves.

EGOISTICAL ESSAYS.—No. V.

"GATED."

This is a great crisis in my career. I think it is Crisis No 243, but I have lost count and cannot be quite certain about it. This is the period of my imprisonment. Nine o'clock has just struck, and I have been forced by the stern mandates of uncompromising authority to withdraw myself from an active share in the busy turmoil of the world, and submit to incarceration until the morrow's morning breaks. But though absent from the eyes of men, I shall not be lost to their memory, for here in the solitude of my confinement I shall pen words that will fly forth to the ends of Cambridge, and shake the oppressors as they recline on their couches of luxury and chafe under the bitter truths that emanate from my J nib.

My sentence was conveyed to me yesterday, and the document shall be stored up among the family archives. At present it is stuck up in my looking-glass together with my other engagements and there it remains, staring down upon me in all its heartlessness—a little narrow slip of paper, printed in rigid immoveable lines with a few sentences of writing introduced only where absolutely necessary—a type of the state of the mind that devised it, regardless, in its sway over the community, of the feelings of the individual. What will posterity say? To think that it could ever have been possible that such things as this were scattered about broadcast, coldly consigning human beings to the solitude of their lodgings; printed, not even affording the satisfaction of the thought that those who issued them were put to any trouble to do so. It is being treated as if one had no separate existence; it is degrading.

I am not angry; only bubbling over with sorrowful indignation.

Were I a poet blessed with the spirit of song, I could pour forth my feelings in strains of harmonious melancholy,—I could compare myself to the caged lion at the Zoological Society's Gardens in Regent's Park, pacing up and down the hearthrug; or to an imprisoned cock sparrow, such I have oftentimes seen, or may be supposed to have seen, fluttering away its poor existence against the cruel bars—or, if anybody who came to listen would prefer it, I might break forth into the nobler effusions of epic, and draw a parallel between my case and those of the prisoner of Chillon, Latude in the Bastille, Richard Cœur de Lion in the Castle of Dürrenstein, Monte Cristo, Napoleon the Great, Daniel in the Lion's den, and many another noble child of fame. But I am not a poet: I was not born so, so I am not fit.

There have been many other great prisoners in the course of the world's history before this—but is any comparison to be drawn between them and me? To be sure, I am not in some respects so badly off as some of them; I have not yet been reduced to throwing two pins about and groping after them in the darkness of my cell to preserve my reason; nor have I to write down my feelings on the remnant of my shirt with my bootblacking for ink, and a nib ingeniously contrived out of a ground-down paving stone; and should I wish to effect an escape, there would be no absolute need for me to pick open fifty-six locks or so with a rusty nail, climb up a chimney and slay my landlady's husband on arrival at the top with an iron bar that I had encountered half-way, finishing up with a terrific drop over the parapet into the street—all this would hardly be necessary, except as a matter of taste, seeing that there is nothing actually to prevent me from opening the street door, and gazing out that way. It is not that that I mind; it is the moral indignity; the paltriness of my offence; and the apparent callousness with which I am consigned to this vile durance. Was Napoleon, was Richard Cœur de Lion, was Monte Cristo, again I ask, were any of those above mentioned shut off from humanity for not getting up in the morning? No,—emphatically no.

Getting up early does not agree with me. It is all very well for people to attempt to cast ridicule on the notion and say that it is good for everybody, and therefore that it must be good for me. I am not everybody, and consequently everybody is not I. I have known myself longer than anybody else, and I consider that I have a right to an opinion on the subject. I do not wish to make excuses, only to justify myself in the eye of authority. I couldn't get up. It was raining and I had lost my umbrella; I might have got my feet wet. I was sleepy: sleep is sent by nature, and it is wrong to combat nature. I didn't want to get up, and I think it is a horrid shame I should be made to do so.

But apart from all minor reasons for my conduct I have been very ill lately and it might have been very bad for me to go out early in the morning. Nobody knows what my malady was. Not wishing to be the cause of anxiety to those around me, I concealed my inward agony under the guise of a smiling countenance. Even the doctor could not make out what was the matter with me. Amongst other things I shall have conferred on mankind will be a new illness—entirely original. 'Tis a great thing to think that one has not lived in vain.

I dont know where my illness came from. It was not exactly a cold, and it was not indigestion, nor was it headache or cramp, but a sort of all these rolled into one. The first symptoms appeared about a week ago. I had been out on the Freshman's river the day before in a canoe with a hole in the bottom, and had sat patiently in a gradually increasing puddle all the way up to Byron's Pool and back. Now I can fully realize the misery that sailors must experience while passing six weeks on a water-logged ship. This may possibly have brought on a chill. The next day I had some friends to breakfast, and it was after breakfast that I was attacked. My first impulse was of course to examine into what I had for breakfast, to make sure that no underhand dealings had been practised—there have been such a quantity of attempts at assassination in high places lately, that no one can feel secure. On closer examination into the contents of a beefsteak pie, I discovered that it was made of pigeon. Now beefsteak pie is wholesome, while pigeon pie is very often apt to be indigestible. I was grieved that the cook should have been guilty of deceit, and I felt that it was my duty not to let him continue in the paths of error: otherwise he might have gone on from bad to worse, and no one knows where he might not have come to at last.

But when I went up to the kitchen to remonstrate and to show that a beef-steak pie was not a pigeon pie, and that it was impossible that it even could become so, unless, perhaps, it got into a space of four dimensions, where all sorts of odd things are going to happen—but that was running into metaphysics, so I couldn't keep up that line of argument very long,—the cook was so confident in his deprecation of pigeon pie, that I thought really only from matters of pure justice I was bound to go and look again. However, when I next interviewed that pie, I extracted what was undoubtedly the leg of a pigeon; and, accordingly, having cleaned it, I took it up in an envelope to convince the cook. He was quite unmoved, and still stuck to it that it was a beef-steak pie, only perhaps a stray pigeon might have crawled in and hidden itself while nobody was looking, in the hope of saving its life.

But whether it was pigeon or unpigeon pie still the fact remains that I had contracted this new and original illness. I have analysed it carefully, and by dividing it into component parts, three parts cold in the head, two parts pigeon pie, one part headache, and four parts cough, and then treating the parts separately, I have succeeded in expelling it all but the cough. I think on the whole I will go as far as to give up my claims to the sole invention of the other parts, but I reserve that cough to myself. I suppose in time it will become fashionable and must receive a name: I shall call it Tussis Columbariensis, as being suitable to the circumstances, as I suppose them to have been. It is indeed a triumph. It is without doubt the most magnificent thing in coughs that has appeared in Cambridge for some time. It is periodic, occurring at intervals of tweny-five minutes from cough to cough, exactly. This is perhaps rather useful, as my watch has stopped and it serves to calculate the time by. It begins in two waves, one in each of my boots, and surges up through my system until it arrives at my throat, and then bursts forth in all its splendour, reducing me for the moment from my normal grandeur to a struggling mass of incapacity, and throwing everything within a radius of ten feet into a violent state of commotion. When my friends hear me coming upstairs, if a period has just elapsed, and I am taken half way up, they know whom they have to welcome, and they run and put away all the china.

Now I put the question to all lovers of reason: Was it to be expected that I could get up early in the morning when I might have been tottering on the brink of a premature grave? How do the authorities know that I may not have been lying awake through the tedious hours of a long night, and that balmy sleep may not have been just on the point of visiting my wearied eyelids when their harsh edict required my presence in College. It will afford me some satisfaction if they have to shed tears of remorse on my tombstone.

The fated hour has struck. I had to tear myself away from a most pleasant gathering in order to be home in time; and just when I had succeeded in leading up the conversation to a most favourable point—a few minutes more, and I should have been able to work in one of my best stories. Indeed, things had got on so far that they must result in that story or else end abruptly, and I have a sort of idea that one of the company knew the outlines, and he will probably try to tell it—and he is sure to spoil it.

What is to be done now? Shall I work? No; never shall anyone flatter themselves that I have aided them in getting good out of evil. Shall I go up and call on my fellow-lodger? No; if I am to be a martyr I will do it thoroughly. I will sit and muse on the vanity of things in general. All this must be seen to. The liberty of the subject has been trifled with! I repeat, is this to be borne? I will have questions asked in Parliament!! I will demand a writ of Habeas Corpus!!! I will—I will—at present, I will—go to bed.

MEMORIAL ABOUT WOMEN'S DEGREES.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

DEAR SIRS,—In answer to the letter of "Spectator" on the above Memorial—which I must charitably suppose he only perused once, and that hastily—may I be allowed to make two remarks. In the first place "Spectator" entirely misunderstands, or misquotes the second of the "two arguments," which he says merely is that women "have been informally examined by private courtesy of individuals." The memorial says on the other hand, that this informal examination "is unsatisfactory with regard to the University, and is liable to cause severe disappointment to candidates who may possibly find themselves refused admission to Examinations for which they have been working for years." These two assertions are both justified by the fact that this year one Mathematical and two Classical Examiners refused to examine the papers of Women Candidates, mainly on the ground, I understand, that by so doing they would not be fulfilling their duties to the University. The second ingenious oversight in Spectator's letter is the phrase "properly qualified women," which of course means women who have fulfilled the University requirements as to "residence, terms, supervision, preliminary examinations, &c." If he had noticed this phrase in the Memorial, he would hardly have asked the irrelevant questions, that adorn the second half of his first paragraph.

As I have shown that "Spectator" has completely misunderstood the Memorial, the last amusing part of his letter needs no reply; but there is one other point, not in his letter, to which I wish to allude. The "Committee of the Association for promoting the Higher Education of Women in Cambridge" in their memorial, and after them the editorial columns of this paper, allude to the absence in Mrs. Aldis' Memorial of any allusion to the benefit of the present informal Examination of Women. Now those who have ever had anything to do with Memorials, drawn up for general signature, will know that it is of the utmost importance for them to be as brief as possible, first because people have not time to read them if they are lengthy, and secondly because the longer a memorial is, the greater danger there is of individuals finding fault with individual clauses, and so refusing to sign though agreeing with the general principle. And so in a Memorial to the Vice-Chancellor, who never, so far as I have heard, examined Women in any University Examination—where was the necessity of thanking some third party, namely the generous Examiners, who in their private capacity as men and brothers, listened to the earnest cry of their imploring sisters?

I am, Sirs, yours obediently,

G. W. JOHNSON.

May 13, 1880.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—I have read with some interest and much surprise an article headed "Ladies Colleges and Degrees" in your issue of May 12;—surprise because the only institutions mentioned by the writer are the University of London, and Girton College. Surely no article on this subject can pretend to any completeness, which entirely ignores the existence of the two Colleges for Women at Oxford, of the University of St. Andrew's, and of Newnham College, Cambridge.

The Oxford Colleges are of too recent date to possess much history, but they deserve at least a passing notice. But the University of St. Andrew's has opened the degree of L.A. to women, and several women have already obtained the degree, while others have passed part of the examinations necessary to obtain it. But Newnham College, or at least the Cambridge Lecture Association to which it owes its existence, is as old as Girton College, the Association for promoting the Higher Education of women in Cambridge having been formed in 1869. The lectures given by this Association, which was organized by the spontaneous kindness of some Fellows and Lecturers of various Colleges, soon attracted students from other places, and to accommodate these a house was taken in Regent Street under the care of Miss Clough. It would be tedious to trace the gradual changes caused by increasing numbers, till a permanent building was obtained in Newnham Hall. Of the work done there I need not speak here; tables of the examinations passed have been published on several occasions and the year-book of Newnham contains a full list of these; but it might be well to mention the fact that the first woman to obtain a first class in the informal Tripos examinations to which the courtesy of the examiners has admitted the women students, was a student of Newnham Hall, who in 1876 obtained a 1st class in Natural Science, and not Miss Scott, of Girton, as some of the papers stated last January; in fact four first classes had been obtained before this year, two in History and one in Moral Science having been obtained at Newnham last autumn.

The writer of the article implies that the Cambridge Higher Local Examination is especially "adapted to feminine weaknesses or strong points." It is curious that men seem to have considered the Examination specially adapted to their requirements, for in 1873 they successfully petitioned the authorities for permission to present themselves for the examinations, and for the last seven years the examination has been open indiscriminately to men and women.

Yours obediently,

FAIR PLAY.

MATHEMATICAL UNION.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Dear Sirs,—In the whole experience of my German University Life, I think nothing struck me so forcibly as the great advantage of the so called "Vereine" among the students for the furtherance of their special subjects of study by the combined reading of original papers and drinking of stale beer, or as the Germans themselves put it, in the statutes of the Berlin "Mathematischer Verein" which lie before me:—

"Der mathematische Verein hat den Zweck, unter den Studirenden der Mathematik das Bewusstsein der Zusammengehörigkeit zu stärken und das Interesse derselben für ihre Wissenschaft, wie ihre Kenntnisse in dieser zu fördern."

Now although we in prosaic England cannot hope to unite the intellectual and material by a mystic bond of beer as the German Idealists do, still I think we might with profit take a hint from these "Vereine."

I believe that a "Natural Science Club" does exist in Cambridge, why should we not have a Mathematical Club, nay, a Law Club, a History Club, and if the germs of ought but the basest empiricism are yet extant in the University, a Philosophy Club?

But what I would more particularly insist on is a Physico-Mathematical Club. Cambridge is supposed to be the mathematical pulse of England, (which perhaps accounts for the regularity and sameness of its institutions) and is conceived at all times to be well thronged with budding undergraduate Newtons. Surely it would be a great advantage for these men to exchange views a little, say, in the form of original papers followed by discussion (not of beer), perhaps once a week. Besides this such a club should possess rooms of its own where it would be possible for the younger members of the University to see the English, American, French and German Mathematical periodicals and papers. It might also hope in time to obtain copies of the proceedings of various learned societies, which an ordinary college library does not contain, and to which even the much abused private tutor does occasionally (perhaps in his weaker moments) refer. These would form the small beginnings of a Mathematical Library for the benefit of Undergraduates in the smaller colleges, who have no Bookery at hand like those of Trinity or St. John's, nor any friend in the Philosophical Society.

Leaving the germs of this magnificent idea to fructify, or not, as fate wills it, in the dusty hedgerows of Cambridge apathy,

I remain, Sir, yours etc,

Karl Pearson.

PROPOSED SWIMMING BATH.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Sirs,—I read with much interest in your last issue, your correspondent's suggestions about a swimming bath, and most fully endorse his opinions on the matter.

There is not the least doubt that swimming, even as compared with other athletic exercises, receives far too little attention at both Universities, but of course this is in a great measure owing to the fact that many find river bathing too cold in May. Whereas in the event of a bath being built, many who now do not belong to the C.U.S.C., would bathe regularly all the year round.

In the event of a company being formed the greatest difficulties to be surmounted would be to find—

1.—Suitable working directors, among whom there ought to be some two or three influential fellows of the University.

2.—Suitable premises; as the bath itself, considering the patronage it would be likely to receive in the May term, ought to be at least some 50 or 60 yards long, by about 15 broad.

Meantime I would remind those of your readers desirous of learning to swim, and who are not afraid of a plunge into cold water, that the swimming club has engaged the services of a most able and successful master, who is at the sheds daily from noon till five o'clock.

Yours truly,

W. S. S. Wilson.

COLLEGE COACHING AND LECTURES IN MATHEMATICS.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Dear Sirs,—Will you grant me space for some remarks on a subject which has already been touched upon in the Review? It will be rather like digging-up again ground that has been trodden down by the crowding of passing events, but none the less may the action be possibly productive of fruit. It needs not to quote Shakespeare to prove that ingratitude is inhuman. And it is only natural that after lying still in a dead calm we should hail with glad gratitude the first puff of wind that may speed us on our way once more. A "College Tutor" in an early number referred to the success of collegiate coaching in Classics, and desiderated it for Mathematics.

Certainly it does seem unfair that at Cambridge, the Mathematical University par excellence, Classics should be more often rewarded by prizes and aided in teaching than Mathematics. My own experience of Classical Lectures has been that they are thoroughly satisfactory; so much so, that a man need employ no "coach." His Lectures and Composition Classes are sufficient, always provided he comes to his Lecture with his work thoroughly prepared, as I think he should. What difficulties of construction may have arisen in preparation are sure to be cleared away by the Lecturer's translation. But turn to Mathematics, and what do we find? A man has to do so much book-work, and some examples, the solution of which depends almost entirely (or should do so) on the previously acquired knowledge of the book-work. He begins with his book-work, and comes to a dead stop at some difficulty, the inability to solve which prevents the right understanding of the remainder. Unlike Classics, Mathematics is such a system of links that you cannot hang one from another that is absent. Our friend goes to Lecture quite in a fog, utterly unprepared to profit by general explanations, if any, suited to a few more brilliant minds; and not having done the examples, copies down an arrangement of symbols in black and white which might be Chinese for all the good it does him. Nor is this all. The disappointment and consequent disgust are enough to cause repugnance to a subject naturally interesting to one whose liking and bent for it are not thus changed by want of confidence and success. And it is not Quixotic to think that it causes irritation of the brain.

I spoke of gratitude. And why? Finding himself in a Lecture to about five, he is able to get his individual difficulties smoothed, his comprehension of the book-work made practical, his power to do examples no longer absent. Is not this system an approach to the desideratum? Do not Mathematical men,—who are not all utter dullards, nor idlers fond of nothing but others' assistance, nor pledged to exclusive self-help,—do not such need a helping hand, not to carry them over the stile, but to show them where to put their foot to climb over themselves?

If, after doing examples on one piece of book-work, the difficulties which had been marked in the subsequent piece were explained before that was got up for working examples from, would not there be less complaint of the uselessness of Lectures to which a man's sense of deference to authority attracts him like Sinbad's island of loadstone, only to wreck his hopes; and from which he would fain escape, that his work might be well done if at all?

I am, &c.

AN ENGLISH TRIPOS.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

Sirs,—I have read with interest various remarks in your columns on the subject of an English Tripos at Cambridge, especially those by Mr. Skeat in your last number. He there expresses a fear that the number of candidates would be exceedingly small, and that the Tripos would in fact labour under the same difficulty as the Moral Science, and up to a year or two ago the History Tripos. I should like to point out the secret of these difficulties. No one knows whether the University is going to lead the public schools, or the schools the University, in any question of striking out a new line of study. Indeed, in other matters, the same thing is observable, e.g. the time-honoured dispute as to whether we shall say Cicero or Kikero has come to a dead lock, as it is not settled who is to begin. In the same way an English Tripos would soon be patronised, if penurious men knew that a good degree in it meant a subsequent competence in the shape of a masters' salary at a public school. But the schools meantime hesitate to guarantee anything of the kind, because the Universities hold out no prospect of English being duly recognized. They look upon the University as the natural pioneer in such matters, and I think they are right. Let us hope then that the University will face the difficulty of making a start, till the schools have got wind of the movement, and organized English teaching, sufficiently to open out a career for distinguished candidates in the future English Tripos.

I remain, Sir, yours obediently,

U. S. H.

COLLEGE CORRESPONDENCE.

ST. PETER'S.

Our first lawn tennis match this term, against Christ's, was played on Wednesday the 12th. Each College was represented by three pairs, and it was arranged that each pair should play the three opposing pairs in succession. We won the match by seven setts to two, or 47 games to 24, our first and second pairs not losing any of their setts. On Friday our best pair, Eccles and Fuller, played Caius. They lost the first sett to four games, but afterwards seemed to get much better together and won the next three to one, four, and three games respectively, thus gaining the match and three setts to one or 22 games to 14. On Monday we are to have a three-pair match with the Mayflies, on their ground.

CLARE.

The Rev. T. S. Raffles, B.A., of this College, has been appointed curate at Hawarden.

The crew did some hard work last week. They continue to improve, and now keep well together at a quick stroke. Barring accidents we hope to do well in the races.

On Thursday the cricket match with Trinity Hall resulted in an exciting finish. Our last wicket fell for 211, just five short of the Hall score. H. J. Ford 105, and H. E. M. Stutfield 82, hit well for their respective sides. On Saturday we played a strong John's eleven on their ground, and lost. Scores:—Clare 96 (C. F. Weston 30, J. E. Norman 25, J. B. Maul 21). John's 170 (R. Spencer 69, J. B. Armstrong 29, F. D. Gaddum 17, J. G. Wiseman 16.)

On Monday we played Christ's, on our ground, and beat them by 41 runs. Of our score of 171 O. Puckeridge and H. J. Ford contributed 47 each, C. F. Weston 18, and H. R. Elder 17 not out. For Christ's H. S. Cooper and G. McMillan scored 85 and 25 respectively. The rest of the team collapsed, and the total only reached 130. A. S. Pereira bowled well.

Our lawn tennis representatives, R. F. S. Colvil and J. McConnel, were beaten on Thursday by H. S. Cooper and A. S. Pereira, of Christ's, by three setts to two. On Saturday the play up at the net of the Mayflies was too strong for us, and enabled the Trinity club to win all three sets.

Clare Avenue, now at its best, is well worth a share of the attention of the May week visitors.

PEMBROKE.

Both boats have been going fairly well during the last week; the only change in the crews has been occasioned by Stack's wrist being sufficiently strong to enable him to row; he replaces Miles at 2 in the second boat.

On Thursday, the 13th, we played Trinity, and defeated them by 151 to 122; Cobbold, with 45, was the highest scorer for us, while for them Crosby made 41. Our victory was in no small degree due to Haviland's getting five of the Trinity wickets at the extremely small cost of 8 runs.

On Friday we played Trinity Hall; the match resulted in a draw, our score being 231, of which Finch contributed 110; when time was called they had scored 110 for four wickets.

On Saturday we played King's, on their ground; they went first to the wicket, and made 63, we then went in, but were not disposed of until the score had reached 272.

The four-handed Lawn Tennis Tournament is at length over; in the final round Finch and Betts were opposed to Hales and Traver, the latter pair being eventually the victors.

GONVILLE AND CAIUS.

We have not much to record about the boats except our hopes. The first boat ought at the worst to keep its place, and the second is pretty certain to do likewise, while the younger children of the oar in the third boat may be able to make interesting investigations into the structure of some boat ahead of them.

The "Hawks" apparently appalled by Lacey's giant score against Clare, were unable to get together a team on Saturday. However, on Monday, that most delightful of matches, the old Caians, came off with more than even its annual pleasantness. The weather was all that could be desired, and better still, a great number of old faces made their appearance, under the captaincy of the indefatigable organiser of the match, Mr. Ernest Baggallay. Amongst others, Messrs. Lockwood (late candidate for King's Lynn), Beechcroft, Turner, Preston, Lacey, not merely figured in the field, but lent substantial aid to the annual cricket tea, which celebrates this encounter between old and young Caius.

TRINITY HALL.

In the second round of the lawn tennis ties, H. M. Stutfield and H. Jeddere-Fisher have beaten A. T. Cairnes and W. H. Murphy. The winners of this round are drawn in a bye, and consequently Stutfield and Fisher will play in the final.

During the past week, matches have been played v. Clare, Pembroke, and Jesus. The match against Clare was pulled off with a margin of only five runs, the scores being 216 and 201 respectively; for us, Stutfield made 82 in his usual fast style, and Lomax and Hone also made material contributions. The match with Pembroke could not be finished; their first innings terminated for a very considerable total, upwards of 300 runs appearing on the score-sheet. When stumps were drawn our men had made 110 for three wickets. On Saturday our team experienced a very heavy day. On meeting Jesus in their close, Jesus went first to the wickets and remained there all day; during which time they compiled the somewhat respectable total of 545 for 8 wickets; Messrs. Garforth and Lucas put together 162 and 140 (not out) respectively, and heavy scoring was, almost without exception, the order of the day. Our men seem to be fairly good with the willow, but they certainly have an unhappy knack of allowing the other side to knock up a superfluity of runs.

Seeing that these words will be put into print but a few hours before the commencement of the May races, it would be obviously somewhat preposterous to offer any remarks concerning the boats. We may however consider it a matter for congratulation that, so far, neither accident nor sickness has interfered with the arrangement of the crews, which are all constituted in the same manner as at the beginning of training.

CORPUS CHRISTI.

Last Wednesday we took over a weak team to Saffron Walden; they went in first and made 220 runs; in our first attempt we collapsed for 39, but in our second venture we made 103 for six wickets, Tanner carrying his bat for 58, which included some remarkable hits.

On Friday last we defeated Sidney. Going in first we made 241, of which H. G. P. Owen made 103, F. T. Colson 31: we disposed of them for 50.

On Monday we played Emmanuel, on the Amalgamation Ground; our side made 166, Owen contributing 37, Tanner 36, and Greenland 23; at the call of time they had scored 170 for two wickets.

On Saturday our Lawn Tennis Club had a match with the "Mayflies," which, after an exciting contest, they won. Our representatives were Owen and Richardson, Cooper and Hough, Alford and Ayerst.

KING'S.

Two matches were played last week, in both of which we were deprived of the services of A. F. J. Ford, and consequently our batting and bowling alike failed us. Against Trinity we scored 74 to their 342 (C. W. Foley's 16, E. Impey's 18 not out, being our only double figures): and on Saturday, after getting 64 (C. W. Foley 13, G. Searle 16) we did not dismiss Pembroke till they had compiled over 250.

At Lawn Tennis we have been as unsuccessful: last week we sent 3 pairs to oppose Caius on their ground, and lost by 4 setts to 9: our representatives were H. E. Ryle, G. Thynne, N. L. Hallward, E. Impey, F. J. Tuck, R. H. Macaulay.

The boat is going evenly and well: yet the pace is not so great as we could wish: however, the sight of Magdalene pursuing us may rouse the crew to greater exertions.

QUEENS'.

We played Ley's School on the 12th. We went to the wickets first but our total only reached 30 (Bolton 9, Rooker 7). Six of their wickets fell for 28, but the score was 78 at the end of their innings (Shenton 31). Brandram took four wickets, Rooker and Butler three each. In our second innings Bolton made 37, Ashmall 31 and at call of time we were credited with 93 for five wickets. The game was lost on the first innings.

Some lawn-tennis scratch pairs have been arranged and will be played off this week.

CHRIST'S.

C.C.L.T.C.—A match was played against Clare; Cooper and Pereira represented Christ's, and after a very closely contested game won by three setts to two. A match has been arranged with Corpus for Wednesday.

C.C.B.C.—The boat has been getting on favourably, as the places have been definitely settled. The names and weights of the crew will be found elsewhere.

C.C.C.C.—The match against Whittlesford resulted in a victory to us. The match with Peterhouse has been postponed. Against the Johnian Second Eleven our Second Eleven managed to score 108. The Johnians made 180 for four wickets, Spencer just making his century before call of time.

ST. JOHN'S.

The College is making preparations to contribute to the entertainment of its visitors by a garden party in the College grounds on Wednesday, May 26th, on which occasion the Fellows garden (commonly called the "Wilderness") will be thrown open to the guests. The following have been elected a committee to make the necessary arrangements: Rev. A. F. Torry, Rev. E. Hill, Mr. W. F. Smith, representing the fellows; E. J. C. Morton, W. H. Bissett representing the lawn tennis club; W. H. Fea, S. G. Craig, the musical part of the College; G. M. Kingston and W. Barton, the boat club; P. G. Exham, J. H. Payne, and F. D. Gaddum, the cricket club, together with F. H. Colson, and W. W. Cassells; and with fine weather a great success may be anticipated.

In lawn tennis the second round of the ties have been completed, and as we have a match against the Trinity Mayflies on Friday, the whole competition will have to be decided before that day. During the past fortnight we have been fairly successful in the cricket field. The first eleven has won two and drawn three matches. They beat Magdalen on May 4th, scoring 204 for six wickets against their opponents 65; J. B. Armstrong and J. H. Payne, claiming 43, F. D. Gaddum, 37 not out, and P. T. Wrigley, 35. Against 96, which was all Clare could make, they made 170 for nine wickets, by the help of 69 from R. Spencer, and 29 from J. B. Armstrong. Of the drawn matches the first was against the Hawks, who made 49 for one wicket, while St. John's, at the fall of their tenth wicket had 223, of which 63 were gained by E. J. Wild; 66 by J. B. Armstrong and 24 by E. S. Chapman. In the Emmanuel match our representatives made 185 (of which J. S. Wiseman claimed 56, E. S. Chapman 42, J. Colman 36, R. Thorman 22) while our opponents had 146 for one wicket at the call of time. Against the Pembrochians we made 204, whereof J. B. Armstrong had 68, and J. Colman 65, and we captured five of our opponents wickets at a cost of 74 runs. The Jesus match was a two days' one and resulted rather in our favour: on the first innings Jesus made 182 against our 168 (E. J. Wild 33, J. Colman 30); the second innings rather changed the aspect of affairs, as our last wicket did not fall till the total had reached 295, mainly owing to the fine innings of P. G. Exham, who made 116 before he was bowled: this together with 39 contributed by R. Spencer, 29 by J. B. Armstrong, 27 by P. T. Wrigley and 26 by extras made a total too high for the Jesuites to reach, who so far failed in attempting it that they had lost four wickets for 58 runs. The full score will be found on another page. The second eleven defeated Corpus 2nd eleven on May 7th by 127 for seven wickets (R. Thorman 48 not out, A. W. Beard 25) to 89 of their opponents. They gave the Christian 2nd eleven a more decisive beating as while Christ's made 118, John's made 182 for four wickets, mainly by the help of R. Spencer's 102, and A. W. Beard's 36, both of which maintained their wickets intact to the call of time.

TRINITY.

The M. and S. met on Friday, May 14th, at 10 p.m. H. H. Turner urged "that there is sufficient evidence to justify us in accepting the Darwinian theory of Evolution." T. Beck opposed the motion. After a lively and interesting debate the motion was lost by 12 to 9.

T.C.C.C. During the week this club has played matches with King's, Pembroke, and the Tooting Wanderers. King's were beaten by 342 to 74 on one innings, G. Streatfield and L. Bury scoring 93 and 56 respectively for Trinity. Pembroke were victorious by 151 to 122. The Tooting Wanderers scored 78 for 6 wickets, the Trinity team having made 310: the chief contributions were C. Hitchcock 74 and F. W. Capron 68.

May Flies L.T.C. On Saturday last this club played the match v. Corpus which had been postponed on account of rain. The club was represented by B. F. Buxton and E. G. Watson, C. H. Malden and M. C. Gibb, W. Malden and R. A. Pelly, and was victorious by 2 setts to 1. On the same afternoon H. R. Foster and G. H. C. Wright represented the May Flies against Clare L.T.C., and were victorious by 3 setts to 0. The final tie of the Double-handed Tournament will be played on Tuesday, May 18th. The competitors are G. H. C. Wright and H. Mc'Lean, and H. M. Foster and T. Gill.

T.L.T.C. played Jesus L.T.C. on May 11th. Trinity won by 15 setts to 11, or by 6 points to 3, each point being the best of three games. The scoring was as follows:—

Trinity.	Jesus.
R. A. Pelly and B. F. Buxton beat	W. F. Cole and E. B. Hill by 5 setts to 3.
H. C. Goodhart and J. C. St. Quentin lost to	G. F. Cole and H. Sykes by 4 setts to 5.
G. A. Bolton and A. E. Black beat	E. A. Armstrong and H. S. Greaves by 6 setts to 3.

T.B.C. B. S. Biram is stroking the first boat: Gubbins, late stroke, is rowing two: Fellowes is at three. The crew are in good condition. Their work at the beginning of the week was very hard: latterly they have been having easier times. The second boat seem well together. The third boat have suffered from the loss of Hutchinson, who has gone up higher, but they hope to keep their place.

EMMANUEL.

On Wednesday the first eleven were beaten by Caius, who made 161 to our 89, to which Shipton contributed 48.

On Monday we beat Corpus by 8 wickets, C. H. Allcock scoring 101 not out, and Shipton 49 not out.

SIDNEY.

Our boat is certainly not going as well as we expected, but its pace is better than one would imagine from the form it has exhibited lately. The advantage expected from the change of stroke appears to have been somewhat illusory.

We made but a poor show at cricket against Corpus on Friday; but this can hardly be wondered at, seeing that five of our eleven, including the three best bowlers are in our boat and were unable to play. Hence, the Corpus captain having indignantly scouted the notion of our playing with two substitutes, his team were able to score over 200 against the 49 for our nine wickets.

There is to be a Promenade Musicale, with the band of the Grenadier Guards, in the Master's and Fellows' Gardens on Wednesday, the 26th instant.

DOWNING.

The only proceedings we have to report are those of the Shakespeare Society, which has finished reading Macbeth, and is now about to undertake Henry IV., Part I.

The boat continues to make progress, and is favourably spoken of by the leading papers. Unfortunately, on Whit Monday, it came into collision with some townspeople, out holiday-making, and very considerable damage was done to our boat. Could not the rules of the river be made more binding on all who patronize the Cam, so that the offending parties might always have to suffer for their recklessness?

NON-COLLEGIATE.

The Worshipful Company of Clothworkers has placed at the disposal of the Censor three Natural Science Scholarships. These are to be awarded to students who have kept three terms, and are of the annual value of £30. The three scholarships at present available are to be raised from £50 to 50 guineas.

Cavendish will no doubt report the cricket match we had the pleasure of playing them on Saturday last.

Cavendish.—The last meeting of the Debating Society was given up to readings and recitations, which went off very successfully. Our cricket team has gained three victories in the last week: on the 11th we beat the Streatham Club by an innings and 2 runs: on the 13th we played Chippenham, on their ground, and won a very pleasant match by an innings and 19 runs. For us W. W. Robinson made 32, and E. D. Robinson 23, and, in the Chippenham men's second innings, Barber took five wickets for one run. Our third victory was achieved against the Non-Collegiates, on the 15th, when we scored 195 for eight wickets, against 32. Our best scores were Hill (not out) 44; W. Robinson 24; and Chapman 23. The sermon in our Chapel on Whitsun Day was preached by Professor Bonney.

C.U.M.S.

The concert of April 5th presented several new features. It was given in the large room of the Guildhall; and the Orchestra of the Musical Society, containing over fifty performers, was heard in public for the first time.

Even without any allowance for the fact that this band was only formed last term, the conductor and all its members are to be congratulated on a really good performance of Mozart's twentieth Piano Concerto, and one of the most charming of Haydn's innumerable Symphonies. We shall expect before long to find that Cambridge will be able to rely on its own orchestral resources in the concerts of November and May.

The Concordia Glee Club sang Webbe's fine prize glee, "Discord, dire sister," and a part-song by Korchat, encored we hope rather for the performance than the composition.

Herr Gompertz's masterly rendering of a Bach fugue for Violin solo, was received with great warmth by the most enthusiastic audience that we remember.

The committee cannot do better than close each series of Popular Concerts with such a performance as that of Wednesday.

The Orchestra numbered 54 performers including the Rev. D. Orpen, (Violoncello) whose name was accidentally omitted from the programme.

PROBLEM III.

Solution:—

Trick 1, 2. A leads Ace and King of Clubs.
3. A leads a Club; B trumps with Ace; Z plays 8 of Hearts.
4. B leads Hearts. A wins.
5. A leads Diamonds; B wins with Queen.
6. B leads Hearts; A wins.
7. A leads Hearts; Z discards from the same suit as B.

9. B plays Ace of Spades.
10. B plays Queen of Spades; Z plays King; A trumps.
11, 12. B makes Ace of Diamonds and Knave of Spades.
13. Z makes last trick having reserved at trick 7 the same suit as B.

N.B.—If at trick 3 Z had played a Spade or Diamond, the play in other respects would be the same as that given; B at trick 7 reserving the suit from which Z had discarded, A and B would make every trick.

OXFORD LETTER.

Oxford at present is full of visitors: but among all its objects of interest there is none that attracts so much attention as a desert in the High, once known as University College. The departed may console themselves with a leading article in the Times, or with the Observer's solemn warning to its readers on no account to confound them with the University: but those who remain have no other consolation but the schools. It is a melancholy sight to see these few sad survivors stalking about the quads like pelicans in the wilderness. Every one should know that it has been an immemorial custom to screw up the dons in University College. Then to omit to do so after a college wine would be worse than passing the wine the wrong way. But of late years the custom has been pretermitted. But providence is just, and University college is no longer at the head of the river. Everyone must sympathise with a noble desire to restore the college to its ancient glory: and it is certainly a great pity that the public should so have mistaken a Conservative re-action. It has been a drama full of interest to the spectators—the Proctor in his robes going up the ladder; disappearing through his window; his breathless instruction to his servant to "send for that locksmith,—the man I had last time, you know;" the college meeting with the President's appeal to his fellows to "act like one Englishman"; the rapid consultation of the dons, all of whom, it subsequently appeared, "strenuously deprecated any such severe measures"; the long line of hansoms, each cheered as it departed by a mob of small boys; and on Thursday morning the gate placarded with "Furnished apartments to let: enquire within"; and to conclude, the Standard's explanation that "the dons had friends coming up for Commemoration and lodgings were expensive."

A deputation of sisters is said to have waited on the Master. Perhaps they are the greatest sufferers. But the Master was stern.

The excitement of going out of training took various forms. In Balliol, rowing perhaps being a sore subject, it became political: and the biggest Conservative that could be found was put into a Liberal's bed. In Magdalen a bonfire was lighted, and the party round it was joined by the dons who had also been celebrating the occasion, and the expostulations of the dean succumbed to the enthusiasm of the common room. New are going to have a ball to celebrate their success in torpids and eights. So, perhaps, are Magdalen, but the times are not settled. Magdalen have never been head before. University have been head most often, Brasenose next, Balliol next.

It is rumoured that the Agamemnon is to be acted in Greek in Balliol Hall. If so, there will be a great demand for Grecian profiles, and blanket: that we hear is to be the costume.

The police consoled themselves for the quietness of the town, by some exciting gown conflicts. On Friday night we were informed that a terrible conflict in the High had ended in three policemen being mortally wounded: soon the three policemen dwindled to one: but he was certainly dying. We now hear that a distinguished University oar cut open a policeman's cheek—hinc illae lacrimae. He has been fined one pound and the cost of the plaster.

Nothing remains of the election now but a few placards urging one to plump for Hall, and the rumours of a coming petition. I saw yesterday chalked up on a college wall

In Oxford town extremes will meet
(So are the fates commanding),
When, striving to regain his seat,
A Tory's lost his standing.

It seems likely to be verified.

Mr. Brandram's reading was a great success, and the singing which accompanied it almost as great.

Enthusiasm is strong, especially, we are told often enough in College chapels, in youth. It was a touching sight to see members of Magdalen jumping into the river and swimming across rather than waiting for the punt, waving the rattle as they swam. But University men must be especially excitable if, as the papers say, they were incited to this rash deed by their "unusual success in the eights." They kept their place.

To avoid possible misconceptions it would be as well to state that the "Mercury" I said Byron is supposed by certain undergraduates to have kept a bear in, is not the metal but a fountain in Christ Church. I say so because you printed it with a small "m."

The warm weather fills the Cherwell with punts and canoes. Here the worn-out eight's man recruits himself after his exertions prostrate in his boat, or, under the shadow of the coming schools and a sycamore, performs the operation known as "work."

The Chancellor of the University came up the day University were sent down. He came to bring his son to matriculate there. He, at least, has faith in the College.

The last two nights of the Eights have yet to be chronicled. On Monday B.N.C. bumped University—Hertford bumped Balliol—Pembroke fell to Trinity early in the race—St. John's caught Christ Church—Worcester caught Keble, and Queen's, who had been been bumped by Oriel on Saturday now returned the compliment.

On Tuesday there was a splendid race all the way between New and University. New were overlapping more than once but failed to make their bump. Exeter caught Balliol very soon—St. John's bumped Corpus—Worcester bumped Christ Church—St. Mary Hall bumped Keble, and Jesus caught Merton,

The Eights on the whole can hardly be said to have been satisfactory. There were far too many bumps made at a very early period in the race, and it seems to be a matter worth considering whether the distance between the boats is not too short. A short bucketting race of a quarter of a mile is not the best thing for the rowing. Magdalen, as were expected, finished Head, They were a very fair crew, and were well together; their names were:—

H. W. Boustead (bow).	6 A. C. Wells.
2 W. E. Austin.	7 J. H. Wharton.
3 G. D. Dakyns.	A. H. Higgins (str)
4 A. E. Stainland.	H. Norman (cox.)
5 J. E. Ivor Yale.

Exeter were a good crew, certainly the best on. They have settled to go to Henley, and they ought certainly to do well there. Unfortunately the new rule limiting the standing of men rowing for the "Ladies" will lose them one good man. Three boats had the misfortune to go down every night, Balliol, Christ Church and Keble. Pembroke went down five places. Exeter made the most bumps, four, and would have made more only for bumps in front. B.N.C., Hertford, Trinity and St. John's made three places each. The eights finished in the following order:—

1 Magdalen	12 Worcester
2 Brasenose	13 Christ Church
3 University	14 St. Mary Hall
4 New	15 Keble
5 Hertford	16 Lincoln
6 Exeter	17 Queen's
7 Balliol	18 Oriel
8 Trinity	19 St. Catharine's
9 Pembroke	20 Jesus
10 St. John's	21 Merton
11 Corpus	22 St. Edmund Hall

The eleven came to grief against the next sixteen. The sixteen went in first and made 247, of which Colebrook (Exeter) made 51, Ridley (Exeter) 40, Peake (Oriel) 37, and Walker (Trinity) 22. The eleven made 103 first innings, and 66 second innings, the only respectable scores being Thornton (St. John's) 35 and 11. Patterson (Pembroke) 6 and 28. The ground was very wet and sticky the second day, which accounts somewhat for the poor display of the eleven.

THE GOLDIE MEMORIAL.

The project for erecting a "Goldie Memorial Bridge" over the Cam has been finally given up, owing to the difficulties in procuring the necessary land. It is now proposed to apply the funds already raised to build a University Boat House. The land has already been acquired, and the Architect's plans have been procured, but further subscriptions will be necessary to meet the expenses.

RECENT ENGLISH ORATORIOS.

To those who watch with affectionate and anxious interest the progress of music in England, it affords matter for solemn thought that so much of the best energies of our best national composers should have been recently directed to the production of Oratorios, and that so little genuine enthusiasm, comparatively speaking, should have been evoked by the works in question.

The explanation of this will seem to many people simple enough. Heaven, they will say, has granted many things to this favoured land, but has refused one. We shall never be able to write music that is worth anything. We need not hope it. The first thing to be said in answer to this representation is that its force is considerably weakened if it can be shown that there are other causes, apart from any want of musical genius in the composers, which would alone be sufficient to prevent these oratorios from being thoroughly successful. Further, it must be remembered that just as great battles have been won by indifferent generals, so works that may really be called successful have been written by men to whom we can scarcely attribute genius in the highest sense of the word. Granting that our composers have wanted the "faculty divine," have the powers that they possess been displayed to the best advantage? May the failure not arise in part from a mistake in the choice of ends, and not merely from inadequacy of means? Have our composers done well in selecting Oratorios as the task on which to expend their best energies? In a word is Oratorio, as a form for further musical composition, "played out?"

There seems to be only one way of studying this question. We must for the present entirely neglect the musical part of our Oratorios, and consider generally the artistic capabilities of subjects of this nature. This can, of course, be done best by examining the libretti of one or two typical works. And it is best to avow at this point that the above considerations have been chiefly suggested by a perusal of Professor Macfarren's latest oratorio—"Joseph." The reception given to this work at its first production was in the highest degree favourable. It was spoken of by one of the leading critics as "the finest work from the pen of one of the most gifted and most distinguished of living English musicians." All this, and very much more that might be quoted to the same effect, makes it the more surprising that scarcely any reference should have been made to the way in which the words have been selected, and the story arranged for musical treatment: indeed it disposes one to doubt whether the critics regarded this as falling within their province at all. An examination of the work from this side may therefore prove not uninstructive; and I fear that such an examination will reveal the fact that "Joseph" is encumbered with certain weaknesses, against which no composer, however able, could struggle with success. Whether, so far as the musical portion of the world is concerned, the verdict first quoted is likely to be ratified, is a question on which I will not attempt to enter. No one doubts Professor Macfarren's ability in the domain of sacred music. Indeed, so far am I from wishing to disparage him that I confess I was disposed to regard as quite transcendent the powers of a composer who could make of such materials a work in any way acceptable.

But before we go any further one or two general observations must be offered on Oratorio libretti. The composer of an Oratorio has evidently the choice of two forms in which to cast his work, the narrative and the dramatic. Of course these may be combined. Each form is attended with difficulties of its own. On the one hand the narrative form demands a number of recitatives assigned to a narrator, and this predominance of recitative, unless the composer has a peculiar gift for composition of this description, is calculated to make the work heavy and uninteresting. On the other hand the dramatic form is attended with equal or greater difficulties. The attempt to represent the characters of sacred history in their own persons, unless very skilfully carried out, is likely to lead to results that, according to the mood of the hearer, will appear either absurd or profane. The cardinal difficulty of the dramatic form, and it is a difficulty which faces us perpetually under different aspects, is this. In the Scripture narrative, scenes are represented merely in outline: much is left to be filled up by the imagination, or perhaps is best not filled up at all. But when a scene is dramatized, and thus brought before our eyes, vagueness is no longer possible. Instead of infinite possibilites you have extremely finite realities. It fell once to my lot to hear a sermon, perhaps the most remarkable I ever listened to, preached by a Welsh minister at Llandudno. Its peculiarity consisted in an irresistible tendency of the preacher to dramatize every scriptural event to which he referred. For instance, in speaking of Abraham's sojourn in tents he proceeded in some such way as this: "Now you might think that a good many people would come to Abraham and say 'Well, Abraham, this is a pleasant sort of place, this Hebron: why don't you build yourself a mansion of brick, or of stone, Abraham?' 'Oh no' says Abraham 'the Lord has commanded me not to build a house. I shall just have a tent for Sarah and me, and we'll enlarge it when the Son of Promise comes.'" The congregation consisted of two parts, Welsh and Saxon. The former evidently accepted this vivid colouring as the only reasonable way of putting things: with the latter there was an evident contest between the feelings of amusement and horror, the former, however, predominating.

Somehow or other, then, this difficulty has to be overcome by the librettist if the dramatic form be selected. And in order fully to estimate the difficulty by considering the various expedients resorted to for getting over it, it will be instructive to refer back to the libretto of Professor Macfarren's earliest Oratorio, "St. John the Baptist." The form adopted here is a mixture of the dramatic and narrative. In the dramatic portions of this work, where the words that it is necessary for any character to say are not to be found in the original narrative, one expedient adopted for supplying their deficiency is to piece together texts that seem appropriate to the situation from other portions of the Bible. Thus, the daughter of Herodias when she dances before Herod sings a song the words of which are drawn from one place in the Book Ecclesiastes and two in the Book of Proverbs: and Herod himself expresses the wicked desires of his heart in strictly biblical phraseology, as if to show that the devil can quote scripture for his purposes.

The same difficulty is met by quite a different expedient in the duet between St. John and Herod; St. John tells Herod "It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife." Herod, not being provided with any repartee, ejaculates "Ha!" like the bad baron in a melodrama.

Towards the close of the same duet we get an instance of a third expedient. This consists in taking the words of the original narrative and dramatizing them by a simple change of the third person into the first. We read in our authorised version (Mark vi., 20), "For Herod feared John knowing that he was a just man and a holy; and observed him; and when he heard him he did many many things, and heard him gladly." Now these words in themselves strike one as unsatisfactory; in point of fact both the reading of the Greek text and the translation are to some extent uncertain. But quite undeterred by any considerations of this sort the librettist boldly adapts the whole to Herod's uncongenial mouth, and makes him say (or sing) as follows:

I fear thee, knowing that thou art a just man and a holy. I will observe thee: yea, I will do many things; and I will hear thee gladly.

This (very safe) promise of Herod's to "do many things" reminds one a little of the threat with which poor old Lear relieves his mind;

I will do such things—
What they are yet I know not.

Let us take just one more example of this extraordinary tailoring process by which the material of the Gospel narration is made up into a dramatic dress. The "expedient" resorted to here is the same as in the example last quoted.

Chorus of Nobles—She goeth forth to take counsel with her mother. What will she ask? Behold she cometh straightway with haste unto the King. What will she ask?

Salome—O King, I will that thou give me by and by in a charger the head of John the Baptist.

Herod—I am exceeding sorry."

It is strange that the librettist should not have seen how utterly these words put into Herod's mouth fail to give the spirit of the word that represent them in the original narrative. When we read "And the king was exceeding sorry," the words do really convey to us that he felt very strongly. But when a man is exceeding sorry he does not deliberately say "I am exceeding sorry." This is more the expression that he might use in declining an invitation to dinner on the ground of a previous engagement. No one can imagine that the language in which a man expresses his emotion is the same as that in which a witness or a narrator would assert that the other was possessed by that emotion. I may say "That man is in a violent passion;" but if the man referred to were to say "I am in a violent passion," I should know that he was getting better. And this consideration alone seems to use a sufficient condemnation of the "expedient" here adopted.

Proceeding now to "Joseph," we find that its libretto is distinguished by the introduction of yet another expedient for padding out the narrative skeleton into dramatic substantiality. The various dramatic scenes in this work are cast in what is called "dialogue." But here the old difficulty occurs. The words of scripture, generally speaking, give only an outline of what the principal character in any scene says. The replies of the subordinate personages had then to be supplied from the inner consciousness of the librettist. But fearful of profaning the sacred words by any secular addition of his own he has with a flash of inspiration solved the problem in a mode which bears the mark of all truly great inventions—extreme simplicity. It consists in making these subordinate characters echo the words of the principal speaker. To exhibit the effect of this device it is only necessary to quote No. 5:—

Reuben and the nine brethren. Our father loveth Joseph more than all his brethren; we hate him and cannot speak peaceably unto him.

(Here again we may notice that though the language from which this is adapted may describe hate very well, this is scarcely the language in which hate would be expressed.)

Joseph. Hear, I pray you, this dream which I have dreamed.

Reuben and the nine. A dream which thou hast dreamed?

Joseph. Behold we were binding sheaves in the field, and lo my sheaf arose and also stood upright.

Reuben and the nine. Thy sheaf arose?

Joseph. And behold your sheaves stood round about and made obeisance to my sheaf.

Reuben and the nine. Shalt thou indeed reign over us? Shalt thou indeed have dominion over us? (Aside.) We hate him yet the more for his dreams and for his words.

Joseph. I have dreamed a dream more.

Reuben and the nine. A dream more?

And so on. It has been reserved for the author of the libretto of "Joseph" to discover the resources of imitation as a device not merely in music but in drama.

Another admirable example of the same thing is to be found in an earlier number, the duet (No. 4) between Jacob and Joseph. Copying the words as they run in the music, we have as follows:—

Jacob. And I have made thee a coat of many colours: a coat.
Joseph. A coat?
Jacob. A coat—
Joseph. A coat?
Jacob. A coat—
Joseph. A coat?
Both. Of many colours.

The delight of Joseph in his new finery so clearly betrays a vain and unregenerate heart that for the future our sympathies are entirely on the side of the brethren.

But probably the finest effect to which our librettist has been led by his adhesion to the dramatic form occurs at the point where Joseph is sold to the Ishmaelites. The Ishmaelites come jogging along with their laden camels, and sing as follows, no doubt by way of advertisement:

We come from Gilead with our camels, bearing spicery and balm and myrrh, going to carry it down to Egypt.

The following dialogue then occurs:—

The nine brethren. Let us draw and lift up Joseph out of the pit: we will sell him to you, Ishmaelites, for twenty pieces of silver.

Ishmaelites: For twenty pieces of silver—for twenty pieces of silver? (after a slight pause, and then very decidedly) We buy him!

The whole scene is brought vividly before our eyes: the brethren name their price without unbusinesslike haggling, and apparently without consultation. The Ishmaelites pause in a meditative attitude. The words of the offer just made them dwell in their thoughts and unconsciously escape from their lips. Perhaps they are incredulous—perhaps they are suspicious. But suddenly all doubts are resolved: they feel that this is too good a thing to let slip, and the simultaneous shout of the Ishmaelites proclaims that they are "on." Truly, "where they do agree on the stage their unanimity is wonderful." The only thing wanting is a stroke of the big drum to suggest the fall of the hammer, announcing that Joseph is "going, going, gone!"

A HOBBY.

It is commonly thought the privilege of age to have hobbies, and it would be well if the monopoly were more than nominal. Unfortunately young men also take to hobby-riding; and though a young man's seat may not be quite so firm as his father's, his riding is rather more eager and impulsive. But there is a very great difference in our indulgence for these two classes of equestrians. The older has our sympathy, the younger our disapproval, if not more. When people are growing old, and the sphere of work in the world is narrowing for them, we feel it natural and right that there be some non-professional interest, some one subject—it may be the growing of large peaches, or the health of their neighbours, or even the study of metaphysics—which in the form of occupation shall give them the proper pleasures of holiday amusement. Life's larger work being nearly done, we do not grudge them the narrowing of routine, the shortening of vision from which very few old men are exempted. And if their seemingly whimsical admonitions or exactions pain us now and then by contrast with their former temper, still both love and duty urge us to indulge the leaning of age. The death of the vexing Polonius was more pathetically mourned by Ophelia, than the incalculable and ruinous conduct of her lover. But there are some narrowings of life and some blindnesses which take place much too soon. Whims offend us in a man whose hair is not touched with grey. As regards unfortunate prejudices from early education and home life, it is natural indeed to retain them even beyond youth, and it is in some cases only a long and painful effort that can quite free us from them. But when young men take up a new idea and measure all things by it, adopting a peculiarity of speech, manner, or thought, then we are struck by a painful and ridiculous anachronism; for the prerogative of the old is claimed by the young, a prerogative too, which few old men would ever be pleased to think they were exercising.

Here perhaps we light on the most fundamental distinction between them. The old man's hobby is mounted half unconsciously. He has not searched the market for it. It is an animal bred on his place, and in which his interest has grown until at last it is become his favourite cob. The young man's method is different. Though he may not have a full knowledge of what he is doing, he has a fairly conscious intention to do it. Self-consciousness, that questionable boon to the higher organisms, exercises itself more in the years of development from boy to man, than at any other time in human life. We awake fully to our own existence, becoming conscious of ourselves and our needs; our importance or unimportance to others, our necessary relations to the large world of society, art, science, politics, and the urgent want of some fixed creed in each and all of these matters. This common self-consciousness of ours plays off many tricks on us, now charming us with a heaven of possibilities, now dashing the picture with a brushful of merciless reality. As known to "plain men" it may hardly claim brotherhood, and certainly not identity with that solemnly-marching and glorified self-consciousness which some philosophers possess, and which may or may not contain all the value of life. One of its least admirable performances is exactly this hobby-dealing. When a young man feels that he really must hold something fixed he snatches too readily at something striking. He demands general sufficiency, but is unfortunately not yet a practised judge of it. Of course a modern young man's hobby must be more intellectual than an old man's. Peaches are a very small thing in the universe of law; even butterflies are a poor speciality, and a young man conscious of a developing or developed cerebrum, must have something appropriate to employ it on. Now-a-days we take wide views where our grandfathers had none at all; so we easily become reflective while they are active, inverting the almost proverbial relation of the ages.

The particular hobby intended to-day, is accordingly one of thinking and speaking rather than of acting. There are many such on view. We choose one as merely typical, not exhaustive of the class. It is speculative, and yet may be ruinously practical. It is destructive, but unfortunately not obviously self-destructive. Its drawing-room name is Pessimism.

The young pessimist is not always sad by nature. He has been converted to the mournful creed in good part by reading and thought. His thought has been most active perhaps in debating societies and over the newspaper as he "watches" events. He has looked at the stars and pondered on the nothingness of things, and has wondered sadly at the dark change in a mountain stream that passes through a town. He has read with concern a book or two in English, which give the views of a serious man of the world, and some poetry of a sad naturalism, perhaps. He has even cut open several hundred pages of German, which easily show to his unbiassed mind that life must be for all men a very weary thing, and that all men are liars except himself and the serious Teuton who has printed so much and converted him. The speculative sadness which thus comes upon him, and which would probably sour his temper permanently if his mind were as intense as he thinks it is, may have arisen partly from occurrences in real life, for which he may honestly claim everyone's sympathy; and which, disappointing him in things particular, unhappily darken also his view of things general. Unfortunate love perhaps and experience of human doubleness, happening to come at a time of growth and development, may have been the occasioning cause, while the modern intellectualism above mentioned affords an important permanent condition.

There does come a time to most men when the whole world seems to harden, when the animating spirit flies away, and all that is worth living for either retires into some other life than ours or entirely vanishes; when in the words of Goethe's "Werther," now perhaps a little thrown into shade by another later grown melancholy of ideas, the universe is like an "ever cud-chewing monster:" an appellation more expressive than picturesque; but the reality is not picturesque. This state of highly sensitive feeling, and therefore of unbalanced thought, is, as the world says, morbid. Few people of good constitution have escaped measles, and all men have some time or other been melancholy. Some like to remain physically invalided; young men generally do not. But mental ill-health, if harmonised with a philosophical creed, has a charm of its own. It is "not beautiful but interesting;" and some find in it a resource, surrounded as they are by doings and interests which they can very easily reduce to an exhibition of mere Will, and themselves feel the nothingness of.

Such a sombre temper can produce a considerable, and sometimes even an agreeable effect on others. But this last only when the matter is not taken too seriously. A playful pessimist may be a very good companion. But of all the griefs of this world a sad young man is the worst; and unless he would kill off his companions thus sideways, and so clear the world of the unlucky human race, let him cease to wear his own contemplative misery on his sleeve.

This is not the place for consideration of abstruse philosophy, but we may recommend one small logical difficulty to the attention of the less stalwart Pessimistical thinkers. One William Shakspeare wrote a play "As you like it," in which is a melancholy man Jaques, who amuses himself by saying sad things about the world in a charming way; in fact enjoys his melancholy, and makes other people enjoy it. If pleasure be a worthless thing, this kind of pleasurable contemplation must be below the dignity of any consistent man. It is very nearly identical with that pleasurable pity-feeling which Herbert Spencer, tentatively indeed, brings into close relation with the whole story of the higher organic life; a feeling therefore to be carefully examined and hardly indulged. If, however, our pessimist does admit the value of pleasure in this case, and continues to follow it, thereby admitting that other people also may and should have at least their refined pleasures, then behold our despiser of all knowable things crossing the threshold of the gayer Utilitarianism, where he may try improving on Jaques with our approval as well as his own. His new creed is at least a living one, and to some extent fitted for world-inhabitants, if not for Immortals. But he can then no more speak, or act, or think as a Pessimist pure.

If any melancholy man have read so far, perhaps he will read a few words more. Pessimism does not imply a superiority of mental or of moral balance. The name is now about as much hackneyed and as casually used as the reality is diverse and wavering. Newspaper correspondents are to-day "pessimistic," to-morrow "optimistic;" and the Russian Nihilists are only half Utopia-seekers, half are irresponsible madmen about universal destruction. Almost everyone must suffer now and then from intellectual nightmare, and every bad dream vanishes in the fresh morning air. Besides, young manhood is not a time for fixity in any new creed. The impulse with which we seize one may be genuine and manly; but it is needful at any rate to be prepared for later additions to it, if not for alterations of it. So far as any faith or view can be said to exist for the sake of development in thought or life, we may place Pessimism in the same stage with Scepticism. It is of itself desperate. Many of us feel that Metaphysical Scepticism does but clear the ground for a practical and constructive knowledge, leaving room in a healthy mind for plenty of imaginative hopes. Similarly a pessimistic view of life, while momentarily benumbing or even temporarily paralysing, can hardly ever last on in a true man's heart, but will make way for fresh and intelligent effort in a world no longer despised or hated.

POETRY.

ON A FAVOURITE PARROT,

Which Escaped on the First of May, and has not been Recovered.

Flown! If Greek fancy hold our faith,
That spirits wing, as birds, their way,
Part of a human soul took flight
With thee that day. (1)

One purpose less. The thoughts that set
Round that poor purpose, planned thy fare,
Nor lowlier ministry disdained,
Ache for their care.

'Tis not thy form of ruffled grey
And drooping red our grief demands,
Thy yellow shrinking eye, charred tongue,
And wrinkled hands.

Rather thy mimic art of speech,
Which oft with snatch of sense would fill
The lagging time, as if with ours
Conspired thy will.

Yet no! it is love's daily use
That wound the little that thou art,
The sameness of thy petty ways,
About our heart.

What cuckoo cry hath won thee hence?
Though all the wooded spaces ring,
Lone stranger, there shall come to thee
No vocal spring.

Would'st thou against those silver thrills
And rapture changing lest it cloy,
Against the lark's sweet wellings pit
Thy harsh annoy?

Alien! those beaks may pluck and pierce
Which now love's gentler chorus swell:
The rescuing human hand may take
To starve or sell.

Thee have I seen; but one I heard,
Between the meadow and the mill,
At the way's turning, deep in boughs
Which now are still,

Calling and clanging on the air,
When the years thawed, as if to greet
The first faint flutter of the spring,
Harsh presage sweet. (2)

She went: thou followest; and the news
Comes wrapt in picture of thy prime,
A woman with her bird at play,
Tear-stained by time. (3)

This touched me; and I wrote these lines,
Discordant as discarded lute
Which jangles with a shivering wind,
Thenceforward mute.

(1) Departed spirits are often represented on Greek monuments as birds or bird-like forms.

(2) There used to be a parrot in a garden at Grantchester, which was put out in the garden as soon as the weather began to be warm. It is some years since I have heard it.

(3) The letter which contained the intelligence of the parrot's loss was enclosed in an old faded envelope with this device upon it.

TO MY PIPE.

Meerschaum, efficacious soother,
When the soul is torn with strife!
Sort of universal smoother
Of the ups-and-downs of life!

For an hour, as in my chair I
Sit and puff thy magic smoke,
I forget the throng of wary
Duns in ambush round my 'oak.'

For an hour that ghastly, daily-
Haunting phantom, Littlego,
(Classics! Mathematics!! Paley!!!)
Leaves me for the realms below.

For an hour that spectre flies—is Little better than a myth—
While a lovelier vision rises,
Namely, S*ph*n*sb* Sm*th!

Sometimes thou hast been untrue, and
Not unfrequently the cause
Of the fines I've paid, pursuant
To the stern Proctorial laws.

Sometimes, when (in moments lazy)
I have smoked thee in excess,
Thou hast tangled all my hazy
Senses in a hopeless mess.

Yet with passion unabated,
Thee I cling to, thee adore,
For the various reasons, stated
Supra—stanzas 1 to 4.

Meerschaum, well may poets liken
Thee to her who from the main
Rose, the foam-born queen of—Why, confound thee! thou art out again!

THE PAPER-KNIFE.

"An Elementary Text Book of Botany," translated from the German of Dr. K. Prantl, the translation revised by S. H. Vines, M.A., Fellow and Lecturer of Christ's College, Cambridge. London: Sonnenschein & Allen, 1880. 6s.

There is no dearth of text-books in Botany, occupying a position intermediate between the primer or "Elementary Lessons," and the magnificent "Lehrbuch" of Sachs. But almost without exception those in the English language share one common weakness: they are antiquated both in manner and matter, and worse than antiquated in their illustrations. One exception there is, in the case of the manual of one who, in his day, was the chief and almost the only British vegetable physiologist, and which in the hands of Dr. Masters has had to some extent the new grafted upon the old. The result, as in the old parable of the garments, is not an unmixed success. The eyes of botanists have consequently turned toward Germany, where Vegetable Physiology and Anatomy have been followed up with that enthusiasm which in England has mostly been reserved for the study of Systematic Botany, and this is not the first German intermediate text-book, a translation of which is in the English market. It is, however, the first which, whether in accuracy, or in a philosophical treatment of the subject, is fit to be placed in the hands of the budding student. But even it has its utility for the English student grievously impaired by its origin.

In the preface to the English edition, the Editor says that "this book was written by Professor Prantl to meet a growing demand for a work on Botany, which, while less voluminous than the well-known 'Lehrbuch' of Professor Sachs, should resemble it in its mode of treatment of the subject, and should serve as an introduction to it.' Perhaps it is captious to suggest that a book might have a higher aim in existence than to serve even as an introduction to the Text Book of Sachs. That work is so invaluable as far as it goes that there is a danger of its being looked upon as the great aim of botanical knowledge to "get up Sachs." Its incompleteness renders this danger a really serious one. The tendency of examination papers for a few years (and in some places even yet) to run in the lines there laid down, to the almost complete exclusion of at least one half of botanical knowledge, will sufficiently illustrate my meaning. Prof. Prantl's work copies that of Sachs in its great morphological weakness, as well as in its anatomical and physiological excellence. The study of Vegetable Morphology is the necessary preliminary to the study of any section of Botanical Science, and in this department lies the first great weakness of this book.

Part I, however, is not alone generally insufficient for the purpose of giving a fair notion of the forms of plants to the student, but it is not always perfectly reliable in fact, and its divergence in places from the standard English nomenclature (and in this department we are excelled by none) may cause unnecessary confusion in the mind of the student. For example on pages 9, 12, and 13 rachis is used only as a term applied to the axis of a compound leaf (as also it is however by Professor Asa Gray), while English authorities apply it to the axis of an inflorescence, and to the petiole of the frond of ferns. On page 10 palmate leaves are described as having a number of equal diverging veins. On page 12 is a figure of the "pinnatisected (sic!) leaves of Papaver Argemone." The figure is that of a "pinnatipartite," and not a "pinnatisect" leaf. (By the way in English floras this plant, with doubtful accuracy, is spoken of as having "bi-pinnatifid" leaves). On the same page the "imparipinnate unijugate leaf of Medicago" is thus distinguished from the "ternate leaf of clover." It would be much simpler, and more morphologically accurate, if the former were spoken of as "pinnately" and the latter as "palmately" trifoliate. On page 13 the ascidium, or pitcher, is spoken of as a modified lamina. Now apart from the fact that the ascidium in different plants varies in morphological character, and that to put it down simply as a modification of one organ is hardly wise,—in no case except perhaps Utricularia is it generally considered to be a modified lamina, in Sarracenia and Cephalotus, being probably a phyllode (or modified petiole) and in Nepenthes (the example given) a glandular development from the apex of the midrib. On page 19 the word phyllode is applied to the flattened leaf-like branches of Ruscus (the butcher's broom), while on page 220 these are correctly named phylloclades, and on page 281 the name phyllode is also, and correctly, applied to the expanded petioles of Australian Mimoseæ.

Of Part II, the Anatomy of Plants, and III, Physiology, it is impossible to speak in terms of too high praise. Written in a succinct and lucid style in the original German, and translated into English of equal quality, the student would indeed be a poor one who, when he had entered upon one of these chapters, did not feel his interest excited, and when he had carefully worked through the whole, with the addition of practical work whenever possible, had not a thoroughly philosophical elementary knowledge of this part of the subject. Yet even here confusion is, and it appears to me quite unnecessarily, caused by doubt as to the use of the word "assimilation." In the preface the Editor says:—"Further, I have not designated the decomposition of carbonic acid and water by the chlorophyll under the influence of light, by the term "assimilation," as is usually done. This term has already a well-defined meaning in Physiology, and it is therefore a mistake to reintroduce it in another sense. At the same time I do not feel myself quite in a position to suggest a term to replace it." Accordingly on looking to what is usually known as "Assimilation," one finds it spoken of as the "Absorption of Carbon." What other "well-defined meaning" assimilation has is left entirely to the imagination, as, on looking for the term in the index, behold it is not. Yet if the student refers to Sachs, or to any of the English manuals he finds this very process of the decomposition of carbonic acid and fixation of carbon spoken of as "assimilation," and on page 77 of this very book the same process is casually referred to under the same name.

Similar praise can be bestowed on that portion of Part IV, Classification, which deals with Cryptogamia, and the introduction to the study of Phanerogamia, though perhaps a little more attention might have been paid to the Morphology of the floral organs, since that portion is omitted in Part I. We note that in the Thallophyta, the division into Algæ and Fungi is still retained, though Mr. Vines introduces the student to the latest arrangement of Sachs in the form of an interpolated section. How best to deal in print with these parallel Fungal and Algal forms appears hitherto to have puzzled botanists; might I suggest as a way out of the difficulty the employment of opposite pages—say the left hand pages for the achlorophyllous forms (Fungi) and the right hand for the chlorophyllous (Algæ). Thus the parallelism of the two sides of the class could be retained, exact or incomplete parallellism on the part of the subsidiary sections being represented by their commencing at equivalent positions on the different pages.

When one turns to the details of classification a keen sense of disappointment is felt at the fact than in this English edition a peculiar German system of Classification is adopted. This appears to me to be doubly unfortunate. The book is meant to serve as an introduction to the text book of Sachs, and yet Sachs' details of his system of classification occupy but a dozen pages, while this introduction occupies nearly a hundred. But there is something more than this. This edition is intended for the English student. Now England possesses perhaps the largest systematic literature in the world, and a definite and elaborate system of classification; a system which, with slight modifications, is in use in all English speaking countries, in France and the Latin countries, in Northern Europe, and even in the great majority of the systematic works of Germany itself. The introduction of a peculiar and nearly unused system of classification into a work intended for students is greatly to be regretted. The editor probably did not feel justified in changing it, but I would most strongly urge that in any future editions the modified de Candollean system of classification be adopted.

The œconomic portions, placed in small print, appear to me to be well chosen, a few misprints in the names can be readily detected by those who are likely to be affected by them. I notice that in Fumariaceæ, the dissections of Dicentra spectabilis, are figured under the erroneous name of Dielytra spectabilis. The history of this name is a curious one. The name Dicentra, (derived from δίς double and κέντρον spur) was given to the genus by Borkhausen, but by a typographical error it was, in his original description of the genus, printed Diclytra. This name was copied, as correct, by De Candolle, in Syst. Veg. ii. p. 107. In compiling his Flora Boreali Americana, in 1840 Hooker fils, apparently unable to account for the etymology of Diclytra, by a erroneous conjecture altered it to Dielytra (i. 35). Professor Asa Gray in the "manual of the Botany of the Northern United States" (5th ed. 1848) corrected the blunder, shewing that the original word Diclytra was a printer's error, and that Borkhausen had given the etymology (as above) quite correctly and with his original description. Perhaps it is true therefore that the synonyms Diclytra and Dielytra should be relegated to the obscurity of old Herbaria and nursery gardens. I miss too, with regret, in Prof. Prantl's work any sketch of the theory and history of classification, an omission of considerable importance in a work, nearly one half of which is devoted to systematic Botany.

It is therefore with mingled feelings that we glance through this book. There is much in it to cordially welcome, and not a little to awake disappointment. It fills a gap in our literature which all existing works seem only to aggravate, but at the same time it will not obviate the necessity to an ordinary student of some other work treating more carefully of the morphological and more rationally of the systematic portions. It is at the same time the most perfect and the most imperfect book of its kind in our language. Once more the thought comes uppermost in our mind, Why cannot some English teacher introduce to us an English book, with the German excellencies combined with those in which England is unequalled? Why will they be satisfied with making translations, without even attempting adaptations? Admirable as in many respects Prof. Prantl's work is, it does not supply all our need.

One word more. I need say nothing about illustrations, except that as far as they go (and that is much further than any work below Sachs) they are perfect. My last word is on the subject of price. In England we are tolerably accustomed to having a translation produced at about double the cost of the original. A German work, costing 15 marks, is reproduced, with the same plates, but bound in cloth, at a guinea and a half; a French one costing 35 francs is, under similar conditions, reproduced at two and a half guineas. In this respect the present work is a remarkable exception. It is cheap, as well as good.

W. HILLHOUSE.

"The Ode of Life," by the Author of "The Epic of Hades." Kegan Paul & Co., 1880.

There is much in a title, whatever there may be in a name; "to good wine they do use good bushes, and good books prove the better by the help of good titles;" the Author of the "Epic of

Digitized by Google

Hades" has been peculiarly felicitous in the titles of his books. In this his latest work he traces life through its varied phases in a series of eleven minor Odes, wisely, thus escaping the monotony consequent on a single Ode of the necessary length. The Ode of Creation" sketches the creation of the earth (not according to Moses), and the development of Life, of Man, and of the Individual. In the "Ode of Infancy" we see the babe with its "infinite possibilities of life," born in a palace or left by the way-side: a study that will probably be extremely appreciated by the mind feminine. The "Ode of Childhood" shews the boy and girl, the two "Fair streams . . . .

One swift and strong and deep,
One where the lilies sleep," soon to be in the "Ode of Youth" the young man and maiden: the studies of Girlhood and Maidenhood are drawn with all the graceful purity and instinctive delicacy that characterise all Mr. Morris' studies of women: the Odes of Childhood and Youth are two of the best in the book. To these naturally succeeds the "Ode of Love," for "how of life to sing, and yet not tell of love:" this Ode is not so happy, it is much too passionless, the course of his love runs much too smooth: the author pleads a voice untrained to love's "celestial strain." More congenial seems the "Ode of Perfect Years," telling of Fatherhood, Motherhood, Labour, and Rest: here, though the subjects and treatment are scarcely remarkable for extreme novelty, are many fine passages and lines: in this Ode occurs the somewhat strange statement that our being is born "of shamefastness and scorn." Following this are the Odes of Good and Evil; the first being a Hymn of Praise to the Creator, the second setting forth the advantages and disadvantages of evil. Evil is bad. "Toil takes the world, and pain," all things "Travail, and groan, and fain would be at rest," yet we are to console ourselves with the reflection that "There were no Good, indeed, were there no Ill."

The assertion that

"Right and Wrong, Approach the nearer that they grow more long,"

Seems more poetic than true: the author seems to have had a private revelation of the mystic events occurring "at the eternal feet." How does a circle round itself?

From this we pass through the "Ode of age" Life's Autumn, the time of calmness and peace, to the "Ode of Decline":

"The Book of Life lies open at its latest page":

In this Ode the picture of the Old, when life seems almost gone, living in the past, thinking of the years and friends that are gone,

"Till only what is past and gone doth seem To live, and all the present is a dream"— is full of truth and touching pathos: This is that "last scene of all that ends life's strange eventful history." The last of the series is the "Ode of Change." Death:

"Death! there is not any Death; only infinite change,
Only a place of life which is novel and strange.
Change! there is naught but change and renewal of strife,
Which make up the infinite changes we sum up in life."

This is one of the best of the Odes—probably the best: it is certainly the most powerful: Mr. Morris seems strongly attracted by the subject, elsewhere he has beautifully termed it "that strange life we blindly christen death."

As a whole the poem is very good; the writer says that "nothing more mature can be expected from him." This is perhaps true, but it may suggest itself to some readers that the maturity has been attained—as it almost unavoidably must be—at the expense of that freshness so marked a feature in his earliest work.

Next to the "Epic of Hades" it is his best work; but the limpid purity, the calm coldness of his style is better suited to a poem like the Epic than to a subject such as the "Ode of Life:" Also his blank verse—almost perfect as it is—far surpasses his rhymed verse.

It may be noticed that the writer seems to refer in a few lines of the 'Ode of Infancy' unobtrusively and delicately to a subject recently more voluminously treated by a Cambridge aspirant to poetic honours.

The Cambridge Bible for Schools. The Gospel according to St. Luke. Edited for the Syndics of the University Press. Cambridge, 1880.

Dr. Farrar is less lurid in his style as a commentator than as a preacher, and consequently more valuable. This edition of St. Luke's Gospel is a useful and interesting little book. It is happy in containing, what the author's "Life of Christ" so much needed, the writing of the Evangelist at the head of the page; and the commentary below is judicious. It is indeed guilty of the mis-ch[illegible]fice of containing Greek words in English characters, so that school-teachers, who do not know Greek, and who will form a large proportion of the readers, will be encouraged in the idea that there is some credit in knowing the sound of the original Greed words apart from a genuine knowledge of the language. A few Greek words are written in their proper characters (pages 157, 158 etc,) and in the name of honesty, the same should be the case with all. The absurdity of the following remark might then have been so palpable as to exclude it: "Nets] Here diktua or castingnets (from dikô I throw, funda, jaculum)"... (p. 112.) On the other hand this little affectation is more than counterbalanced by many good qualities. The notes are enlivened by frequent snatches of poetry. The ingratitude of the nine lepers is an opportunity for quoting "Blow, blow, thou winter wind," and two following lines. Most of the quotations are more worth making. There is a useful introduction and index, such as all the volumes of this series possess, and some good excursuses at the end, of which II on the double genealogies of Christ, is (like all Dr. Farrar's work) quite readable and instructive. The illustrations of St. Luke derived from the Talmud, contained in VII, are noteworthy as being now published for the first time.

Exemplaria Cheltonensia, by Herbert Kynaston, M.A. London, Macmillan and Co., 1880. pp. 143.

In this volume the Principal of Cheltenham College prints about 50 Latin renderings of passages from English poets—"quae discipulis suis carmina identidem Latine reddenda proposuit, ipse reddidit, ex cathedra dictavit." The book is thus evidently intended "in tironum usum", and accordingly does not pretend to rival such books as the Sabrinae Corolla or Mr. Jebb's Translations. However, pieces of high merit may be found amongst Mr. Kynaston's Exemplaria. The Elegiacs appear to us the best feature in the book. As a specimen, we quote the beautiful rendering of some lines of Bryant:

Airs that wander and murmur round,
Bearing delight where'er ye blow,
Make in the elms a lulling sound,
While my lady sleeps in the shade below!
Lighten and lengthen her noon-day rest,
Till the heat of the noon-day sun is o'er:
Sweet be her slumbers; though in my breast
The pain she has waked may slumber no more.

O vaga, quae blando circum nemus, aura, susurro
Undique delicias quo juvat ire vehis,
Murmura per tilias defer suadentia somnos
Sopitam leviter qua tegit umbra Chloen.
Huic facilem et longam mediâ de luce quietem
Dum sol inclinans deprimat axis iter.
Sit secura quies illi: mea pectora quamvis
Maceret aeternus quem ciet illa dolor.

Equally good Hexameter pieces might also be quoted. Mr. Kynaston's Lyrics are, perhaps, on the whole less successful. We note a somewhat unusual construction of the Alcaic third line in two adjoining stanzas on page 29;

"Detergeo et pilis honorem" (ix. 3).
"Mendacium incertaeque vitae" (ix. 7).

Should not this have been avoided in a book intended mainly for schoolboys and teachers of schoolboys?

And what of the following stanza?

* * * *

Artemque honestam? rite vocaveris
Illum beatum, quo populus duce
Stat pacis auctor diligendae,
Quemque regit populum peritus (xlii).

* * * *

This is surely heavily burdened by the prosaic "illum beatum," the rhythm of the third line and the clumsy repetition of "populum."

We notice a few misprints: e.g. face (L. 4)? pace; and stillentis (XL. 9)? stillantis. But these are small blemishes. We must conclude by expressing our satisfaction that Mr. Kynaston should have found time, amidst the multifarious duties of a Head-master, for the publication of this attractive volume.

SUPPLEMENT TO

The Cambridge Review.

No. 22. WEDNESDAY, MAY 19, 1880.

THE RIVER.

The unusually long period of practice has not been without the effect which we foresaw and foretold in our first number of this term. During the past week rumours, and something more than rumours, have been circulated with regard to quick times over the course.

The different ways in which these reports have been received by the various rowing authorities have been highly amusing, some have scoffed, some have believed, others have feared, whilst others again have set to work on the true British principle of nescia vinci, and have been stimulated to an attempt to rival these monstrosities of the times.

Hitherto we have always considered that a course from Little Bridge to the hedge above Charon's ought to be done in about 10 mins. 8 secs. if a boat in the higher parts of the First Division means to do well; such calculations, however, have been completely upset by the performances of the last week.

Many explanations have been offered for these remarkable courses, of which only two recommend themselves to us, viz., the long practice, and the strong and favourable winds; of these two, neither has probably been of more assistance than the other to the much-enduring sons of the oar.

As this is our last opportunity of offering a word of advice to those, who this afternoon will row the first race of May, 1880, we do not intend to be prolix in our precepts, it is too late now to try and mend faults, so that all we recommend is to keep it long and not to start at too fast a stroke. A great many really good boats are spoilt by starting off at a stroke of about 40 per minute; this stroke is all very well for the last rush, but at the beginning of the course it may be disastrous, since in every boat will be found someone who is apt to "lose his head" at that exciting moment when the last gun goes, and for such a man a stroke of "forty" does away with all possibility of recovering himself. After mentioning these "perils of waters" it is only right to say a word about the perils of the land, that is of the towing-path; its condition is such as greatly to endanger the safety of those gentlemen who, as our sporting contemporaries have it, "advise from the bank." It is hardly more than a fortnight since a member of the Clare boat received, whilst riding on the bank, injuries which, almost miraculously, were not serious; hardly had we ended our congratulations to this fortunate gentleman upon his escape when Armytage, who was coaching a boat, and whose knowledge of riding must, owing to his education and birthplace, be equal to that of any member of the University, was thrown, owing to the fact that his horse stumbled and fell, in one of the many holes which render the towing-path absolutely unsafe. We are thankful to say that Mr. Armytage's injuries are not so serious as was at first feared; and it is anticipated that he will be able to serve his college at Henley. We are not aware under whose jurisdiction falls the repairing of the towing-path, but we most certainly hope that that functionary will awaken to a sense of his own responsibilities.

The enviable place of "Head of the River" no doubt will still remain in the possession of its present owners. If report speaks true, the time in which Jesus have accomplished the course is wonderful, even in these days of fair winds and long practice. The accident which deprived them of the services of Armytage does not seem to have affected the boat much; and this afternoon at least promises to be a paddle over for them.

Lady Margaret will probably give way to Caius, if the latter can only do as well in the races as they have done in practice; as however, the Lady Margaret boat is distinctly below average; this is not meant to be taken as a very great piece of praise for Caius. The crew is a rough one, and we still adhere to our last week's opinion.

The authorities of First Trinity I. seem at last to have settled upon the men for their boat. The stroke thwart has been filled till quite recently by Gubbins, but he has been displaced by Biram who has been stroking the second boat, which, under his leadership, is said once to have done a faster time than the first boat did on the same day. It seems hardly probable in spite of the benefit they have undoubtedly derived from their change, that this boat will do much in the ensuing Races, the boats above them, if we except L.M.B.C. I. are very good, whilst behind them they have at least one boat which might make matters rather uncomfortable for them.

Third Trinity I. are hardly what we expected and hoped, they are, strange to say, not very well together, and as that virtue is a sine qua non with Third Trinity rowing, they will have to be very careful lest Trinity Hall prove unpleasant neighbours to them.

Trinity Hall are probably at the present moment in tip top condition and, if this only lasts them through the races, ought to do extremely well and register quite two bumps; they are however a light crew and it is with anxiety that we see them quite the most finished crew on the river. They have paid great attention to the eradication of some of their old faults so that the scratchiness which was their distinguishing mark at the beginning of the term has almost entirely left them.

Caius II have benefitted by the rough weather we have been having lately, and as they are a strong lot may do better than their somewhat uncouth appearance at present predicts. There is however an utter absence of swing throughout the boat and if any of the fair boats behind them can manage to row a good long stroke over the whole course we may see Caius II fall from a position which, however honourable, is perhaps a little too lofty for the second boat of any College of a less size than Trinity.

Clare I have been spending all their energies lately over an attempt to row a fast stroke, the result seems to have been rather to knock the boat to pieces, since, neglecting all attempt at getting their hands away, they scramble forward each man for himself; like a great many other boats they are short in their swing; in spite however of these faults there is plenty of honest work in the boat which seems to go along at a good pace and if they will only swing out and get their hands away there seems a very fair chance of their making a bump.

First Trinity II. have been doing really good rowing lately, and their stroke seems quite up to the business. They have got well together, and though it is improbable that they will go up, yet we can only see one boat behind them which is much quicker, and at all likely to try conclusions with them.

Pembroke have quite got together again, and certainly No. 4 shows to greater advantage than any of the others. To-night they will probably register their first bump.

Emmanuel are unlucky in having to start behind Pembroke, as it is highly improbable that they will do more than row over the course. If they wait patiently till to-morrow they will no doubt enjoy the pleasure of having a turn at Lady Margaret II.

Jesus II. are sufferers from the loss sustained by the first boat, in the injuries done to Armytage. Jackson, who was rowing five, has gone back again into the first boat, where he certainly seems much more comfortable than in the second. Sidney, with First Trinity III. and L.M.B.C. II., ought to be easy victims to Jesus.

Trinity Hall II. are hardly going with the life which they did a week ago, they want a little "go" infused into them from the first boat. They ought to go up, and it is just possible that at the end of the races they may find themselves in the first division.

Downing are doing well, and ought certainly to make one bump, but will have to row hard for it, whilst after the first night or so they will have Queens' behind them.

Queens' have improved very much lately, of course they will make an easy bump to-night, and ought to get one other bump afterwards. The swing in the boat is irregular and many of the men especially No. 6, lie too far back at the end of the stroke. It is a pity that Warlow could not have gone further up the boat, as, though a strong and honest oar, his place is hardly at stroke.

King's are wonderfully well together but the pace resulting from this is not what might have been expected.

We are much obliged to First Trinity V. for coming so obligingly and prominently before us lately; with First Trinity IV. it seems to imagine that the Long Reach is its own peculiar and undisputed practising ground; certainly it is a fine thing to see Trinity men rowing, but when other Eights are stopped nolens volens to be spectators, the result is often grumbling.

The trial race between Peterhouse and Pembroke II. for last place in the Second Division resulted yesterday afternoon in the victory of Peterhouse after a good race.

As, however, most of our readers will have the opportunity of judging for themselves as to the respective merits of the various crews: we will refrain from more elaborate criticism. We have just briefly indicated what we consider to be the probable tendency of this evening's racing, and leave the result for a good start, good luck, and good "coxing" to decide.

CRICKET.

UNIVERSITY v. ENGLAND.

May 10th, 11th.—The University for two whole seasons has not suffered a single defeat; this wonderful run of luck was broken last Friday by a very powerful team of cricketers collected by C. I. Thornton. It is certainly no disgrace to have been beaten by such a strong eleven as came to Cambridge last week, especially when we consider that of their number the three professionals were among the 'Players' of England last year, and that of the nine gentlemen, six, or at any rate five, would be found in the 'Gentlemen's' team at Lords, on the Oval. Still it is difficult to account for the very indifferent show made by the University in batting, especially in their first innings: on the second day the ground certainly was very treacherous and soft, making it difficult to get the ball away: but on the first day the wickets seemed to play very well and in no way helped the slow bowling of Barlow who proved so destructive. A bowler like Rotherham with a very high over hand action would probably bump on any wicket: on Thursday he seemed to create a panic among the eleven, as nearly everyone received a blow from him on some part or other of his body. Bowling of his type is not often met with, and as few of the eleven had met the great Spofforth, whose deliveries are very similar to those of Rotherham's, they were fairly nonplussed.

The eleven having won the toss commenced with Bligh and Whitfeld, of whom the former was bowled off his pad in the second over. Steel was shortly afterwards dismissed with a very good 'yorker' and Lancashire was immediately sent back with a similar ball. Ford after one or two nasty blows was completely taken in by a slow one from the fast bowler, and was well caught at short slip. Roe stayed a long time at the wickets for his four runs, and among other ugly knocks received a full pitch in the middle of his back. Foley played steadily, and was given out for a catch at the wicket; none of the remaining members did anything, though Pereira played in fair form. 37 runs were all that Cambridge could put together. The fielding of the visitors was admirable, especially that of Pilling at the wicket, and of Lucas as longstop. England commenced with Thornton and Barlow. The captain soon succumbed to Pereira who bowled from the Pavilion end, but Barlow with Penn, the next comer, stayed a long time and brought on different changes. Penn's innings was the feature of the match; his hitting especially in driving Steel's slow ones, and in hitting the fast longhops on the off side which were not wanting, was wonderfully hard: he eventually fell to a very good catch made by Wilson at mid on. Lucas succumbed to a really good ball of Gaddum's, but Midwinter, Grace, and Pearson, all added their share of runs at the end of the innings. The total at the end of the first day was 161 for 8 wickets, but after the rain of the intervening night, the ground exactly suited the deliveries of Steel and Ford, and they disposed of the remaining three men for only 11 runs. Gaddum on the first day bowled well, while Bligh fielded well at long leg, otherwise there was nothing remarkable either in the bowling or the fielding of the University. The University being 135 to the bad started inauspiciously at the second venture; Bligh was caught from a good hit at cover point and thus 'bagged a brace,' Whitfeld was taken close in at short leg, and Steel after one or two good hits was bowled by a curly one from Barlow, while Lancashire fell to the same bowler, making the second batsman with 'spectacles' to his name. Ford made a few big hits, but with the exception of Wilson and Foley who both played steadily and were in a long time, no one else did anything. The innings closed for 79, leaving the University defeated by an innings and 56 runs. Score;

THE UNIVERSITY v. M.C.C. AND GROUND.

The second foreign University match ended in almost as severe a defeat as the first. The M.C.C. had not sent down a particularly strong batting team, though as for bowlers there was no deficiency, Rhodes, Foljambe, W. H. Fowler and J. E. K. Studd represented the M.C.C., while the ground was composed of Shaw, Morley, Ulyett, Barnes, W. Hearn, West, and Wild. The chief feature of the match was the magnificent second innings of A. G. Steel who made 70 runs against some of the best bowling in England, and the unaccountable falling off in the batting of several others on the Cambridge side.

The fielding was not by any means good, as though occasionally there was a smart piece or two, this was generally cancelled by a catch carelessly dropped or some slovenly piece of misfielding.

The University went first to the wickets, Bligh and Whitfeld, representing them against Morley from the Pavilion end and Shaw from the other. After a short time Bligh had the misfortune to play a ball hard on to his wicket. It struck us that Bligh played the bowling of Shaw rather too nervously and was evidently too much afraid on first going in of not scoring. C. T. Studd, who came in first wicket down, made a splendid hit to square leg off Shaw for 4 but in attempting to put a similar ball to the same place unfortunately hit under it and was caught at short slip with only 5 to his name. G. B. Studd played well and with a very straight bat, but was also unlucky, as he hit a leg ball safely into the hands of Ulyett, who, it is needless to say, did not let it escape. Barnes had now been bowling from the pavilion end in the place of Morley, while Shaw continued unchanged at the opposite end. Whitfeld and Steel were both dismissed for small scores, as was Ford, though the latter commenced playing well and seemed in for a good score. Rowe made a few runs but except Wilson, who played in his usual steady way for 10 not out, no one did very much. The innings closed for 79.

M.C.C. opened their batting with Ulyett and Hearn opposed to Ford (pavilion end) and Steel; runs came freely, till at 13 Ulyett was caught at the wicket for 7.

Barnes came next and commenced a very steady and creditable innings: he hit hard and took no liberties: with Hearn he caused the bowling to be changed several times; Gaddum and Wilson both having a try at the Pavilion end, and C. T. Studd at the other. Hearn was the first to leave, with the total at 75, of which he had made 42 by steady play and good hitting. J. E. K. Studd, who came next, should have been stumped, and likewise caught in the long field, but the latter was a difficult chance. He quickly knocked up 13. After Foljambe and Wild had both been disposed of in one over, W. H. Fowler came to bat and by some daring hitting and tremendous good luck (he was palpably missed twice) added 36 to the already large total, raising the score from 115 to 157. After his dismissal—caught at third man off Gaddum, whom he essayed to hit three times running back handed but on the third occasion managed to send the ball to a field,—Barnes' patient innings was brought to a close. Though not particularly interesting to on-lookers his 51 was very well obtained, and was invaluable to his side. His fall made 7 wickets down. the score standing at 162.

The next morning Rhodes and Shaw made runs rapidly; and with 19 from the former, and 22 from the latter the score reached the formidable dimensions of 207 against 79 made by the University. G. B. Studd dismissed Rhodes with a capital one-handed catch.

Being 128 to the bad the University commenced their second innings with the same batsmen as before, and the same bad luck. Bligh was caught at the wicket off Shaw and Whitfeld soon after luncheon, which here intervened, was given out leg before wicket, The two Studds brought the score to 34, at which total Ulyett dismissed the younger brother. Steel hereupon came in and commenced a splendid innings. Backed up by small contributions from G. B. Studd, Ford, Rowe, and Lancashire, he saved his side from a single innings defeat, and was not beaten until he had amassed as many as 70 runs, all made in his very best style. The innings closed for 170. This left M.C.C. only 44 to get to win, and on Saturday morning they sent in Ulyett and Wild to make them. Wild was bowled for 8, and Hearn was well caught by the bowler for 5, but on Barnes coming in, the runs were soon knocked off, and M.C.C. gained the victory by eight wickets.

A JOURNAL OF UNIVERSITY LIFE AND THOUGHT.

No. 23.] SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1880. [PRICE SIXPENCE.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

The Bishop of Durham presided at the annual Co-operative Congress at Newcastle, and delivered a striking address on the nature and aim of the Co-operative system, pointing out that it fostered two great habits of life which distinguish civilisation from barbarism, and the higher forms of civilisation from the lower,—providence and combination. Co-operation would make tke working man his own capitalist, and would gradually distribute capital, and would be the best security against communistic developments by which production was paralysed and thrift discouraged.

The Chancellor's Medal for an English poem goes again to Trinity this year, having been adjudged to H. F. Wilson. The Porson Prize, divided as is so often the case, has been awarded to C. H. Garland, of St. John's, and W. R. Inge, of King's, W. Wyse, of Trinity, having gained the Powis Medal for Latin Hexameters.

The dispute at University College, Oxford, has come to a conclusion satisfactory in result, but hardly in character. One of the offenders has written to the Master, acknowledging his share in the outrage, and the College has again been recalled to Oxford. The events of the past week will probably teach the authorities caution, and the undergraduates order.

From the applause on the banks during the first nights of the races it would appear that the favourite boats, leaving the Head of the river out of the question, are Caius and First and Third Trinity; Clare always wins the visitors to its cause, and they are more numerous during the latter part of the week, and on the Monday and Tuesday of the First Division races.

On the first night bumps were made by Caius I., First Trinity II., Pembroke, Third Trinity II., Downing, Queens', Magdalen, Christ's, and Trinity Hall III., no club securing more than a single bump. The race between Third Trinity I. and Trinity Hall I. was the event of the evening.

Thursday's racing was most exciting. Six bumps were again made in the Second Division, and three in the First. All three of the Trinity Hall boats gained a place, so placing their second boat second in the Second Division. First Trinity I. caught Lady Margaret, and Third Trinity II. made up for the defeat of their first boat by catching Sidney. In the Second Division, besides the bump made by Trinity Hall II., Queen's caught Corpus, Magdalene First Trinity IV., Christ's I. Lady Margaret III., while Caius III. succumbed to Trinity Hall III., and First Trinity V. to Peterhouse. In the Second Division no less than five bumps were made in sight of Ditton meadow.

The Professor of Experimental Physics is determined to put the Cavendish Laboratory on a proper footing, so far as apparatus is concerned. It has been notorious that the Professors and Lecturers have for some time suffered serious inconvenience from deficiencies in the "plant" of the Laboratory, and in fact some of them have, we believe, incurred serious expense in procuring what was necessary to carry on their work. Lord Rayleigh has lately instituted a Fund to remedy this evil, and a sum of £1650 has already been promised or subscribed. Among the contributors are the Chancellor, the Earl of Powis, Lord Derby, Sir W. G. Armstrong, and Mr. A. J. Balfour, M.P.

The cricket match between the University and Yorkshire was commenced on Thursday. Cambridge won the toss, and sent in the Hon. I. Bligh and H. Whitfeld, who put together 70 runs before they were parted. Bligh and C. T. Studd played very fair innings for 70 and 68 respectively; but Jones, Steel, and G. B. Studd were all disposed of for small contributions. At the close of the day the score stood at 210 for 7 wickets. Yesterday Lancashire (42 not out) and Morton (25) raised the total to 272. Emmett took 5 wickets. Yorkshire began badly; the first three wickets falling to Steel's bowling for 40 runs. But when Ulyett joined Tayler, the score was rapidly raised to 140. At this point the tide turned in favour of Cambridge, and, when play ceased, 7 wickets had fallen for 149, of which Tayler made 44 and Ulyett 64. Foley made four catches at the wicket. Our special correspondent's report is unavoidably crowded out.

THE GOLDIE MEMORIAL.

Eight years ago it was decided by general consent to make some formal recognition of the great services rendered by Mr. J. H. D. Goldie to Cambridge rowing, of his brilliant success as stroke of the University Boat, and of the unwearied patience in performing the other duties of his post.

The first project entertained by the committee then appointed, was to erect a Foot Bridge over the Cam, and protracted negotiations with the land-owners on both sides of the river, were continued for some years, but as the difficulties involved proved insurmountable, another alternative has been suggested and approved, and a proposal has now been definitely made that a University Boat House should be erected in place of a Bridge. The suggestion seems a good one, and though the direct personal benefit that individual members of the University will thus receive must of course be less than if the other plan had been practicable, there can be no reason why all members of the University should not loyally unite to ensure the success of the Memorial. Though a new generation has now taken the place of Mr. Goldie's contemporaries, it is not the habit of Cambridge men so to break with its past, as to forget the names of those who have served their University in bygone years, and we trust that the committee, which is of a thoroughly representative character, will have a hearty and loyal support from all quarters.

A site suitable for the purpose has been secured on a forty years' lease at a reasonable ground rent, and architect's plans have been procured. To meet the estimated expenses of building and fitting a sum of £1,500 will be required, while, if the subscribers to the Bridge fund transfer their subscriptions, a sum of £550 is at once available. To raise the balance a new fund has been opened to which subscriptions are now solicited, which may be paid to the Goldie Memorial Account at Mortlock's Bank, or to any member of the committee, whose names are given below.

The Trinity Hall Boat Club have already paid in to the new account nearly £37, an example which other Clubs will no doubt speedily follow, and several subscriptions have already been received.

ON THE COMPULSORY STUDY OF GREEK.

I.

If the proverbial "intelligent foreigner," whose business it is to explain to Englishmen the peculiarities of English life, were to be asked after spending a fortnight about this time in the University, what are the three principal subjects of intellectual thought and interest at Cambridge, he would probably answer, Vegetarianism, the admission of ladies to degrees, and the compulsory study of Greek. It is upon the last of these that we propose to offer some remarks in the present article.

The Greek question, as it may be called, took its rise in a memorial addressed some long time ago to the Council of the Senate by a number of distinguished persons, who thought that a good many students were prevented from coming to the University by the necessity laid upon them of passing an examination in the Greek language, and that still more, who submitted to that necessity, were injured by it. It was accordingly the prayer of the memorialists that the Council should consider whether the University would not gain something, as well as these students, by a relaxation of the present stringent rule. A Syndicate was appointed in March, 1879, to consider the matter, and after just a year of labour they have presented the Senate with a Report and several Appendices, containing among other things letters from some of the original memorialists who may be supposed to explain what is desirable, and some Head and Assistant Masters who may be regarded as the exponents of what is possible. We could wish that answers had been received from the Head Masters of some important Schools, e.g. of Harrow and Marlborough, and that we had more information as to the opinions of Assistant Masters, which would be naturally of high value upon such a point. But on the whole the evidence collected is interesting and important in its bearing upon the educational value of Greek in public schools.

As to the report of the Syndicate, we cannot doubt that the University has received with due respect a document which is signed by a Deputy Vice-Chancellor, four Professors (of Greek, Anatomy, Chemistry, and Mechanism), one Public Orator, one Prælector in Ancient Philosophy, an author of mathematical and other works, a Vice-Provost, two Senior Deans and Mr. Browning. But it is felt, we think, that they have done little more than break the ground of a great question. Their main proposal is that bonâ fide candidates for Honours should be relieved from the necessity of taking up two classical languages in the previous examination, and should be allowed to substitute French and German for one of them. But a large proportion of undergraduates are unfortunately not candidates for Honours. It is a melancholy fact that the Pollman is a more striking feature of Academic life in England than the Honour-man. Of course Poll-men are not all homogeneous; some of them differ less intellectually from Honour-men than low Honour-men from high ones. But speaking broadly we may divide the undergraduate population into Honour-men and Poll-men, or in other words, into Class-men and Pass-men; and their cases are very different. People may wish, as many do, to excuse the former from the Greek part of the Previous Examination and yet to retain it for the latter; or again, it is conceivable, though not so probable, that others may be in favour of relieving the latter from the Greek part and yet of insisting upon it in the case of the former. The arguments for either system deserve to be considered without much reference to the other.

It may be good or bad policy to attract the largest possible number of able students in all the various departments of learning to the University. But that is certainly the line which has been taken of late years, and for our own part we are heartily glad of it. Religious and social restrictions have been swept away one by one; Professors and Lecturers have been appointed in a great variety of subjects; the influence of the University has been brought to bear upon an increasing number of large towns; there has been a growing desire in the country for the advantages of an University education and degree, and the result is that men whose antecedents and attainments are strangely divergent have with one accord begun to turn their eyes towards Cambridge. Among these men there are many, and will be more, who have never had any inducement to study Greek. They are self-educated men perhaps or have received their education at schools where Greek is never taught; they have not been able to indulge in intellectual luxuries, but have been obliged to shift for themselves, and so have learnt what was most useful to them; and, as they do not feel the want of Greek, so they have not, and never have had a desire to learn it. But they may have a taste for Mathematics or Natural Science, and would do honour to the University, if it were to admit them within its pale. It is undoubtedly a grievance that these men, if they come to Cambridge, should be compelled to pass an examination in Greek.

We know no more pitiable spectacle than that of a potential high wrangler or distinguished man of science who finds himself compelled at a late age to embark upon the study of the Greek language and to acquire for the purpose of a single examination a minimum of Greek learning, which is as useless to him when acquired as it is burdensome and irritating in the acquisition. To take an extreme case,—the misery of the classical man reduced to turning the Fifth Proposition or the Parallelogram of Forces into Greek Iambics is trifling in comparison with that of the mathematician, who aspires to obtain a second class in the Previous Examination, by getting to know not, it may be, even the elements of the Greek language, but merely the look of the Greek words in any passage of the authors set him and the corresponding words of the crib, and applying the one with precarious dexterity to the other. Nor will anyone, we suppose, now-a-days, maintain that there is any especially magical influence in Greek, so that one man who has scraped together a scanty store of Greek learning stands ipso facto on a higher level of education than another who is imbued with some slight knowledge of Natural Science or a third who has somehow got a smattering of Mathematics.

We think, therefore, that a case has been made out for exempting bona fide Honour men from the necessity of passing an examination in Greek. We say bona fide Honour men, because we agree with those who hold that the ordinary third classman in any Tripos is not easily distinguishable from the Pollman, and, if he deserves relief, deserves it on different grounds from one who promises to become distinguished in Mathematics or Natural Science, or any other branch of learning. But what we insist upon in the case of mathematical or scientific students—for it is these who are principally concerned—is that, if they are excused Greek, their education should not become a narrower one than it now is. After all the University is the natural referee in matters of education; the schools must abide by its decision. It is not right that the University should encourage a partial, one-sided education. Premature specialization is an evil which always threatens to invade schools, especially in these days, when all the world is over-examined; and it is held in check only by the action of the Universities. If the Universities should exact no more of an Honour man than a certain knowledge of his own subject, boys would specialize at an early age, and their minds would, we believe, suffer immensely in strength and tone. The pure scholar, i.e. the scholar who knows nothing besides his Classics is bad enough, the pure man of Science is worse, but the pure mathematician (if the phrase may be pardoned) is worst of all. We desire that the University should always insist, as it now does, upon every candidate for Honours showing some knowledge of some subject which lies wholly apart from his own immediate study. We believe that the best corrective of a strictly scientific or mathematical education is the study of language and literature, and the best corrective of a strictly literary education is the study of Science or Mathematics. And as we should strongly deprecate a classical man being allowed to go out in Classics until he has shown some mathematical or scientific knowledge, or both, at some period of his career, so we are anxious that a mathematical or scientific man should be obliged to pass an examination in some language and literature before he takes a degree in the subject of his choice. We do not care to insist upon Greek; we would rather offer these men, as an alternative, some subject more suitable to their immediate purposes. Nor is the time at which they shall pass the examination so important, although we would give them their first chance of passing it as soon as they come into residence rather than while they are still at school, as a boy who gets a certificate some time before he leaves school is not unlikely to fall a prey to that premature specialization which we deplore. But the one thing needful is that no one should become a candidate for Honours in Mathematics or Natural Science until he has already proved himself possessed of a tolerable working acquaintance with the grammar and literature of one modern language, i.e., able to answer grammar questions, to translate fairly difficult unseen passages, and to write prose composition. The Syndics propose to exact both French and German in lieu of Greek. We incline to think this rule would require too much; we doubt whether it would afford the desired relief to a number of students whose education has perhaps gone on under difficulties; and we would rather require a man to display a good knowledge of either French or German than put up with a smattering of both. If we do not prefer English to either, the reason is simply that we have always been surprised at the fact of any man being allowed to take a degree in Honours, or indeed a degree at all, without passing an examination in the language and literature of his own country; and this we would exact, whether the study of Greek is retained or abolished.

STUDENT DUELS IN GERMANY.

It must not be supposed that I intend entering into any discussion of the system of duelling, as practised and tolerated in Germany; my object is simply to describe one of those periodical encounters at which every member of a recognised 'Corps' is at some time or other expected to present himself. As a rule strangers are not present on these occasions, and to those who merely judge of the proceedings by the ugly scars seen on the faces of the combatants, a description of what I saw while at Heidelberg may perhaps not be entirely devoid of interest.

The duels take place in an inn known as the "Hirschgasse." Standing on the terrace of the "Schloss," this inn is a conspicuous object low down on the opposite bank of the Neckar, and somewhat to the right. The meetings are held every Tuesday and Friday during the Semester, and hither the students repair in groups of two or three to avoid attracting too much attention. Although forbidden by the regulations of the University, no very strenuous efforts have been made to suppress them; occasionally the illegality of the proceedings is made evident by a sudden interruption on the part of the authorities, but as a rule the whole thing is winked at as a piece of folly which is already declining, and will, most likely, come to a natural end.

There are two rooms at the "Hirschgasse" devoted to the use of the students: the larger is occupied on two sides and one end by tables, each of which is specially used by members of some one "Corps," the whole being arranged in order of priority. The roof and walls are decorated with the insignia and devices of each "Corps," of of which there are five. The remaining end and centre of the room is left free for the duels, and is rendered unpleasantly conspicuous by the stains on the floor; within an irregular circle three yards in diameter, the boards are of a dull reddish-brown colour, of which the cause is obvious. A similar narrow stain marks the path from this spot to the door leading into the smaller adjoining room. The latter is used as a dressing room in more senses than one—by the students when preparing for the duels, and the surgeon at a subsequent stage of the proceedings whenever his help is required. In the earlier days of the "Corps" no protection was allowed to the combatants, and the encounters were frequently fatal: now, however, a system of covering is adopted which effectually prevents injury to any vital part. A German student, when dressed for his duel, or as it should be called his "Mensur," to distinguish it from those fights which come strictly under the name of duel, is a truly ridiculous object. He first diverts himself of everything but a jersey and trousers. He then suspends a thick sheet of leather over the front of his body, and fastens a stand-up collar of similar material round his neck. A pad of leather is placed in the angle of his right arm and body, and the arm itself is cased in a padding of the thickness of an English boxing-glove. The right hand is left free and is sufficiently protected by the basket-shaped hilt of the sword (Schläger). The eyes are screened by strong iron spectacles, with wire-work in the place of glasses, and the costume is now complete. It will thus be seen that all the vital parts are protected; the ornamental are however left to themselves and often suffer accordingly. The weapons used have a basket hilt, resembling a Scotch claymore, only larger; the blade is about a yard long, slightly bent and blunt at the point. It is sharpened for eighteen inches from the tip on the convex side, and is finally whetted on an oil-stone. When thus equipped the combatants are led into the larger room, each with his right arm raised and supported by his 'second,' for it is one of the regulations of the duel that the right arm must not be lowered until the fight is over. Having been placed facing each other, about four yards apart, they receive their swords and wait for the command to begin. This is given by the student who superintends the duel; it is his business to see fair play, and to decide who is the victor. Another student stands by as time-keeper; watch in hand he notes the time of commencing and ending each, what we should call, 'round.' Unless one of the combatants receives a cut of so severe a nature that it would be dangerous to continue the fight, the duel must last until the sum of the times occupied by the 'rounds' amounts to fifteen minutes; each 'round' ends when a cut is given or received. All being ready, the presiding student or umpire calls out "Auf die Mensur" (Advance to the trial*). At this the combatants step forward, the right arm raised high above the head in a semicircle, and, with the points hanging down, cross swords; the left arm is held behind the back. "Fertig" (are you ready)? calls out the umpire, and after a short pause, "Los!" (go it!) The cuts are delivered with extreme rapidity, and are directed at the head, which each tries to protect with his raised right arm; hence, as rule, it is the left cheek which suffers. When a cut is received the recipient calls out "Halt." The round is over, its duration noted, and the umpire examines the wound: if it is trifling, after a minute the fight begins again with the same expressions as at first. If, however, the wound is serious, the fight ends and the vanquished one, after passing through the surgeon's hands is sent home and put to bed.

The spectators return to their respective tables and pass away the time in the interval between two duels in beer-drinking, smoking, card playing, and throwing dice, as the case may be. A series of the above encounters takes place at each meeting which may be given at ten and last until one or two o'clock; I have myself seen seven such duels in one morning.

And now as to the way the combatants are selected. It must not be supposed that a "Mensur" is necessarily what we call a duel; this fighting is part and parcel of "Corps" life. It is trained for and practised in the same way as our students go to a gymnasium to box, in a regular school of arms where there are professional teachers, and each student on joining a "Corps" knows he will have to go through the above at intervals in his University life. The Presidents of the "Corps" select the combatants and use their endeavours to match them as equally as possible. Frequently, however, they are not thus matched; the "Mensur" is often used as a means of satisfying personal animosity and in such cases the results may be very much more serious. Occasionally a death ensues, not from the direct effects of the wound but from subsequent inflammation and mortification; but these cases are rare. The cuts are often very serious; thus the cheek is laid bare, the nose cut through, the lobe of the ear removed, or the cut may be four or five inches long and through to the skull on the top of the head. In most cases, however, the combatants are merely snicked all over the face, and the blood trickles copiously over them and on to the floor. Frequently so much blood is shed that after several encounters sand is strewn on the boards to give a firmer foot-hold.

And now a few words as to the continued existence of the above. Not a word can be said in its defence, and it is strange that the Germans should continue to tolerate a condition of things which is a conspicuous blot on their in many ways excellent system of student life. It is unmanly, senseless, and useless. I believe its supposed utility has had much to do with its continuance. It was considered to cultivate pluck and endurance, and since a very large number of "Corps" students pass into the army as officers, such qualities were sought for. But this is of course absurd reasoning, to which the answer is ready at hand in contrasting our students with theirs. It is however only fair to say that the practice is dying out, that only a very small number of students engage in it, and that recently the authorities have had the good sense and determination to prohibit it in some of the larger Universities, viz., Leipzig and I believe Berlin and Munich.

EGOISTICAL ESSAYS.—No. VI.

THE MAY-WEEK.

It is humiliating. After all my self-congratulations that I had made a startling discovery in the way of illnesses, that might perhaps have changed the whole course of the progress of events, to think that it should prove to be the hooping-cough! Now if it had been typhoid fever, or even a mild form of the plague, it might have been worthy of some consideration; but that I should be shunned by society merely for the sake of such an infantile sort of thing as the hooping-cough! I feel quite vexed about it. But there is no getting out of it; the doctor has been here to-day, and after punching me about, and looking into me with a sort of ear trumpet, he has pronounced that I have got the hooping-cough, and that I have been having it all this time and have not improbably been disseminating it about among all my friends liberally. The majority of the boat came to tea here last Sunday, and if it goes down this week owing to the crew having caught the hooping-cough, I shall feel guilty in the eyes of the whole College—and what is worse, I shall have incurred an everlasting obligation to them, and may be called upon to fulfil it at any moment, which may turn out to be extremely inconvenient.

Nevertheless, it is something to talk about, having got the hooping-cough at this particular period. Everybody can pass the time by going about and watching the various festivities that are taking place, but it is not everybody who can say that they have struck out such an entirely new line of enjoyment as I have during the May week. Let the common herd go and devote themselves to these transient frivolities; I desire not to diminish their pleasure.

I am to be shut up until the east winds go away; if my experience of the weather is worth anything, it will then begin to rain, and I shall not be able to go out because of the damp; after that nothing will dry up the ground except more east winds; so that my chances of getting out for some time appear rather small. For some reasons I am not altogether sorry; I shall have some time now to read my books: I have been cutting the pages all this afternoon in preparation for beginning to-morrow. But the chief reason for which I object to being kept in is that I do not get enough exercise. I have discovered that 220 times round my table make a mile, but it is a monotonous way of getting an appetite for my victuals, besides not being particularly good for the carpet; it also has a tendency to make one giddy, not to speak of the risk of catching my shins against outlying pieces of furniture if I attempt a spurt. I have tried resting a poker across two chairs and jumping over it a fixed number of times; but I cannot get enough run, and either crash headlong into my mantlepiece at one end of the room, or else fall prone on my sofa at the other; while such proceedings not unfrequently attract the attention of casual passers by—perhaps their notice is drawn by seeing the house shaking from the outside. Indoor gymnastics are all very well as treated of in little green books to be obtained at all railway bookstalls throughout the United Kingdom, but they do not answer when practised indoors, unless a general clearance is made of the furniture. So now I pass the time chiefly in studying people as they pass. I have drawn a sofa to my window and have taken up a commanding position for this end. I was going to have had some people of my own down, but now I suppose to them that will be out of the question. Alas! they are no better than the rest; they all forsake me in my adversity. How true is the amendment on the proverb "A friend when you have the hooping-cough is a friend indeed."

I wonder why it should be the fashion for the man who is going to have people to stay with him—especially his own people—to look upon himself as a sort of social martyr, and so entitled to the pity of all whom he meets. If he does not want them, why does he ask them? but the majority of the undergraduates that I have seen passing, especially on the first day of their people's arrival, appear to be particularly bored, and unable to keep up a respectable standard of conversation owing to their thoughts being preoccupied in the arrangement of the next remark but two that they feel they will be called upon to make. The people they seem to be at least at home with are their own nearest relations—cousins always excepted—and when they meet anyone else with his people they look at him as if they would like to effect an exchange. Perhaps something might be done so that by mutual agreement, or perhaps by drawing lots, everybody should exchange sisters for a time, and then nobody would be at such a loss what to do.

This, however, is a reform that cannot be carried out all at once, and we must be content to go on with matters as they are at present. If we have really put ourselves to such trouble to get people down here, we ought to do the whole thing properly, and to provide entertainment for them to the best of our power, and not allow any more secret part of our feelings to show itself. We should parade them round the principal sights, give them all the stock pieces of information, and drown our cares in a reckless plunge of extravagance into the kitchen bill. The last is an infallible resource; three luncheons are equivalent to no end of conversation; and whenever a new topic is wanted, a suggestion of five o'clock tea will always supply the gap. Thus we may convince our people that we are happy; and they will be happy too; and we shall all be playing our parts in the great drama of humbug that is everlastingly going on.

But a truce to this moralizing! why should I act like a wet sponge, and try to damp the ardour of those who are at any rate doing their best to carry out the principle of conferring the greatest good on the greatest number, although they may be, perhaps, keeping to rather worn-out grooves? I am getting morbid; it is all the effect of the hooping-cough. I had made great preparations myself with the same view if this—old—hooping-cough hadn't come and stopped me. (Query. Are there any circumstances under which a Christian may be justified in using a bad word?)

There are two ways of meeting one's people. One is to go down to the station, and offer to look after their luggage. This, however, except so far as the will goes for the deed, is generally of little practical use, as, especially when there are ladies concerned, there are such a lot of things to be found, that the owner has after all to come and identify them for her or himself. This being taken into consideration, perhaps the second method is the best; namely, to be "discovered" sitting at a table surrounded by papers and books, and to rise suddenly in a confused manner, and say that you had just been doing a little work, and had not the slightest idea that the morning had passed so quickly. Then put away your books hurriedly, and say you will just run out and see about luncheon. When you return you will find all your books being severally perused by the ladies, and the deeper the subject, the higher you will rise in their estimation.

You will then have luncheon, which, if skilfully managed, can be prolonged for some hour and a half, and then you had better trot them out to see the sights. As it will probably be the first occasion of your ever having done so, your best plan will be to have purchased a Spalding's Guide before-hand, and crammed it up carefully, as one would Paley for the Little-Go. There are, however, a few stock stories which may be added, and if they refer to undergraduate exploits, and you can contrive to make yourself, or at least, some of your most intimate friends, figure as the hero, so much the better. If you meet any particular fine looking man and the ladies wish to know who he is, say he rows, or plays, or runs, for the 'Varsity, and nod to him when he isn't looking. This will add to the general effect.

In order to get through things in the most convenient fashion, it would be best to pursue some method in your sight-seeing. First, visit the Fitzwilliam; walk up one staircase, through the galleries and down the other; then glance at the sculptures and go out again. Time, about 15 minutes. Then go on to Peterhouse; see the last deer before it is too late—it looked very seedy last time I saw it, and it may not last out another week—look in at the Combination Room, and say something about the rich tints of the windows of the Chapel, point out Gray's fire escape with the required anecdote, and then proceed by Pembroke and Corpus, through Cat's to Queens'.

You should style Queens' as "quaint;" then walk through it, and out over Newton's Bridge—anecdote here—then continue through the backs to King's Bridge. Stand here and say—"This is one of the finest views in Cambridge." Somebody will say, "Oh!" and after three minutes have been allowed for astonishment, it will be time to inspect the Chapel and Hall. Collect the general opinion on the merits of the screen, call attention to the fact that the porter's lodge resembles a cruet stand, repeat all that has ever been said about the fountain, and King's will have been done. Clare can next be visited. I believe there is a story that Clare was built without an architect; at any rate it will do for something to say. Cross Clare Bridge, tell the Senior Wrangler story, and ask the company to count the balls. It perhaps will be better not to do so if any other undergraduate is of the party. The joke appears to have an irritating effect on anyone who has heard it more than—say, a dozen times. I tried it the other day on a bye-term man who had only been up three weeks, and he hit me a severe blow on the hat. You can spend a little mute admiration on Caius, and at the Hall there are the botanical curiosities in the garden. Then walk round by the Trinity Avenue, and call attention to its beauties. Next perform the trick with the knocker in the Cloisters in Nevile's Court. This proceeding is probably immensely appreciated by the inhabitants thereof. At Trinity also there are the Chapel, the Hall, and the Old Court — don't forget it is the largest in England, and don't be quite sure it isn't the largest in the world. Go through John's and over the Bridge of Sighs, and you will have done Cambridge pretty well. If you have any time to spare, Magdalen was where Pepys was at College—the only record left of him is that he was intoxicated one night; Sidney was Oliver Cromwell's place of education; Milton was at Christ's, and has left a tree somewhere about; Emmanuel was the place where the Pilgrim Fathers packed up their luggage and left for America. Jesus Chapel is worth visiting, but by this time your ladies will be tired, and you had better take them home to tea, and give them a little time to put their general ideas of the beauties of Cambridge into a definite shape. Help them as much as you are able, but particularly do not let them fall into the delusion that it is the Cam that runs down Trumpington Street.

There are other things to be done on other days, but this will serve to wear off some of the first awkwardness, and you will soon begin to find that people are not such a terrible thing to have to do with after all. There are balls, and May races, and concerts, and flower shows: but what need to enumerate them, for are they not written in the multiplicity of Calendars that are being circulated at the present time? CORRESPONDENCE.

COMPULSORY CHAPELS.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—I wish to draw attention in your pages to the means at present employed for securing attendance at College Chapels. I have only found it necessary to learn the rules which hold in five colleges to convince myself of the existence of scandalous abuses. There are no doubt honourable exceptions, but I believe that some of the rules for compelling the presence of undergraduates at what can only in mockery be styled Divine service, need only to be mentioned to be condemned.

Digitized by Google

At two colleges a fine of one penny is exacted for non-attendance at Chapel, this sum being doubled on "sheet nights," i.e. when the undergraduate hides his defects beneath a surplice.

At another the value of a chapel is estimated at the high price of sixpence. Thus during a residence of nine terms the sum of £25 is to be won by assiduous attention to the commands of the chapel-going bell. Verily chapel-goers have their reward—a shilling per diem.

Another college secures the attendance of its unwilling members by a rule which enacts that a day is "kept" by appearance either at chapel or hall. One consequence of this law is that during the Newmarket weeks morning chapel is crowded by men who have no other way of keeping their day. Ought not college deans to look with a benign eye even on the First Spring Meeting, which thus fills the House of God with worshippers?

But most iniquitous, at any rate in the eyes of professing Christians, should be the rule which holds in some of our Colleges that attendance at Communion is equivalent to a Chapel "kept." What a scene is this? The Dean, who has gone out into the highways and hedges and compelled men to come in, blandly proclaims that they "eat and drink their own damnation." Surely no tongue can be raised in defence of a system which allows such scandals as these. And yet such a state of things as I have mentioned exists at one college at least, and is tacitly allowed in another. It is true no man is absolutely compelled to attend Communion, but unworthy motives are allowed to influence him towards doing so.

But not only does this system of compulsory chapels contain numberless abuses; What justification has it for its existence?

By what authority do college deans prescribe hours of prayer to undergraduates, and who gave them that authority? What right has any man to put to another the question "Why were you not at chapel last Sunday?" It is useless for the offenders to suggest that such matters should be left to the judgment of each individual. He is met with the reply, "You have transgressed a rule of the college." Who can withstand reasoning so cogent?

We are often reminded that for the ensurance of early rising and the maintenance of discipline compulsory chapels are useful. One of your contributors has taken the trouble to point out that the seats in his College Chapel are invaluable as a means for straightening the back of the aspiring oarsman. But other and more efficient means of attaining these ends can be found than the forced attendance at a service, sometimes distasteful, often inopportune. No religious ceremony should be degraded to these base uses. The prevailing system replaces the worship of God by "keeping chapels."

It may be said that the abandoning of the present rule would thin the congregation of college chapels. This, coupled with the fact (which may, I think, be asserted without fear of contradiction) that a vast majority of men content themselves with a minimum of attendances, would conclusively prove that the present regulation is really one of compulsion. And whether is it better that men should abstain entirely from chapel or that they should attend solely for the sake of avoiding disagreeable consequences?

Is it to be wondered at that behaviour in chapel is sometimes unseemly? Here, as elsewhere, familiarity breeds contempt. It is true the House of God is no longer profaned by the sight of a pack of cards (perhaps the eye of college-law is more vigilant than formerly) but "Cavendish on Whist" is still not seldom found to be a pleasing substitute for a prayer-book.

There are other and more indirect evil consequences of the compulsory system. Evasions without number, sometimes the lie with circumstance, sometimes the lie direct are pressed into service in case of absence. The word "indisposed" is found to have a happy ambiguity of meaning. Such of course may be the consequence of the enforcement of attendance at hall or lectures, but it is a particularly deplorable result of endeavours—however mistaken—to improve the condition of erring undergraduates.

To me it seems that no valid reason can be given for upholding a system—the legacy of the monastic spirit of three centuries ago, a cause of error and offence to thousands.

UNIVERSITY INTELLIGENCE.

The Chancellor's (English) Medal.—The gold medal given annually by his Grace the Duke of Devonshire, to such resident undergraduate as shall compose in English the best Ode or Poem in heroic verse, has for this year been adjudged to H. F. Wilson, Trinity College. The subject given out was "Rienzi."

The Porson Prize.—This prize, given annually "In Memoriam" of Professor Porson, in the shape of Greek books, to such resident undergraduate as shall make the best translation of a proposed passage from the works of any standard English poet into Greek verse (the metre to be Tragic Iambic Trimeter Acatalectic), has been adjudged to be divided between C. H. Garland, St. John's, and W. R. Inge, King's, whose merits were declared equal by the Examiners. The subject given out was a passage from "Timon of Athens."

The Powis Medal.—This gold medal given annually by the Right Hon. the Earl of Powis, High Steward of the University, to such resident undergraduate as shall produce the best exercise in Latin Hexameter verse, has been awarded to W. Wyse, Trinity College. The subject given out was "Ravenna."

The Professors, the Superintendent of the Museums of Zoology and Comparative Anatomy, the Strickland Curator, and the Trinity Praelector in Physiology, on the request of the Museums and Lecture Rooms Syndicate (in their annual report to the Senate) have reported on the condition of their respective departments.

The Professor of Experimental Physics, on discovering the great deficiency of apparatus at the Cavendish Laboratory, has taken steps to put the University in a more satisfactory position, and to supply the most pressing wants. He has therefore instituted an apparatus fund to be spent in eight or ten years, at the discretion of the Professor, and help has already been received from the Chancellor and from other sources. The amount at present subscribed is about £1,900, and it is estimated that a total of £2,500 will be required during the next ten years to put the institution on a proper footing.

THE MAY RACES.

Wednesday, May 19.

On Wednesday morning the easterly winds that had prevailed for so long shifted round to the south, and the afternoon was warm and the air almost close, though there was no sun to increase the heat. It was a perfect afternoon for a race; no wind, no stream, and no sun, and although the lowering sky may have deterred some visitors from putting in an appearance, the banks were crowded, and the meadow at Ditton, though sombre in hue, was as full as ever.

The boats started in the following order:—

The Bracket shows the bump.

In the Second Division there was some fine racing. From the start Third Trinity II. began to gain on Jesus II., while Trinity Hall II. was creeping up to them at "Grassy." The Jesus cox by bad steering lost a considerable amount of ground, and the Trinity boat pressed them hard as far as Ditton, where, in spite of the efforts of the Trinity Hall boat to make their bump first, Third caught their rivals, and ran into them in a way that not a little endangered seven's outrigger, and placed the bump beyond all dispute, thus placing themselves in the position of "sandwich" boat. The Hall, disappointed with their prey snatched from them in the moment of victory, rowed steadily over the course, untroubled by the boats behind them: for Downing had started at a rattling pace, and caught up Corpus in the Plough Reach. Catharine's had been even still more unfortunate, and had fallen a victim to Queens' in the Post Reach, at a very short distance from the start, a fact showing the importance of getting away with and not after the sound of the gun.

First Trinity IV. rowed over, taking it easily after Grassy, where a bump was made behind them.

Lady Margaret III. was closely pursued up to Ditton by Caius III., where a bump was certainly missed by the cox of the latter boat, which in its turn was closely followed by Christ's, who got away with a good start, and settling down to a pretty fast stroke, gained about half a length on Caius, continuing to do so up the first half of the Post Reach. Here Caius put on a spurt after Lady Margaret III., and began to gain. In the Gut Christ's were still well in their distance, and Caius, failing to make their shot, began to go to pieces, and Christ's gained slowly up the Plough Reach. Good coxing round Ditton brought Christ's to within a length of Caius, who tried to avert the evil day, but in vain. Christ's gained hand over hand, and after over-lapping them for several strokes ran into them about 150 yards below the Willows.

First Trinity V. started off at a fast stroke, but as they never rowed a single stroke right out this was of little use to them. Hall III. outpaced them from the first, and caught them just as they got into the Gut.

Peterhouse had a row over, without perceptible gain or loss, when the bump in front of them occurred.

In the First Division only three bumps were made. Jesus seemed to keep away from the other boats with comparative ease, and not being pressed, made a most effective display as "Head of the River." Among the boats behind them was some exciting racing, for Caius I., rowing fast and in good style, caught Lady Margaret I., about half way up the Long Reach, First Trinity I. being unable to gain on them, partly owing to considerable rolling soon after the start, but mainly owing to the very wide course round Grassy taken by their cox. But the race between Trinity Hall I. and Third Trinity I. was probably the best of the da The Hall slowly crept up to the Trinity boat, until at Ditton they had gained about half their distance, the boat going well together, and from this point they gained ground rapidly, rowing about 40 to the minute, until at the middle of the Long Reach they were within half a length of the leader. Here the wash made the boat rather unsteady, but Brooksbank took his men steadily up, until at the Railway Bridge they overlapped the Trinity boat. No change took place in the relative positions for a considerable distance, the Trinity boat occasionally drawing away for a foot or two, and then again being rowed down. After the big horse-grind was passed the Trinity Hall men began to fall away slightly, and both boats eased at the post without the long-expected bump having taken place.

Caius II. rowed over, keeping well to their distance from Clare.

First Trinity II. wasted very little time at the start, and rowing about 37, gained about three quarters of a length on Clare I. before Post Corner. In the Gut they quickened and continued to gain. After Grassy they quickened once more, and quickly walked up to Clare. They overlapped just as Clare were getting well on to the corner, and quickening well together, made a bump exactly opposite the Ladies' Meadow, Dill's coxing was very good throughout, especially at Grassy.

Lady Margaret II. shared the misfortunes of their first boat, for after a good race Pembroke caught them about the Plough. Pembroke having made their bump so early, Emmanuel rowed over the course at a steady stroke, First Trinity III. gaining on them, though without actually pressing them at all hard. The Trinity boat, starting at a brisk stroke, gained somewhat up the Post Reach, but at Post Corner they began to lose ground, and at Ditton had quite lost their advantage. In the Long Reach they rowed pluckily, and at the Railway Bridge had again gained, this time quite a length: but from here to the finish they were unable to increase their advantage. They were well out of their distance from Sidney all over the course.

Sidney I. rowed over, keeping well away from Third Trinity II., (who rowed in their heavy boat), though it never gained very much on First Trinity III. In Plough Reach it was within its distance, but lost a little down the Long Reach, towards the end of which the time became bad, and the Trinity boat in front rowed away from it.

THURSDAY, May 20.

The brightness of the afternoon considerably increased the crowd of spectators, and the weather was as pleasant for the crews as for the on-lookers. The number of bumps made was the same as on the previous day, three in the first division, and six in the second.

SECOND DIVISION.

Third Trinity II. rowed over, never being pressed at all.

The Hall boat started well, and rapidly commenced to overhaul Jesus II, which was in front of them. The cox took an admirable course, and gained considerably round Grassy. Up the Plough Reach the distance was very quickly decreased, and on arriving at Ditton the nose of the Hall boat was inside the stern of the Jesus boat. But just at the critical juncture one of the bow-side oars of the second boat came out of the rowlock, and the Hall boat in consequence fell back some few feet. Wilde however held his spurt with great spirit, and the crew quickly got together again and scored their bump at the Willows.

Downing rowed over.

Queens' gained on Corpus up the Post Reach, but lost somewhat round Grassy Corner: up the Plough Reach the boats kept about the same distance, and Corpus were safe until both boats got round Ditton Corner, when Queens' quickened their stroke and began to overhaul Corpus rapidly: an exciting race down the Long Reach ended in Queens' securing their bump about half-way down.

First Trinity IV. got off after Catharine's at a good brisk stroke. Magdalen came on fast after them, and, just as Trinity gained on Catharine's so Magdalen gained on Trinity. In the Plough the three boats were almost touching each other. Round Ditton Magdalen fell back a little and Trinity seemed certain to catch Catharine's: but Catharine's quickened and kept away. As soon as the boats were straight in the Long Reach Magdalen began to come up. But Trinity quickened up very pluckily, and were not caught until half-way up the Reach: Catharine's were then not more than two feet away from them.

King's rowed over.

L.M.B.C. III. nearly made its bump at Ditton but missed it and was unable to catch the boat above it, and was quickly caught up about the middle of the Long Reach by Christ's, which got away with a good start, but rowing with rather too slow a stroke did not gain much more until the Gut. The cox took a fair Grassy, though not so good as on the previous night; assisted by this Christ's rapidly diminished the distance about a length, which separated them from L.M.B.C. III., and at Ditton were within half-a-length. The racing was rather exciting as L.M.B.C. kept continually overlapping King's, who pulled very pluckily. All up the Long Reach Christ's gained hand over hand, and eventually made their bump in nearly the same spot as they did on the previous night.

Trinity Hall III started behind Caius 3rd at the bottom of Post Reach, the Hall boat gained rapidly; up the Gut it travelled very fast, and on rounding Grassy the two boats were so close that it was evidently merely a matter of when the bump should be scored. The question was soon decided, for the Hall crew ran into the leading boat with great ease at Ditton, thus scoring their second bump in these races.

First Trinity V were again unfortunate. Peterhouse gained on them from the start, and went into them in the Gut.

FIRST DIVISION.

As on the first night Jesus and Caius rowed over in procession, neither being pressed by their neighbour in the rear. L.M.B.C. had a good race all through; First Trinity I. getting off pretty well, gained very slowly on them. In the Plough they came up more rapidly, and at Ditton scarcely a length separated the boats. Down the Long Reach they gained steadily, and at the Railway Bridge actually touched the Lady Margaret boat. By some mistake this was not acknowledged, and the consequence was that First Trinity jumped right into them, two's oar unshipping the Johnian's rudder. Unfortunately both boats were considerably injured, and the Trinity stroke's oar broken short off.

Third Trinity I. got off well, and until Ditton scarcely lost ground at all. But different tactics were employed by Trinity Hall I. in this second essay, and the wisdom of the change was shown by the result. Starting long and clean, the Hall crew kept it going fairly well till Ditton. Up to this point the boat had been not altogether steady, but the length of the stroke was beginning to tell, and the gap between the boats was already diminished. On turning into the Long Reach, the crew got beautifully together, and still maintaining the long stroke, their rowing was remarkably clean and easy. The boat therefore began unmistakeably to overhaul the Third Trinity crew, and on reaching the Railway Bridge, about a length and a quarter separated the boats. Here Brooksbank quickened a little, and the crew, still rowing long and easily, picked up the leading boat with surprising quickness. At the Little Ditch the bell was going for the quarter-length, and then the moment for which the Hall had been waiting came. Picking up the spurt with excellent precision, a few strokes drove their boat well into Third Trinity, the bump being scored just before Charon's. This last piece of rowing was probably the best that the Hall has done this year.

First Trinity II rowed a very exciting race with Caius II. The Trinity men started well and gained considerably in the first reach. In the Gut they spurted and reduced the Caius' lead to a length; this was steadily and rapidly diminished up the Plough, and off Ditton the boat's overlapped so much that unfortunately the Trinity cox took a shot. The Caius men were fortunate in being just on their stroke at the right moment, and the Trinity bow passed over their rudder without touching it. This shot made their Ditton a poor one, and Caius gained by it quite a length. Down the Long Reach the boats kept apart, until near the Bridge when Trinity quickened up, and came up to Caius fast, overlapping them just at the last corner before Charon's. Their cox took another shot, which was not more successful than the former one. This again gave Caius a lead, and Trinity, finding their oars knocking against a boat under the bank, easied.

Pembroke did not succeed in catching Clare.

L.M.B.C. II. was hotly pursued up to Ditton by Emmanuel, but they managed to get away and succeeded in rowing over the course safely.

First Trinity III. got off well at a fast stroke and gained a full length on Emmanuel in the Post Reach. Encouraged by this they quickened well up on the corner and rowing well together overlapped them at Grassy. With a capital burst together they bumped Emmanuel before they had got off the corner.

Sidney I again rowed over. They rowed steadily up Plough Reach at a slow stroke, with Third Trinity II gradually gaining on them. At First Post Corner Third were about a length and a half behind, and at Grassy about a length. At Ditton Third were nearer than at any other part of the course, having gained quite two and a half lengths; but on getting well into the Long Reach Sidney quickened and did more work. They then increased their lead to about a length and maintained it all down the Reach. At the Railway Bridge Third made a final spurt, and got within half a length at the finish.

Third rowed in a light ship fitted with fixed seats; considering that they had only been out in her that very morning they sat her remarkably well.

FRIDAY, May 21.

The afternoon was bright and warm, and great crowds of spectators flocked down in carriages, in boats and on foot, lining the river bank beyond the Railway Bridge, and crowding the meadow at Ditton. Later in the afternoon the sky clouded over, but no rain fell, and the crowds did not disperse. All the boats of the First Division were heartily applauded as they passed Ditton Corner, the Head of the River, Caius I., and Trinity Hall I. eliciting the greatest enthusiasm. After the races the usual scenes took place as the boats returned, and a large number of boats lost oars and rudders. while a few received more serious damage, without the occurrence of any real accident.

SECOND DIVISION.

Between the starting posts and Grassy Third Trinity II. and Trinity Hall II. remained about equidistant, but Jesus II. were gaining on Hall: Queens' did not appear to be either losing or gaining. Magdalene bumped St. Catharine's about 200 yards below Grassy. King's were rowing pluckily and gaining rapidly, but were hard pressed by Christ's. Trinity Hall III. and Peterhouse were also gaining. First Trinity V. were a long way in the rear. In the Plough Reach Trinity Hall III. bumped L.M.B.C. III. Off Ditton, Downing gained rapidly on Jesus II., and bumped them at the Willows. At Ditton corner two in Trinity Hall II. broke his stretcher, and during the remainder of the race could only keep time with the boat. In spite of this mishap, the Hall gained steadily up to the Railway Bridge, and at the finish were but a quarter of a length behind the leading boat. Peterhouse again gained a place, bumping Caius III. in the Long Reach. King's almost regained the place they had lost on Wednesday: at the finish they were within a quarter of a length of First Trinity IV.

FIRST DIVISION.

The gun was fired at 7 o'clock precisely. Between Baitsbite and Grassy the first 6 boats rowed in a procession moving at equal intervals. First Trinity II. were gaining on Caius II. and Pembroke I. on Clare. First Trinity III. bumped Lady Margaret II. in the Gut, but not till they had almost rowed past them. Third Trinity II. were rowing pluckily considering their previous labours. In the Long Reach First Trinity II. worked steadily up to Caius II., and, rowing parallel for some distance, at last turned and ran into them half-way up the Long Reach. Trinity Hall I., following the same tactics as on the previous night, rowed steadily, reserving their spurt till they neared the Railway Bridge; from which point they gained steadily, effecting a bump opposite the Ditch. First Trinity I. did not appear to gain on Caius; Jesus held its own throughout, without any apparent effort.

COLLEGE CHAPELS.

SATURDAY, May 22nd.—King's: Anthem, "I was in the Spirit.' Blow. Trinity: Anthem, "I saw the Lord." Stainer.

SUNDAY, May 23rd. (Trinity Sunday).—King's: Anthem, "Holy, holy, holy." Handel. Trinity: Anthem, "Holy, holy, holy." Handel. St. John's: Holy, holy, holy." Handel.

MONDAY, May 24th.—King's: Anthem, "And lo a throne." Spohr.

TUESDAY, May 25th.—King's: Anthem, "In humble faith." Garrett.

The Pall Mall Gazette in Friday's issue reports the death of Professor Miller, who for many years has held the chair of Mineralogy in the University.

The University Musical Society gave the first of their two May Term Concerts in the large room at the Guildhall yesterday afternoon. Every seat was occupied, and the performance was most successful. It should be remarked that owing to the inadequate arrangement of the building sunshades and parasols were freely used by the lady visitors.

People are beginning to ask when the proposed Memorial Cross in old All Saints' Church-yard, opposite St. John's College, will be proceeded with. We understand that the delay is due to the slow pace at which subscriptions are coming into the hands of the Committee. The deficit is not large and we hope it will soon cease to exist.

C. U. Bi. C.

The Inter-University Trial Races were run on Thursday, May 20th. The path was rough in many places, and there was a little wind.

TWO MILES.—C. A. E. Pollock, Trinity, 1; G. D. Day, St. John's, 2. Pollock got the best of the start, but Day went ahead after 200 yards and kept in front till the conclusion of the first mile (time, 3 min. 7 sec.) Pollock then made the pace, Day not trying to get by until the last lap, in which he drew up level, but was unable to pass, and was beaten at the finish by about ten yards. Time, 6 min. 12 sec.

TEN MILES.—O. G. M. Leeds, Clare, 1; F. F. Tower, Trinity, 2; C. A. E. Pollock, Trinity, 3; F. S. Colman, Corpus, 0; F. G. Mayor, St. John's, 0; H. G. Atkinson, Emmanuel, 0. Atkinson led for the first three laps, when Tower went in front, Atkinson soon after giving up. The others kept well together until a spoke of Mayor's front wheel broke and he retired. The order for some miles was Tower, Leeds, Pollock, Colman, the last gradually dropping behind the others, who were riding in close company. The time for five miles was 16 min. 19 sec. Pollock then spurted ahead for a couple of laps but being attacked by cramp was repassed by Tower and Leeds. Soon afterwards Colman retired. At the commencement of the ninth mile Leeds spurted and was soon some way in front, winning ultimately by 60 yards, Pollock more than a lap behind.

TWENTY-FIVE MILES.—G. D. Day St. John's, 1; D. J. S. Bailey, Jesus, 2; H. Nicholls, St. John's, 3; O. P. Fisher, Jesus, 0. All four starters kept close together for 17 miles when Fisher got the cramp and after riding two or three more laps, retired. Before this he had been leading for the greater part of the distance. The three left in all led in turn during the next four miles, till in the 21st mile they settled down into the order, Nicholls, Day, Bailey. There was no further change until the last lap when Day and Bailey ran right away from Nichols, the former winning after a hard race by a yard, Nicholls about 50 yards behind.

The times for each five miles were as follows:—Five miles, 16 min. 34 sec.; 10 miles, 33 min. 11 secs.; 15 miles, 49 min. 55 sec.; 20 miles, 1 hr. 6 min. 40 sec.; 25 miles, 1 hr. 23 min. 45 sec.

Besides these races there was a three miles learner's race, which was won by W. G. Barclay, Downing, in 10 min. 43 sec.

The competitors against Oxford on Wednesday will probably be as follows: Two miles, Pollock and Day; 10 miles, Leeds, Tower, and Mayor; 25 miles, Day, Bailey, and Nicholls.

KING'S COLLEGE MUSICAL SOCIETY.

This Society gave its third concert in the College Hall, on Thursday, May 20th, at 9 p.m., before a fairly large audience; and the committee are to be congratulated on the very attractive programme they offered to their guests. It is satisfactory to notice the classical character of the concert, and the variety obtained by an alternation of instrumental and vocal music. The society set an example which might well be followed elsewhere in allowing no encores, though sometimes asked for: the programme itself being quite long enough for the enjoyment of all visitors who had gone through the usual gaieties in the course of the day.

It would be invidious to notice any one's performance in particular, but several things in the programme call for remark. Gade's trio in F major, for violin, violoncello and piano, opened the second part. The first movement (allegro non troppo) recalls the same composer's, "The sun in ocean sinks to rest," in the "Erl King's Daughter." It has the same light motif running through it, but the composer has worked it out more fully in the trio. This was perhaps the most attractive of all the movements; though the climax of the trio was reached in the finale, Allegro vivace. Messrs. Crowder and Mann opened the concert with one of Mozart's later sonatas, that in D major, and did full justice to one of the finest violin compositions of that master. Mr. Capel Cure played part of a violoncello sonata of Walter Macfarren's; Mr. Johnson gave Schumann's first Novellette, and Mr. Croft, Chopin's Nocturne, in F, and Impromptu in A flat. These gentlemen are to be warmly congratulated on the successful assistance they have given to these concerts. Of the vocal music, which the audience seemed thoroughly to appreciate, perhaps one of the best things was Sir George Elvey's part song, "Softly blow, ye breezes," which, though not a new composition, was performed for the first time at a madrigal concert, at Bristol, last Christmas, and met with an enthusiastic reception. It is a pity that Mr. Alan Gray's version of the "Three fishers" is not better known. It is an excellent setting of Kingsley's well known poem, and was well rendered by Mr. Foley. Mr. Gompertz sung Sullivan's "The distant shore," and Mr. Crowder, "Madamina un catalogo e questo," from the "Don Giovani." A very successful concert ended with Purcell's "Come unto these yellow sands," which forms part of the Tempest Music. The only thing that calls for remark in the arrangement of the programme is that the audience appeared to consider that a somewhat undue preponderance was given to the instrumental music. This, however, is certainly a fault on the right side, and when there are so many able instrumentalists in the College, their performances make an excellent programme. Thanks are due to all the performers for their kind assistance.

CHOIR MUTUAL AID SOCIETY.

THIRD ANNUAL FESTIVAL SERVICE IN KING'S COLLEGE CHAPEL.

The festival was very well attended this year, perhaps partly owing to the showers which prevented much sight seeing during the afternoon, and every part of King's Chapel was crowded with visitors.

We thought that the anthems given this year were not so interesting as they have been in former years, but the singing was good throughout, the only fault to be found being that perhaps the trebles were rather too powerful for the other parts. This peculiarity is often to be observed in the Cambridge College Chapels, where there are not so many men in the choirs, in proportion to the boys, as in the corresponding Oxford choirs of New and Magdalen Colleges.

In every festival the difficulty of uniting conductor and organist is to be found—the organ being generally so placed, and so fenced about with screens, that it is a difficult thing for the organist to watch the conductor's baton, and King's was no exception. In the last anthem, Beethoven's "Hallelujah," from the 'Mount of Olives,' this was especially to be observed. It is, no doubt, a difficult anthem to accompany, and in the latter part the organ was not always well with the choir.

Taking the singing more in detail—the service began with "I will arise,' by Creyghton, which opened the service very suitably. The first part of the service was intoned by the Precentor of Trinity, the music of the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis being Walmisley's, in B flat. This setting of the evening canticles is for double choir, and went admirably. The phrase 'and His mercy,' taken up alternately by the two choirs, gives a beautiful effect. The anthem placed in the usual part of the service was Greene's "God is our hope and strength;" the verses were for four and six voices, with a duet for two counter-tenors. The remaining part of the service was intoned by the Precentor of King's, and ended with the prayer of S. Chrysostom, after which the following anthems were sung:—"Now my God, I beseech Thee,"—Sterndale Bennett; "O Lord, Thou art my God"—Wesley; and Beethoven's 'Hallelujah,' from the 'Mount of Olives.' A voluntary was also played before the Hallelujah—Andante in G—C. E. Stephens. The service was concluded by the blessing given from the altar. Bennett's anthem is not very well known, and is a fine work, although the first movement is rather disfigured by peculiar separation of the word 'let,' from the words to which it belongs. The third chorus, "So we, Thy people," in peculiar $\frac{3}{2}$ rhythm, and the quartet recitative that follows are very original.

In Wesley's "O Lord Thou art my God" there is a quintet, and a bass solo, which was taken by the first bass of the Trinity Choir; Beethoven's noble "Hallelujah" is too well known to require notice.

On the whole we thought the festival was rather too long, particularly Wesley's anthem, but at the same time it is an institution that well deserves the support that it gains. It is so seldom that one can hear in King's a choir suitable to the size of the building, that one wishes the choir festivals came oftener. One more criticism, and we have done—Why were the responses played on the organ? They never are so played at the ordinary services, and surely with a trebled choir, it would be still less necessary. The result of playing them was that the intoning was made a matter of great difficulty, as the least change of pitch became painfully evident at the end of the unison. The service and Beethoven's "Hallelujah" were conducted by the organist of Trinity, the extra anthems by the organist of St. John's.

On Wednesday the terminal competition for the handsome Peek Challenge Bowl, with silver cup added, came off; it was won by Lieut. Lindsay, F Company, with a score of 42 points, Lieut. Goddard, E Company, taking the second prize of £1 with 34 points.

On Friday and Saturday the preliminary competition for the Prince of Wales' Grand Challenge Cup took place, only the first six in this competition being entitled to shoot for the grand prize itself. Both days were fine and the shooting on the whole was very good, notably that of Col.-Sergt. Dove, who was to the fore with plenty in hand. The scores of the six were as follows:

Col.-Sergt. Dove	...	32	25	25	28	110
Lieut. Goddard	...	30	26	23	21	100
Private Daldy	...	28	24	29	18	99

Private Blake	...	28	24	20	25	97
Private Pollock	...	29	23	20	14	86

On Monday the annual match with the Inns of Court was shot, fifteen a side, resulting in the defeat of the University, but this is not to be wondered at, as some of our crack shots were unable to take part. We shall give the detailed scores next week.

RECENT ENGLISH ORATORIOS.

PART II.

I propose now to consider a rather different class of points calling for criticism in our Oratorios, which will be sufficiently suggested to the reader by the term Realism. Of course Realism in the sense of mere vividness or concreteness is inseparable from the dramatic form. But besides this, we have in these Oratorios some attempts at Realism, more properly so called, that is to say the introduction of local colouring intended to suggest to the senses the details of the scene as they actually occurred.

To go into the general question of Realism in sacred Art would take us much too far afield. It is sufficient for the present purpose to point out that some tendency in that direction seems now observable. The great painters of old used to represent sacred personages with the features and in the raiment of the persons they saw about them. Mr. Holman Hunt spends a long time in the Holy Land with the object of giving us a faithful representation of the face of a youthful Oriental Jew and the interior of an Oriental carpenter's shop. Whether this Realism will be found in the long run to strengthen the religious feeling, or whether it is rather to be regarded as the outcome (no doubt often the unconscious outcome) of a rationalistic and sceptical age, is a very grave question.

Traces of such Realism occur in "St. John the Baptist" in the three blasts of the trumpet that commence the overture. This, as we gather from the Preface, is intended to represent "the sounding of the ram's horn, or silver trumpet that announces the new year," and which "may be supposed to have been an intended greeting for the Messiah." Again, speaking of the daughter of Herodias, the preface says: "The difficult incident of her appearance at the banquet is attempted to be met with due reverence for the solemnity of other portions of the history, by the avoidance of all familiar forms of dance music, and the employment of scales in use among Eastern nations, and by the introduction of some fragments of genuine Oriental melody. It will be fortunate if a picture may thus be raised of the possible reality of the scene, dissociated from conventional notions."

With these applications of local colouring I have no wish to quarrel. They seem to me thoroughly legitimate effects. But I must say that I think the same principle is carried to a point beyond the line that divides the ridiculous from the sublime in the chorus at the beginning of Part II. of "Joseph," where the Egyptians show their reverence for Pharaoh in the following language:—

> "Lord of diadems, hail!
> Regulator of Egypt, hail!
> Chastiser of foreign lands, hail!
> Sun-born of the gods, hail!
> Possessor of the Upper and Lower Country, hail!
> Hawk of Gold, hail!
> Arch in years, hail!
> Greatest of the powerful, hail, all hail!"

To this "neat derangement of epitaphs" (as Mrs. Malaprop would very appropriately have called it) is appended the following extraordinary note:—

> "Records of the past; being English translations of the Assyrian and Egyptian monuments, published under the sanction of the Society of Biblical Archæology"

One reflection is forcibly suggested by these attempts at Realism in Oratorio. How much harder the task set before the arranger of an oratorio librett) is now than it was in the days of Handel! Then the author might if he chose cast his work in the dramatic form without being encumbered with any of the difficulties that surround that form in the present day. Then there was a conventional colouring to be given to every scene, and a conventional language for the characters to talk; and both were accepted by the people of that time as suitable and sufficient. There was no thought of Realism. Solomon and the Queen of Sheba bow and set to one another like a Dresden-china shepherd and shepherdess. Nobody thought for a moment that no words but Scripture should be admitted to Oratorio. A sufficient supply of verses, generally more flowery than devout, could always be obtained at short notice, such as this:—

"Low at her feet he bowed, he fell,
And laid in dust his haughty head,
And long posterity shall tell
That where he bowed he fell down dead."
Handel's Deborah.

Or this:

"'Tis thus the crocodile his grief displays,
Sheds the false tear, and while he weeps betrays," Handel's Susannah.

Now all that is changed. The reason is twofold. In the first place the historic sense has become more exacting: in the second place the religious sense has become, if not stronger, more refined. On the one hand the critical spirit has made us more impatient of merely conventional representations of great events: on the other hand our increasing fastidiousness has tended to make us more or less dissatisfied with any concrete representation of sacred events, whether conventional or realistic.

If we look at the early history of oratorio we find that it was in its origin a religious service. But insomuch as it made its appearance in Italy, where the application of scenic effects to religious services has always been regarded by the people as natural and proper, before long the purely devotional character of the original oratorios was broken in upon. We read* with regard to some of the early oratorios that they were "curious mixtures of piety and profanity." That these two elements have a sort of affinity for each other in oratorio seems clear from quite recent instances. We may say perhaps that oratorio has throughout its history been beset by the conflicting traditions of the Church and the Theatre. It is not difficult to divide oratorios into two classes according as the one set of traditions or the other has been uppermost in them. And we may notice that whereas one of these classes, the ecclesiastical, tends to adopt the narrative form, the other, the theatrical, attempts as far as is practicable the dramatic. Instances of both classes readily occur. Among the former class we have Bach's setting of the "Passion" and Handel's two finest works, the "Messiah" and "Israel in Egypt." On the other we have the greater number of the rest of Handel's oratorios. If we ask to which of these two types of oratorio "St. John the Baptist" and "Joseph" belong, we are somewhat puzzled. To the librettist, as pointed out above, the circumstances of the time no doubt presented peculiar difficulties. Determined to be dramatic, but also obliged to be scriptural, he has evolved a type of oratorio which may perhaps be described as a game of capping texts interspersed with lessons in biblical archæology.

There is just one more point about these oratorios to which I would call attention. The introduction of reflective or devotional passages occurs in oratorios of nearly all kinds. The greater part of the words assigned to the chorus, indeed, are commonly of this kind. But similar passages are often assigned to solo singers.

It is evident that the difficulty of setting words of this kind so as to maintain the requisite emotional level is much greater in the case of a solo than of a chorus. It must also be pointed out that the difficulty is greater when the dramatic form predominates than where the narrative form is employed. In the former case the composer is likely to be in the vein for writing dramatic music, and the transition to the devotional style may not be easy. In "St. John the Baptist" the words that form the commencement of the Gospel of St. John are made the subject of a contralto air. Some may think that such words could under no circumstances form a suitable subject for music. But even if they could, it could only be by the most careful preparation, and most fortunate treatment. In "Joseph," again, there is a long didactic air for sopranos (No. 30) which ends up with the words "Wherefore let us run with patience the race that is set before us," &c. So far as the words are concerned there is here no fault to find; but in the setting of the words it seems to me as if the composer had been unable to shake off the influence of the dramatic style. Anyhow these words are set to a tune which—well, if we heard it in an opera-bouffe we should scarcely think it over solemn for the occasion. The climax is reached when the singer at length runs (with patience) up to the high soprano C, whence a brilliant descent is made to bring the air to a conclusion.

To return to the general question. The defects I have pointed out seem all to spring, more or less, from the adoption of the dramatic form. "Is all this, then," it may be asked, "written to prove that the narrative form is the only one left for oratorios?" Not exactly, for I should not admit that the narrative form was without its drawbacks either. In fact I should rather say, "If your work is to be distinctly ecclesiastical and devotional, why have a story at all?" What need of a Bible story to serve merely as a peg for devotional airs and choruses? Is not this practice connected with an idea which if pressed few would now like to avow, that the stories of Sampson and Jephtha are "fit for Sunday" because they are in the Bible, and the story (say) of King Arthur not, because it is not? As for purely sacred music let us consider the field offered by the Psalms. These wonderful poems are surely capable of treatment as elaborate as the most ambitious composer need wish. In fact I am disposed to think that if (besides instrumental music and secular vocal music not of a dramatic nature) we have on the one hand real religious music, and on the other real dramatic music with all the scenic accessories that are its due, we shall do pretty well in the future without more oratorios. I do not wish to undervalue the immense mine of music to be found amongst oratorios already written, and with regard to the English oratorios of the present day I am far from wishing to reduce them all to one level and ignore the fact that there are amongst them really delightful works, especially where (as with Mr. Sullivan's "Prodigal Son") the composer has has been fortunate with his libretto.

It only remains to consider one argument that may be brought forward in favour of the maintenance of oratorio. I mean the patriotic argument. The oratorio, it may be said, is our national form of music, and we must not desert it. It is very difficult indeed to define the right attitude to assume in regard to music, as a natural question. On the one hand we feel that in judging of music the nationality of the composer ought to be left entirely out of account. On the other hand we cannot suppress a desire that we, as a nation, may eventually possess a real school of composers of our own. But to attempt to conjure up, or bolster up, any such school, by what we may call a Protective System, is the greatest possible mistake. We must recognize that we are still in discipleship. As Germany once looked up to Italy, so we must look up to Germany, only possibly with the recognition of a still wider interval between master and pupil than in the former case. We need not, I think, be afraid that any genuine elements of national music that do exist among us will be completely obliterated. The astonishing spread of musical taste and musical knowledge in England in the last few years seems to promise much. But in any case it would be much better that we should never have a national school of composition than that we should cheat ourselves of good music by favouring composers and forms of composition simply because they are English.

THE DECAY OF CEREMONIAL.

A salient feature of these times of ours is the triumph of Business over Art. They have grappled in needless conflict, and, for the present at least, the former has the honours of victory. And nowhere has devastation been more complete than with the Arts of Ceremony. We have lost two mutually dependent capacities, that of contriving stately ceremonies, and that of enjoying them. They 'bore' us, we have no craving for them; they are lifeless, we have no care to put life into them.

In whatever direction we turn we can see the relics of old ceremonies: some are dying, some dead, and some buried, not without reverence, in the tombs of archæologic lore. It cannot be said that the air is fragrant with their memories; what has gathered about them is a musty savour of decay. Look at the old Calendar of the year—what has become of the 'Days' which in quick succession brightened or solemnified the passing months?

> Jack-in-the-Green no more is seen,
> Nor May-pole in the street,
> No mummers play on Christmas-day,
> St. George is obsolete.

"Elia" might indulge in pleasant fooling about them, as realities to him, none the less pleasant for the antiquarian flavour gathering about them, but to us they are not Days but Names.

Look at Elections, too. The boisterous hilarities of the hustings are no more: no longer does the holding up of the miry and perhaps hireling hand give the non-elector a temporary share in the visible management of the nation's affairs. This, very likely, is well. But need the change have been so drastic? Was there nothing between rowdyism and the present system of ticket meetings, select nominations, and general attempt to keep the different sides apart? Here and there, indeed, during the late elections something more ceremonious spontaneously asserted itself, as in that pleasing arm-in-arm procession of candidates and leading supporters at the Manchester nomination. And the Celt evidently retains some relish for the olden humours, as the Egg of Enniscorthy bears witness; is the dourness of the Saxon to be another addition to the "wrongs of Ireland"?

Then, at home: what human ritual can cope in poverty of artistic imagination with Degree-day in the Senate-House of Cambridge? Prosaic is not the word for it; there is utter blankness. Even if the candidates themselves are lost to better feelings, the disappointment of sisters, aunts, and cousins, bears witness to the deeper needs of the human bosom on occasions like this. And the poverty of Ceremonial receives here no aid from the rich arts of Music and Painting. No statues* suggest an Academic Walhalla or are carried, Roman-wise, in ambition stirring procession; no paintings beguile our time or fill our minds with lofty memories or high resolutions: no swelling strains assist the imagination to realize that the close of University life means somewhat worth thinking on. Stateliness and grace have departed, though "graces" are not wanting; it is a "business;" and soon the deepest recollections of Degree-day will be those connected with that not unpainful tour, when, bills in hand, the laurel-crowned makes reckoning for the expenses of the terms which have fled.

Similar ruin is coming, or has come, upon the chief occasions of familiar social rejoicing; of which Weddings used, at least, to stand foremost. I leave outside such an arrangement as a marriage at an office-desk in a register-office; imagination recoils from the contemplation: but even from wedding days when no actual embargo is laid upon cheerfulness, most of the poetry has gone. Bridesmaids are struggling for existence; groomsmen have perished, save one to show what once has been. The breakfast is a scene of ordinary chatter, references to the deeper meanings of the day flickering, perhaps, fitfully and dubiously about; speech-making is tabooed. No longer is the whole day spent in gratulatory rejoicing,

> The whiles the maydens doe theyr carroll sing,
> To which the woods shall answer, and theyr echo ring.

The guests, if any, just linger on until the newly-married have driven to the nearest railway-station, and then, pell-mell away. We have lost, it seems, the whole poetry of the situation; if we have the feelings we think that they need not be expressed, or else that we cannot do it with tact and grace. Can the real reason be that because we no longer care to cry

> Crowne ye god Bacchus with a coronall, that we reject also

> And Hymen also crowne with wreathes of vine?

In our eagerness to suppress Bacchus have we expelled Hymen with the Muses and the Graces, all in one dishonoured rout?

From weddings the transition is naturally to funerals. Of private ones I will not speak further than this, to ask the friends of Funeral Reform what substitute they propose for the 'pomp and circumstance' which have hitherto engaged the attention and soothed the imagination of mourners? As for public funerals of great men, the general mind still holds firmly to them:

> Lead out the pageant sad and slow,
> As fits an universal woe.

If the deeds of the dead are to be recorded, we have in their public funerals a means of impressing the memories of the multitude which it were a thousand pities to throw away.

In connection with the dead, we must notice a movement running counter to the general tendency dealt with in this paper. Symbolism has re-asserted itself through a combination of two of the deepest of human feelings—respect for the dead, and love of flowers. The decoration of graves is now a custom revived to pristine vigour, but it has stepped in only just in time to prevent the very terms "wreath" and "garland" becoming mere echoes from poetry and history. Another symbolicism, running counter to the decay of ceremonial, is very prominent just now. I mean the Ritualistic movement in religion. Of this I shall say nothing except to point out that its effect extends very much farther than the expressly ritualistic Churches, and even than the Church of England itself.

There are also one or two important bodies among whom ceremonial still holds honoured and useful sway. Our legal friends, now, maintain a cheerful devotion to robes and wigs, to "openings of commissions" and mysterious javelin men. Whether or not this proceeds from inherent love of precedents I do not know, but I, for my part, am comforted to see it, nay, I have to rejoice that it has of late received extension to the less reverent minds of Solicitors, who now plead in gowns before the not too awful dignity of the County Court. True, here and there an ill-regulated mind may allow a Judge to appear on the Bench in a shooting-jacket, as Lord Young did the other day, but this was a mere vagary, and it was in Scotland.

* This I say purposely, as the Hanoverian Kings in the garb of Roman Senators hardly fulfil this purpose. Pitt is well, but where are the others of the mighty dead?

Then there are the mysterious fraternities, Freemasonry, Oddfellows, Foresters, Good Templars, and perhaps more. I have no knowledge, and I dare not make surmises, as to what of elegant ceremonial still attaches to their rites. By us of the outside world they are known as delighting in quaint insignia, and having many ranks and many offices; about an office for each member, let us say. And I have heard it affirmed that it is this very love of Symbolism which gives them one half of their attractiveness. It has been declared that the prospect of possessing medals, ribbons and aprons galore, with a free supply of capital letters for titular purposes has no small share in the making and the keeping of many a worthy Mason or Templar.

These strivings after better things are, however, merely oases standing verdant in the spreading desert. There can be no manner of doubt that the most widely evinced attitude towards ceremonial art is to despise it. We will cling to the few golden threads in the fast paling fabric of social life, but we do not close our eyes to the fact. It is curious to see how people attempt to justify the growing gloom. Many, perhaps most, urge simplicity, some of them forgetting that there is a simplicity which is itself ceremony, just as Diogenes' humility was a form of pride. If Lord Castlereagh appeared, as was said, at the Vienna Conference without decorations, he went very grossly over-decorated. The evening dress of an American Minister at a Drawing-room is a uniform as decided as the most broadly laced suit in the room. But besides those who do not see that there may be pretentiousness in simplicity, there are more who cannot distinguish splendour from gorgeousness, formality from artificiality. Offended with pompousness they fly to brusqueness, forgetting that stateliness lies between. Ceremoniousness is dismissed as childish or barbaric, forgetting that children give life half its poetry, and not seeing that barbaricism is a quality of one stage of art, not the perennial substance of it. If we turn to that period of our history to which we must turn so often when thinking broadly of English life, the Elizabethan period, what do we find? Is it not that stateliness, elegance, decorousness, all that makes external life ceremonious and pictorial, were at their highest pitch just among the most splendid set of men of whom we can boast? Sidney, Raleigh, Spenser, Bacon, Shakespeare, Jonson—these were men the splendour of whose writings reflects the magnificent exterior of the age as well as its vigorous and high-hearted energy. What could we make of Raleigh in an unceremonious world, of Spenser going down by train to his modern wedding, Bacon at a modern Cambridge degree day? Imagination collapses at the attempt to realize such incongruities. It seems to me that Sidney or Raleigh would have insisted on proposing the health of the ladies, that Spenser would have—well, perhaps, done like Mr. Allingham, published his epithalamium in some Cornhill, that Bacon would hardly have been restrained by force from addressing the Vice-Chancellor on the present and future condition of the Mathematical and all other sciences.

The decay of ceremonial is, after all, one of the broad effects of the prevailing weakness of the æsthetic spirit. Our noblest living artist has lately given us his opinion as to the obstacle our modern life offers to the development of fine art: "A great school of art is possible in England," he says, "only on the ground that all things are possible." Our poets when they leave psychological analysis wander back to Arthurian legends or Greek myths. One solitary art advances, Music, and even that with a tendency to become mathematical, so to speak, appealing to intellect rather than to feeling.

To quote Mr. Watts again, "the world has become unnecessarily grey." And yet there are colour-blind souls who plume themselves on their supposed superiority, trying to cover with the pretence of simplicity the poverty of their imaginations. Of course if we have lost the feelings for graceful pomp, for stately dignity, we must make the best of it: but can such loss be permament? will not the warmer side of nature reassert itself and a new life erelong arise even for the Art of Ceremonial?

POETRY.

ODE TO MAY.

πῶς οὐ χρὴ καὶ ἀοιδὸν ἐν εἰαρι καλὸν ἀείσαι;
Meleager.

What song to welcome coming May, the queen
Of flowery meadows and delicious days?
Are not the banners green
That wave along the hedges, and the songs
Of lark and nightingale sufficient praise?
What other due belongs
To this sweet creditor, whose unpaid debt
Grows every moment by no offerings met?

We owe thee more than we can ever tell,
But thou more bounteous wouldst not be repaid,
Knowing thy grace too well,
How from the fount of thy Divinity
Clear waters spring more gracious in cool shade
Because they are so free:
We worship at the shrine of hot July,
But thou giv'st happiness nor seek'st reply.

Surely thou wast not born within our ken,
But fashioned far away in fairer skies,
A gift of gods to men.
The Graces wove thy Vesture bright of mists
Breathed from the sun when first he doth uprise
And girds him as he lists
In crimson panoply, the king of might
Coming forth as a giant to the fight.

Thou from the song they labouring at the loom
Sang clear retainest yet some melody:—
For they from dawn to gloom
Spun ceaselessly, then gathering the thrums
Wound them upon the spool right carefully
And straightway each one comes Into her palace high and wonderful,
After they wrought the raiment beautiful.

There did they rest, and thou being clad didst down
From heaven descend along the golden stairs
And Joy a flowerful crown
Set on their head, and sorrow fled away
Before thy feet, and melancholy cares
Went after him their way;
And thou, a goddess sprung of love and light,
Camest to our shores to make thereon delight.

But we—our ears are dull, souls heavy grown,
We cannot hear thy music as we would;—
O queen, are we thine own?
Dost thou not now remember and regret
The vale of Tempe and the shadowy wood
And crocus-blossoms wet
In the dim dawn, where once thy favoured sons
Paid at the shrine their earliest orisons?

Or wave-charmed isles lulled by the summer sea,
Where she, thy sister, stilled the nightingales,
Thy heralds, filled with thee
And thy glad tidings*, till gods envious grown
Cast her to lie for prey to waves and gales;
Nor from her golden throne
Could Aphrodite save her votaress
Or clasp her beauty with a last caress.

Wilt thou not bear us back with thee again?
Wilt thou not fire us as of old, O May?
Sweet as before thy reign
Fills woods and hills, fills field and fountain sides,
Dishonoured, disenchanted; nymph nor fay
In wood or fount abides,
No more thy morning worshippers salute
Thy feet with praise and incense, song and lute.

Yet unto us is given joy of thee,
We too from feebler lips and fainter heart
Still praise and bow the knee.
Thou bringest back hope and sweet memories,
And fresh as from the morn of years thou art,
A gladness in our eyes.
Thou shalt not sink into the summer time
Unpraised, unsung in even a colder clime,

Behold, beneath her feet the streamlets flow
And blossoms break into a fiery spray;
A milder air doth blow
Through the green fields and forests ever young:—
Crown me with flowers and frondage, fairest May,
Whereof sweet birds have sung,
And sing thou with thy voice content and peace,
And from the loud world grant a little ease.

THE PAPER-KNIFE.

Macmillan's Science Primers. Introductory. By Professor Huxley, F.R.S.

Messrs. Macmillan and Co. have recently been publishing a series of Science Primers, under the joint editorship of Professors Huxley, Roscoe and Balfour Stewart. The last of the series that has appeared is introductory to the whole. Professor Huxley is the author, and his name was sufficient to procure a great sale for the work, even before publication. There are three chapters headed respectively Nature and Science, Material Objects and Immaterial Objects; of these the first covers but eighteen pages, the last two, while the remainder of the ninety, composing the whole book, is devoted to chapter II. This seems a strange division of the subject. Excellent Primers have been published in the same series on Chemistry, by Professor Roscoe, on Physics, by Professor Balfour Stewart, and on Physiology, by Dr. Michael Foster, and yet Professor Huxley thinks it necessary to fill three-quarters of his work, with matter most of which must be found in one of the three works alluded to. In an Introduction to a scientific series of books, primers though they be, we look for something more than Professor Huxley has given us about the aim of Science, the Relations of Nature to Science, and the methods by which scientific discoveries are made.

The true object of a scientific training and its importance are things too easily passed over, and might well have been more fully developed and insisted on in a work like the present. A class of boys it may be are learning Physics or Chemistry from some other book; it would have been no small help to the teacher, and would have added considerably to the interest felt by the class, could they know more fully why they should be so employed, or what use their work was to be to them. An Introduction to a series of sciences need not consist merely of the elements of some of these sciences put in a simple manner.

There would, however, have been less reason of disappointment if the book as it stands had been thoroughly satisfactory, but this unfortunately is far more than can be said for it. On page 28 we have some remarks on "the mischief done by the inaccurate use of such words as attraction and force," and are told that "it is worth while to take pains to get clear ideas on this head at the outset of the study of science." Before writing to any purpose on Physics it is not only worth while but absolutely necessary to have clear ideas, to be in a position to form a clear physical conception of the facts to be explained in the book and their mutual relation.

Now the theory of Energy and the great principle of the conservation of energy form the basis of most physical research at present and are of fundamental importance. Section 29, page 43 is on the energy of moving water. In the previous section the motion of water issuing through a short horizontal pipe from a vat has been considered and explained, and now we are asked to turn one end of the pipe vertically upwards and again observe the jet of water. We are told that neglecting the resistance of the air the horizontal jet might go on for ever if its weight did not gradually cause its path to become more and more bent towards the earth, and then the author continues:—

"When the jet is vertical the case is altered. The water thrown up vertically constantly tends to fall down vertically as any other heavy body would do, and its momentum has to overcome the obstacle of gravity." It is not easy to see how the case is altered; the direction in which the water starts is different it is true, but the important point is the manner in which the motion is modified by the weight of the water. This weight is due to the attraction of the earth, and its effect is identical in the two cases. Suppose the velocity with which any particle leaves the pipe be such that if we could destroy the effect of its weight the particle would by the end of one second be at a distance of 50 feet measured in a horizontal direction from the pipe, we can find its position by travelling this same distance 50 feet in the horizontal direction, and then descending about 16 feet vertically downwards. Had the particle been started with the same velocity in any other direction, vertical or otherwise, our rule would have been just the same, we should have still to travel 50 feet in the original direction of the particle's motion, and then descend 16 feet. If it be thrown vertically upwards it will at the end of one second have risen 34 feet. But for the action of gravity it would have gone 50 feet, gravity has pulled it down 16, it has therefore risen 34 feet. The two cases, so far as the action of gravity is concerned, are the same, not different.

But we have not yet reached the end of this strange confusion, for in the next sentence we learn that "any given portion of water is in fact acted on by two opposite tendencies, momentum urging it up and gravity pulling it down. Now if two equal tendencies exactly oppose one another, the body does not move at all." The momentum of a body then, according to Prof. Huxley, is something external to the body tending to produce motion. Momentum and the weight of a body are quantities of the same kind, and can therefore be compared. Numerically we can say which of the two is the greater, and in what proportion. Can our teacher tell us which is the greater, the volume of a box or the area of its lid, the size of a field or the length of one of its sides? It is just as impossible to compare weight and momentum as it is to compare volume and area or area and length. They are quantities of a different kind. The effect of gravity or the weight of a body acting on a body free to move is to produce momentum, and to find the momentum produced by its weight in a given time when a body is falling freely, we multiply the weight by the time during which it has been falling.

In continuing his explanation Professor Huxley says, "Thus a portion of water which has just left the spout shoots up because the velocity with which it is impelled upwards is sufficient to carry it through a greater space in a given time, say a second, than that through which its gravity would in the same time impel it downwards." Gravity would in one second draw the body through about 16 feet. If then the velocity upwards with which the water leaves the spout be less than 16 feet per second, it will at once begin to fall downwards, this at least, nonsense though it be, is the only meaning of which the words are capable.

Page 45 introduces us to the conception of energy, the word obstacle has been used several time previously. "The horizontal jet has no obstacle to overcome"; "the vertical jet has the obstacle of gravity," and then we learn that "when a body in motion overcomes any kind of obstacles in its way, parting with its momentum and more or less coming to rest in the process we say it has energy and that it does work."

Now this statement is far too general. Any body in motion has energy of course. It may, however, lose its momentum entirely and yet retain its energy unchanged; because it parts with its momentum it does not follow that it parts also with its energy. The energy of a body or its power to do work is of two kinds; it is partly kinetic and partly potential. Kinetic energy depends on the motion of the body, and if the body loses its momentum it also loses its energy. The potential energy depends on its position with reference to other bodies which affect it and on the forces acting on it, for the body, even though at rest, may in virtue of these be capable of doing work. The kinetic energy may be transformed into the potential or vice versâ.

This is what happens in the case of the jet of water. Any particle of the water has always till it reaches the ground the same amount of energy; it does no work, though it overcomes the obstacle of gravity; it loses kinetic energy, but it gains potential. But the fault is, energy to Professor Huxley means kinetic energy; potential is ignored. The same error occurs in the next next page, where we are told that water falling down hill "acquires momentum and hence energy." It does not: it acquires kinetic energy, but loses an equal amount of potential.

Less than four pages have furnished matter for a long notice. The rest must be passed over with but few words. The proportion of its weight to its volume does not, as is stated on page 32, give us the density of a body. The distinction between mass and weight is a difficult one to make clear to elementary students; it is missed in section 22. The same section contains this definition of relative velocity: "Of two bodies, one of which travels through one foot in a second while the other travels through two feet, the latter has the greater relative velocity." What this has to do with relative velocity we entirely fail to see. In conclusion, then, all must regret that Professor Huxley should have thought it requisite to leave his own subject and attempt to teach people physics. To write well on any branch of science requires a comprehensive grasp of that branch in all its bearings. For this long special training is necessary, and now-a-days but few are able to make many subjects their special study.

The theory of energy is clearly stated in the late Professor Clerk-Maxwell's book, Matter and Motion, chapter V. May we express the hope that in a second edition of the present work Section 29 may be re-written more in accordance with the principles there enunciated.

Professor Skeat's Etymological Dictionary of the English Language. (Part II., Dor-Lit.)

Our readers will be glad to be reminded that the third part of this excellent work is to be published on the 1st of July. Of the general merits of Professor Skeat's work we have already expressed our opinion in the columns of this journal,* and to that opinion we have nothing to add, except that the better is our acquaintance with this Etymological Encyclopædia, the more deeply are we sensible of the vast obligations which its author is conferring on English linguistic studies and Philological Science in general.

In our previous review we ventured to think that Professor Skeat had taken too extended a view of the province of English Etymology. We then gave a promise, which we have been tardy in redeeming, of shewing how the space which would have been gained by a less liberal estimate of his task might have been turned to account. The room now occupied by more or less detailed discussion of foreign derivations might, we think, have been more advantageously filled by developing, in their applications to single words, the laws of English phonetic change. We know that this is an unpopular suggestion. Phonology is a name that is odious to the general public (there is a general public, even in Cambridge), and its recent extensions by Brugmann, Sweet, de Saussure, and others will not tend to make it more popular. But for all that it is a study with which no philologer can dispense, and least of all the English philologer. Thanks to the stereotyped monstrosity which we call English spelling, whose connexion with pronunciation is nearly as slight as in Chinese and much more misleading, the notion of a sound apart from a symbol is strange even to the educated Englishman. His sole acquaintance with the representation of words in writing is through the sight: in most cases he merely translates a cluster of muscular movements into a succession of written or printed figures or vice versa, without attaching any definite idea to them separately; and, paradoxical as it may seem, he would be satisfied that (apart from the meaning) two words in Chaucer and Tennyson were the same, if you could shew him that they were spelt the same! How serious an evil this confusion of letter and sound, of speech and character, has become, we cannot stop to demonstrate at length, though we are sorry to say such demonstration is by no means superfluous. It will be enough to shew by an example that it is absolutely necessary for the etymological student that he should be acquainted with the changes which have passed over the pronunciation of each word; or rather over the word itself. For the representation of the word in writing and printing is merely its ghost or shadow, which has disembodied itself from the substance to haunt and trouble the uninstructed with its vain and phantom suggestions. 'The word 'name,' says Mr. H. Sweet,† as its spelling indicates, was in Chaucer's time pronounced naamə, or something like it. It is now neim, although still written 'name.' The investigations of Mr. Ellis have proved that 'name' passed through the following stages: naamə, naam, nææm, (long of æ in 'man'), naem, neem, neim'. Verbum non amplius addam.

I add some notes on special points which are the outcome of a tolerably minute scrutiny.

Drone. The root DHRAN can hardly be to make a continuous sound, and an extension of rt. DHAR to bear maintain. It is much more probably a simple onomatopœia.—'Duplication from Lat. duplic-, stem of duplex and Duplicity from Lat. duplici-, crude form of duplex' is probably an oversight, for there is no ground for a distinction between crude forms and stems. Easel. Compare the use of the Greek κιλλίβας an ass.—Elephant, 'from Lat. elephantem, acc. of elephas: from Greek ἐλέφαντα acc. of ἐλέφας'. Elephantus is the original and the popular Latin form. It comes from the Greek gen. ἐλέφαντος: compare delphinus, Titanus, abacus, &c.

Emolument cannot come from emŏliri. It is from emolere (compare tegumentum), and means 'what is ground out,' the corn which is the profit of the grinding. Equine. ἵκκος is misprinted ἵκκος—Etymon. 'ἔτυμος an extended form from ἐτεός' (ἐτεός): rather a formation with a different suffix. Euphrasy. It would have been better to have quoted φρεν-, base of φρην, the mind, in the old form φραν- which comes in Pindar. Excise, to cut out. Professor Skeat's statement that it is very rare and must apply only to our earlier literature. It is surely common now. Fastidious. It is not clear from Professor Skeat's quotation that Bréal's explanation of fastidium as for fasti-tidium involves that of fastitidium being for fastutaedium. If it does, it is clearly wrong, as there is no analogy for the formation. Fastidium is formed with the same suffix as for-m-ido and fastidare is exactly parallel to formidare. Fish. I have never been able to see any objection to deriving fish, piscis, &c., from root PI to drink: cf. 'he drinks like a fish.' Flagitious, 'from Lat. flagitium, a disgraceful act, from Lat. base flag- to burn.' Flagitare properly means to 'beat': flagitatus in an old phrase in Cato (ap. Prisc. 719 P.) and in Festus p. 110 appears as caesus in Tertullian Pall. 4. Hence it = 'hammer at, importune.' Flagitium either means 'a matter for the lash' (flagrum, flagellum) or else 'a burning shame.' Foment. The origin of the Lat. fovere should not be unknown. It is from a root BHAW‡ to warm, or shine, which we find in φα(F)os, favus, &c., and is an expansion of BHA to shine. Formidable. Lat. formido is connected with horreo. The alternation of f and h in the same word is not uncommon in Latin. Fulcrum. Fulcio is closely connected with farcio and means properly "to press." It has nothing to do with Skt. dhru to stand firm. — Galaxy. Brunnhofer's derivation of γαλακτ is satisfactory. He takes it from a root GAR to swallow, drink (Curt. No. 643). He compares γάρος pap. We may add βδέλλα, βδάλλω where the g is treated as in βίεω.—Gastric. The various forms may be explained thus: Root GAT. Skt. jatharas = root + suffix + ara (compare Goth. quithr in laus-quithr-s), Gk. γασ-τήρ (for γατ-τήρ) = root + suffix -tar Lat. venter (for g uenter) and Teutonic wanst for want-t come from a nasalized form gant. Grail. It does not seem likely that Spenser's use of grail for 'fine particles' should be derived from the O.Fr. graile, fine, small. May it not be simply the Fr. subst. grêle hail?—Habitude: "formed with suffix -do from -habitu, crude form of habitus." It is more correct to say formed with suffix -tudo (or tudin) from stem habe- compare vale-tudo, &c. Ichneumon. The Greek ἴχ-νος is much better connected with ικ-νέομαι (Curt. No 24 c) than with ἔοικω. Iron. Professor Skeat's ingenious connexion of iron with ice is very probable. Iron's rapid conduction of heat which in a northern climate would make it feel extremely cold for the greatest part of the year would contribute to fix the name. Lemur. The sing. of Lemures is not found in Latin. Lea. 'Lat. lucus a grove, glade, open space in a wood (derived a lucendo!§)'. It can be shewn that this is not the primary meaning of lucus, but belongs to nemus = Gr. νέμος a feeding place among trees. Propertius, a poet full of archaisms, has V. 9.24. lucus ab umbroso fecerat orbe nemus, i.e. a lucus (the sacred plantation) had made a nemus or glade by a circle of shade trees.' We may compare Gk. λυγή, λυγαῖος ἐπηλυγάζω and probably lugeo to put on black', λυγρὸς which point to a root LUK to be dark. Thus lucus means shade and is named a non-lucendo after all.

We cannot conclude without again expressing our admiration of the way in which Professor Skeat is executing his task.

A JOURNAL OF UNIVERSITY LIFE AND THOUGHT.

No. 24.] WEDNESDAY, MAY 26, 1880. [PRICE SIXPENCE.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

The University Commissioners have invited the several Colleges to express their opinions about the comparative merits of their original scheme for the attachment of fellowships to professorships, and a new scheme intended to encourage the election of professors to fellowships, without making it compulsory.

The late William Hallows Miller, LL.D., F.R.S., Professor of Mineralogy in this University, whose death we chronicled last week, was born in 1801. He graduated at St. John's, in 1826, and became Fellow and Tutor of that Society. In 1832 he succeeded Dr. Whewell, in the Chair of Mineralogy; and in 1856 became Foreign Secretary of the Royal Society. In 1843 Professor Miller served on the Committee appointed to superintend the construction of the Parliamentary standards of length and weight, the originals having been destroyed by the fire in the Houses of Parliament. The work was brought to a successful issue, mainly owing to the late Professor's exertions. Amongst his numerous scientific productions may be mentioned his papers on Crystallography and the Standard of Weight, and his very important edition of Phillips' "Introduction to Mineralogy." Professor Miller had been in very delicate health for some years past, but the end came somewhat suddenly.

We regret to record the death of another very distinguished man of science—Professor David Thomas Ansted, formerly Fellow of Jesus College. Professor Ansted was the author of more than twenty works on Geology and Physical Geography, besides numerous memoirs in scientific periodicals.

Preachers of very different styles have lately occupied the pulpit at Great St. Mary's. First came the brilliant eloquence of Canon Farrar, next the sound practical wisdom of the Tutor of Pembroke, and on Trinity Sunday the theological learning and critical acumen of Dr. Salmon, the celebrated mathematician, now Professor of Divinity at Trinity College, Dublin. A considerable portion of Dr. Salmon's argument appeared to be directed against the position taken up in a popular course of Hulsean Lectures, which have since been published under the title of Through Nature to Christ.

The Syndics of the Pitt Press have made arrangements with Mr. J. G. Fitch for the publication of a volume on Education, which will contain the substance of the course of lectures delivered by him last Lent term, under the auspices of the Teachers' Training Syndicate.

Professor Bain has resigned the chair of Logic, at Aberdeen; and Mr. Charles Niven, of Cork, late Fellow of Trinity College, has been elected Professor of Natural Philosophy in the same University.

We must congratulate the eleven on their victory over Yorkshire, which will, we hope, prove the first of an unbroken series of successes. The batting was all that could be desired, the two principal scores being first-class performances; the bowling was well tested during the long stand made by Ulyett and Taylor, and came well out of the trial; and we are glad to see the captain is not afraid of trying repeated changes. The fielding was on the whole good, sometimes very brilliant, but one or two easy chances were unaccountably missed. C. W. Foley was successful at the wicket.

The cricket match between the University and the Gentlemen of England was begun on Monday, when the Gentlemen went in first and scored 232, of which Hon. A. Lyttelton made 67, and F. Penn 88. Yesterday, at the close of play, the University had made the grand score of 343, with the loss of only three wickets. Of these Hon. I. Bligh contributed 90, H. Whitfeld 116, C. T. Studd 23, R. S. Jones 81 (not out), and A. G. Steel 11 (not out.) Play will be resumed to-day.

In the First Division on Saturday no bumps were made, but, in the Second, Jesus II. were caught by Queens', and St. Catharine's I. by First Trinity IV. Christ's I. bumped King's, and Peterhouse Lady Margaret III.

On Monday night in the First Division races Emmanuel caught Lady Margaret II., and Third Trinity II. bumped Sidney I.

On Tuesday evening, the last night of the races, Third Trinity II bumped Lady Margaret III, but no other change took place, most of the boats having already settled down into their true places. There was a fine race between Trinity Hall I and Lady Margaret I, who adopted the very questionable tactics of bringing up two such powerful oarsmen as Sandford and Prior, after the races had already begun, with the view of retrieving the defeats already experienced. St. John's is to be congratulated on escaping the inevitable consequences of a success so attained.

Mr. Galpin's assault of arms will take place next Saturday evening at the Bijou Theatre in St. Andrew's Street. Several well-known performers will take part in the proceedings, and the entertainment can hardly fail to draw a large number of visitors.

The undergraduate loan collection of pictures opened yesterday; it is a really representative selection judiciously made. The water colours are hung by themselves in a verandah; and one corner is reserved for oils, among which are said to be a Murillo and an Ostade; another is filled with curious old sporting pictures, well worth a visit. We trust that Addenbrooke's Hospital will benefit by the Exhibition.

UNIVERSITY CULTURE.

Free thought seems pretty well established in Cambridge. We may say what we like on politics, literature, social science, and within certain limits, on religion. But there are two institutions which it still seems rather blasphemy to call in question, namely, Public Schools and Universities. With regard to the first I am happily one of the orthodox: I believe heartily in Public Schools, and shall have occasion to call attention to some of their merits in this particular article: but with regard to the latter, I should like to ask some questions which cannot but occur to a sceptical temperament.

The ordinary degree at Cambridge is confessed on all hands to be no token of any real learning. The Third Class of some of the Triposes is probably little better. But we are told that the B.A. of Cambridge conveys a certain social stamp: that those who are dignified with that title have lived in a certain kind of society and received the "culture" which it necessarily imparts. The notion of University society, which its defenders entertain, is something of the following kind, I suppose:—They think that all sorts of men meet up here on an equal footing, that poor men meet with rich men, clever with stupid, volatile with serious, poll men with honour men, "smugs" with "swagger" men. It is a fine idea, if it only could be realised; but is it?

It is always dangerous to generalise from one's own experience, even in so limited a sphere as Cambridge: consequently I do so with fear and trembling. There are no statistics available with regard to Cambridge society; but it is my own experience that men of different sorts do not combine together. Poor men by themselves, reading men by themselves, "smugs" by themselves, this, in spite of exceptions, is the great rule of University life. Our society is thoroughly exclusive, just because we are not forced in the natural course-of events to know our neighbours, as we are in provincial society and at school. I do not forget those strange friendships, where chance seems not merely have brought together, but to have bound indissolubly men of utterly incongenial tastes and habits, But ἦλιξ ἥλικα τέρπει is, and must be, the rule of a society where neighbour is not forced to know neighbour, independent of his personal likings.

"Juxtaposition is great, but, you tell me, affinity greater."

If then the idea that College life gives a wide experience of men and manners is chimerical, I believe there is hardly any advantage to be claimed by College over school. Every lesson that a young man learns by associating entirely with young men, may be learnt equally well by boys from boys. Esprit de corps, a rare possession now-a-days, except amongst men who have passed through school or college, is certainly stronger at school.

Few men, except those immediately concerned feel as much interest in their College boat or eleven, as they did in the cricket or football matches at school. It is frequently noticed that collegians of the present day are not as enthusiastic as those of former time, simply because then the Public Schools were few in number, and College was the only place were most men could acquire patriotism. But since the cheap big schools sprung up, things are changed: his school is a man's first love, and College can seldom rival it. Sociability again, which is merely encouraged at College, is absolutely forced on a boy at school. He cannot lead a hermit life: he must see and talk to other boys. Take another great lesson of Cambridge life; deference to public opinion. No doubt a boy who has been petted for years at home, without ever doubting that the world feels anything but admiration for him, will learn much at College. His favourite ideas are laughed at: he is told pretty plainly that such and such actions will not do: in fact he is made to behave himself as public opinion prescribes. But if this is true of college, it is still truer of school: the lesson there is taught more roughly, but at the same time more completely. Independence again, and contempt for money and rank, which are the other two chief lessons of University life, are so thoroughly characteristic of the schoolboy, that I need not dwell upon them.

In fact put Mr. Verdant Green at school and he cannot fail to get rid of his greenness. Send him to college and he may or not fall into the hands of Mr. Bouncer and Mr. Larkyns. More likely than not those gentlemen will not think an occasional laugh at his expense worth the general nuisance of his society. He will consequently fall into the hands of others only less green than himself and his enlightenment will never be complete.

If then all, and nearly all the advantages of college can be obtained at school, is it worth while for a boy of 18 or 19, who is no particular scholar to be sent to the University for three or four years more. A boy of 19 who has passed through every phase of school life is just fitted to enter the world, if anything can make him fit. He has acquired the qualities mentioned above: he has learnt the one great lesson of the centurion of Capernaum, "to be himself a man under authority, having others in authority under him." Above all he has been trained to do definite work, not excessive indeed, but very different from the sham work of a moderately clever poll-man. Is he not really more fitted to enter life of any kind, than he will be after his University training: he will then have been for three years, without any responsibility or any discipline, except the pseudo-discipline of deans and proctors. He will have spent these three years in idleness, giving a few hours perhaps in the week to what is called work, but without any Carlylean Work with a capital W, no object in fact except to do what Tennyson pleasantly calls "catch the blossom of the flying terms," or in other words, to eat, drink, and be merry.

Again we may ask if it is wise to restrict a young man for half a year to the society of his contemporaries. That young men may gain experience from their elders no one will doubt: that purity is best promoted by free social intercourse between the sexes, is one of the great principles of English society. And surely it is no answer to say that this seclusion is only for half the year? If the society of women and older men is beneficial for half a year, will it not be so for the other six months, Moreover, I imagine that it is a common experience of men up here, that they get thrown behind-hand in home society, by their frequent absences. They forget people and people forget them, and the result is within the experience of many people, that the undergraduate contrasts unfavourably in general society with the young officer. The latter labours under many disadvantages: as a rule he is less clever than the Cambridge man, and he is conscious that his coat and profession will secure himself admiration from some people, irrespective of his personal merits. Consequently he has almost as much temptation as a curate to become a coxcomb. But in spite of this he shews, I believe, more savoir faire, and less offensive shyness, than the other, because he mixes more in general society and sees something beyond the mess.

This same objection applies of course to schools to some extent, but not so strongly, I believe, as might at first sight appear. That school boys want something to promote purity amongst them, every public-school man knows well enough: but it is a doubtful question, whether female influence will do it. They are capable no doubt of falling in love, more so possibly than their elders. But they have little of that feeling of respect towards any member of the sex, whatever may be her personal attractions, which is the essence of modern chivalry. They are too near the days of the nursery: the petticoat is still to them the symbol of despotism. Similarly with the society of elder men. We all know how, when good food and pleasant society, is eliciting from his elders their best wit and wisdom, the schoolboy sits stolid and listless, and gazes only on his plate. No doubt the curious principle on which we are brought up, that "little boys should be seen and not heard," which simply means that children should never voluntarily try to learn anything, has much to answer for. But the fact remains behind, that the ordinary boy is unreceptive of ideas, however plastic his moral character may be.

Finally the question has its pecuniary aspect. We have to consider not merely whether the thing is valuable in itself, but whether it is worth the money spent on it. It costs, on a moderate computation, £600 to maintain a man at College for three academical years of six months each: for the same money, a boy may be maintained at one of the great cheap schools, such as Shrewsbury, Haileybury and many others for six school years of eight or nine months each. The money spent on the school boy, is spent on him at an age when he could hardly be earning his own living: whereas by coming to college a man is thrown back three years in every profession, except the clerical. If he went straight from school into the world, he might be able to marry at 25, instead of having to wait for three or four years more as so many impecunious lovers have to do. No doubt a University degree often confers a privilege, which has a pecuniary value. But my contention is not that a University degree is not valuable at present, but that it ought not to be valuable.

I have discussed this subject in a way that will probably seem to some readers dogmatic and shallow. But the whole matter is so wide, that I can do little more than state the various questions that arise: and it is difficult to be brief without being dogmatic. That sensible people have sensible reasons for sending their sons to Cambridge cannot be doubted: but they are certainly apt to hide their light under a bushel of generalities about "culture" and "polish."

F.

ON THE COMPULSORY STUDY OF GREEK.

The case of the Poll-man is more difficult to deal with than that of the Honour-man. We feel a generous sympathy for the average Poll-man. But our principal desire at this moment is that his intellectual life at Cambridge should not become an easier one. We think he gets off cheaply already. We suppose there are few places where a degree, as such, represents so little necessary attainment as at an English University. We are convinced that the amount of knowledge now required in the case of any Poll-man before he can proceed to the B.A. degree is not beyond the capacity of all industrious and of most idle men, or that, if it is, the schools are to blame and it is not the business of the University to humour the educational deficiencies of public schools.

The typical Poll-man who seeks exemption from the study of Greek stands on wholly different ground from the Honour-man of whom we spoke in our last article. It is not generally the case that he has laboured under especial educational advantages. He is not enthusiastically devoted to some one study above all others; nor does he show promise of remarkable proficiency in any. He has no strong love of knowledge for its rewards, still less for its own sake. He adds little or nothing to the reputation of the University as a place of learning. He dislikes Greek and complains of it, but then there are many other things of which he complains. He objects to Greek as he objects to Latin, and to Latin as to science, and to science as to mathematics, and to mathematics as to modern languages, and to modern languages as to compulsory chapels. They are so many restraints upon his freedom; perhaps he would willingly, if he could, renounce them all. In considering the case of the Poll-man, the real difficulty we have to meet is not that he is obliged under the existing system to take up one study which is odious to him and to abandon, even temporarily, another of which he is fond and in which he excels, but that he appears to get almost as much intellectual good from one study as from another, and unfortunately not much good from any. We are tempted to say that it does not matter what he studies.

We believe the opinion is gaining ground among schoolmasters that ordinary boys of indifferent abilities and without any special taste for language are not much benefited on the time and labour they have devoted to learning Greek. They may master it so far as to pass the previous examination. But they have no real insight into the language or literature. They cannot read Xenophon or Sophocles with ease and pleasure. It is exceedingly probable that many of them never open a Greek book from the time that the obligation to do so ceases. Whatever benefits Greek confers upon those who enjoy it and can enter into its spirit are non-existent for men of this kind.

It is possible, of course, to defend the study of Greek upon other grounds. Schoolmasters sometimes argue in behalf of Latin verses that, if they do no particular good, on the other hand they do not appear to do any harm, that they occupy boy's time and give them a good deal of wholesome trouble and have a tendency to keep them under control; and the same may doubtless be said of Greek. But such a defence amounts to a confession that the educational value of Greek, as it is at present taught, is small.

The practical difficulty in the way of relieving Poll-men from the necessity of passing an examination in the Greek language is that the change would widely and seriously affect the public schools, and in this respect it seems to differ from any legislation regarding the cases of Honour-men only. If in each year a few distinguished students of Natural Science or Mathematics were allowed to take up a modern language—say French or German—instead of Greek in the Previous Examination, it is not probable that the curriculum of the schools would be materially changed; indeed we doubt whether it would be influenced at all. But if a way of escape is opened for any Poll-man who is acquainted with some modern language or languages; in other words, if the University no longer insists upon Greek as a necessary study, it is practically certain that the schools will follow suit, and the result, not immediate, of course, but gradual and ultimate, will be that Greek knowledge, which is now an universal element of higher education, will become the property of comparatively few, and will lose something of its present educational importance in the eyes of the world. For there is always a ground-swell of feeling against Greek; schoolmasters find it a troublesome subject, fathers have an idea that it does not "pay," superstitious mothers dislike and distrust the look of the letters; and no doubt any discouragement of the study in the University would immediately injure its position in the schools. The modern sides, which are now subordinate to the classical, and receive the weaker intellectual vessels, would become their rivals or superiors, at least in numbers. And there are many schools which stand below the great public schools in reputation and success, in these it would perhaps be difficult, on the score of expense, to support both a classical and a modern side, and consequently, if the claim of modern studies were strongly felt here, as it probably would be, there would be a danger of classics going to the wall.

We cannot help feeling that the position of Greek in English education depends principally upon the action of the University in regard to Poll-men—not so much, if at all, upon its action in regard to Honour-men. It it therefore with great diffidence that we express an opinion in favour of relieving Poll-men under certain conditions from the Greek part of the Previous Examination. Our reasons are simple. We do not rate the intellectual capacity of ordinary school boys very highly. We think with Mr. Arthur Sidgwick that Greek is too hard for them. We are sure that they could not combine the study of Greek with the study of what are called modern subjects. But the claims of modern studies are becoming imperative; and there is a constantly increasing number of boys who are inclined to study French and German instead of Greek. We are afraid, as we have said, that the intellectual advantage they will derive from any study must be small. But we think they might be brought to take a certain degree of interest in a modern language, and we doubt whether they could ever make progress enough to get any actual good out of Greek. It is true that modern languages have not often been taught successfully in our public schools; but the reason is rather that there has been a want of efficient teachers and serviceable books, whereas Classics have been taught to boys under the most favourable conditions and have not, we think, been satisfactory in their result. Besides, there is one important distinction to be made. A stupid boy who has devoted several hours a week for many years to the study of Greek and then abandons it, finds himself in no way benefited by his labours, but if he has acquired even a smattering of modern languages, he has something that is or may be of direct use to him any day, something which can be improved whenever he goes abroad and which he has an obvious immediate motive to keep up.

If then modern languages, instead of Greek, are to be an essential element in the education of many boys, the University must relax its existing rule, or these boys will be debarred from the advantages of an academic education. We are opinion that they would be greatly the losers by such a state of things. We desire that all boys should be encouraged to study Greek, who are capable of studying it to any purpose. There are some boys who could not or would not be benefited by it, but would probably be benefited by a modern education. It would be well to let these boys pass an examination in modern languages instead of Greek, but to make this examination so hard that they shall not get through it without the same amount of work which is now devoted to Greek. In the case of Poll-men we would insist upon their passing both in French and in German. A boy who has been educated on the modern side of a public school may be fairly expected to know something of two modern languages; and every Poll-man who gives up Greek, should, we think, be required to pass an examination in Grammar and the translation of unseen passages in French and German. It may appear paradoxical to require two modern languages of the Poll-man, and one only of the Honour. But the interests of higher education demand that the Poll-man shall not be let off more easily than he now is, and it must be remembered that the Honour-man is taking up language as a mere supplement to the study of his choice, while to the Poll-man modern languages will be either the first thing, or at least as important as anything else.

EGOISTICAL ESSAYS.—No. VII.

MY MODEL COLLEGE.

When I decease, and make my will, after having handsomely provided for all my indigent relatives, my old and attached servants, and various favourite animals, I shall devote the rest of my property, amounting to so many shares East Timbuctoo railway stock, at 150 per cent., to the foundation of a College at Cambridge.' This College shall be founded expressly with a view to the Promotion of Social Culture; now that the Pollman is to be done away with, some provision must be made to supply his place. It shall be called St. Tibb's. I don't exactly know who St. Tibb was, or whether a masculine or feminine saint, but I have seen the name up on a street corner, and it has struck me as a good one for a new College. It must not be in any way supposed to be intended as an association with Cat's; indeed, Cat's has grown so proud lately, that perhaps it would not deign to be associated with any other College.

The foundation will consist of a Master, twelve Fellows, and twenty-four Scholars. The Master and Fellows will be required to dine all together at least once in three terms, so that a vacancy will be ensured every year. The Fellows will be divided into the useful and the ornamental, and in order that promotion may not be too slow, an inspection will be held at the end of every year, and those that cannot prove themselves to be either useful or ornamental will be expected to resign their fellowships. The vacancies will be supplied from among the scholars, who will be required to toss for preference.

Of the twenty-four scholarships, sixteen shall be reserved to candidates who can prove kinship to the family of Smith; the remaining eight shall be open, consideration always being taken of the neatness of the candidate's tie and the polish of his boots. These scholarships shall be held until the time of passing the Previous Examination, or in the event of that not taking place, until the third year of residence. Any scholar who is unable to satisfy the examiner at the end of the May term that he has not exercised a sufficient degree of hospitality will be liable to be deprived of his Scholarship.

The examinations will be held once a year, and will consist of passages from the following prescribed books:—

The Whole Book of Etiquette,
The Ball Room Guide,
The Art of Conversation,
The Gentleman's Complete Letter Writer,
Cavendish on Whist.

Besides this, the candidate will be expected to compose an extempore piece of poetry suitable for a lady's birthday book, and to write an original essay on one of the following subjects:—

The Weather,
The Last Bit of Scandal,
The Pictures,
What to do with one's Hands.

In addition to the main foundation, there will be a Professorship of Practical Economy attached to the College, of which the holder will be required to publish, at least once a year, a pamphlet on the subject of "the Circumvention of Creditors."

The building itself will be carried out in strict accordance with the principles of modern architecture. The architect will be given some money and materials and turned in loose to adapt them as he can to certain requirements.

The College will form a quadrangle, the buildings on the four sides comprising a judicious mixture of styles, calculated to provide an adequate supply of materials for conversation. The whole of the frontage will be occupied by a stone wall, pierced with apertures resembling windows, so that the impression will be conveyed that there is more behind than appears at first sight. Part of the revenues of the College will be derived from the letting out of this wall to bill-posters. In the middle of the wall will be the Porter's lodge, and if the architect happens to have a large supply of superfluous pinnacles on his hands, they will be placed wherever there is available room for them. On the right hand on entering the gate there will be the Chapel, which will combine the beauties of a Cathedral and Cannon Street Railway Station. The windows of the Chapel will be peculiarly fine specimens of old stained glass, with legends connected, and representing curious subjects, such as people's legs going up ladders with no particular bodies attached, typical of the incomprehensibility of the early Christian allegory.

Exactly opposite the Chapel will be the Hall, with some of the Scholars' rooms attached. Strict attention will be paid to the outward appearance of these buildings, the rooms inside having to take their chance of getting a window or not. Exactly facing the entrance will be another row of buildings, on which the architect will be allowed to give free scope to his ideas of originality. The result will probably be something between the early Norman and the Swiss Cottage style, with a dome and a slate roof. The Kitchens, Offices, and staircases, not having been contemplated in the original designs, will have go in wherever there is room.

The court will be occupied by a green, which will be appropriated to the use of the Fellows. Provisions, however, will be made to prevent too evident tracks being worn by the Fellows making short cuts. If any Fellow wishes for a particular short cut, he may apply to the Master to have a paved way laid down for him, to be deliberated upon at the next meeting.

In the centre of the green there will be a pump, on the top of which there will be a statue of the founder, dressed in accordance with the received notions of statuary, in a bath towel and a pair of spurs. His right elbow shall be resting on a pillar—with a cushion at the top, for there is no need why he should be uncomfortable,—and the relative position of his dexter fore finger and his profile, combined with the peculiar expression of his right eyelid will at once recall the spectator to a sense of his sagacity. At the base of the pump will be the figures of Sincerity and Courtesy sitting back to back, to signify the main object of the foundation of the College, and round the foot shall be inscribed in letters of gold the legend:

"Ille bonus socius, sic semper diximus omnes."

There will be an official attached to the College whose especial duty will be to admire this pump.

There will be certain regulations as to the general behaviour of the Scholars, such as there not being permitted more than three German bands in the college at the same time, if they are found to disturb the general quietude of the College; no one will be allowed to rise at any unfashionable hour, the limit to be left to the judgment of the authorities; too much energy will be discouraged, the most recognised pastime being to drive to Ely and be photographed; anyone convicted of taking part in any more vulgar occupation rendering himself liable to the strictest censure; but all these will be more strictly defined when the Charter is drawn up.

Once a year there will be a grand Commemoration, or Founder's day. All the old Fellows and Scholars will come up and combine with the present ones. They will remind one another of past times, and of things that they once did together, and which in many cases will have slipped the other's recollection, unless some third person, ignorant of the details of the transaction, happens to join in. Everybody will forget themselves and revert to the happy days of youth. The Master will be required on this occasion to sing a comic song.

The date of the anniversary of the Founder's day had better be the first of April.

PROPOSED SWIMMING BATH.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—The importance of the proposal to start a swimming bath at Cambridge is, I trust, sufficient excuse for further arguments in its support. Mr. Howard Wright's letter rather insists and rightly so, on the obligation resting on the University to see that all its members can swim. But with the present facilities this would seem impossible of accomplishment. Surely the one lesson from the late sad accident is this. We ought all to be able to swim. But we cannot without a bath. And by 'we' I do not mean only men. After Miss Beckwith's late performance at the London Aquarium, tho' with Mrs. Grundy we may agree that we should not like to see our sisters, our cousins, or our aunts make such exhibitions of themselves; still we must acknowledge that it explodes the idea that the "weaker sex" are, or must be helpless in the water, or very soon overcome by fatigue. Now that the fact that women are the better for physical development is being recognised, is it vain to expect support from both sexes for a bath? The Women's Union Journal for February, gives an account of swimming classes in Glasgow, referring to the same at Dundee, Edinburgh, Greenock, &c. At Tiverton, with less than half the population of Cambridge, there is a swimming bath (that pays) with "days for women," at a charge of 1*d*. I know ladies who use the great advantage there offered at this absurdly low price, without inconvenience or unpleasantness. At Liverpool, Folkestone, and Queen's Road, Bayswater, ladies' schools and others use the baths. Mr. ("Rob Roy") Macgregor's efforts in London have been successful. It is true that the university and townsmen have the river; and that there might not be custom enough to make an exclusively women's bath pay. But might not both classes of men use the baths as well as the river? And would not the combined patronage of all suffice for profit? A gymnasium for women would also be useful; and in conjunction with one, a bath might succeed better financially. There is already a gymnasium: but if the bath could not be combined with it, each might exist apart.

No one who has read articles on "Feminine Athletics" in Good Words for August 1879, and March 1880; in Chambers's Journal for August 1878 on "Swimming for Girls;" and on the physical education of women generally in Dr. Caldwell's "Physical Education," and Herbert Spencer's tract on education, to say nothing of Locke and other educational reformers; no one, I feel sure, can doubt the necessity for, and benefit from such a scheme. At Blackheath there is a gymnasium largely frequented by ladies.

With suitable arrangements there is no reason why all classes should not share the benefit of both bath and gymnasium. Lawn Tennis is scarcely feasible in the October and Lent terms, and all might be better for swimming all the year round.

I hear that once there was a bath in Cambridge. As there is none now, we may assume that it failed. Will some one who knows tell us 'why,' 'when,' and 'where'? Surely the scheme deserves outspoken condemnation if not support. Let those who see obstacles name them. If the Town and University would coöperate for establishing this bath, and that energetically, perhaps the last accident may prove to be finally the last. At any rate discussion may do good. Will no "influential Fellows" of the University express the readiness they feel to act as working directors? Is Midsummer Common unsuitable or unavailable as a site?

I am, &c.,

May 20th. W. E. REDDIE.

LADIES' COLLEGES AND DEGREES.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—"Fair Play" is inaccurate in stating that the only institutions mentioned in the article on "Ladies' Colleges and Degrees," in your issue of May 12th, are the University of London and Girton College; he has overlooked notices of the Royal University of Ireland, and of Queens' and Bedford Colleges, London.

† For the omission of Newnham College I am not responsible; the article in its original form contained an account of this body, which you omitted either for want of space or, perhaps, because the changes in constitution whereby the College replaces the Hall of the same name have very recently been before the public. It did not fall within my purpose to recapitulate the positions achieved in examination by the students of either institution.

In writing on the subject I had to choose between making the article a bare catalogue of the numerous colleges, associations, &c., for the higher education of women, such as is to be found in any educational hand-book, and giving a fuller account of one or two of the most prominent movements; the latter course seemed preferable. Otherwise I should not have passed over University College, London, and its open lectures; Alexandra College, Dublin; the Lady Margaret and Somerville Halls, Oxford; the lectures in connection with Owens College and the new Victoria University of Manchester, and many others, to say nothing of continental and American Colleges and degrees.

Lastly, the University of St. Andrew's did not "open" the degree of L.A. to women, but created it for them; a small favour in comparison with the thorough-going measures of the University of London.

I am, Sirs,

Yours obediently,

May 20. THE WRITER OF THE ARTICLE.

A PHOTOGRAPHIC SOCIETY.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—As nothing has come of my last letter to the Review of May 12th, would those men who are interested in photography kindly communicate with me, so that we may know about the number of men who would be likely to join a photographic club, if such an one were to be started in Cambridge, and that a meeting may be held as soon as possible, so that something may be arranged before next term.

Yours truly,

Pembroke College. F. S. WYLLIE.

† The paragraph on Newnham College was omitted, because it was impossible for the writer to represent adequately in a dozen lines the educational work and success of that institution, and at the time no further space was available.—Editors of the Cambridge Review.

COLLEGE CORRESPONDENCE.

ST. PETER'S.

There has been considerable rejoicing over the success of our boat in the May races. That it had rowed good courses before the races was known, but we have been so often disappointed of late years that success had become a thing to be hoped for, but hardly expected. Our rise of four places has been achieved by steadily rowing down the boats in front, and not by bucketing, so that it is the more likely to be permanent. Our stroke deserves credit for his judgment and plucky rowing.

The Scratch Fours were rowed on April 23rd. Four crews entered. The winning boat was made up as follows:—Bow, Lamb; 2, Sidley; 3, Bott; 4, Peirson; cox., Bingham.

The lawn tennis match with the Mayflies has been put off till Thursday. The Scratch Pairs were begun on Monday, when six out of the thirteen pairs that entered were disposed of.

On Saturday Peterhouse gained on Lady Margaret III. at first, soon reducing their lead to a length. Here, however, they seemed likely to stick, as they rowed from First Post Corner to Ditton without gaining any further advantage. After rounding Ditton they gradually got nearer and bumped just before the Railway Bridge.

PEMBROKE.

Of our boat there is little news to tell; on Wednesday night they caught Lady Margaret II. and since then have each day pursued Clare, always gaining more or less upon them, our nearest approach to them being on Friday, when we finished up within half a length of them.

On Tuesday, the 18th, we played Corpus. They went in first and made 120, we then went in and had got 185 for 7 wickets when time was called, of these Finch made 75, while the two "not outs" Gregory and Haviland had made 29 and 18 respectively. On Thursday and Friday we played Emmanuel and were beaten with 4 wickets to spare.

On Monday, our Lawn Tennis Club, represented by Cobbold and Eden, played the Caius Lawn Tennis Club, represented by Lacey and Francis. It was arranged that the best out of 5 setts should decide the match. Cobbold and Eden won the first, third, and fourth setts, and were thus the victors. On Wednesday, the 26th, the Lawn Tennis Match with Christ's comes off on the Amalgamation Ground, (6 a side).

GONVILLE AND CAIUS.

Our three boats all rowed over on Saturday night, the Third boat keeping far ahead of First Trinity V.

CORPUS CHRISTI.

Our first boat has not been fortunate, going down two places, which reduces our Lent gains to one place.

Our Cricket eleven have suffered two defeats last week, at the hands of Pembroke and Jesus; against the former we made 162, Richardson making 35, Greenland also played good cricket. Against Jesus we collapsed for 78.

On Thursday we gave the Non-Collegiates a day's outing, scoring 253. Owen knocked up 68, while Hough made 54, Greenland and Cooper scored 35 and 29 respectively.

Our Lawn Tennis team managed to defeat Christ's, on Monday, each of our pairs getting the best of three sets. Our representatives were:—Selwyn and Wade, Cooper and Hough, Colson and Petit.

KING'S.

The great event of last week, at King's, was our concert, which, by all accounts, was a great success. We hope, however, that the reception given to the National Anthem is not a fair indication of the loyalty of the College.

A match was played on Saturday with St. John's, on their ground. After getting 144 ourselves, we got six of their wickets down for 108, and then decamped to the river, leaving the match in a most interesting state. Our patriotism was but poorly rewarded, by the sight of our boat being bumped at Ditton by Christ's.

QUEENS'.

There is no College news to report this week except the success of our boat, which made three bumps, and is now 4th in the division.

We have cricket matches this week with King's School, Ely, on the 27th, and Clare on the 28th.

In the first tie of the first round in the Lawn Tennis Tournament Haynes and Rowlands beat Giles and Priestly.

ST. CATHARINE'S.

Our boat started in front of First Trinity IV. on Saturday night, and did not lose much ground until the Gut, where Trinity spurted; in the Plough Reach, they gained again and were less than a length off; our stroke then quickened, but the men behind fell to pieces, and they overlapped us at the Willows, and rowed almost right past before they bumped.

On Friday night we got off rather badly, and Magdalene came on with a very fast stroke, and caught us at First Post corner.

JESUS.

There seems no doubt now, whatever opinions may have been entertained, that our first boat has deserved to hold its past position as head of the river. Ditton corner seemed universal each night in its admiration of the long steady stroke and excellent time, and the boat is not far behind an average 'Varsity crew. Our 2nd boat has sustained four successive bumps, but when it is remembered that it lost its strongest man, in consequence of Armytage's accident, and an untrained man had to take the vacated seat, regret rather than surprise should be expressed at its fall; besides our second boat always has had a way of catching up all it has lost in the May races, during the Lent term.

Our cricket continues eminently successful, notable chiefly for tall scoring. So great indeed appears to have been the dread aroused by our doings in this branch, that St. John's second, who were to have played Jesus second on Thursday last, failed to put in an appearance.

Little lawn tennis is going on, the courts during the last week, having been generally deserted.

The College is honoured by a constant succession of admiring and admired visitors, and the reading man, who, in the present state of the weather, hardly likes to exclude the fresh breeze by closing his windows, is often more tempted to gaze on the many passers by, as he hears a step somewhat lighter and a voice somewhat softer than usually resounds in the courts, than to pore over the regular lines of wearying type.

CHRIST'S.

The success of the boat in the May races has caused a feeling of intense satisfaction throughout the College. An open air soiree was held on Saturday to celebrate it, at which a prominent member of the boat assisted with his fiddle. The evening finished up with a dance. The bump supper will take place on Wednesday.

The Brundit Sculls will be rowed on the 28th, and the Philipp's Pairs on the 29th.

Christ's Lawn Tennis Club played Corpus on Monday. The nature of the balls and the condition of the ground were, however, so exceptional as to render our defeat inevitable.

ST. JOHN'S.

We regret to record the death of Professor W. H. Miller, M.D., F.R.S., Fellow of this College, and Professor of Mineralogy in the University, which took place at his residence, in Cambridge, on Friday last. Professor Miller, who was Fifth Wrangler in 1826, was elected in 1832 to the Professorship of Mineralogy, on the resignation of Dr. Whewell, and was, we believe, the oldest Professor in the University.

At the close of the third ties of the lawn tennis competition the following were left in:—A. Fitzherbert, B. E. Holmes, G. W. C. Ward, J. H. Haviland. There was not time to play the final tie, and accordingly the committee selected Fitzherbert and Holmes to represent us against the Trinity Mayflies. The Trinitarians, however, completely over-matched our representatives, though perhaps the result was partially due to the bumpy state of the Mayflies ground, where the match was played.

Mr. J. Tillard, late scholar of this College, and an assistant master at Haileybury, has been appointed an Inspector of Schools.

MAGDALENE.

We are glad to say that our boat has made three bumps, and though they tried hard to catch Corpus on the last night they were not able to get nearer than a length. In the last three May races we have now made eleven bumps out of a possible twelve.

Our eleven has not played any matches during the last week. This week, however, there are four matches on the card. We were very glad to see that one of our members, W. N. Roe made 153 against St. John's, for the Crusaders.

TRINITY.

The Irregulars have adjourned until next term. May Flies L. T. C.—On Tuesday, May 13th, the final round of the Scratch Pairs was played off. G. H. C. Wright and J. R. H. McLean carried off the prizes. On Friday, May 21st, the May Flies played John's L. T. C. The Johnians were represented by a single pair. C. P. Harvey and J. H. C. Wright played for the M. F. L. T. C. and won easily the first three out of five setts, only losing one game.

The Chancellor's Medal for an English Poem on "Rienzi" has been awarded to H. F. Wilson.

DOWNING.

On Saturday night, May 22nd, the success of our boat was celebrated in the usual way by a bump supper, in the College Hall, to which about 45 men and their friends sat down. Dr. Perkins, President of the Boat Club, took the chair. Among the guests was R. E. Webster, Esq., Q.C., who added to the festivity of the occasion by speech and song. The presence of four ex-captains added greatly to the enthusiasm and interest of the evening.

Considering that in three years our boat has risen from the third division to near the head of the second, without ever going down a place, the club has reason to be proud of its captains.

NON-COLLEGIATE.

The Cricket match with the Ley's School, on Wednesday, resulted in our favour. In response to their 119, we put up 129 for eight wickets. This result was mainly owing to Mitchell, who bowled in capital form, and to Williams, whose score of 43 was made without a chance.

On Thursday, Corpus employed us pleasantly for three hours' leather-hunting, making in the meanwhile about 260 runs. As they left us but ten minutes to return the compliment the match was necessarily drawn.

Fourteen men take their degrees this June. Ten in Specials and four in the Natural Science Tripos. This is the largest number presented at one time since the non-collegiate system came into operation.

UNIVERSITY INTELLIGENCE.

Sir William Browne's Prizes have been adjudged to—For the Latin Epigram, H. C. Goodhart, Trinity College; Greek Epigram, T. G. Tucker, St. John's College; Latin Ode, J. C. Moss, St. John's College; Greek Ode, J. C. Moss, St. John's College.

An ode bearing the motto Σικελίας γαρ, κ.τ.λ., was highly approved, and the author is requested to call on the Vice-Chancellor.

The election to the Professorship of Mineralogy, now vacant through Professor Miller's death, will take place in the Senate House, on Saturday, June 12th, at twelve o'clock noon.

F. G. Howard, M.A., of Trinity College, has been elected Secretary to the Lodging House Syndicate for a term of three years.

Wednesday, June 2nd, 9—12, Demosthenes. 1—4, Algebra. Thursday, June 3rd, 9—12, English Composition and Shakespeare. 1—4, Latin Composition.

At the Congregation to be held on Thursday, May 27th, among the Graces offered to the Senate, it will be proposed to confer the degree of D.D. on the Rev. G. E. Moule, B.A., of Corpus Christi College, Bishop Designate of Ningpo, and the degree of M.A. on C. Creighton, Demonstrator of Human Anatomy.

It will also be proposed that E. S. Roberts, M.A., of Caius College, and H. E. Savage, Inceptor in Arts, of Corpus Christi College, be appointed Examiners in the Classical Tripos, for the ensuing year. Professor Fowler being unable to examine in the Moral Sciences Tripos, it is proposed to appoint W. Cunningham, M.A., of Trinity College, in his place. Dr. Merivale, Dean of Ely, and H. Sidgwick, M.A., of Trinity College, have been proposed as Examiners for the Hare Prize. It will be proposed to confirm the appointments, made by the Teachers' Training Syndicate, of the three lecturers on the History, Practice, and Theory of Education, viz:—Oscar Browning, M.A., of King's College, the Rev. THE MAY RACES.

SATURDAY, May 22.

The order of the boats was as follows. The Bracket shows the bump.

	FIRST DIVISION.		SECOND DIVISION.
1	Jesus I.	1	Third Trinity II.
2	Caius I.	2	Trinity Hall II.
3	First Trinity I.	3	Downing.
4	Trinity Hall I.	4	Jesus II.
5	L.M.B.C. I.	5	Queens'
6	Third Trinity I.	6	Corpus I.
7	First Trinity II.	7	Magdalene.
8	Caius II.	8	St. Catharine's I.
9	Clare I.	9	First Trinity IV.
10	Pembroke I.	10	King's.
11	First Trinity III.	11	Christ's I.
12	L.M.B.C. II.	12	Trinity Hall III.
13	Emmanuel I.	13	L.M.B.C. III.
14	Sidney I.	14	Peterhouse
15	Third Trinity II.	15	Caius III.
		16	First Trinity V.

In the Second Division, Third Trinity II kept their distance from Trinity Hall II until the Long Reach, where the latter quickened ineffectually, never getting so near to their rivals as on the preceding night, though they had no difficulty in keeping away from Downing. Queens' gradually gained on Jesus II from the start, especially in the Post and Plough Reaches, but were not sure of their bump until both boats were round Ditton Corner, when the Queens' men came up very fast and rapidly caught the Jesus boat, securing their bump at the Willows. The Magdalene boat, which has already mounted three places, did not succeed in catching Corpus, although in the earlier part of the race, it was gaining perceptibly. First Trinity got off well and gained fast on Catharine's up to Grassy. Round the corner Catharine's held their own, but directly the Trinity men got straight they quickened up and began to go into Catharine's slowly but surely. At Ditton only quarter of a length separated the boats. In the Long Reach, Catharine's gathered themselves together a bit, and in spite of a spurt behind them, managed to hold their own for about a hundred yards. Just before the Willows Trinity picked it up again, and, as Catharine's were quite done, they made their bump. Christ's went off at a very fast pace, straining every nerve to catch King's early in the race, and made their bump at Ditton Corner, leaving Trinity Hall III to row over. Peterhouse also bumped Lady Margaret III, Caius III and First Trinity V making no change in their relative positions.

In the First Division no change took place in the order. Jesus again rowed at the same long and steady stroke, without any real effort. First Trinity I. rowed with more life than they have shewn before, and after passing the Bridge gained considerably on Caius I., finishing about a length behind them, while Trinity Hall I., after apparently gaining up to Ditton, fell off altogether towards the end of the Long Reach. Lady Margaret I., finding it necessary to add to the strength of the crew, has recalled Sandford and Prior, the latter taking his place in the boat on Saturday and the former on Monday. Third Trinity I. got off after the Johnians well, but at first John's held their own, gaining slightly on Hall I. up to Grassy. After this 3rd I. drew steadily on them and at the Railway Bridge were within half a length. There they fell off, and the Johnians finished some distance ahead of them. First Trinity II. did not travel well, never gaining more than a yard or two on Third, and at the finish were more than their distance behind them. Caius II. rowed over: while Clare rowing at a slightly quicker stroke, were never pressed by Pembroke, who seemed to be reserving their strength for the last two nights of the races. First Trinity III. got off fast, and gained about three quarters of a length on Pembroke by Grassy, but after this Pembroke drew steadily away, and at the finish neither boat could be said to have gained appreciably. Emmanuel got off with a good start, and gained rapidly on Lady Margaret II.: by Ditton they were within a length. Spurting up the Long Reach, they had almost overlapped, and seemed sure of their bump, when the hook holding the rudder lines gave way. The cox tried to recover the lines by creeping along the canvass, but unfortunately lost his balance in the attempt. The bump was then out of the question: but the eight steered themselves successfully over the rest of the course, and drew well away from Sidney at the finish. Sidney had quickened up as soon as the accident was perceived, but were unable to recover the ground which they had sacrificed earlier in the race. Third Trinity II. drew up to them at first, but fell away by Ditton, and during the rest of the race paddled easily.

MONDAY, May 24.

Jesus I. rowed over as before; but First Trinity gained on Caius from the Willows to the finish, and latterly were within a length of them. Starting very fast, Trinity Hall rapidly overhauled First Trinity, and at one time the leading boat looked in danger. This state of things, however, lasted no further than Ditton, for at that point the wind began to have its full effect upon the light Hall crew, and the Trinity men began at once to draw away. The Lady Margaret boat, very materially strengthened by the substitution of Sandford and Prior for two of their weaker hands, came up very rapidly about Ditton, and on turning into the Long Reach an exciting race occurred. At about the Willows L.M.B.C. were half a length or so in the rear, and were creeping slowly up, until not more than a quarter of a length separated the boats. Despite the most strenuous efforts of the Johnians, they were unable to decrease this lead, and shortly after the Railway Bridge the determined rowing of the Hall boat began to carry them away. The non-success of the Johnians was probably mainly owing to the spirit of the Hall stroke, who on easying at the Post was evidently utterly rowed out. Third Trinity I. lost ground round Grassy, but gained a little in the Plough. In the Long Reach they again lost ground, not rowing well together; but after the Bridge they went better, and finished well away from T. B. C. II. Clare I. were never pressed by Pembroke, and at the finish had got within a length of Caius II. First Trinity III. got off fast, and at first gained on Pembroke: in the Gut there was little more than a length between the boats. But Pembroke here began to go away, and finished quite their distance ahead. Emmanuel got well away, and rowing a quicker stroke than they have been doing, got within a quarter of a length off Lady Margaret II. by Ditton. By the middle of the Long Reach they had overlapped, and, as some thought, actually touched the Lady Margaret boat; but the latter did not acknowledge it, and drew away again a little. At the Bridge Emmanuel spurted well, and made their bump just before the winning post. Sidney gained about a length on Emmanuel up Post Reach, but lost ground rapidly to Third Trinity II. At the first corner Third were within a length, and at Grassy only half a length behind. Sidney then picked up a little; but Third, spurting as they neared Ditton, caught them just round the corner, Emmanuel being about half a distance ahead.

TUESDAY, May 25th.

Jesus I. passed Ditton amidst loud cheers, and arrived at the winning post Head of the River for the sixth year in succession, thus rivalling the performance of First Trinity, who were Head from 1866 to 1871. As the boats passed Ditton, L.M.B.C. I. were pressing close upon Trinity Hall, and the quarter-length bell was ringing during a magnificent race all through the Long Reach. At the Railway Bridge the boats were overlapping, but on different sides of the river, so that a bump was impossible. But at this point the Hall stroke quickened; and, in spite of the efforts of the rival crew, took his boat right away from them, till at the finish nearly a length separated the two. Several men in both crews showed the severity of the strain. Pembroke I. were gaining on Clare, but never drew very close. First Trinity III. were losing a little in the Long Reach. Third Trinity II. concluded a laborious and successful week by bumping L.M.B.C. early in the race. Sidney brought up the rear.

The final order for the First and Second Divisions for 1880 is as follows:—

FIRST DIVISION.	SECOND DIVISION.
1 Jesus I.	1 Sidney.
3 Caius I.	2 Trin. Hall II.
3 First Trin. I.	3 Downing.
4 Trin. Hall I.	4 Queens'.
5 L.M.B.C. I.	5 Jesus II.
6 Third Trin. I.	6 Corpus I.
7 First Trin. II.	7 Magdalene.
8 Caius II.	8 First Trin. IV.
9 Clare I.	9 St. Catharine's I.
10 Pembroke I.	10 Christ's I.
11 First Trin. III.	11 King's.
12 Emmanuel I.	12 Trin. Hall III.
13 Third Trinity II.	13 Peterhouse.
14 L.M.B.C. II.	14 L.M.B.C. III.

Isard rode well, and won by 200 yards; had he been pressed he would probably have made much quicker time.

C.U.M.S.

The Musical Society has the excellent habit of producing works either too new or too old to be familiar, and the programme of the first of the May Term Concerts, given at the Guildhall last Friday afternoon, before a crowded audience, is a fair instance. It runs thus:—

1. Quartett in F (M. S.) ... ... C. V. Stanford.
2. Madrigal, "Dainty fine bird" ... ... Orlando Gibbons.
3. Violin Sonata (Op. 78) ... ... Johannes Brahms.
4. Madrigal, "To Chloris" ... ... C. V. Stanford.
5. Quintett in A (Op. 114) ... ... Schubert.

Nos. 1 and 3 are new, the latest instrumental works of their composers; No. 2 is old; No. 4 is both; and No. 5, the famous Trout Quintett, (so called from the fact that the subject of the Andante with variations is Schubert's earlier song, "Die Forelle"), is so rarely heard and is so charming that it was tantalizing to find that the absence of the Contra-basso displaced it for Schumann's familiar Piano Quartett.

Mr. Stanford's Quartett in F was written for and produced at one of last year's series of Richter concerts, but had not been heard before in public at Cambridge, though, on their recent visit Messrs. Joachim and Hausmann took part in a private performance. The work has vigour and originality, its subjects are pleasing, and their development ingenious and scholarly. It is of the school of Schumann and Brahms; the Scherzo with its charmingly contrasted Trio, the subject of which is equally effective in its first dreamy form and when, repeated fortissimo, it leads up the climax of the movement, especially suggesting the work of the former master. Though this number was the most applauded we feel a decided preference for the opening Allegro con brio. It seems to be the most masterly and the most promising of Mr. Stanford's writings.

The Gibbons' Madrigal is a lovely piece of old English work; abounding in the progressions that look so bold on paper, and sound so charming on performance.

It is a chief proof of Brahms' greatness that his style clarifies as it advances. His last opus, the Violin Sonata, appears at first almost too simple: but depths of beauty show themselves on each fresh hearing. We know nothing in music so seductive, if the bad word may pass, as the modulations by which the perfectly graceful first subject is led in on each later appearance; and what is fresher than the second subject of the same movement, or broader than the melody of the Adagio? The last movement—founded on the tune of the composer's Rain song—is perhaps slight, but contrasts excellently with the others, and this contrast is, with great art, emphasized by the introduction of the subject of the flavour Adagio as an episode. Herr Gompertz' playing was worthy of the work: and more cannot be said.

Mr. Stanford's Chloris is a happy combination of antique form and modern colour: it has the flavour of age, without the pedantry of the imitation-old. It well deserved its warm reception.

Of the Schumann Quartett criticism would be manifestly superfluous: but the performers must be congratulated on the excellent rendering given without any sort of rehearsal or preparation.

In conclusion consideration for the conductor might we suggest that his services should not be demanded for each item of a laborious programme; and for the audience that blinds would have spared the necessity for that use of the parasol and the sunshade which intruded among the sacred rites of Art the frivolous associations of a garden party.

At a meeting of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society, Mr. Magnússon called attention to the great interest which the Icelanders of the 13th century took in collecting the widespread accounts of the life of Archbishop Thomas of Canterbury. His fame reached Iceland soon after his death.

UNIVERSITY v YORKSHIRE.

May 20, 21, 25.—After two successive and severe defeats our eleven has at length scored its first victory this season, a victory creditable in every sense. The University recruited its ranks with two old blues, P. H. Morton of Trinity, who has played for the two last years and R. S. Jones, of Emmanuel, who played last year and also did so well for Kent at Canterbury. Foley also took Payne's place behind the stumps. Yorkshire had their usual team with two new men figuring in it, Tayler and Grimshaw. The points most remarkable in the match were the excellent batting of Bligh and C. T. Studd, the former of whom quite made up for his previous shortcomings, while the latter by his fine innings made his place in the eleven as good as certain, and the general improvement shown both in bowling and fielding by the University. On the Yorkshire side the batting of Ulyett and Lockwood and the fielding of the whole team were most conspicuous.

Steel for the third time having won the toss, sent in Bligh and Whitfeld to face the bowling of Peate (slow left hand), and Bates (slow right hand), the former from the Pavilion end. The play at first was very steady, but at the same time very good: it took an hour to register only 44 runs. Several changes in the bowling took place, Hill for Bates and Ulyett for Peate, but it was not till Emmett had taken Ulyett's place that a separation was effected, Whitfeld's leg stump falling to the lefthander.

Whitfeld had played most steadly for his 24 out of a total of 77. Jones, who followed, quickly made five, and then succumbed to Pinder who had gone on after luncheon with lobs. C. T. Studd and Bligh were in some time together; the former played better than we ever remember having seen him play. His innings was certainly the best of the match, though only a little superior to that of Bligh's. The latter, like Whitfeld, was bowled by Emmett. Neither Steel, G. Studd, nor Ford did very much, but Lancashire and Wilson kept their wickets till the call of time 5.30.

The next morning, Wilson was soon bowled and Foley caught at the wicket, the total standing at 219 for 9 wickets. The last pair, Lancashire and Morton, made a most unexpected stand, and added as many as 53 to the total. Lancashire played very carefully, and made some very pretty cuts, while Morton amongst other hits sent Hill to leg for 5 in good style. The innings closed for 272, Lancashire carrying his bat for 42, while Morton made 25. Emmett was the most successful bowler, capturing 5 wickets for 49 runs; the fielding all round was good.

Yorkshire commenced with Lockwood and Grimshaw, Morton bowling from the Pavilion end, and Steel from the other. Both batsmen were caught at the wicket off Steel for small scores, and Tayler, who came next, was given in to a clear catch at the wicket off Morton. After this he stayed in till the close of play, and made 44, when he was again caught at the wicket off Wilson, and this time given out. Bates fell to a 'yorker' from Steel, but Ulyett with Tayler put on nearly 100 runs. Ulyett had two lives, one early in his innings at short slip, and another later on at third man. Riley was not at all comfortable with the slow bowling, and was caught by the bowler off a miss-hit. With the fall of Emmett's wicket (bowled by Wilson), the stumps were drawn for the day.

The next morning Morton soon disposed of the remaining three batsmen for 12 runs, Pinder being bowled by a 'yorker,' Hill, after being missed at long leg, being well caught at long stop, and Peate being given out leg before.

Yorkshire being 111 runs behind, had to follow their innings. On this occasion they commenced with Grimshaw and Ulyett, Morton and Steel bowling as before. Fifty runs were on the telegraph board before Ulyett was well caught at coverpoint by Whitfeld. He had made 30 runs, this time without any chances. Just before lunch, Grimshaw was stumped off Steel's bowling, after a steady innings of 26. After the interval Tayler quickly fell to Steel, but Lockwood and Bates together put on runs at a good pace. Bates was too anxious to hit, and was stumped, but Lockwood again found a good partner in Riley, and these two brought the total to 160, when a sudden collapse set in. Lockwood was bowled by a curly one from Steel, Riley easily taken at coverpoint, and Hall stumped off Steel. Next Emmett was bowled by a similar ball as in his first innings, while Pinder was magnificently caught by Bligh at long leg with one hand. The innings closed for 184, the fielding all round having been safer than in the previous innings.

The University had now only 74 to get to win, and with an hour and a half to do it it seemed pretty certain they would manage it, but few expected to see the two first batsmen wipe off the runs by themselves. Yet so it turned out; Bligh played in a far freer style than he has hitherto this year, and made as many as 57 out of 75. Whitfeld played his usual steady game, and made 17: the University thus won by 10 wickets.

OXFORD LETTER.

The term draws to its close: the eights are over, Greats are over; we have nothing to do but wait for the end;—the dissipations of Commemoration, with which the Undergraduate's Journal, I perceive, favourably compares the "harmless sensuality" of the Cambridge May week.

The University prodigals have returned. An interesting collection might be made of their travels and adventures: some spent the interval down the river, some in town, one, as we have seen in the papers, was "forced to put up in an unknown inn." The culprit has at last confessed, and Oxford is to be deprived for a year of the presence of so interesting a character. I should be sorry to disturb anyone's misconceptions, as they are probably harmless and certainly amusing: but it might be as well to state that the permission given by the college to any one who liked to come forward and say they were not guilty was not designed to discover the offenders, but simply and solely to enable the scholars and exhibitioners to keep their term, and so save them from pecuniary loss. It was presumed that the offenders would give themselves up without forcing the college to any special appeal to their generosity. Those who enjoy the company of University friends were sorry that the authorities were mistaken. It is said that a don of University on being accused of unnecessary violence answered with the story of the man who defended himself with a pitchfork against a dog—who ran against it and killed himself: upon which the owner remonstrated with him and asked him why he could not have put the pitchfork the other end first: "If the dog," he answered, "had come at me the other end first, I should have."

The origin of the good old custom, lately discountenanced, was, I am told, something of this sort. There was a block in the college gateway which every freshman had to make a hack at with a knife. This was removed, upon which it was decided at a college meeting to screw up the dean instead. The proposal was adopted and has been kept to since with great punctuality. But the old order changeth, giving place to new. I am afraid they will have to content themselves with hanging the bursar, or roasting the cook.

The divinity schools have not been quite so deadly as last year. There was a scene, and the air was full of articles, missionary journeys, and Jewish kings. The immortal Maclear was everywhere in the ascendant. "Job," I heard a man murmuring as I passed a window, "was a man who united considerable mental attainments with remarkable patience under peculiarly trying circumstances." One might see a couple in a punt; one man reading to himself how Noah in his 500th year began the ark, while his companion was murmuring over "what the Pelagians do vainly talk." These struggles sometimes produce surprising results; a friend of mine told me with some pride that he had described Haggai as having "attained a world wide celebrity as the mother of the prophet Ishmael."

The Union on Thursday was the scene of an exciting incident. In the course of an eloquent speech on Home-rule the opener suddenly said he could not proceed with the debate because he was going to faint: and made for the door, but fainted too soon and had to be carried out. Fortunately a clergyman present produced a brandy-bottle, and the patient revived. But the debate did not: and it was on the whole the dullest of this dull term.

The Palmerston and the Canning have been, it is said, meditating a joint meeting: but as the latter (as befits Conservatives) smoke churchwardens, and the Palmerston does not smoke at all there are considerable difficulties to be got over.

The Agamemnon is reported to be already rehearsed: and the parts assigned. It is to be acted in Balliol Hall, before the Master and anyone else who choses to come. There is no truth in the report that the Proctors are to attend and a certificate for Pass Mods given to all who sit through the performance. It certainly ought to be fine. The O.U.A.C. are to be largely represnted. Agamemnon runs the quarter: Clytemnestra is known for an excellent wind; and Cassandra is good at the hurdles. The Argive Elders, as is fit for a senate, represent every employment from rowing to Chemistry. We wish them all success.

Cardinal Newman pays us to-day his second visit since that eventful night when he came up from Littlemore, as he thought, for the last time. We are told he still keeps a picture of Oxford in his room and underneath "Can these dry bones live?" But, in spite of that passage in the Apologia we all know so well, the dust of the Apostate city clings again to his feet. On Saturday night a festival was given in his honour in Trinity: the Hall was crowded: man after man was led up and introduced, the Cardinal standing all the time. He shewed particular eagerness to be introduced to those who came from the College which bears the name of his old Oriel friend. The lime walk in Trinity Gardens was lighted up; a red light at one end, a white at the other, so that half the company looked like corpses and the other like demons—a very striking effect. On Sunday morning he preached at the Roman Catholic Church: his text was from the Psalms—"Thou art the well of life." He was rather imperfectly heard; but even so his large audience seemed much impressed. On Sunday night he had dinner with the scholars of Trinity. But perhaps these details are more interesting here than at Cambridge. To us it seems a great thing to see ψυχὴ μεγαλήτορος Αἰακίδαο. As an antidote Bishop Ryle preached in the University pulpit.

These for the gospel; for the law, Lord Coleridge came last Sunday to stay with the Master of Balliol: as for fine arts we have had the honour of entertaining the dashing young poet who consoles himself for his caricature being in the pages of "Time" by the thought that his portrait is in those of eternity.

There is not much boating or cricket news to chronicle this week. The Sculls begin on Monday and the Pairs on Thursday. Adam of Christ Church and Brown of Hertford seem to be the best men in for the former event, but it is not likely that the races will bring out any remarkable talent. There are but few pairs practising, and at present Staniland of Magdalen and West of Christ Church seem about the best. The Exeter eight are hard at work for Henley, and are going very fairly. They have been obliged to make a change in their crew owing to the new rule limiting the standing of competitors; at present the boat is composed as follows:—

Bow, Hume	5, Fort
2, Pinckney	6, Bowen
3, Blandy	7, Kindersley

There has been no 'Varsity cricket match this week, but we must notice the good bowling of Evans of Oriel, for an Eleven of England v. Daft's American Team. He bowled nine wickets in the first innings.

The Trial Races of the Dark Blue Bicycle Club, to choose representatives against Cambridge, came off on Tuesday, at the Iffley Road Running Ground, with the following results:—

IMPRESSIONS OF THEOPHRASTUS SUCH.

When Theophrastus Such saw that his first published work had fallen blankly on the public, he found a critic in the shape of a friend ready to hint that its failure was due to its inherent dullness, not to that subtlety, which is "the preferable ground of popular neglect."

"The Impressions of Theophrastus Such" have met with a reception, of which the lack of warmth is accounted for on both these grounds. The book is called dull: it is even called stupid by those who, feeling that George Eliot was an author of reputation, and that her last work deserved, at least, their notice, have obliged themselves to pay her the compliment "of sitting alone in the same room with it."

Other critics have gone deeper. They allow that the book may be found dull. But they ascribe this to a subtlety of thought little adapted to please the popular mind on the look out for light and easy reading. They speak of an "involution of style" of a weight of matter, rendering the essays at once too condensed and too heavy for easy intellectual digestion. "Too great involution of style" is, we are told, one of the defects of Shakespeare's latest works: yet this does not apparently diminish their popularity.

It is part of the literary slavishness of our age, that we are content—nay, that we actually delight in wrestling with cumbrous Elizabethan or Jacobean prose, distracting our attention with copious notes, in order to attain to a just estimate and intelligent appreciation of a mind of the 16th or 17th century, or of any other mind, whom age has done much to render classic. And yet, some little difficulty of style, or some other superficial defect, gives us a handle for adverse criticism, or prevents us from making thorough acquaintance with minds that make the literary glory of our age.

We can imagine the 21st or the 22nd centuries, if they follow in our steps, and devote much of their literary energy to analysing and theorising upon the mental development of writers of previous centuries, putting forward a theory as to the growth of George Eliot's genius, in which Theophrastus Such shall bear the same relation to her previous works, as "The Tempest" does to Shakespeare's. As Prospero is said to represent the sympathetic serenity attained in old age by the great soul that had gone through the passionate experiences of a Romeo, a Macbeth, and a Hamlet, so might Theophrastus Such be considered as embodying the comparative calm of the widely human mind that has imagined and shared the struggles of a Maggie Tulliver, a Dorothea, and a Gwendolen. Unfortunately the picturesque charm which renders "The Tempest" attractive and Prospero interesting, apart from the important part they play in the theory of Shakespeare's mental growth, is wanting to Theophrastus Such. He is no deposed duke, gifted with magic power, thrown on a desert island. His is an obscurer interest:

> "The pathos exquisite of lovely minds > Hid in harsh forms."

He is the product of a very modern civilisation. Deficient animal spirits, a morbid sense of the closeness of the social tie, when every independent movement may hurt a feeling or shock a prejudice, conduce to make him play outwardly a very small part in the world. All his energy has gone to inward life and to observation. One can imagine that many of his acquaintance, people not in want of sympathy, whose nervous systems had received no shock from accidents on the Alps, who galloped through the world on their hobbies, blinkers on themselves as well as on their steeds, would think him not only dull, but stupid in the deepest sense of the word. Not only was he deficient in that animal energy which can give renewed life to common-place, but he was wanting in that coarseness of mental behaviour, which in this comparatively backward age of mental life, is necessary to make individuality recognised as such. Theophrastus would have shrunk as much from snubbing a human being as from knocking him down. In the earlier stages of all life self-assertion means antagonism, and that Theophrastus Such had to forego the former because his advanced spiritual life and wide sympathies forbad him the latter, is a sign not of insufficient mental independence or energy, but of a mind too delicately constituted for the age in which it lived.

The result is that he is pushed aside. Some, desirous to rescue themselves from insignificance, become cynical; an easy means of obtaining distinction so long as the majority of the world retain their interest in life and their belief in things. It has been observed that the easiest way to silence a cynic is to throw him into the company of another cynic. The desire for distinction, which, to a certain extent lies at the bottom of every shallow soul that betakes itself to cynicism, cannot then be gratified, the piquancy of its creed vanishes, and it realises what it had long preached—that the world is really hollow. Theophrastus Such is too magnanimous: has too large a nature to become a cynic; yet, at the same time he does not find any merit in insignificance other than the rather oppressive one, that it may be good moral training. He will not search the world for consolation: he will not seek rest in the apathy of resignation or activity in the strength of defiance. He is too individual to throw all strength into the channel of sympathy, to live entirely in the lots of others. He remains possessed of a strong distinctive individuality; discontented with the discontent of an ideal nature, yet content in widening his personal lot by wide comprehension and keen interest in the lives and experiences of others; not embittered "by looking into happiness through another man's eyes." But, outwardly, the strength of such a character is not recognised: it has apparently been spent in quelling the struggles of a strong inward life. Yet the calm which follows these struggles is not one of exhaustion, it is the calm which comes with the attainment of an exquisitely delicate mental balance. This mental balance is at once what would render him uninteresting to the undiscriminating eye, and yet, what would render so true his impressions of human life and human beings? He does not aspire to organise the sum of human knowledge. His impressions are valuable, in that they are the impressions of a wide and comprehending sympathy, active in that sphere, which is too temporary, too accidental to come under the observation of a philosopher determining the aim of life.

To those who have not had opportunity of observing the living type, many of his impressions may lack interest: the narrower and more personal ones, for instance. The portrait of the individual,—of the mental babarian,—who would grieve profusely at having trod on the tip of your smallest toe, and yet at any moment would ruthlessly assault and trample on your mental being; of the prosperous man, whose life embittered by thought of forsaken ideals, is never happy in his externally successful compromise between God and mammon: of Grampus, the assailant of Merman, marching sternly towards the truth, massacring all who did not attempt to get at it in his own way: of the being, so incapable of self-criticism, that her life turned on a little pivot of gratified vanity at seeing her dull collection of facts advanced to the dignity of print: of the cunning Lentulus who by careful behaviour could lead you to believe that the greatest things said by the choicest spirits of the day were nothing to the thoughts locked up in his own bosom; of the man who had seized a half-truth, and acting as if it were a whole truth, ran down the whole race of authors in his eagerness to prove that such a thing had been implied or said before; these are all the impressions of a keen and delicately discerning mind. They will, perhaps, repay reading as much as the characters of La Bruyère or of the more classic Theophrastus, both of whom, whatever be the lasting merits of their genius, lived and wrote in ages so far distant from ours, that what were subtleties then, ought to be truisms now.

In "Looking Backward," "Debasing the moral currency," "The modern Hep Hep" are impressions of a wider and deeper character. In the first is a protest against that glorification of the past: that disloyalty to our own age, which comes with the false colouring we give to bygone times.

Not only do we feel with that lady whose highest aspiration was to have walked and talked with Cicero in his garden at Tusculum, but we colour the whole age with the enthusiasm derived from the contemplation of Cicero. We cannot manage our ideal aspirations. They wander into the past, and we get sad and hopeless, dwelling on the "pathos of things:" or they live so entirely in the future, that our vision of the present is dim and confused.

But nowhere does Theophrastus Such deal with a subject more widely interesting than in treating of the debasement of the moral currency by that "gluttonous laughter," which seizes as its prey anything in which it can see incongruities. The Philistine in ridiculing the passionate intensity of the degenerate æsthetic, is apt to think that he is on a very superior level, that he is the servant of truth and simplicity. And perhaps never is a sense of the ridiculous more healthily and beneficially employed than in playing round a degenerate æstheticism. But is the Philistine sure that he can shake himself free from this attractive habit of laughing: is he sure, as Clarissa was of her children, that he can be "reverent in the right place." Books, coarsely indiscriminating, ridiculing all the beliefs, æsthetic or otherwise, which the 19th century, much against the grain, has produced, are fatally popular. Almost every author of reputation has found someone among his readers, who understands him enough to make successful fun of him. It is not against the widespread existence of the sense of the ludicrous that Theophrastus inveighs, but against that wholesale ridicule which cannot distinguish the wheat from the chaff: "which lowers the value of every inspiring fact or tradition so that it will command less and less of the spiritual products, the generous motives which sustain the charm and elevation of our social existence." It is as easy to blunt our finer and more ideal feelings by a too eager search for incongruities, as it is difficult philosophically to account for their existence. But without them,—"the spiritual police,"—our splendid material fabric is helplessly in peril.

It has been thought that the energy of the "modern Hep, Hep," the impatience which here Theophrastus Such shows with public opinion in the matter of the Jews, was inconsistent with his nature, with the tolerance of one who had so nearly attained the ideal height "of suffering fools gladly."

But if Theophrastus has such feeling for the more neglected and obscurer individuals of the world, counting himself among them, surely he would feel for that obscure and neglected race, whose past gives hint of latent possibilities, now more or less hidden by the work of generations of persecution and contempt. The Gentile world has only too well fulfilled its function of scourging the Jews: is only too ready to think, that with certain brilliant exceptions, the marked characteristics of the race are those which conduce to success in the money-lending and old-clothes trade. Theophrastus might not go so far as the visionary Mordecai, but he would reform public opinion on the question of the Jews. He would have us believe in the possibilities of a race, whose more unpleasant qualities can be accounted for as the results of ages of persecution, and of a universal contempt not often the lot of those who suffer the material inconveniences of injustice.

The defects of the whole work would be perhaps as easy to seize as the defects in the character of Theophrastus Such himself, and it is unfortunately much easier to express grounds for disliking than liking. In the former our feelings are not generally of such subtlety or such force as cannot be done perfect justice to by words: in the latter case, perhaps not skilful enough to state adequate grounds, we run the danger of degenerating into a mere verbal roar of admiration. But, whatever the failings of "the impressions of Theophrastus Such," and these probably have often been stated, the book bears the stamp of a mind of the most beautiful and rare type, a mind of high ideal vision, yet of keen spontaneous sympathy and understanding with the un-ideal present.

THE ART OF THE DAY.

Every age is characterised by a leading virtue, a characteristic art, and a particular vice. This is rather an obvious remark, but like all such it contains an element of truth. The virtue and the art are always linked together; the vice is the opponent of the former, and becomes in the long run the destruction of the latter. The virtue of the Greeks in their golden period was the noble passion of life. A race recently emerged from the gloom of barbarism, they looked forth upon the world. They saw nature around them, and realised, untaught by their ancestors, the great fact of the glory and beauty of life. They found themselves to be one with all that they saw about them in beauty and in health. This intensity of sympathy with the glory of nature found its expression in myth and hymn; it clothed itself in the partly unfathomable mystery of their religion; it worked itself out in the interlacing growth of their conceptions of the divinities of sky and sea, of mountain, wood, and stream; and finally it perished in the decay of its own creations and was buried in their dust.

Such was their virtue. Their art grew out of it. It was the art of shaping forms out of formlessness and breathing life into dead blocks of stone. So long as this was the single aim of their sculptors they produced work which has remained absolutely unrivalled by succeeding generations of men. They are the only perfect makers of the images of living things as such. Aiming only at absolute truth they attained beauty also, and then startled by that beauty they fell in love with it, as it were married themselves to it; and, abandoning thenceforward the pure fountain of their inspiration, they perished as the producers of maudlin and degraded works appealing to the feelings of the ignorant or the passions of the base. Luxury was indeed the destroyer of their art, and luxury was their governing vice. It is the natural opposite to the perfect strength of life, it grew side by side with the contrary virtue, for as the beauty of living was advanced so too was its ease and pleasantness. Then the pleasure was made the aim and the whole fabric toppled over and fell to pieces. It would be easy and perhaps profitable to draw paralled instances from other epochs of the history of the world, but the limits of an article will not admit of it.

In our own day we can discover a virtue which shows itself in the struggle after truth, producing on the one hand an eagerness of scientific research based upon experiment, and of historical investigation which ransacks every depository of original evidence, and on the other hand giving rise to a widespread unbelief which denies everything that cannot be proved, and thus throwing itself back upon itself, finds the necessity of starting afresh and working on bases recognised as hypothetical.

The art of the day is not so easily discoverable. It is not painting, it is not sculpture, it can hardly be said to be music; it decidedly is not architecture. In all of these and many others, past ages surpass us. The only art in which we stand absolutely in the front is in that of games. Games of cricket, tennis, rackets, and so forth, such as we may see at the present day, are works of art perfect in their kind, and never so well performed by any generation of our ancestors. They are also purely works of art. They enlist the sympathies of the spectator, they involve the most absolute education of the eye, the most complete control of the hand, the full strength of the body. They perform no distinctly useful purpose, but they serve to give grace to life, and they offer the absolutely beautiful sight of healthy life in full action, the mind in command and the body in perfectly governed obedience. They are the beauty and the flower of modern life, and they grow directly out of the virtue of truthfulness.

The connexion may not be clear, but I believe it is perfectly logical. The habit of scientific accuracy has cut off from us all the arts that have gone before, and not these only but all the formative arts whatever. We investigate principles in every direction. We reduce music to a science and criticise and analyse it as such. We treat painting in the same way. Architecture is nothing but an antiquarian labour, and sculpture is only disguised anatomy, breathing of the dissecting-room and not of the pure life of the sunny south where it found its birthplace, its home and its grave. And this passion of everlasting investigation of rules and principles produces in us the inevitable result that we think the artists of the past have created their immortal works by some sort of rules, that they had discovered certain principles on which they worked, and that the greatness of their success was due to the rightness of their laws. Our artists therefore work upon this method, and working so they can never be successful. No real masterpiece can be the result of anything but absolutely unconscious sympathy and passionate love for the thing imitated. No best understanding of the arrangement of the bones in a skeleton, or of the proportions between the height of the head and the length of the body, or of the relative positions of muscles and stomachs will ever enable anyone to draw the picture of a really noble man, so that you may see the fire in his eye, the zeal in his heart, the divine fury of him labouring and struggling within the prison of his flesh. The scientific principle is the death of all formative art, and none such is possible in our day, except here and there in exceptional instances, the result of exceptional circumstances.

But this very principle is the life of action. Every new discovery, and every destruction of an old error is but a fresh "trumpet-call to action," the more uncertain the surroundings the more inevitable the impulse to labour. Here we cannot rest; Forwards then, and evermore Forwards! If absolute knowledge is impossible, work is yet possible, nay is necessary—work the only parent of faith. And thus the life of action finds its corresponding symbol in the arts of action, leaving no trace save in the memory alone—action pure and simple, true in essence, glorious in life, perfect in harmony. A right and known aim, a perfect command of eye and hand, harmonious subordination of man to man—these are necessary for a perfect game of whatever kind, they are the real principles of the art of the day.

The vice that mars this virtue of truthfulness is its opponent insincerity—a hydra headed beast, seen everywhere, irrepressible, growing out of all that is best and noblest in us, turning itself about us, winding itself into our most sacred places, mingling with our greatest thoughts, ruining our grandest deeds. It is an insincerity that pretends to feel where it is callous, that pretends to sympathise where it remains cold, that pretends to admire things in which it sees no beauty or to know that which it has never studied. It produces cant in religion, cant in literature, cant in art, cant in politics. How many men with all their talk about scientific proofs of religion can give a reason for the hope that they say is in them? How many men have read the authors they pretend to admire or the books from which they glibly quote sentences or phrases that remind one of gradus-tags? How many men know anything about the thoughts which a picture was intended to convey, and when they praise or condemn do so for any other reason than that they have heard others do the like? How many men's political opinions are of any more real value than the cockney's sympathies with one side or the other in the Boat-race. If the principle of the thoughtful is based on the struggle after truth, the vice of the thoughtless is not in unbelief, not in cold denial, not even in any of the grosser sins; but in this, that being what they are, moderately sympathetic, passably ignorant, they yet pretend to be fired with the emotions of those they are compelled to recognise as their masters in thought, and they puff out their very ordinary sized souls with the unballasted wind of a pretentious emptiness.

POETRY.

LEVAVI OCULOS.

I read how bitter are the waves that break
O'er Sorrow's main,
Yet will not, kindly-cruel, from us take
The life of pain.

But we must sink, and ever fear to sink
Still deeper down,
The while our lips those deathly waters drink
Which will not drown.

And my sad heart began for her relief
To utter moan,
Feeling that word through her own deepening grief
Sink like a stone.

Then with high mien, striking my weak heart dumb,
Uprose my soul,
Who looked beyond Earth's dim sad course to some Far-shining goal.

Call not thy sorrows depth, she cried, but height,
Gain, and not loss;
Steep beyond steep they climb to where sweet light
Falls from the Cross.

SONNET

From the French of Louise Labé.

As long as tears can flow from these poor eyes
For the glad days we spent so long ago;
While this sad voice, however faint and low,
Can yet be heard in spite of choking sighs;
While yet to sing thy grace of shape and mind
My hands can give the dainty lute its tone;
While my spirit still content can find
In understanding thee, and thee alone.
So long I still shall hope not yet to die:
But, when advancing years have dimmed my eye,
Forbade my voice to sing, my hand to move;
And when my soul in this abode of clay
Can give no longer tokens of its love,
I pray that night may shroud my brightest day.

THE PAPER-KNIFE.

A Wreath of Songs by the Cambridge Lotos Club.—(Cambridge: Deighton, Bell & Co.) 1880. 3s.

To open a new volume of Cambridge poems is certainly one of the "mixed pleasures." So many fail, where one succeeds: a Trevelyan, or a Frederic Myers is so rare, that in such cases it is always the safer course to anticipate little and to be easily contented. But the volume now before us calls for the exercise of no such virtue; for whatever may be its shortcomings and its blemishes, it also shows signs of a true poetic power. It is the work, as the Preface tells us, of resident undergraduates, six in number, if we may draw any inference from the algebraical symbols that serve instead of initials to distinguish the contributors one from another. Two writers are represented by eight poems, two more by seven, another by two, while the sixth contributor shews but one poem,—talent, we were about to say; but it must not be supposed that the merits of the poems of each vary directly with the amount. In a volume like this it is but natural that when different hands have combined to produce the whole, there should be no apparent unity of purpose or aim, and in fact we find here the most widely differing characteristics side by side. But there is almost a complete absence of the faults of expression and of affectation that are but too common in the works of the younger poets of our day, and the verses are for the most part simple and intelligible. [A] is the only contributor who shews a tendency to exaggeration and false passion, and it is unfortunate that the merits of his companions should bring his defects into comparative prominence. He has caught some of the characteristics of Maud, and has reproduced the elements of discontent and bitterness without the lyrical sweetness and strength. There is one passage where there is a strange blunder. Alluding to the beginning of a friendship, he writes:

Yet that bright hour shines still; my heart unweaves,
Grows vocal into song, as though a wand
Of magic minstrel touched its iron greaves.

What connection the iron "greaves" can have with a heart or with unweaving is a mystery not lessened by the statement of the next stanza:—"What bliss was mine! I trod on silver feet." But this is the worst and almost the only fault of the kind to be found in the book, and we will turn to the other and pleasanter side of the poems.

[C] is the moralist, and his poems occurring at intervals, tame as some of them are, certainly make a good setting to the rest of the book. He reverses the Church Service, and it is "here followeth"—not the "Anthem," but the Sermon. Prejudice, Dissappointment, Greatness, Dissatisfaction, are some of his themes. Perhaps "My Wish" is the most successful of all, where after rejecting different alternatives, he gracefully concludes:—

"Then shall I wish thee aught? not I.
Some greater mind will doubtless try;
But I feel far too much afraid
To spoil a life divinely made.
But this I wish, I fear too much,
Unvaried by the slightest touch,
The only wish that seems to strike me,
I wish, in truth, that more were like thee.

We must not dwell on D's amusing political ballad, and its political scepticism, or on E's poems in which there is nothing very noteworthy, but must pass to the two last writers who to us seem to stand out above the rest in beauty of thought and grace of expression. The volume certainly will owe much of its success to them, and we are sorry that F is not more fully represented. In each of his poems there is the simplicity of feeling and the clearness of conception which should be more characteristic of the poetry of the day than is actually the case, while in the choice of his themes, wisely abandoning subjects out of his range of experience, he has ventured to dwell on emotions common to many of us, but which few can express with the same felicity. We give one of the poems in full:—

NUPTA.

Delightful days of converse sweet
When more than sister, back returned
She soothed the hearts that long had yearned
Her voice, her look, her smile to greet!
With love's rich lesson in her eyes,
And on her lips his language rare,
She came, a breath of purer air,
A star from some serener skies.

No longer child, but woman grown,
With warmer heart, if that could be,
Instinct with larger sympathy,
Her spring-tide graces wider blown.
She came and went: we chafed no more,
With her great gladness satisfied,
And set again the window wide
That our white dove might landward soar!

B has powers of a different and more striking order, a rare metrical skill conbined with an imagination that does not travel in the regions of the common place. As a rule we prefer his sonnets, but in the "Ballad of a Garden" and in the "Nocturne" he is most successful. Men are but rare in the University who could write such a stanza as this—

Yet now the sea is still and pacified,
The sighing softens as the sands grow wide.
At the far end of the long backward sweep;
The utter ebb and pausing of the tide;
For the sea winds and all the waves have died,
And the world's trouble almost seems to sleep.

Perhaps it is in concise and clear-cut lines such as the second and the last, that B's power is most conspicuous, but in some of his poems there is a vagueness which appeals to us in quite a different way, of which this sonnet will furnish a good illustration.

MIDNIGHT.

A Space of blue unfathomable night,
Solemn with sense of all the stars unseen—
Veiled shades of banks, and shadow-bridge between,
And mist-encircled blurs and points of light—
The river rolling in mysterious might,
And dim as dreams that doubt of what they mean,
And boats and men, as ghosts of what has been:
All this we feel, with deeper sense than sight.
Day would give back dull roofs and blackened towers;
A sullen stream, grey lightless piles of stone;
And fierce pursuit of pleasures, nought enjoyed.
Better the mystic moonless midnight hours,
And the dim vision, limitless and lone,
Of the vast city asleep, and vaster void.

It is a pleasure to be able to congratulate sincerely the amonymous authors of "A wreath of Songs," and we shall be much surprised if the success of the first series does not call for a successor: in that case it will be possible while retaining the striking and prominent virtues of the present volume, to eliminate the larger part of its defects, and to produce a collection of poems that will be welcomed not only in Cambridge but in the wider world outside.

Commentary for Schools. S. Luke. By E. H. Plumptre, D.D.

Compiled chiefly for English readers, as the book consists of the English text corrected into better agreement with MSS authority, in the notes where also explanations are given of absolute senses of words—e.g. audience, instantly, etc.

The principal points brought out in the book are (1) possibility of connexion between the author of the gospel and Lucan, which would explain why Spain should be the goal of S. Paul's journey accompanied by S. Luke. (2) Theophilus (in the preface) is supposed to be a Roman. Godet's theory is much more striking (i. 30) where he suggests that S. Luke was a freedman of the house of Theophilus and was here assisted by his former master acting as patrenus libri (cf Clementine Recog.) (3) A note on ἐπιούσιος arrives at precisely the opposite conclusion obtained in the "Hints on Revision." (4) An excursus on the day of the crucifixion is also at issue with the view maintained in the Introduction to the Gospels and supported by Farrar, and Godet, and seem as far as we are able to judge much less satisfactory.

It will be seen that on several crucial points the book is at variance with those of many of our teachers, but the notes themselves are very clear and interesting.

Art in the Mountains. The story of the Passion Play By Henry Blackburn. (Sampson Low.)

Those who wish to be present at the Oberammergau Passion play cannot better ascertain both the nature of the play, and the best means of seeing it, than by reading Mr. Henry Blackburn's book. All information about the available trains, and the lodgings to be obtained at the village of Ober Ammagau will be found there: but the undertaking is not a very difficult one, as it is proposed this year to run a train which will enable visitors to sleep at Munich the night after the play. There will be 29 representations of the play, beginning next Monday, and continuing till near the end of September. The theatre is constructed to hold 6000 persons, and it appears that the play is sometimes repeated on the following day, if there are many who fail to obtain seats. The performance begins at 8 a.m., and lasts till 5 p.m., with an hour's interval at midday. The stage is 120 feet wide and 170 feet deep: at the sides and the back are buildings representing the streets of Jerusalem. Almost the whole theatre is open to the air, and the adjoining hills rise naturally behind the stage. In the middle of the central building is a curtain which conceals the inner stage. The performance contains two kinds of scenes. There are 17 scenes from the New Testament, beginning with Christ's entry into Jerusalem and ending with the Ascension. These scenes are represented partly on the inner stage, where the scenery is changed from time to time, partly on the larger stage without. But each of these is preceded by one or more tableaux vivants from the Old Testament. Some event is represented typical of the same from the Gospel story which is about to follow. While the representatives of the ancient prophets and Kings stand immovable in the background, a chorus explain in song the connection of the scene represented to its antetype, moving to and fro on the outer stage.

Our author speaks highly of the grouping of figures and mixing of colours in some of these tableaux, but a few of them, especially those of Adam and Eve driven from the garden, and of Jonah escaping from the belly of the whale, seemed to him to fall short of the simplicity and naturalness of the rest of the performance. But for the play itself he has hardly anything but praise. Every detail of the story, even of the Crucifixion itself, is represented with minute realism. Those who witness the play must be prepared to see an exact reproduction in flesh and blood of those scenes already familiar to us in the masterpieces of the painters of Christianity, and which rise before the imagination of Christian readers. Many important witnesses seem to argue that the Passion Play is a reverent and honest attempt to lay before the imagination of the spectator as clear and complete a representation as possible of the story of Christ; and that the effect which it in fact has both on the ignorant peasants of the Tyrol and on visitors of other nations and other ranks is to kindle genuine interest and religious feeling. The acting is careful and natural, almost without exception, and excites the admiration of trained actors who have witnessed it: the Gospel narrative abounds in situations which must have the greatest tragic effect if they are rendered in a sincere and straightforward manner. It may be said that the mysteries of religion should never be represented in a material way: but at all events it seems that the Oberammergau Passion Play should be ranked no lower than the great paintings on the same subjects, and deserves much less blame than the rude images continually before the eyes of Catholic congregations. It is not easy to blame such dramatic representation without blaming too all word painting or poetry on the same topics.

CAMBRIDGE FEMALE MISSION.

For the rescue of fallen women and the protection of those in danger.

President and Treasurer: The VICE-CHANCELLOR.

IN addition to voluntary help the Mission employs a female agent of much experience in work of this nature. It has recently at considerable expense established for her a Mission House where she receives at once those whom she influences. The work of the Mission has lately been prosecuted with great activity and marked success. It is straitened for want of funds chiefly from the lack of collectors in several of the most important colleges. The Mission was originated by undergraduates, and has always depended mainly upon their contributions,

The Secretary will be most thankful to hear of new collectors, and to receive donations, however small, from those who have not otherwise been applied to.

SUPPLEMENT TO

The Cambridge Review.

No. 24. WEDNESDAY, MAY 26, 1880.

Sunday, May 23.

Sermon at Great St. Mary's by the Rev. Dr. SALMON, Professor of Divinity, Trinity College, Dublin.

"Now when John had heard in the prison the works of Christ, he sent two of his disciples and said unto Him, Art thou He that should come or do we look for another? Jesus answered and said unto them, Go and shew John again those things which ye do hear and see: the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached to them."—Matthew xi. 2—5.

Although the celebration of this day is a comparatively modern appendix to the feasts of the Christian year, it is very fitting that an opportunity should be given us to ask ourselves what conclusion ought we to draw from the facts we have commemorated; what is the only theory which will make these things credible. We have commemorated the day of the birth and the day of the death of the Founder of our religion; and in this there is nothing to be ashamed of, whatever theory we hold about Him; for all must allow that He was one of the world's greatest benefactors, and filled a place in its history such as scarcely any other has occupied; and that therefore those who bear His name may rightly strive that His life and death should not be forgotten. But we preceded our commemoration of His birth by a season of preparation, and we thereby signified our belief that His appearance in the world had been no chance birth of time, but an event long prepared in the Divine counsels, prefigured in the ceremonies of the Mosaic law, announced beforehand by the Jewish prophets in predictions which, as the time of his coming drew near, became more numerous and more distinct. In a special festival we celebrated His Conception as an exception to the laws of human generation. In commemorating His Nativity we acknowledged it as signalised by miracle, and in our glad hymns we echoed the strains in which the shepherds keeping watch over their flocks heard the heavenly host welcome the glad tidings of great joy. We not only commemorated His death, but three days after we declared our belief that death had not been able to hold Him captive. On this belief we found our own hopes for future reunion with those we have loved; for (in the Apostle's words) if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him. We celebrated His glorious ascension into heaven, and last Sunday testified our gratitude for that, when He departed from this world, He did not leave His people orphans, but gave them another Comforter who should abide with them for ever. And now the question comes, What mean we by all this service? Did the facts which we commemorate really happen? If not, why do we commemorate them? Then, indeed, have we cause to be ashamed, not for ourselves only, but for the whole Christian Church throughout the world, and from nearly the apostles' times to our own, that the true history of Him by whose name we are called has been so overlaid by fable, and that it is with the fabulous part we have all been almost exclusively taught to occupy our minds, and thereon to rest our hopes. On the other hand, if these facts did happen, things are true of Jesus of Nazareth which are true of no one else that ever lived in the world. He is a unique person in the world's history. And the more we think on the matter, the less can we be satisfied in ascribing to Him any dignity short of Divine. It seems to me, then, that the answer to the question, Have we a right to call ourselves Christians? depends on our answer to two questions which really reduce themselves to one, Are the things commemorated in the feasts of the Christian year true, and was Jesus of Nazareth a unique person?

There were among the Socinians of a former generation those who rejected the doctrine of our Lord's Divinity, but who yet felt no difficulty in admitting the truth of some, if not all, of the supernatural facts of the Gospel history, and in ascribing to the New Testament books a Divine inspiration distinct in kind from any which can be attributed to the best of human productions. It may be safely said that the times in which such an attitude of mind was possible have passed away never to return. Any difficulties which are felt now relate to the belief in supernatural facts, not to the acceptance of the doctrinal inferences which such facts once admitted suggest. Nay, it will be found that the admission of the doctrine in which we this day profess our belief sweeps away at once the most formidable difficulties which now stand in the way of the acknowledgment of the supernatural facts.

There has been a tendency of recent years to sneer at the evidential school of the last century as if Lardner, Paley and the rest had failed in the task they set themselves, and as if their failure did not much matter to us who have a more sure foundation for our faith. Such sneers indicate a complete failure to apprehend that ours is a historical religion, the cardinal tenet of which is that some eighteen centuries ago there was in this world one who was like no one else who ever lived in the world, and who then did a work for the benefit of the world which none but He could have accomplished. All those celebrations of the Christian year of which I spoke are nothing but an expanded expression of our faith in the articles of the baptismal creed. Without such faith I do not see how anyone can rightly call himself a Christian. If we can imagine ourselves asking any of the ancient teachers whom the Church has honoured, What must a man do before you can acknowledge him as as Christian? he would no doubt answer, He must be baptised. And what is necessary before he can be baptised? He must believe. And what is the belief of which you require him to make public profession? I believe in God the Father Almighty and in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord: who was born of the Holy Ghost and the Virgin Mary, was crucified under Pontius Pilate and was buried, and the third day rose again from the dead, who ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of the Father, whence He cometh to judge the quick and the dead, and I believe in the Holy Ghost. For almost the entire, if not the entire, of the duration of the Christian Church no one was recognised as a member of it without some such profession of belief as I have read, and you will have observed that the articles of that profession are for the most part exactly those which the feasts of the Christian year successively present to us for our meditation. But several of these articles relate to historical facts, and our belief in these must be obtained by evidence of the same nature as that on which which we believe other historical facts. Our belief that our Lord suffered under Pontius Pilate must be justified by the same kind of evidence as that on which we believe that there was such a person as Pontius Pilate. Our belief that our Lord rose again on the third day must be justified by the same kind of evidence as that on which we believe that He was crucified and was buried. It is impossible to evolve a historical fact out of our internal consciousness or to have any real belief that anything took place 1800 years ago, merely because we wish it did, and because we find such a belief comforting and consolatory. Writers on evidences then have undertaken no needless task when they have set themselves to enquire whether our belief in the facts of the Christian creed can be justified by the ordinary rules of historical investigation; if they have failed in what they tried to establish, we must be forced to admit that the faith which the Christian Church has always held rests on no solid foundation.

It must be owned, however, that times have changed since the natural course of a defender of Christianity was accounted to be that he should establish the occurrence of certain miracles and offer these as credentials of a divine revelation. Now-a-days instead of regarding the miraculous part of Christianity as the foundation on which the remaining part rests, this miraculous part is looked on by many as the overburdening weight under which if it cannot be cleared away the whole fabric must sink. Only get rid of this and we may still have, we are told, a very noble religion. If we will but surrender the Christian miracles we may still have our Christ. No honours will be too great for him, no language too lofty to describe the services he has rendered humanity. But is such a compromise possible? In the first place if our Lord be worthy of all the reverence which we are permitted to pay him we cannot in judging of his miracles leave out the consideration how did he judge of them himself? How did he teach others to judge of them? I do not dwell on the fact that in the fourth Gospel his mighty works are always represented as signs wrought by him to testify a divine commission; it suffices to refer to that story the account of which I read as recorded in the text. It is common to two of the Synoptic Evangelists Matthew and Luke. If we are to discriminate the records of our Saviour's sayings into more or less trustworthy, this story must be regarded as belonging to one of the earliest forms in which sayings of his were committed to writing. And the substance of it is that when he was asked if it was he of whom the prophets of the nation had spoken, he on whom the expectations of the nation were fixed, he appealed to his miracles, or rather perhaps to the correspondence of those mighty works with what the prophets had told concerning him. The blind receive their sight, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached to them. If the wonders related of him are to be reduced to exaggeration, misconception, natural occurrences falsely attributed to supernatural causes, we must say that the mistake which his Church has made was made in his own lifetime and was shared by himself.

In one of the earliest attempts made in this century to write a nonmiraculous life of Jesus, the method of accepting the Gospel narratives as in their substance true but depriving them of their supernatural character was fairly worked out ad absurdum. Our Lord had been believed to walk upon the water, but this was because he had been seen walking on rising ground close to the lake, and by a precipitate judgment of the disciples had been imagined to walk on the surface of the water: the story that he had been transfigured arose out of the fact that the disciples had seen the beams of the morning sun brilliantly reflected from his garments: the story that he had miraculously multiplied the food of the 5,000 arose out of the fact that the multitude had been influenced by the examples of himself and his disciples, each to bring out his private store and share it with his neighbours so that all ate and were satisfied. I need not repeat in detail how improbability is heaped upon improbability until the explanation how Jesus of Nazareth came to be regarded as a miracle worker presents us with a story quite as inconsistent with human experience as that he actually wrought the wonderful works attributed to him. No one can treat this method of naturalistic interpretation with more scorn than does Strauss, who declares that if the Gospels be once admitted as historical records it is impossible to eliminate miracle from the life of Jesus. But what if giving up the historical character of the Gospels as we have them now, we transfer our allegiance to a supposed original Gospel, from untrustworthy enlargement of which our present Gospels took their rise? May it not then be possible for criticism to reduce the Gospel narrative to a form, in which the method of naturalistic interpretation shall not be inapplicable? Some of the more refractory miracles will have been cleared away, and the total number so greatly reduced that the calculus of probabilities will no longer present so appalling a result, when in order to measure the probability of the non-miraculous life of Jesus we multiply together the chances against the truth of each particular explanation. I am far from denying the possibility that criticism may detect in the texts of our present Gospels traces of an earlier document. That the task is enormously difficult may be inferred from the want of agreement between the able men who have attempted to perform it: that it is impossible I do not venture to say. But two things I think we may safely say. One that this task, if ever it is performed cannot be accomplished by any mere mechanical process. For instance it may be a very important step in the process of ascertaining the facts with which criticism must deal to take out the words common to the three Synoptic Gospels. But it would be clearly irrational if we were to imagine that criticism had then finished its work, and that we might jump to the conclusion that in these common words, and these only, we had the original document. Such a process involves the assumption (the unreasonableness of which is seen the moment the assumption is put into words), that on the supposition that such a document existed, and that it was made use of by three subsequent compilers, each of these compilers was bound to incorporate every particular of it in his work, so that an omission by any one of them condemns the part left out as no portion of the original gospel. So far is this from being true that I very confidently believe that if such a document existed there are things which we now find in no Gospel but St. Mark's, which certainly formed part of it. And if in our search for the original document the concurrence of the three witnesses is not necessary neither again is it sufficient. Unless we can say with certainty that none of the Evangelists made use of the work of another we cannot be certain that all the things they have in common were independently taken from their common source. But I think it more important to express my belief in the second place that in this matter criticism will not do its work successfully unless it is single-minded and works without any arrière pensée. If the investigation is prompted by the hope or dominated by the expectation that the discovered residuum of the Gospels will be non-miraculous it must end in failure. For it will be in vain to have got rid of all other miracles if we are forced to leave behind the miracle of our Lord's resurrection, and what can we imagine to have been the date of a Gospel which did not contain this miracle? It must certainly have been earlier than any of the Epistles of St. Paul in whose mind our Lord's resurrection is one of the most certain of facts, a fact so certain that a doctrine is convicted of falsity if it involve the denial of the resurrection. "If there be no resurrection of the dead then is Christ not risen, and if Christ be not risen then is our preaching vain and your faith is also vain. Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God because we have testified of God that he raised up Christ, whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not. And if Christ be not raised your faith is vain, ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ have perished." But we need not come down so late as Paul. Those who believe and those who disbelieve in our Lord's resurrection can at least have no difficulty in agreeing as to the date at which such a belief arose. If a year had elapsed, if six months had elapsed, from the time at which our Lord had died on the cross the death of shame, and if during all that time no sign had clouded over the completeness of the triumph of his enemies, if his followers had for so long a time been forced to acquiesce in the conviction that he who had saved others had been unable to save himself, we may say with certainty that it would have been impossible to revive their crushed expectations, and that one who should then first come to them with the story of a resurrection would find them in no state of mind to give it credence. Or take the thing another way. They who denying a real resurrection of Jesus attempt to explain the rise of a belief in it appeal to the fact that there often remains on the mental retina the image of a luminous object after the object itself has been withdrawn. The face long familiar and long loved refuses to vanish from our mental vision or is ever starting up unbidden. So the minds of those to whom Jesus was inexpressibly dear, and who had built on him all their hopes could not let his image go. Their prophet could not die. Thus whether or not Jesus of Narazeth actually did rise again it was inevitable that his followers should believe that he did. I shall not discuss whether or not this explanation is sufficient but it is evident that the exaltation of mind which it assumes on the part of our Lord's disciples, only belongs to the time when their loss was still fresh. It is not conceivable after the time when the first poignancy of grief which refuses to realize its loss is succeeded by that dull pain which confesses that life has got to be lived on after all that made it dear has gone. Thus if we are forbidden to hold the article of our creed, On the third day He rose again from the dead; we shall be forced to substitute, On or about the third day it came to be believed that He rose again from the dead. It follows that our chronology can find no place for a non-miraculous gospel. At the very earliest date that we can imagine the history of our Lord's life put into writing the story of the Resurrection must have come to form an essential part of it. Criticism then can give us no help to eliminate this miracle from the record. A gospel which does not tell of a resurrection from the dead is an impossibility. If any critic imagine that he has arrived at such a gospel the result condemns the method he has employed. If in this part of the history the authorities to which we have access exhibit greater variety than elsewhere, we must not infer that each had to supplement from his own resources an original narrative defective in this part, but rather that it was for this part of the story materials were so abundant that selection became necessary.

In sum then a non-miraculous Christianity is as much a contradiction in terms as a quadrangular circle; when you have taken away the supernatural, what is left behind is not Christianity. It is not the religion which the apostles preached, it is not that into which converts were baptized, it is not that for which martyrs gave their lives. There might be differences of enumeration if we were asked to state what were the supernatural facts which we should pronounce essential to Christianity, but on this point we can be agreed that Christianity requires faith in a supernatural person. For anyone who tries to clear away the supernatural from Christianity has got to deal with the question, What think you of Christ? Did He differ from other men in degree or in kind? Was he, however pre-eminent above his fellows, a man who possibly may in other ages or other parts of the world have had his equals, and as time goes on for all we know may have His superior? Or was He a Person altogether unique in the history of humanity? Certain it is that nothing less than this is what His Church has always claimed for Him. From the earliest times Christians refused to acknowledge as belonging to their body those who admitted with Jesus sharers in His honour. There were those who set up images of Christ along with those of Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle and others, but such obtained no recognition as fellow disciples from the Christian body. And if it was thought a degradation to Christ to place him on a level with philosophers, still more distasteful to Christians was the project attributed to the eclectic liberality of a half-converted emperor to find room for their master in a pantheon of heathen divinities. He was not one who could share His glory with another.

This honour of having a place in a Pantheon with others is what will now be readily accorded Jesus by students of comparative theology. They recognize the historical claims of Christianity to consideration as one of the world's great religions, and they are prepared to investigate its contents on the assumption, however, that this religion is not to be favoured by any speciality of treatment: that its founder is to be regarded from the outset as fairly comparable with the originator of any other religion that comes under review, and that we are at once to set aside as undeserving of examination any wonders told of him to which we should refuse credence if told of the founder of Buddhist or Brahminical religion. It is evident what must be the result of an investigation into the truth of Christianity, which starts with the assumption that the fundamental doctrine of Christianity is false. You cannot expect to arrive by any process of sound reasoning at a conclusion in direct contradiction to the premisses with which you set out, and so the Christian will not be much flattered at hearing that the result of the examination has been to ascertain that there are precepts of their Master more noble than anything taught by Gotama or Confucius if the question whether Jesus does not stand on an altogether different level from them is rejected as not worthy to come under discussion at all.

On the other hand, if that be once conceded, or even admitted as possible, which our faith asserts, namely that our Blessed Lord was a unique person distinct in nature from ordinary men, all difficulties about the admission of what would otherwise be accounted supernatural facts at once disappear. There is in Christianity but one miracle, the appearance in the world of a supernatural Person. We may believe most thoroughly in the uniformity of nature and be fully persuaded that from like antecedents like consequences will follow, but if the antecedents be not like we shall not expect uniformity of result. It is contrary to experience that a man should be able to give sight to the blind, that at his word the dead should return to life, that he himself should die and be buried, and rise again the third day. But if He of whom these things are asserted be more than man, our experience has nothing to say. Once on a time it was received as a proposition universally true that all metals are heavy, and a man who should report that he had seen a metal floating in water might be regarded as asserting what was contrary to experience, but if he explained that his assertion did not relate to any of the known metals but to one unlike them in character and properties, his announcement, though surprising, ceased to have any opposing experience to encounter. Thus the Christian miracles form a connected system; it is idle to reject one unless you reject the whole. If one be admitted all the rest are credible. If the proof of one be unassailable it avails nothing to raise difficulties about others. If for instance it be not denied that Jesus rose from the dead, it is but time wasted to attempt to show that the story of the miraculous conception is later in date. If in His death He was not subject to the ordinary laws of mortality it is quite as likely as not that He differed from other men in the manner of His birth. Not merely is it the Christian doctrine that Christ is a unique person but also that he came to do a unique work. We might think perhaps that His work as a teacher would sufficiently justify His mission. Principles of pure morality for which we may search with more or less success in the speculations of philosophers before Him were converted by Him into the practical rule of life of multitudes. It is of little consequence whether those have succeeded who have tried to find in the writings of an earlier age anything resembling the maxim "Do unto all men as you would they should do unto you." If such a maxim can be found (and it is singular how a principle which seems to us so obvious should have been so missed and so imperfectly enunciated) yet it was at best but the lofty thought of one or two individuals. Christ made it the professed rule of practice of hundreds of thousands. Those hopes of a future life which before His time had been but a shadowy dream disputed of by men of speculation were made by Christ fixed articles of popular belief. We can tell how great a change Christ wrought if we think of those commonplace words of consolation which naturally present themselves when we come in contact with any bereaved sufferer: of that sure and certain hope which robs sorrow of its bitterness and enables us without excessive grief to commit to the grave the remains of beloved friends, and if we compare with our feelings at such times those with which Pagans parted from their dead; the broken column, the cropped flower which represented that death had destroyed all of existence, the cheerless creed which only told of a night that all must sleep, that it must be our fate to descend whither Æneas and Tullus and Ancus have fallen, thenceforward to be but dust and shadow. Still more did Christ benefit the world by raising men's conceptions of the character of God and so making morality a part of religion. What help could theology give religion when the gods were represented as likely to be indulgent to human vices because they had practised them themselves. Christ taught His people to believe in a God of infinite holiness and purity, who hates sin and yet who may be loved with most trusting confidence: a heavenly father to be whose especial children is the best reward of the peacemakers, to see whose face is the highest hope of the pure in heart; who is ever at hand to strengthen His true worshippers, to whom is due our heartiest love, our humblest submission, whose most acceptable worship is a holy heart, in whose constant presence our life is passed, to whose merciful disposal we are resigned by death. If this were all he did who shall say that Christ's mission to the world had not been justified. But the scriptures give us to understand that the main object of His coming was not to add certainty to the conjectures of natural religion; not even to communicate some new truths unattainable by human reason but that it was to atone for the sins of mankind and effect the redemption of a lost world. This work is truly unique. And so it will not seem strange that we do not find in everyday experience instances of wondrous works like those ascribed to Him if we believe that He was not only different from ordinary men but was sent to do a work quite different from anything that has taken place before or since. If this be true it is to be expected that the works which he did and the signs which prepared the way for him should be different from anything which falls within the range of our daily experience. What has been said applies also to the whole system of prophecy and to the relation of Christianity to the Jewish dispensation. Once accept the Church's doctrine as to the Person and work of Christ, and it immediately becomes credible that He did not burst on the world without preparation. Christ's mission is by hypothesis an event unparalleled in the world's history, and of infinite importance to the human race. If a theist finds no difficulty in believing that while yet this earth was unpeopled by living creatures, it was through God's Providence being prepared to be the future abode of man, still more easily can a Christian regard the advent of Christ as the consummation of the purposes of God, for which all earlier dispensations had been designed to prepare the way.

It follows from what has been said, that the doctrines of the Church's creed are so connected together that if you remove the article of our Lord's Divinity the remaining articles become not more but less credible. Before I conclude I wish to say something on the question, whether if you remove the doctrine of our Lord's Divinity our religion will be the nobler. I believe the contrary to be so much the case that if we cease to worship Christ as God, I doubt if we shall do well to call ourselves by his name at all. The question is, in short, whether our souls are more likely to be elevated by the worship of God, or by creature worship. It is notorious how a man's character is moulded by that of the being whom he worships, and in whom is embodied his highest notions of perfection. I had already occasion to glance at the injury done to Pagan morality by the worship of gods, who could not be imagined to hate vices to which they had been themselves addicted. Even under the Christian dispensation, when creature cult has been practised under the most favourable circumstances, the effect has not been favourable to morality. One has been made the object of worship, who has been indeed acknowledged to be a creature, but in whom men's highest ideal of purity, tenderness, and self-denial has been embodied. Yet as her mercy was supposed to be not limited by justice she was regarded as one not hating sin as God hates it, one likely to be indulgent to human frailty and to forgive it on easier terms than the Supreme, and so her office has been looked on as that of shielding the sinner on any terms from punishment: of enabling him to continue in sin with a prospect of escaping with ultimate impunity; and bandits and assassins have found themselves able to continue their trade while paying her the warmest devotion. If God has forbidden us idolatry it is because the most effectual instrument of our moral renovation is communion with Him who is known to be of spotless purity. It is by contact with God's spirit that man's spirit is sanctified, and we do our souls an infinite injury if shrinking from God's perfect holiness, we fancy we have found some being higher than man but lower than God, who can shield the soul conscious of guilt from the painful sense of God's immediate presence. The worship of Christ has done the Church no harm, simply because she has not looked upon Him as a creature. If it be the perfection of the Christian life to set Christ ever before us, to live as in His sight to strive to be like Him, to consider how, by our actions, we shall best please Him; when we say Christ we mean God. We have set before us the very loftiest ideal our minds are able to form, we do not bate a single attribute from infinite perfection. But if by Christ we mean man the case is different. It might be natural that his followers in the exuberance of their love and gratitude to him who had taught them the best lessons they had ever learned should exceed the limits of sober reason in the honours they paid him. Perhaps, indeed, we might be obliged to own that in this matter their Master had led them astray, and by the emphasis with which he insisted on personal allegiance to himself detracted from his merits as a true teacher of Humanity. But why should we, if we have learned better, repeat the mistakes of the first disciples. The history of any science, however interesting it may be, is a thing wholly unnecessary to the knowledge of the science. If we know the truths which Archimedes or Sir Isaac Newton discovered it is needless for us to discuss which of the two were the greater mathematician, needless to enquire whether there may not hereafter arise a mathematician greater than either: unnecessary even to know that such men existed at all. So in like manner for the science of religion, if Jesus be no more than the teacher who brought certain truths to light: the vital matter is that we should keep hold of the truths, but the name of the teacher might be forgotten. In short, the teacher who leads us from nature to Christ does us infinite service if by Christ we mean God: if we have been made to feel that in this world we are not the helpless sport of blind forces which toss us about as chance may order for evil or for good, but the objects of the love of a heavenly father, who has not merely shown his love in our creation and our preservation, but who has so loved the world that he gave His only begotten Son that whatsoever believeth on Him should not perish but have everlasting life. But if Christ be man, to lead us to Christ is a miserable halting place. Then to lead us to Christ means this:—to arrest the growth of the science of religion at the point at which it arrived eighteen centuries ago; to throw our thoughts on the past instead of on the future: and to say that at the end of a period when the human intellect has been exerted with unexampled activity, when literature and science have been cultivated as they never have been before, we are to be content to sit at the feet of a highly gifted Jewish teacher who died 2,000 years ago.

And surely this affords a simple test whether or not we have claimed too much for our Master. If he were only man he was ex vi termini fallible and imperfect. He belonged to a nation far below our own in culture and education; and the fact that he lived so many years ago implies that he was in ignorance of all that the accumulated experience of eighteen centuries since his time has added to human knowledge. Unless the science of religion be incapable of progress, it is inevitable but that we shall find in his teaching errors to correct, false conceptions to rectify, half views to enlarge. Yet it is not mere respect for the prejudices of society which induces many who reject his supernatural claims to call themselves by his name. It is because they have really been unable to find any better teacher, any whose lessons so commend themselves to their hearts and consciences. And what of those who disdain his teaching altogether. Have they improved on it? I believe many of themselves would be the first to own that it is not that they can give better solutions than he of the problems which have perplexed thoughtful men of every age but that in rejecting his solutions they think such problems ought to be abandoned in despair. I suppose the keynote to our Lord's discourses may be said to be the doctrine that we have a Father in heaven. No other utterance recurs so often, or is made the basis of so many deductions. His disciples' daily prayer was to begin "our Father which art in Heaven." The sense of their sonship was to be the governing principle of their conduct. They were to do good works letting their light shine before men that they might glorify their father which is in heaven. Yet not in order to gain the praise of men or to be seen of men, "otherwise ye have no reward of your father which is in heaven." To be like their heavenly father, perfect like him, was to be the aim of all who called themselves his children. As he sends his rain and makes his sun to shine on the evil and the good so were they to love their enemies and not grudge to bestow their benefits on the unthankful and the evil. To his love they might safely trust. All corroding cares might be dismissed by the thought your heavenly father knoweth ye have need of these things. He feeds the fowls of the air, are not ye much better than they? None of you would refuse good gifts to your children neither will your heavenly father refuse good gifts to them that ask him. We enquire whether the philosophy of the nineteenth century will endorse this teaching. Is it true that the power to which we owe our being is a Person who loves us, who regards our conduct, whose attributes we may strive to imitate, in whom we can safely trust? Some will tell us that they do not know whether or not we can ascribe anything like personality to that ever present force, that stream of on the whole beneficial tendency which pervades the universe. Others tell us that we have no experience of thought without an organized brain and that as we know that no such mighty all pervading organization exists we can safely say that the force which everywhere shows itself is directed by no conscious intelligence. And does this force love us?—Well, the individual certainly not. The laws by which that force works are undoubtedly beneficial on the whole: but the general action of these laws is never modified in the slightest no matter how cruelly they may effect individuals.—Then this power may be said in a sense to love if not individuals at least the race.—Well no, neither can we say this either. Species like individuals make progress to a certain point and then decay and die: this world itself once incapable of sustaining life, then by degrees decking itself with myriad forms of beauty and vigour will in all probability again become incapable of sustaining life and will be borne round through space a burnt out cinder.—And will no memory anywhere remain of those who during its season of life have on this earth thought and worked and loved?—It is to be feared none.—And those whom we have loved here and who have gone from us do they not live?—Oh yes, they live in your recollections. Cherish those recollections as best you can for it is all you will ever know of them.

If this be progress it is such progress as is predicted for the world we live in, progress to a state when its sun shall have been burnt out, its life departed, its heat evaporated, when it shall have been frozen into a lump of ice. Thanks be to God our sun has not been quenched. "Jesus lives" was the watchword of our Easter Day—lives not merely in the memory of the lessons he taught, not merely in the admiration of those who have read the history of His life: but lives in power and glory, sitting at the right hand of God, guiding, ruling, defending his Church, daily fulfilling His promise, "I will be with you alway even to the end of the world": present with it by His Spirit which he promised to give us as an abiding Comforter, in the Unity of which Spirit with the Father he lives and reigns ever one God to whom be ascribed all might, majesty, glory, dominion and power; now and for ever.

The Cambridge Review:

A JOURNAL OF UNIVERSITY LIFE AND THOUGHT.

No. 25.] WEDNESDAY, JUNE 2, 1880. [PRICE SIXPENCE.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

The Rede Lecture was delivered in the Senate House last Wednesday by Professor Humphry, F.R.S., the subject being "Man, pre-historic, present, future." The lecturer, having first indicated the chief points in which man differs from the lower animals, went on to discuss the theory of Evolution. Presumption and probability, he remarked, were in favour, increasingly in favour, of the theory; but still the science of Evolution was yet in its infancy. More Darwins must carry on their honest, patient investigation ere this mystery can be solved. He then went on to illustrate his subject by discussing the characteristics of various races, and concluded a very interesting lecture by saying, "To the burning question 'whence and whither,' . . . . as regards the body at least, I am compelled to reply that we find ourselves simply floating on the streams of time. The bark, we suppose, moves on. Whether we peer fore or aft, it is obscurity. Sufficient for the day must be the knowledge thereof."

By the kind permission of the Dean of Westminster, there was a public meeting of the friends of the Cambridge Delhi Mission in the Jerusalem Chamber at Westminster Abbey, on Monday last. The Bishop of Durham and Canon Westcott, the two founders of the Association, were present.

Some surprise has been caused in the University by the receipt of the following instructions from the University Commission:—"We, the University of Cambridge Commissioners, do hereby authorise and direct the University of Cambridge to suspend the election to the Professorship of Mineralogy, now vacant in the said University, until the thirty-first day of December, in the present year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty." The election which had been fixed for June 12th is accordingly postponed.

The list published of the candidates for the General Examination shews their numbers to be about 250 in all They are being examined in the Senate House, the Law School, and the Arts School, and the period of trial will last until Thursday at four o'clock.

An Association of Classical Tutors has been formed and already joined by a large majority of Coaches, with the view of making coaching more efficient and more pleasant. Among the Coaches specialists will reap most benefit from the scheme, as by various details which will be found in another column their work is encouraged and opportunities provided for tuition in special branches to a greater extent than is possible under the present haphazard and independent system. The benefit to the pupils from any movement in this direction is obvious. Indeed on all grounds there can be no doubt that some such scheme is needed: it provides for the division of labour, and if it really secures it, a great point will have been gained in comparison with the great waste there is under the present system. It is important to notice that the Association is intended to be perfectly voluntary and as flexible as possible, and that its effect will not be to abolish the present system but only to supplement and extend it. For the rest, we refer our readers to the more detailed statement in another column, and wish the project every success.

Those who have been visited by some energetic medical members of the University, eager for subscriptions to Addenbrooke's Hospital, may like to know that the money so collected is not going to increase the general funds of the institution, but is meant especially for the cleaning and painting of the wards and corridors, which necessarily require a thorough everhauling from time to time. The endowments and regular contributions are quite inadequate to carry on even the ordinary work of the Hospital, so that special provision has to be made for any extraordinary expenses that may arise. We are glad that the appeal seems likely to be well responded to.

A garden party of a very pleasant character has been given by St. John's College, which introduced vocal singing in place of the military bands which do duty at the King's and Sidney promenades, and made use of its large grounds for lawn tennis playing. The "wilderness" showed unusual signs of life.

A supper was held at the Hoop Hotel, on Saturday evening last, in which more than seventy of the friends and supporters of the Cambridge Review took part. Mr. Henry Jackson occupied the chair. The proceedings were of a strictly private character.

The Letters to the Editors are unavoidably crowded out this week.

BOAT CLUB FINANCE.

I.—THE COLLEGES.

While boating is still so fresh from the stir and mirth of its yearly festival, and the vehemence of manly plaudits and the grace of maiden smiles still cast their halo round all that concerns it, it may seem proof of a dull, not to say jaundiced temperament, to grub among prosaic pounds, shillings, and pence, and ask the readers of the Review to look into the reckoning. But it can hardly fail to interest some section of the fifteen or sixteen hundred residents who are directly concerned, and thereby to further the interests of the University's most popular pastime, to give such survey as is possible of modern Boat Club finances. The frank and painstaking courtesy of the various treasurers has supplied me with the needful materials; and though it is impossible but that some slips should have occurred in collecting a multiplicity of details, and that some truths should be misleadingly stated, it is to be hoped that general accuracy has been secured.

It will be well to commence with a simple tabulation of such results as seem most generally important and instructive.

The first three columns are designed to show the progress made in boating during the last five years, and more particularly in the last two. The statistics are taken from the numbers paying capitation tax to the University Boat Club, as though there are not a few discrepancies with the numbers returned by the different treasurers—in part owing to diversities of arrangement in the capitation of non-rowing members—this seemed the most uniform index accessible, and has the advantage of underrating rather than overrating the number actually upon the lists. The figures prove conclusively the growth of interest in boating, and may help to calm the fears aroused by the development of rival sports, more particularly football and lawn tennis. One warning, however, is necessary; in very many of the smaller colleges, as even in such thriving communities as Caius, Pembroke, and Trinity Hall, practically all members of the college enrol themselves in the Boat Club, and the numbers so far indicate increase in the numbers of the University rather than of active oarsmen. In details it will be seen that by far the most marked fall occurs in the Lady Margaret Club, which may presumably be attributed to a reaction consequent upon the Goldie ascendancy, and partly perhaps to some local dissatisfaction attested by the bubble movement of the so-called St. John's Club, which ended its short-lived existence in 1876. Corpus shows an appreciable decrease: up to 1875 all members of the college, except the sizars, were registered in the Boat Club, but since that date motives of economy, urged by the college authorities, have led to a discontinuance of the practice, and at present the support of about 70 per cent. is secured. The latest return of Trinity Hall, strange to say, is numerically lower than in any of the last five years, but this is due to a re-arrangement of the capitation payment by non-rowing members. Jesus, as might be expected, gives the largest increase, and this is the more genuine as in this college membership is not a universal obligation, but extends at present to about 80 per cent. of the undergraduates. The rise in First Trinity is practically equivalent to the absorption of the Second Trinity Club in 1876, but four other colleges, Caius, Clare, King's, and Pembroke, show an increase of some thirty a-piece. The additions at the foot of these columns give the total augmentation.

The fourth column merely states the number of boats now put on the river by the respective clubs, an asterisk being affixed to all those who entered for the competition for last place in the Third Division at the late Lent races; the unusual and probably unprecedented vigour of that competition is an additional attestation of the present vitality of boating.

The fifth column speaks for itself, and presents tolerable uniformity. Corpus decisively carries off the palm of economy, while Third and First Trinity, and next to them, Lady Margaret take the lead in extravagance. At Emmanuel, where all but stray individuals join the club, a commendable arrangement exacts only half the terminal subscription from Sizars and remits the whole of the entrance fee. The terms of composition are very various, and would be tiresome to state. In no case, it will be observed, is a difference made between rowing and non-rowing members; for theoretically, and to a not inconsiderable extent practically, all members joining a boat club do so with some more or less defined intention of rowing. In the matter of terminal subscriptions the variations range between the very close limits of £1 and £1 5s. The normal duration of the term of subscription is nine terms, but Clare charges for seven only. It is surprising to observe the very small number of Colleges that make a distinction between rowers and non-rowers. First Trinity and Trinity Hall agree in according honorary membership to non-rowing subscribers of six terms' standing, and in other Colleges, as at Magdalene, advantageous terms of composition are open to the non-rowers. Non-rowing members of First Trinity continue to pay the capitation tax to the University Club. The most systematic discrimination, which on grounds of justice has much to commend it, is shown by King's and Third Trinity. King's is one of the Colleges where all but a quite insignificant fraction of the undergraduates are incorporated in the Club, and the principle has been steadily there maintained that non-rowers should pay one half of the subscription of active members; in former times the subscriptions stood at £1 and 10s. respectively; this was raised subsequently to 30s. and 15s., and then lowered to the figures that appear above, but the principle was adhered to throughout. At King's, too, it will be noticed that the University poll tax is collected and paid independently, † The 4s. 6d. Poll-tax is paid separately in addition: non-rowing members pay 12s. 6d. subscriptions, with 3s. Poll Tax.

‡ Rowing members for 9, non-rowing for 6 terms.

and this device may furnish a useful hint to struggling clubs, for it affects a considerable economy in a rather less naked and irritating way than by raising the subscription. With regard to the collection of subscriptions, it may be said that the employment of a paid collector saves endless worry to a treasurer, and probably in the long run with ever-shifting treasurers results in a positive increase of funds. The terms usually given to such collectors appear in more than one case needlessly high, and though it would probably be unjust to invade vested rights, I may state from tolerably wide experience of the percentage ordinarily given to town collectors, that two per cent. is ample remuneration for the collection of subscriptions, so large in amount and so easily obtained. To support the collector treasurers should not shrink from exacting the penalties that the club laws lay down against default or unpunctuality, and every club would do well to have some rule upon the point among its statutes.

The next columns present a statement of the sums actually paid out by the Clubs under the assigned dates, being the last two University years. The figures thus ranged can hardly fail to be instructive to treasurers who care to study their subject, and a useful interchange of communications might result; but at the same time it must be clearly understood that the figures adduced will not bear the strain of hasty and superficial conclusions. Not only is the range of quotation, covering only six terms, too narrow; but the financial arrangements, and the modes of book-keeping in different clubs are so various as to defy rough and ready comparisons. Mere disbursements are no true test of expenditure, where liabilities are suffered to stand over, but this caution applies to very few of the figures indeed. On the other hand the discharge of accumulated arrears may swell the apparent expenditure. Caius for instance, is steadily paying off the debt contracted on the erection of its boathouse, though such sums may fairly be balanced against the savings effected by its possession. Christ's figures stand considerably higher than in the current year. King's in its second column includes the payment of an outstanding debt of over £80. Catharine's terminally pays off about £10 of contracted debt, and First Trinity in its second column includes the final clearance of its boathouse debt by a payment of above £20. Besides these special cases it is the habit of all but the most opulent clubs to have recourse to special funds for the purchase of new eights when required, and such special funds are not as a rule included in the ordinary accounts. Clare provides for about one boat in three by this method, but in many colleges it is the normal procedure. To take one or two typical instances:—Emmanuel, which does not include Special Funds in its return, has expended in the last three years an annual average of £58 on this score: King's in the two years cited £105, which is however included in the figures given above, and no doubt greatly exceeds the average calls under this head. Thrifty Queens' puts by 4s. of every member's terminal subscription, the proceeds of which yield an eight quadrennially. Jesus, John's, King's, Pembroke, First Trinity, Third Trinity, and Trinity Hall have their full expenditure faithfully represented, and do not for any normal expenses fall back on special funds. No perfectly satisfactory standard is possible for measuring the relative expensiveness of clubs. Proportion of numbers to expenditure overlooks the essential difference between rowing and non-rowing members: proportion of boats on the river to expenses is too arbitrary a test. A comparison of the subscriptions charged is the best guide, but even this is not free from complexity, and of course neglects the disturbances produced by special funds. In the main it is clear that the largest and most thriving clubs are most exacting indeed in their terms of subscription, but to a still greater extent most self-sufficing in expenditure. First Trinity does not officially canvass for members, and has not for years gone for help outside its own ranks, and in the large totals that it displays, £120 in the first year and £115 in the second consist of grants towards the expenses incurred at Henley. Jesus likewise contributes, though slightly, from current funds towards Henley expenses. First Trinity probably stands alone in having set on foot an annual sinking fund of £18 for the redemption of its boathouse or whatever other step may be necessary, when the lease of its present land falls in.

There is a prevalent belief that boat clubs are normally insolvent. This is untrue. Boat clubs are needy, but few, allowing for sale of stock would find any difficulty in honourably winding up their affairs. Few indeed like Trinity Hall and Pembroke, can boast a comfortable balance at their banker's, but the large majority are currently solvent, and succeed in meetiug their terminal liabilities. When bankruptcy sets in a heroic effort is quickly made, and the debt cleared by the assistance of the Fellows of the College and other friends of the suffering club. Of the eighteen clubs whose condition is known to me, six only are insolvent. Of these one is paying off annually £30 of a debt originally only £130: another has started a special debt fund, and in two terms has paid one half of a debt of £140; three more accept their plight, one being deep in the mire, the other two, as yet, only £80 behind hand; the sixth is Caius, which possesses in its boathouse property far outweighing in value the diminishing debt which its erection created.

As regards details of expenditure, such remarks as seem called for on rental and repairs are purposely deferred. The charge for horses, from 7s. 6d. to 8s. 6d. per afternoon, must be a thorn in the flesh of every treasurer. There is one animal, at least, running at 6s. a day; and though the reports of its locomotive and æsthetic properties is discouraging, it has been guiltless of misdemeanours, escaped tumbles, and kept pace with a high first division boat. While the present high rates are maintained, treasurers should, at least, combine to a man to resist all solicitations for tips from ostlers and others. The amount devoted to prizes is not excessive. First Trinity, indeed, expends annually about £35, but owes much of its life to its vigorous competitions. No other club exceeds £18 a year in this department, and not more than three or four rise above £12: Catharine's and Peterhouse dispense with rewards altogether. It will be more profitable, however, to discuss financial administration than minor details of expense. Treasurerships are both attained and held by very various modes. The office is ordinarily annual, and where the terminal tenure prevails, it becomes annual in practice; the minutes of one club record a terminal meeting, at which none but the officers being present, they proceeded to resign office and re-elect themselves. The election is sometimes by ballot, sometimes by open voting, and in a boat club it is quite possible to discuss publicly the merits of rival candidates and vote upon them without creating jealousies or bad blood. The treasurership is usually and wisely conjoined with the secretaryship. It is not at all common that the office should, as until recently in First Trinity, attach ex-officio to the second or third captaincy: less haphazard methods of election are now in favour, and the Treasurer is chosen on his merits, if possible but not invariably from among the better oars in the clubs: he customarily takes precedence next below the Captains. Some clubs have enlisted the services of a graduate member: this ensures a wholesome and saving continuity in the administration of funds, and in Colleges like Caius and Emmanuel, where the Treasurer continues to take active part in boating, is probably productive of unmixed good. Proper financial control is but very imperfectly developed. At Caius, Catharine's, Pembroke, and elsewhere, all large extraordinary expenses, above all the purchase of new boats, are submitted to the members in general meeting, and at Corpus, where this system obtains, a large expense is defined as any sum exceeding £5. A really more effective method is to entrust the finance to a competent committee; Trinity Hall will furnish a good instance, where the committee consists of four Captains, the Treasurer, and two auditors appointed by the club. Other clubs which possess a committee have suffered it to derogate its financial functions to one or two of the Captains. This is a great error; the extravagance of an irresponsible captain may embarrass a club for years, and even apart from this danger it is very important that some few members of the club besides the treasurer should be au fait with its financial condition. A terminal audit is a wise and almost universal provision, but degenerates sometimes into a mere formality: it should include, if possible, that most troublesome of financial undertakings, an estimate of outstanding liabilities.

Space forbids more than the barest mention of Henley expenses. The despatch of a boat to Henley requires in all clubs the express sanction of a general meeting. A four economically managed may be taken to Henley for about £90: representation by an eight costs from £150 to £250, though Caius, by strenuous economy, but at the cost of practising upon the tideway for a damagingly short space of time, achieved their last trip for the sum of £125.

II.—THE UNIVERSITY.

My next task is to consider University Boat Club finance. It is of almost universal interest, as all members of the several College Boat Clubs are members of the C. U. B. C., though membership, it must be owned, is not with most a very conscious function. Here a very different state of things to that current in the College Clubs faces the inquirer upon the receipt side. No straitening poverty has to be grappled with; the U. B. C. has but to spend and to ask, and with the omnipotent Poll Tax is as rich as a School Board. This entails plain dangers, nor do the counterbalancing checks appear sufficient. The treasurership is linked with the secretaryship, which is annual or more strictly terminal in tenure, and is dependent upon social qualities combined with excellence in rowing, selection being narrowed to the "'Varsity Blues": that is to say, the University Club retains a system which ensures financial discontinuity, which gives the slenderest guarantee of capacity, and which every independent club has found it wise to discard. On the other hand a very important makeweight to this weakness must not be overlooked. About six years back a paid treasurer was appointed, the treasurer proper being relieved from the arduous task of book-keeping; since that most wise step the previous chaos of accounts has been reduced to order, the Poll-tax has been punctually charged and gathered in, the rate has been lowered once, and may probably be soon lowered again; and for the two last years the admirable practice has been adopted of publishing and distributing to treasurers a curt but lucid statement of the year's receipts and expenditure, which leaves nothing to be desired but a subsidiary statement of existing assets and liabilities. Of late, and notably in the case of the incoming President, the U. B. C. has been fortunate in its treasurers, but the system is certainly defective, and when a good opportunity occurs of entrusting the office to some oar of repute, at once competent and willing and permanently resident, it should be eagerly seized, and would no doubt prove fruitful in economies. Another weak point is that finance, like all else, is managed by the captains of boats, exceedingly few of whom are treasurers too, or even much acquainted with, the financial state of their respective clubs. Still, considering the very subordinate character of their financial duties, it is easier to point out the defect than suggest a remedy, except by some more or less elaborate scheme for the participation of treasurers in certain discussions; but this is obviously full of difficulties, and as their rank in the U. B. C. is probably one of the strongest existing incentives to captains to acquaint themselves with the pecuniary condition of their Clubs, it may be well to put up with a second best in gratitude for the attendant good it brings.

To come now to figures. The columns subjoined give in a highly compressed form the expenses of the U. B. C. as published for the past two years. To each figure is annexed in brackets the portion of it practically recouped, by sale of tickets, by entrance fees, or from some other source:

Minor Expenses	56	0	0½			76	15	3½
	1346	4	5½	(99	12)	1259	11	4½	(221	15)

The figures are large, and may surprise the uninitiated. Criticism, especially as I am in no way behind the scenes, may be terse. The receipts are not here given, but in 1879 tally almost exactly with expenditure, while in 1878 they fall short by nearly £100. Apart from the side sums included in brackets, they are derived almost entirely from fines and the capitation tax. The capitation tax is an inevitable but most burdening charge upon the Clubs. From 1876 to 1878 it stood at 5s. 3d. for rowing, and 3s. 3d. for honorary members, and since then has been reduced to 4s. 6d., and 3s. respectively. How heavy a charge this is may be gathered from the bare statement that the annual contribution of First Trinity amounts to £145. The existence, however, of the Poll tax redresses certain apparent hardships in the boat-club system. It may have seemed hard on the one hand that boating should for University purposes be taxed in a way that finds no parallel in the case of the other athletic industries of the place; on the other hand it may have seemed hard that so many non-rowing men should be called on to subscribe to the support of boating. The incidence of the Poll Tax reduces both grievances; for the University Boat Race, the Boat Procession, and hardly less the College Races, possess a general and not merely sectional interest, and the principal actors may reasonably claim to be public benefactors; on the other hand, were the boat-race discontinued, the subscriptions of non-rowing members might be largely if not entirely dispensed with. In the levy of the tax unpunctuality in payment should be rigorously visited with the prescribed penalties, yet this is never done, the severity of the present rule reducing it to a dead letter. Better far to inflict a sharp fine upon defaulters, than threaten the Draconian penalty of denying the College boat its place in the races.

To turn now to expenditure and consider in order the various heads. On the first it requires extensive information to speak to any good effect; from the nature of the case nothing but constant vigilance on the part of successive presidents will avail to limit exorbitant charges. Perhaps the most questionable of the items included is a sum of £82 for training expenses at Cambridge; it would have seemed a natural arrangement that the crew should be franked their travelling expenses and keep at London or Kingston, but should, as in college boat clubs, pay the whole, or at least the major part of their training accounts at Cambridge, all charges for room and waiting being of course excepted. To judge by the balance sheet, which ought not here to be a misleading guide, the amount refunded by the crew in two years is a mysteriously small £15 14s. 6d. From time to time gossip has been rife concerning charges for fractures; the late President's last communication upon the subject, in the pages of the Review, was reassuring and satisfactory; they should, as a matter of course, be disallowed by any treasurer: furniture or crockery breaking, however legitimate and useful a vent for exuberant vigour, must always be a matter for private enterprise. As regards the boat race dinner the new plan of equal division of expenses seems both in equity and in finance an improvement upon the old system of each University playing host alternately. The issue of complimentary tickets should be minimised, and the reunion must always be in itself so popular and interesting that the price of dinner tickets might, without fear, be equalised with the actual expense per head; while £18 worth of "Band" is surely a quite needless luxury. Payments to boat builders in 1878 include, it must be hoped, large arrears. These, in common justice to coming generations of undergraduates, should never be tolerated. In 1876 there were accumulated liabilities amounting to more than £700, and nothing but honour is due to the treasurers, who have not shrunk from ending so mischievous a system even at the cost of heavy budgets. As soon as all arrears are paid up, every account should be sent in terminally and paid by the treasurer during his tenure of office. Strict supervision of the items in detail is on any other terms impossible. The prize account of 1878 is no doubt swollen from a similar cause. It is to be hoped that the U.B.C. will not go on increasing expenditure under this head: but their latest action is threatening. It may be reasonable to honour the losing trial eight with medals of bronze while the winners earn silver, but the distribution of silver medals to the head of the second division, at the end of the Lent races, is an arbitrary piece of extravagance, that will not improve either the races or rowing one tittle. Nothing more occurs to be said on the mere face of the accounts, except that a claim must be special indeed that can justify the U.B.C. in contributing to any charity, unless it were in favour of some veteran dependant of its own or the like. The Ditton Church fund, through the popularity of Ditton corner in the May week, already derives indirectly from the University Club a most helpful little endowment.

III.—PROPOSED UNIVERSITY BOATHOUSE.

Finally, let these prolonged inquiries close with a judgment upon a practical issue now presented to the University. An influential committee propose to apply the abortive Goldie Bridge Fund to the erection of a University Boathouse, and have the other day come before the public with a request for a round £1,500. The object of the movers is presumably to enhance the comfort and dignity of the representative University oars, for it can do little or nothing to increase their efficiency. As the discomforts and indignities to which they are in their present quarters exposed are known only to the elect, that side of the subject must be left to other pens. From a purely financial aspect the plan appears worse than unworthy of support. The "rowing members" of the University Club amount to 20 or more for the larger part of the October Term, to a dozen or so for the Lent Term, and in the May Term have no sort of need for a boathouse at all. No independent Club of the size would dream under the circumstances of erecting rather than hiring accommodation. Nor when once erected will it be productive of economy. The present rent paid by the U.B.C. is £5 a term, with housing for eights at £6 and for pairs at £3 3s. a year. Now rent of land, structural repairs, rates, and wages of a competent boatman, would assuredly much exceed the cost at present involved. None but the larger boat clubs can economise by building boathouses. Also the sum asked is over-large. Trinity built a boathouse for about 250 members for £1300, and Caius a boathouse for 150 for £950. In any case the scheme should not be taken in hand till the whole sum required is subscribed: an initial debt would be tantamount to an increased capitation tax, in other words diminished popularity and efficiency for the college boat clubs at large. The scheme is not free from other objections, above all the very unsatisfactory tenure on 40 years' lease. Things are apt to get settled before the critics hear of them, but if it is not yet too late, I would venture to submit to the committee an alternative scheme for their consideration. More than one of the small colleges in responding to my financial inquiries has independently expressed cravings for an amalgamated small college boathouse. Single-handed, none can realise this desire nor effect the economy; undertaken jointly it would have a most helpful effect, and possess the economical advantages of the Special Fund system. I have purposely tabulated above the amounts spent by the colleges in rental, and to these fall to be added the heavy charges for repairs that form so large an item of expenditure, and constitute the true gain of the private boathouse arrangement. I had desired to give a full synopsis of the rents paid by the clubs that are housed at Foster's. Unfortunately the Clare officers conceive finance to be somehow disadvantaged or profaned by publicity, and Sidney awaits the verdict of a general meeting upon the point. But of the other Clubs at Foster's, who seems on the whole to raise his terms highest, Catharine's pay £40, Emmanuel £61 10s., Pembroke £34, Trinity Hall £80, and Cavendish £26, a total of above £241, independently of repairs, which form a considerable item. Here there is a fine opening for economy. The Oxford University Boat Club, to judge by the Oxford correspondent's letter in the Review of April 28th, is now making a move in the suggested direction. Could not the Cambridge committee put themselves in communication with the Oxford authorities, and with the smaller College Clubs, and revise their plans of the C.U.B.C. into something more modest in its own behalf, and more beneficent to humbler subordinates? A well-digested scheme would be hailed with delight and financial support by more than one of our colleges, and receive a heartier approval than the present from at least one subscriber to the Goldie Memorial.

THE UNIVERSITY FRANCHISE.

At the present time, when every interest and every class in Britain are endeavouring to exert an influence on the affairs of the country, when so many people of little education and often of less sense vote for Parliament (with an immediate prospect that their number will be increased by the lowering of the county franchise), bachelor graduates of Cambridge can surely not be blamed if they rebel against their exclusion from the University suffrage. Their rights in virtue of their degree, consisting, I believe, only of a limited use of the Library, are not such as to confer much dignity on their status. Therefore, if, as I will endeavour to show, it is both just and expedient to put them in respect of the franchise on a footing with the members of the Senate, it is due to their degree itself to remove this disability. It is unnecessary to discuss their general fitness, when we think of the specimens of the British elector that most of us must have met with during the recent elections. On the other hand it can be said, and not without reason, that the interests of the University are so peculiar and important, that the right of election must only rest in those of its members whose special fitness is beyond a doubt, and thus the question naturally arises, in what respect M.A.s or LL.M.s are better qualified than bachelors.

The first point to consider is that of age. It is true that by giving bachelors the franchise, the same man may possibly be able to exercise his right three years sooner than he otherwise would; but scarcely anyone takes a Cambridge degree before he is twenty-two years old, and the average age is undoubtedly higher. A young man has at this time of life usually formed definite opinions, which are in the main not likely to change for many years afterwards. Even the opinions of the mass of undergraduates are more sober than those of their brethren on the Continent. Socialism or Republicanism does not exist here, and a visit to the Union or any of the kindred College societies would soon convince anyone who fears the rashness of youth that matters political, educational, or otherwise, are discussed among us as moderately as they could be in any other assembly. No rational being need apprehend the introduction of a body of voters striving for reckless change, and the destruction of those institutions of which we all are proud. Here those that oppose the views of this article might object, that granting what has just gone before, where could we draw the line if the franchise were to be altered? Why should all undergraduates of the age of twenty one and upwards not have a vote, if they have such good qualities? Such a question leads to the next point, that of fitness, and is easily answered. There would be no guarantee that the undergraduate had any knowledge of the University, whatever his age, and however great his intelligence; he might be older than many a member of the Senate, and still not have kept two terms. But the graduate has necessarily been in residence for three years, during which time he has in most cases acquired all the knowledge of the University that he will ever possess; for in general he goes into the world, and the ideas which he takes from here form the standard whereby he judges any University question: so that the new graduate may, in many cases, be a better judge of a cause which might conceivably divide the constituency, than the old doctor or master, whose standard is a state of things that no longer exists. When we consider the question of individual attainments, reason is as much on the same side. The superstitious reverence of outsiders for the master's degree cannot be shared by those who know that the additional qualifications are merely standing and fees, and that the title does not prove any higher state of mental cultivation. No doubt in many cases the facts are quite the reverse. Far from having added to his knowledge the incipient M.A. may compare very unfavourably with himself when he first graduated; for to forget is easier than to learn.

As there are always people whose regard for the wisdom of former generations is so great that it is difficult to persuade them of the necessity of changing whatever their forefathers established, I will allude briefly to the state of things when the University franchise was established, an event which took place in the year 1603. A few simple facts will shew how widely different the circumstances were under which the privileges were granted. The bachelor in the 17th century was nothing but a higher kind of student, he remained in residence, and to quote from Huber's "English Universities," "was then bound, while continuing his college studies, to attend the public lectures, to take a part in greater and more important disputations, and to give certain probationary lectures and oratorical declamations: and at the end of two years he was presented with the dignity of Master, and admitted to it after keeping his act." He would then be scarcely so old as the bachelor is now; for it was a usual thing to matriculate at the age of fourteen or fifteen. In fact (this I also state on the authority of the above quoted learned professor) towards the end of the 16th century there was a complaint that the majority of M.A.s in residence were young men of from twenty to twenty-four years of age, to the great disgust of their seniors, who complained grievously of the fact. Surely with such evidence no reasonable person can deny that any bachelor is now as well qualified for a vote as one of the original electors.

However, those who wish to obtain any concession or recognition of a right must look to themselves for success, and there is far too much tame acquiescence on the part of bachelors in their insignificant position here. If they wish to improve it they should unite in bringing their claims under the notice of those who have the power of satisfying them. The first result would perhaps be discouraging, but at a future time there might still be the unselfish gratification of having done something for later generations.

AN ATHLETIC TRIPOS.

It is not long since there was agitation in high quarters as to the advisability of allowing athletic merit to count in competitive examinations. This agitation has, after some lapse of time, percolated to Cambridge, and we have great pleasure in presenting to our readers the Report of a Syndicate appointed by a grace of the Senate, on Feb. 29, 1879, to enquire into the whole question. Among the members of the Syndicate were found several of our better known athletes, together with a fair sprinkling of more aged M.A.s, selected with a view to toning down the extravagant zeal of the would-be reformers.

The report is as follows:—

(1.) Your Syndics have enquired into the whole of this great question, and are unanimously of opinion that the time has come when activity and success in the bodily palaestra should be allowed some weight in the granting of a degree.

(2.) Having regard to the glory of their ancient and renowned University, your Syndics are of opinion that the great body, which first set on foot the principle of University extension to those without, should also be the first to inaugurate extension at home, and to offer a cordial welcome to the new candidate for admission into the sisterhood of the Arts and Faculties.

(3.) Furthermore your Syndics wish to insist on the following important results which would, as it would seem, accrue to the University, and to the Science of Athletics from this recognition.

(a) Whereas the treatment of this subject has been hitherto distinctly unscientific (insomuch that some have even been found to deny altogether its capability of scientific treatment), your Syndics would point first to the advantage which must be gained for the devotees of athletics, and they be many, by the introduction of method, where all is as yet confusion.

(b) Secondly, though perhaps they could not assure any marked increase in the success of the University in her athletic contests, for indeed it is not the result, but the method to which science pays attention, yet your Syndics feel sure that a public recognition of athletics would be very beneficial to the intellectual growth of many who are forced for patriotic and other reasons to surrender their time to pursuits which at present are despised as being purely physical.

Digitized by Google

(c) The vast range of subjects to which a thorough knowledge of this science should introduce all those who are attracted to pursue it, and to which it would introduce them, should you be pleased to adopt the scheme submitted to you, seems to your Syndics to be a point very strongly in its favour.

For example, there is need first of a complete knowledge of the most abstract part of the science of Mathematics for all who would excel either in the collecting of the correct number of men to compose a team; or of calculating the weights of those who are to be arranged in due order in a boat of eight oars; or if any would register the score of a rifleman or cricketer with exactness; or if one would keep the accounts of his club from extravagance or confusion.

Further, the science of probability and the logic of chance are also needed for such as would fain follow with profit the current prices in the betting market.

And herein we observe, secondly, that our scientific athlete must needs add to his other pursuits the graver studies of the Law, that he may be able to give an explanation of the seeming anomaly in our glorious British Constitution whereby we find, by the side of a recognized paragraph in the daily papers, relative to "Market Odds," sundry notice of legal vengeance on the heads of offenders against the "Betting Laws."

Your Syndics would note thirdly, that a true votary of athletics must be made to pursue his investigations yet further, if the University is to guide him into complete knowledge of the subject of his choice. For to fit him for the great positions of a leader or an instructor of his fellows, must he not of necessity plunge deep into the Moral Sciences: be they of Psychology, Methodology, or Logic. For it would seem to require no superficial acquaintance with Logic to expound the reason why if A beats B, and B beats C it should thence ensue that C should prove victorious over A.

All these varied studies would of necessity force themselves on one whose natural abilities led him to the pursuit of this great science of athletics, besides the more obvious investigation into the natural laws which regulate the development of muscle. But, futhermore, should he have exhausted these domains of thought, there will yet remain an abundance of collateral matter to which his attention might be directed through the medium of alternative papers. How, for instance, could he be led more naturally into the arcana of scientific investigation than by being required to trace the effect of the great principles of evolution and natural selection, whereby the sliding seat eight has been developed from the more cumbersome but safer tub of fifty years ago. What more natural outlet for his spirit of historical research can be found than is afforded by the study of the growth of the institutions to which he is so attached; and by close investigation to the spirit of their constitution?

Whence could he derive a keener insight into the mysteries of Political Economy than he must of necessity gain from his acquaintance with the principles of association or co-operation, which are to him the essential conditions of victory? Is his bent Philological? Can we not satisfy that to the uttermost by leading him to study the principles of comparative grammar in the varied slang of his contemporaries, and to pay strict heed and attention to the language of his coach or his coxswain.

(4.) Your Syndics find in this large field, which an examination in athletics must of necessity cover, a convenient safeguard against that danger of premature 'specialisation' which has been of late brought much before their notice.

(5.) Furthermore they hope that their scheme will help to solve many of the difficulties which have hitherto afflicted the Double Honours' Syndicate.

(6.) At the same time helping to abolish that invidious distinction between the Honour man and the Poll man which is at present so usefully prominent.

(7.) Finally they would suggest that their scheme, if passed, would effect that transformation of the festivities in the month of May, which seems at present so much desired; for would not the Races appear as a part and no unimportant part in the proposed examination?

Further points have passed under the notice of your Syndicate, but they have been unable to arrive at any definite solution of the questions propounded. They are briefly these—

(a) If the successful candidates are to be allowed to proceed to an Arts degree, they foresee that the title "Bachelor of Athletics" would be expressed in abbreviation under the ambiguous form B.A. Perhaps then A.B. (which in another relation suggests the idea of corporeal activity) would be a style more suited to the course of study pursued.

(b) Whether in view of the proposed extension of University examinations, it would be possible to provide a modified form under which arrangements could be made for the admission of ladies to degrees through this channel?

These and other difficulties your Syndics would propose to discuss further, and also to develop more in detail the scheme for examination suggested, should you be pleased to adopt the principle on which they propose to act.

COLLEGE CORRESPONDENCE.

ST. PETER'S.

In chapel on Sunday morning we had an interesting description of mission work in Zulu-land, from the Ven. Archdeacon Mackenzie of Peterhouse, who has spent some years in South Africa.

Our Lawn Tennis Scratch Pairs were played last week, when thirteen pairs entered. In the final heat the two pairs left were J. Eccles and W. Hope v. H. Bott and J. M. Dodds. The former won without much difficulty. Our match with the May Flies has had to be postponed until the Long Vacation.

On Wednesday we played Magdalene, losing by 30 runs. Against Sidney on Saturday we were unable to get an eleven together.

The following have been elected officers for the October term:—Boat Club, Captain, W. O. Parish; Secretary, W. New; Treasurer, H. Bott. Sexcentenary Club, President, H. Bott; Secretary, J. Eccles; Treasurer, E. T. Littlewood.

CLARE.

Last Wednesday, on the occasion of the boat procession, Clare Bridge was crowded with a fair share of the youth and beauty assembled at Cambridge. Our boat was deservedly cheered for the high position it had so well maintained. During the morning the crew were photographed in their ship a little below the bridge.

A general meeting of the Boat Club was held on Saturday, when the following officers were elected for next October term:—President, Rev. W. Raynes; First Captain, W. Keess; Second Captain, S. J. S. Banks; Third Captain, J. R. Wardale; Secretary W. T. Lawson; Committee, J. F. Gaskell, F. Marshall, and W. D. Ridley.

The Clayton light pairs were fixed for 2nd June, and the Roddam sculls, open to freshmen, for 1st June.

Time has not this week permitted of any of our cricket matches being satisfactorily finished. On Friday, May 21st, against a strong team of the Hawks we scored 247. O. Puckridge made 120 in faultless style, and H. J. Ford 30. When the stumps were drawn the Hawks had obtained 60 with one wicket down, R. Miller making 25 not out, and L. T. R. Morgan 27. Our return match with Trinity came off on Wednesday, May 26th, on their ground. Winning the toss, they went in and were disposed of for 234. Our score at the close of the day amounted to 54 for 2 wickets. No large scores were made on either side, except C. Hitchcock's 52 for Trinity.

Want of time alone prevented our gaining an easy victory over Queens', on Friday 28th May. Clare batted first and put together 208 runs (H. J. Ford, 73, J. B. Maule, 43 not out, W. H. Alderson 22, and J. E. Norman 21). Queens' score reached 60 for eight wickets, J. H. Gray 25, and J. Rooker 13 not out, being the principal contributors.

On Saturday the eleven finished a fairly successful season by playing 16 of the boating men. The boats went in first, and in spite of getting on a good beginning caused by H. R. Roberson's setting off at 27 and being backed up by S. J. S. Banks' neatly finished 14, only reached a total of 68. The eleven then started, and pulling well together bumped, rowed past, and reached 227, C. F. Weston's 85 being the feature of the innings. The fielding of the wet-bobs was erratic.

O. G. M. Leeds, who has earned his blue for the 10 mile bicycle race, deserves great credit for his plucky riding against Oxford, while suffering from the serious injuries to his wrists caused by an accident two or three days previously.

A single and double handed lawn tennis tournament has been arranged.

GONVILLE AND CAIUS.

The Caius Musical Society gave their usual May concert on Thursday: its customary success attended it. The Hall was crowded, or rather over-crowded, by a distinguished and appreciative audience, whose physical energies were sustained by the hospitality of the committee. The programme included the "Narcissus of Massenet," the principal feature of which was the excellent rendering of the leading part by Treherne. This was succeeded by the string quartette of Galsworthy, Dewberry, Crichton and Read. After an interval for ices and cooling beverages, Treherne introduced the second part by his song: "The Snow lies white," for which the ex-president of the Musical Society received a hearty encore. The concert was concluded by the Cantata of "Robin Hood," in which Treherne as the Outlaw Chief, C. T. Bayley as the Bishop, J. A. Bratton as Little John, and J. T. Hall as Maid Marian, acquitted themselves nobly, and were well supported by the Chorus in their efforts. The proceedings terminated about 11 o'clock.

CORPUS CHRISTI.

The Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Ely preached in our Chapel on Sunday morning.

Last Wednesday our concert went off with great eclat, owing to the energetic efforts of the Secretary, ably backed up by the rest of the committee.

There is but little news from the river; W. H. Addison rowed over for the Freshmen's Sculls.

At a general Boat Club meeting, held last Friday, the following officers were elected for the ensuing year:—1st Boat Captain, H. W. Everington; 2nd Boat Captain, L. E. Bartlett; Lieutenant, W. B. Pulling; Secretary, E. Smith.

We always considered that the amount of cricket spirit in our College was very small, but we little thought that a team would not be got together to play Trinity last Saturday. However, it was found possible to find eleven men to play the boats that afternoon, the latter suffering a severe defeat.

Another victory was scored against Cavendish last week, disposing of them for 68, we got about 130. Last Wednesday we played a good match against rather a strong team of Crusaders, we only made 81, owing chiefly to the bowling of Gaddum; of these Hough made 35; their total reached 93.

Our cricket campaign is now at a close; out of 14 matches we have won five, lost six, drawn three. H. G. Owen has far and away the best average, having played first rate cricket through the whole season.

KING'S.

The flower show was, as usual, held during heavy showers, and on the afternoon of the boat procession the rain hardly held up. The state of our turf bears witness to the annual invasion of our grass on that afternoon. No cricket or boating has taken place: a match between the boat and an opposing eleven did not come off owing again to the weather.

QUEENS'.

On the 27th we went to Ely to play the King's School. We went first to the wickets, but at the conclusion of our innings the match had to be stopped on account of the weather. Our chief scores were Butler, not out, 15, Bolton 10.

At the terminal meeting of the Athletic Club, J. Rooker was elected President for the ensuing year, A. T. Hodgson, Hon. Sec., and J. Jervis, E. A. Anderson, and A. Higham as committee. The only ordinary meeting of the St. Bernard Society was held on Saturday in Mr. Haynes's rooms.

In the Lawn Tennis Tournament the second round is drawn thus: Andrews and Ellis play Butler and Dummelow; Harper and Ashmall play Higham and Bolton; Haynes and Rowlands play Temperley and Hind.

ST. CATHARINE'S.

Boat Club.—At a meeting held on Monday evening, 31st May, the following officers were elected for next Michaelmas term:—First Captain, A. D. Davies; Second Captain, T. Taylor; Secretary, J. Chisman; Committee, J. Woolcott, E. W. Elliott, J. M. A. Stewart.

We hope that next year a brighter future may open for the club, for the past year has been one of continued disaster.

L.T.C.—On Monday, 31st, the club played a match against Christ's Lawn Tennis Club on the ground of the latter. After some very close setts we were defeated by five setts to two.

The whole college appears to be given over to examinations—the May examination commenced on Monday, and we have a number of candidates for the Pass Examinations. Our scholarship competition is fixed for June 7th.

JESUS.

The Farquharson Challenge Pairs were rowed on Saturday: only three pairs came up to the scratch. The race resulted in a pretty easy victory for M. Hutchinson and Stokes. How the Henley eight is to be constituted is not yet quite known; it is believed, however, that at least six old blues will figure in it.

The close has not been so busy this week as usual. On Tuesday the Hawks, with the aid of a very fast wicket, and through the absence of the chief strength of the Jesus bowling, succeeded in scoring over three centuries for nine wickets. It may have been rather bold to conclude, that the non-appearance of a John's second eleven, at the appointed time last week, was the result of our previous prowess in the cricket line; but when so important a club as that of Trinity College fails to muster an eleven, and breaks a long standing engagement, a melancholy conclusion is forced upon us: that there may be such a thing as too good cricketers. Failing, however, to find a foreign opponent, a college match was got up on Saturday: Jesus v. Rhadegund Club. The latter scored over two hundred before time was up, Lucas, Gurdon and Robinson scoring largely. The College were all out for something over ninety.

In Tennis, on Saturday, we played three representative pairs of the West Middlesex L.T.C., and were victorious by five matches to four. The two Coles, Armstrong and Greaves, Sykes and Stokes represented Jesus. The first pair were very successful, and won all the three matches they played.

CHRIST'S.

The Bump Supper was held in the College Hall on Wednesday, 26th, Rev. J. W. Cartmell, the President, was in the chair.

The Brundit Sculls were rowed on Friday and Saturday. In the first heat Holman beat Pope and Earl beat Polwhele. In the final Holman beat Earl by about 95 yards. The Phillipps pairs have been postponed.

The Eleven went down to Bedford to play the Grammar School. Christ's were victorious by nine runs, scoring 154, Cooper 72 and McMillan 31 to the School 145.

The Lawn Tennis Club have been more successful in their last two matches, winning 6 setts out of 8 against Downing, and 5 setts to 2 against St. Catharine's.

The Concert was held in the College Hall on Friday, the 28th. The Committee are to be congratulated on the taste with which all the arrangements were carried out, especially in the floral decorations. The programme included Gade's "Erl King's Daughter," which was much admired, and Cooke's glee "Hohenlinden." Our thanks are especially due to Mrs. Stanford and Miss Egerton, for the considerable share they had in making this one of the pleasantest and most successful that the Society have given. The following was the programme:—

PART I.

The Erl King's Daughter ... ... Niels W. Gade

PART II.

Glee ... ... "Hohenlinden" ... ... T. Cooke
Song ... ... "Minnelied" ... ... Brahms
Mrs. C. V. Stanford.
Aria from Tannhauser ... ... Wagner
Mr. A. S. Pereira.
Violin Solo ... ... Mendelssohn
Herr Gompertz.
Song ... ...
Miss Egerton.
Song ... ... "Terence's Farewell" ... ... Patourel
Mr. R. Whinnerey.
Part Song ... ... "Take Care" ... ... Bartholomew
God save the Queen.

ST. JOHN'S.

Our Lawn Tennis Party last Wednesday was very successful. The weather, though rather heavy, was otherwise pleasant, and we were fortunate enough to escape the rain which spoilt Thursday's festivities in other places.

The Annual College Examination commenced on Monday, and is rather an unpleasant reminder that the May term has its duties as well as its privileges.

We are glad to notice that some of the Browne Medals return to the college this year, and that they are accompanied by a share in the Porson Prize.

TRINITY.

The M. and S. met on Friday, May 28th, at 10 p.m. J. F. P. Rawlinson proposed: "That this House disapproves of the extension of the franchise to women." W. H. Dickinson opposed the motion. The result of the voting was:—Ayes 11; Noes 7. Thus the House entirely reversed a recent decision of its own, no doubt in consequence of the absence of the warmest supporters of woman at the Masonic Ball.

The Mayflies have played and won their last match of the season. On Wednesday last C. H. G. Wright and H. McLean, C. P. Harvey and H. R. Foster, J. C. St. Quentin and R. A. Pelly represented the club v. Caius L.T.C. Two pairs of the Mayflies beat their opponents. Matches had also been arranged with Jesus L.T.C. and Peterhouse L.T.C.: but owing to the weather and other unforseen causes they are put off. The Mayflies have been singularly fortunate this year, for they have not lost a single match.

EMMANUEL.

The following men were photographed as constituting the first eleven: C. H. Allcock, W. B. Allcock, R. P. Brownrigg, W. Shipton, E. Cotton, (Captain), C. B. Walters, H. Piggott, J. C. Woodhouse, A. Hewetson, H. V. Machin, and W. V. Machin.

At a meeting of the Debating Society, Mr. W. N. Shaw was elected President for next term; A. W. Gundry, Vice-President, and J. E. Potts, Secretary.

The Burton Challenge Cup for pair oars was rowed on Saturday. There were two entries—W. Thornton, (bow), E. S. Whelpton, (stroke), and H. Jukes, (bow), H. T. Bulstrode, (stroke). The former, steering a much better course than their opponents, won by ten yards.

SIDNEY.

At a meeting of the Boat Club on Monday night the following were elected officers for the next term:—President, Rev. J. F. Hardy, B.D.; First Captain, C. C. Nalers; Second Captain, H. C. Robson; Secretary, W. J. Harding. An enthusiastic vote of thanks to the President was carried, and also to Mr. S. Phelps, M.A., for his untiring energy in coaching the boat this term. The Carpenter Sculls were fixed for Monday next, June 4th.

We were to have played a Cricket match against Peterhouse, on Saturday, but at the last moment the Peterhouse captain sent up to say that he could not bring a team owing to the nearness of the College Mays. Our eleven have not had much opportunity of testing their strength this term, owing to five of them being in the boat: they were successful, however, against Cavendish and Magdalene, but were overmatched by Corpus, when playing without their rowing members.

The College Examinations begin on Thursday and last four days; they are held conjointly with those at Christ's and Emmanuel.

DOWNING.

D.C.L.T.C.—On Friday we played against Christ's, on their ground, but did not come off victorious. Some of our best men were not available, nor did our representatives all of them exhibit their best form.

On Saturday the Attwood and Buckmaster Cup, for pairs, was competed for. C. Alison was the winner. The competition was hot and the play very good. The same afternoon the fours began, the result being that J. E. Viney and W. E. Beaumont were left in against W. H. C. Gatty and N. C. Hardcastle. The final games, 3 setts of 7 games, will probably come off to-day.

NON-COLLEGIATE.

CAVENDISH.—Last Thursday evening was given up by our Debating Society to readings and recitations. Next Thursday, the House is to be asked to "express once more its approval of Conservative principles."

On the 26th ult. our cricket team played the Leys School on their ground, and beat them by 30, on the first innings (78, 48). Our best scores were Bradnack 22 and Chapman 16. On the 28th we played Corpus, and were defeated by 127 to 69. For them Brown made 32 and Owen 27, while Hill's 14 (including three four's) was the highest score on our side.

The first two rounds of our Lawn Tennis ties have been played off, and the finals will be played this week.

UNIVERSITY INTELLIGENCE.

The Rev. J. T. LANG, M.A., of Corpus Christi College, has been appointed Lady Margaret's Preacher for the year ensuing.

THE COUNCIL OF THE SENATE are of opinion that it is desirable that steps should be taken to secure the better observance of the Edicts respecting Boating on the river above Newnham (Ordinationes, pp. 147, 148), and that the declaration of ability to swim should be made more definite. They therefore recommend (1) That the two Edicts on the subject of Boating be amended by adding in each case after the words "able to swim," "at least a hundred yards." (2) That it be the duty of the Proctors to inspect from time to time the books containing the declarations mentioned in the Edicts, and to see that they are regularly kept. The Vice-Chancellor invites the attendance of Members of the Senate in the Arts School on Friday, June 4th, at 2.30 p.m., for the discussion of the above Report.

OXFORD v. CAMBRIDGE.

A large number of spectators witnessed the Inter-University Bicycle Races on Wednesday. The path was in good order and there was no wind. Cambridge won two events out of three, and but for an accident to Mayor's machine in the ten miles race, this might have resulted in another Cambridge victory.

Two Miles.—C. A. E. Pollock, Cambridge, 1; G. D. Day, Cambridge,† W. L. Ainslie, Oxford,† L. A. Wynne, Oxford, 0. Ainslie on the inside had the best start, Day running second and Pollock third. In the second lap Wynne rushed to the front, but before it was completed, Day, followed by Pollock, went by him. In the third lap Pollock took the lead and the order at the end of the first mile (time 3 mins.) was Pollock, Day, Ainslie, and Wynne: the last now began to drop behind and the pace became faster. Ainslie passed Day and rode beside Pollock for more than a lap, not getting by him till the middle of the last lap but one. In the last lap a great race took place; Pollock rode up level with Ainslie and slowly drew in front, until 100 yards from the end he was able to take the inside, winning by about a yard and a half. Meanwhile Day had caught Ainslie, and a neck and neck race resulted for second place, the judges giving it as a dead heat. Time 5 mins. 56 secs.

Ten Miles.—W. L. Ainslie, Oxford, 1; F. F. Tower, Cambridge, 2; F. G. Mayor, Cambridge, 3; M. H. Jephson, Oxford, 0; O. G. M. Leeds, Cambridge, 0; E. K. R. Reynolds, Oxford, 0. After various changes in the order Tower took the lead in the fourth lap and though others went in front for a few laps at a time, he made the pace for the greater part of the distance. After three miles, Reynolds, who was some way behind, retired. Leeds was suffering from the results of a fall on the preceding Saturday, and after six miles was unable to keep up with the other four, who were still riding in close company. At seven miles Ainslie led, Tower being second and Mayor third, and this order continued for two miles, Jephson being now left behind. In the last mile Tower spurted ahead, but was repassed by Ainslie, and though Tower succeeded in getting level again, in the last lap the Oxonian managed to get away again, and won by two yards. A spoke in Mayor's front wheel broke three laps from the end so that he could do no more than ride on at an easy rate for third place; this he just obtained, coming in ten yards ahead of Jehhson and a lap in front of Leeds. Time 31 mins. 42⅗ secs.

Twenty-five Miles.—G. B. Day, Cambridge, 1: D. J. G. Bailey, Cambridge, 2; D. R. Smith, Oxford, 3; H. Nicholls, Cambridge, 0; W. K. Adam, Oxford, 0; E. H. L. Reeve, Oxford, 0. The Cambridge men made the pace throughout, Nicholls however dropping behind after three miles; Reeve was left astern from the beginning, and was lapped in four miles, when he retired. The race was now in the hands of Day, Bailey, and Smith, the last-named waiting on the two others, who led alternately. After six miles they succeeded in shaking off the Oxford man, and riding together at a great pace steadily increased their lead till in the last lap of the 12th mile they had gained a complete lap on Smith, who in turn was a lap ahead of Nicholls, who was the same distance ahead of Adam. The time for the half distance was 40 min. 22 sec. Day and Bailey made no efforts to increase their lead, and all five rode round together till the last mile. Day and Bailey then raced for first place, the former winning by a yard. Smith was a lap and 100 yards behind, Nicholls more than two laps and Adam more than three laps in the rear. Time, 1 hour 22 min. 20 3-5th sec.

The results of previous Inter-University Bicycle races have been as follows:—

1874 Cambridge won. Road race, 80 miles.
1875 Cambridge won. Road race, 50 miles.
1876 Oxford won. 50 miles.
1877 Cambridge won 2 and 10 miles. Oxford won 25 miles.
1878 Oxford won 2, 10 and 25 miles.
1879 Oxford won 2, 10 and 25 miles.

Cambridge has thus won 4 times and Oxford 3.

AMATEUR v. PROFESSIONAL RACES.

John Keen was unable to compete on account of illness, so that F. Cooper was the only professional representative.

The amateur Hon. Ion Keith-Falconer was on this occasion beaten in both races (1 and 10 miles) but in each case the professional had to beat the previous record time to win.

The one mile race was ridden on Wednesday, after the two mile Inter-University race. Falconer led till 200 yards from the finish when Cooper shot in front with a fine spurt and won by 5 yards. Time, 2 min. 46 2-5th sec. This is one second better than the previous record.

The ten mile race took place on Friday. As the object of the race was not merely to test the relative speed of the amateur and professional, but to accomplish if possible a very fast time, with the consent of the competitors, H. L. Cortis (Wanderers B.C.) made the pace for them a great part of the distance, C. A. E. Pollock (C.U.Bi.C.) relieving him for a couple of miles. Falconer went ahead at the start and rode the first mile in 2 min. 58 sec. Cortis then made the pace with Falconer and Cooper following close together. About the 5th mile there was a slight shower. It was now evident that record would be beaten from six to 10 miles. Falconer finished six miles in 18 min. 4 sec. and seven miles in 21 min. 7 sec. After going half a mile more he had to give up, being attacked by a bad stitch. Cooper gamely kept on, and Cortis who had been resting, took him along for the last mile and a half; his time for eight miles was 24 min. 7 sec.; for nine miles, 27 min. 12 sec., and for 10 miles 30 min. 6 4-5th sec. The previous fastest on record was 30 min. 45 sec.

MATCH WITH LONDON BICYCLE CLUB.

One Mile.—First Heat; W. Wyndham, London, 1; C. A. E. Pollock, Cambridge, 0. Time, 2 min. 59⅘ secs. Second Heat: G. D. Day, Cambridge, 1; A. Herbert, London, 0. Time, 3 min. 7⅘ secs. Third Heat: O. P. Fisher, Cambridge, 1, J. Scott, London, 0. Time, 3 min. 4 sec. Cambridge won the event by two heats to one.

Four Miles.—W. T. Thorn, London, 1; C. A. E. Pollock, Cambridge, 2; F. G. Mayor, Cambridge, 3; A. Herbert, London, 4; O. P. Fisher, Cambridge, 5; O. Thorn, London, 6. Time, 12 min. 32 sec. It had been arranged that this and the 15 miles races should be decided on the following system: the winner scores six, the second man five, the third four and so on: the marks of the representatives of each club are then added together and the club scoring most marks wins. Cambridge thus won this event by 11 marks to 10.

Fifteen Miles Race.—D. J. S. Bailey, Cambridge, 1; W. T. Thorn, London, †2; G. D. Day, Cambridge, †2; W. Wyndham, London, 4; F. F. Tower, Cambridge, 5; A. D. Butler, London, 0 Butler was left behind in the first lap and retired after 11 miles when more than a mile behind. The others kept close together throughout. For the greater part of the distance the Cambridge men, Tower especially, cut out the pace. After 10 miles records began to be beaten. Day scored a record for 11 miles, 34 min. 19 sec., and another for 13 miles, 40 min. 33 sec., while Tower led at 12 miles, 37 min. 24 sec., and at 14 miles, 43 min. 40 sec. In the first lap of the last mile Thorn followed by Wyndham rushed to the front, the latter, however soon assuming the lead, Thorn being second, Day third, Bailey fourth, Tower fifth, all close up. This continued till the last lap when Day and Bailey challenged the London men and with a fine spurt Bailey ran in a winner by two yards, Day and Thorn making a dead heat for second place. The full time was 46 min. 34¼ sec., the previous record being 47 min. 47 sec. The last mile was run in 2 min. 54½ sec. and the time for the last lap was 38¼ sec. Bailey's lap was however about a second faster, as he was quite 10 yards behind the leader at the beginning of the lap. Cambridge thus won all three events.

ASSAULT OF ARMS.

Under the patronage of the Vice-Chancellor, the commanding officers of the C.U.R.V., and the most important athletic clubs of the University, Mr. Galpin's annual Assault of Arms took place on Saturday evening, the 29th inst. The attendance was fairly good, and applause was often deservedly elicited, at the results arrived at by the talented performers, among whom were representatives of Messrs. Angelo's time-honoured establishment in St James's, Mr. Galpin and his assistant Mr. Molt, and several members of the University. The boxing of Mr. Rolt (an old pupil of the Cambridge School of Arms), the fencing of Mr. Mac Turk, the sabre-play of Mr. Molt and M. de Castel (whom we fancy we recognise as an ex-officer of the C.U.R.V., under a slightly different name), the gymnastics of Messrs. Molt, Perks, and Clark all call for special praise and notice. It would be desirable that the use of the weapons they wield, were more fully learned and understood than they at present are, by many officers of Her Majesty's army and reserve forces, of whom so few follow the examples of those in many European armies, of attending the instruction course of a Maître d'armes. Perhaps the most perfectly executed, and generally admired performance, was that of Mr. Galpin himself, with the Indian clubs, which heavy objects he manipulated with an astounding ease and diverting dexterity, causing one almost to forget that their weight was 11lb each.

The performers were cheered and stimulated by a series and well sustained waltz melodies, from the skilful fingers of Mr. T. Silver. It is to be regretted that Mr. Henderson was unable to be present, and shew his skill in the use of the sword.

THE LOAN EXHIBITION OF PICTURES AT THE CORN EXCHANGE.

A representative collection of Pictures belonging to junior members of the University formed a new feature among the events of the May week. It took place in the small room at the Corn Exchange. The number of pictures brought together was about 250. Amongst these, of course, the larger part were of comparatively small interest. The class of water colours struck us as perhaps the best, including as it did two landscapes by Cotman, a "View of the Thames in a fog at early morning," by Arthur Severn, and the "Lake of Thun," by Elijah Walton. A small Coast-scene by some unnamed artist was very striking for the extraordinarily soft gradation of the colours, and deep atmospheric effect. The oil-paintings were not very remarkable for beauty; but they included a few interesting works, belonging for the most part to Mr. Bayley, of Caius. Amongst these we may mention a "Drinking Scene" by Hogarth, a "Dancing Scene" by Watteau, and a "Group of Boers" by A. van Ostade. An unfinished painting of a "Fen Girl," by Mr. J. Batten, of Trinity, and a study of a Kingfisher by the Hon. R. Carew were deserving of all praise.

The class of mezzotints was grouped upon a screen, and includes a strikingly large portrait of Fox, and a pretty one of Lady Hamilton, after Romney's picture of her; these, with two plates from the Liber Studiorum, and two Constable's formed one of the most pleasing parts of the collection. The etchings of course were numerous, and no doubt it would not have been difficult to have brought together a much larger number; on the whole they were fair impressions from interesting plates, but do not call for special remark.

The line engravings for the most part were bad. They consisted of the monotonously dull interpretations of pictures on a large scale, which used to be so much the rage. An exception must, however, be made in favour of a fair impression from a splendid plate by Gaillard, after the well-known Madonna with the Child and St. John by Botticelli in the Louvre.

There were a considerable number of drawings 'by the Old Masters.' 'Raphael's design for the ends of the Parnassus fresco,' we are sorry to say, was the work of a poor beginner of the 17th or 18th century, copying from the fresco itself. Another Raphael drawing was by the same or a similar hand. 'The sacrifice of Elijah' was real work of the school of Rembrandt, and a very few others were as old as they professed to be; but we are surprised that those who are responsible for the naming could allow such manifest forgeries to be ticketed* as they were.

Lastly, there was a large and interesting collection of photographs, mostly from paintings and drawings of the present day. A certain number of old sporting pictures, and a few others chosen apparently to show what some men will tolerate on their walls, completed the collection. On the whole it certainly showed that the taste of the undergraduate is not so bad as is generally supposed. It is clearly, however, capable of elevation, and we consider exhibitions of this kind one of the best means of aiming at that result. The venture, we understand, was financially a success.

OXFORD LETTER.

The election for the Union Presidentship took place on Saturday, and resulted in the victory of the Hon. G. N. Curzon, of Balliol, by a majority of 145. Mr. Curzon opened the debate which lasted us three Thursdays, and has often distinguished himself as a Conservative speaker. We are to have a show debate next Thursday, in which several distinguished members of the society will appear, presumably for the last time; the subject, as usual, being political, the errors of the present government. Our attention does not, as at Cambridge, stray from affairs of state to the claims of the softer sex or breach of promise laws; possibly because it is easier to get up one subject than two. Whatever the reason is we are most faithful to politics.

Talking of politics the petition is reported to be sent in: if it is carried, I suppose, we shall have another detachment of Birmingham police. They will probably, however, keep clear of Hertford men.

Commemoration-time is rapidly approaching. The usual events will happen, except that Exeter have put off their concert, owing to a sad accident, and New College is going to give a ball on June 4th. The Agamemnon is to be acted on the 3rd, in Balliol Hall. A rival performance of "Ici on parle Français" is advertised for Tuesday. It is hard to tell whether the Balliol or the Christ Church performance will be most successful. For the first, rehearsals are constantly going on. The Organist of Magdalen has written music for the chorus. Robert Browning and Lord Carnarvon are going to honour the performance with their presence, it is rumoured: which will make it very hard to choose which translation will be used. Mr. Richmond is designing the tableaux. For the credit of Athletics we hope it will be a success.

The Newdigate has been won by Mr. Rodd, of Balliol. The subject was Sir Walter Raleigh, who inspired 23 competitors, one of whom, it is said, assured the examiners that he would cut his throat if he did not get it "this time." He is, however, still alive. The Latin Prose has been won by Mr. Upcott, of Balliol, who rowed in the Balliol eight when it was head: The Latin Verse by Mr. Fausset, of the same College.

Magdalen will be unable to celebrate their victory with a ball. Jupiter non vult.

The Trinity dinner, for which Cardinal Newman came down to Oxford, went off very successfully. Professor Bryce proposed the Cardinal's health, and succeeded wonderfully well in offending nobody. The meeting was a curious one in many ways. One speaker, making a geological simile, said he saw round him many Academical strata: in some ideas and histories altogether antiquated, the records of Palæozoic times: in others modern organisms dimly emerging, while others again, though richly fossiliferous, contained many specimens of extremely late life; the older, he might have proceeded, shewing traces of fire: the latter of water. How times have changed since "loss and gain," and that happy period when one greeted one's acquaintances with gibes about the Donatists, or questions on Antinomian doubts.

Mr. Hatch preached again to-day. I saw among the audience the Master of Balliol, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Mr. Matthew Arnold. M. Renan was taken to hear Mr. Hatch, and said on leaving the Church, that he might have exchanged discourses with the distinguished clergyman and no one would find it out. Whether he meant a high literary compliment or an aspersion on his orthodoxy, we cannot tell. The Archbishop preached in Balliol Chapel in the afternoon, Mr. Matthew Arnold being again among the audience.

Neither the Pairs nor the Sculls produced many entries, there being but three for the former event, while there were five for the latter. In the first heat of the Sculls, Poole, (B.N.C.) beat Coleridge (Trinity) very easily. Second heat, Adam (Christ Church) beat Brown (Hertford). Soon after the start Brown had an accident to his swivel rowlock, which obliged him to stop for some time and to unship his scull. This enabled Adam, who had the second station to get right up to him, and though Brown then rowed away well, of course his case was hopeless. Chesshire of Worcester drew the bye. In the second round, Poole drew the bye and Chesshire with first station beat Adam by about three lengths. In the final heat, Chesshire (first station) beat Poole by about the same as he beat Adam.

In the first heat of the Pairs, Staniland of Magdalen, and West of Christ Church, with first station, beat Disney and Brown of Hertford, by two lengths. In the final heat, after a capital race all the way, Staniland and West beat Chesshire and Heywood of Worcester by not more than a length. The winners are both Eton freshmen and rowed in the Eton eight at Henley last year, while West stroked the 'Varsity last term. The pair had rowed together for two years at Eton, and rowed well together.

The Exeter Eight, as yet, seem hardly to go as well as they did in the May Races, and there seems to be some difficulty about re-arranging the places satisfactorily. Kindersley has been rowing five instead of seven, an arrangement which does not seem advantageous to the boat.

The Cricket match against M.C.C. had a strange termination: the first day was so wet that play was impossible, but starting the next day on rather a soft ground they managed to finish the match before evening, M.C.C. winning by one wicket. In the first innings the 'Varsity made the small score of 53, but the M.C.C. could not boast much as they made but 89, of which Lord Harris made 15, Mr. Evetts 17, Mr. Heath 22. In the second innings the 'Varsity made 75, of which Morton made 30, Hare 13 not out. With but 39 to make M.C.C. went in, but their wickets fell with surprising swiftness, and they just managed to make 41 with but one wicket to fall; their highest scorer was Shaw, who made 16 not out.

We have received the new number of the Journal of Philology. The most important item in its contents would appear to be a dissertation of fifty pages by Mr. A. W. Verrall, "on a chorus of the Choëphoræ." Further we have a second instalment of Mr. W. G. Clark's notes on Aristophanes, 'Æneas' wanderings" by Prof. Nettleship, "Animal worship" by Prof. Robertson Smith, "Propertiana" and the "Myth of the Sirens" by Mr. J. P. Postgate, "Valerius Flaccus" by Mr. R. Ellis, "Agnatic guardianship" by Mr. P. M. Lawrence, &c.

* We understand that the committee desired it to known that the exhibitors were in every case responsible for the naming of their pictures.—ED. Review.

THE CRITICS BALL.

Owing to the disinterested efforts of a few Trinity gentlemen, many of the visitors to Cambridge were enabled to spend at the Guildhall, on Tuesday, May 25th, one of the pleasantest evenings of the May week. The "Critics," a Trinity Club, decided to give a Ball upon that day, and the energy and boldness of these gentlemen in carrying out their undertaking was only equalled by the success which met their efforts. The number being necessarily limited, it was in vain many sought for the coveted ticket, and it speaks volumes for the dance-loving propensities of our fair visitors that, despite the usual attractions of the Masonic and Trinity Balls, this newly-created festivity met with the success which it undoubtedly deserved.

As at most of the Cambridge Balls, the music was of the very best, and amply made up for what might have been considered in some circles not quite an unexceptionable floor. The room was most tastefully decorated, and no pains can have been spared to set off a room which is, we fear, best known to many of our readers as a place of torment frequented by ogres in the shape of examiners for the Little-go or General.

The programme, as carried out, was remarkable for the small number of square dances; and as the number of invitations was limited, the number of chaperons was also curtailed.

The following gentlemen acted as the committee:—

Mr. R. G. M. Dill, | W. A. Forbes,
Mr. F. Feeney, | W. G. Devonshire, (Hon. Sec.)

FIRST TRINITY BALL.

The Trinity Ball was held on Wednesday last, under the management of the following Stewards:—

Prof. T. Mc. K. Hughes | Mr. R. D. Davis
Mr. J. Prior | Mr. J. H. L. White
Mr. E. J. Mortlock | Mr. B. S. Biram
Mr. J. M. Image | Mr. M. Wills
Mr. G. H. Rendall | Mr. G. P. Trevelyan
Mr. R. C. Lehmann | Mr. R. D. Guiness
Mr. A. H. S. Bird

Mr. A. Nimmo,
Hon. Sec. Ball Committee.

The decorations were particularly good; and although there had hardly been enough time to properly prepare the room; yet the floor was in very fair order. One drawback at the first ball was, and must always be, the quantity of dust which accumulates between the boards. This has to be danced out before the floor is really in a good order. The boat flags of the various Colleges were as usual hung round the room; and the oars which were placed about here and there gave a distinctly boating air to the ball. On the whole the ball was a decided success; and the only fault was the fact that there was not room for the many who sought admission in vain. The success of the Trinity boats on the river seemed to communicate itself to the ball, and all there seemed to think that it compared very favourably with those of past years.

THE MASONIC BALL.

Although the Masonic Ball is always the last piece of gaiety in the May week, yet it is generally the most "run upon." An entire week before it actually took place, the usual notice was exhibited at the Honorary Secretary's residence in Trumpington Street, to the effect that all the tickets were disposed of. Many people who had come up on purpose to go this ball were unable to get tickets, and had the room been larger a hundred and fifty more applicants might have been satisfied. So great was the rush that, had there been time, it was contemplated to utilize the Corn Exchange.

The large room in the Guildhall will not hold more than four hundred with comfort; and this year the number of persons admitted was four hundred and fifty. We were glad to notice the presence of several brethren from the sister lodges at Oxford; and we hope that they may prove avant couriers of others in succeeding years.

Mr. Gilbert Ainslie was, as usual, the Hon. Sec.; and thanks to his untiring exertions, the music, floor, and decorations were all that could be wished. A new feature in the shape of a large illuminated square and compasses was introduced this year, at the suggestion, we hear, of one of the fair sex. The usual banks of flowers and blocks of ice formed an effective background to the orchestra; while, as in former years, a cascade of water, delightfully suggestive of coolness, filled up the pauses between the dances.

The programme contained five squares dances, enabling the Masons to appear in varied attire, and perform the usual ceremonies with their swords. The remainder of the twenty-four dances consisted of a couple of Polkas, a novelty in the shape of a Highland Schottische, and the rest valses. The dancing was kept up till after four o'clock. Amongst those present we noticed Bro. Rev. C. J. Martyn, well known at Grand Lodge meetings, and many others who wore the broad purple. Among the ladies the honours were perhaps divided between a well-known local beauty, a fair visitor from Bury, and a young lady in light blue. The arrangements were carried out by the following stewards:—

PROBLEM V.

Solution:—

Trick 1, 2 and 3. A leads Ace King and Queen of Hearts.
4. A leads 4 of Hearts; B plays 3 of Spades.
Z plays 10 of Spades.
5. A leads a Diamond; Z wins with King.
6. Z leads Ace of Diamonds.
7. Z leads King of Spades; B passes.
8. Z leads 3 of Spades; B plays Ace.
9. B leads a Spade; Z wins with Knave.
10. Z plays Queen of Spades.
11. Z plays King of Clubs; B plays 8.
12-13. B makes Ace and Knave of Clubs.

N.B.—If at trick 4 Z had discarded a Club, A would then have lead a Club, and B ultimately would make his Ace and Knave of Clubs. At tricks 7 and 8, B plays his Ace, when Z leads the 3 of Spades, to prevent Y getting the lead.

CRITICISM.

It has been said of us who live in this nineteenth century that we have utterly and entirely lost all capacity for enthusiasm, all power of feeling genuine admiration, that, in a word, we are nothing if not critical. But though we may plead guilty to the general charge, and admit that the tendency of the age is towards destruction rather than construction, though we may complacently assure ourselves that "unreasoning hero worship" is not one of the prevalent vices of the present day,—still there is one person for whom all unite in feeling an unbounded admiration. We receive his most trivial utterances with profound respect, accept his views with enthusiastic eagerness, instantly abandon any pet theories of our own that clash with his, and indeed bow the head in unquestioning awe before him, and him alone. The only person untouched by criticism is the critic himself.

It would be almost comic, were it not matter for graver feelings than laughter, to see how men of infinitely superior intellectual calibre to the critic blindly accept his views even on subjects of which they are better qualified to judge than he. Perhaps the reason for this is to be found in the stress and hurry of modern life, combined with the raising of the standard of knowledge required by "society." Everyone is expected to be able to talk about the last book published, while very few have a spare hour in which to read it; the natural result is that people have recourse to reviews, and, having no time for further thought, accept and adopt the critic's theories.

But all the more important is the question, who is to be the critic? We cannot alter the conditions of modern life; it is alike impossible to revert to the infinite leisure of our forefathers, and to induce society to accept from its members less than it now requires—a thin varnish of omniscience. These facts must be recognised, and we have only to turn our attention to that for which the remedy lies in our own hands. Grant that the reading of reviews instead of their subjects is a necessary evil, the problem remains: in what way can we reduce the evil to a minimum? One solution, and one only, is possible. We must insist on the fitness for his task of the writer of the review, in other words we must criticise the critic.

It has long been an accepted axiom that the poet is born, not made. But it is generally assumed that such is not the case with the critic. It is thought that however incapable a man may be of constructing and creating, he is perfectly competent to destroy and dissect the productions of others. But surely this shows a misconception of the function of a critic. What we want is not that criticism from the outside which, almost always depreciatory, leaves on our minds so strong an impression of the cleverness of the critic that we overlook what ought to have been the most prominent thing, the failures of the author. What we need is criticism from the inside, the criticism of a man who, while penetrating into the very heart of the author, never loses sight of his own personality, who, while able by his intense sympathy to see the other's point of view, yet maintains his own, and so brings us into contact with the author without allowing us to forget the medium.

The difference between these two sorts of criticism is like that between the illumination of a semi-transparent object—a figured glass vase, for instance—from within and from without. In the one case, although the modelling of the surface of that part where the light falls is distinctly shown, not only are some parts left in darkness, so that we fail to grasp the general effect, but shadows are cast which obscure our view even of the details, and lead to actually false conceptions. In the other case, a clear soft light shines through the vase, enabling us to distinguish the proportions of the whole, the harmony of parts, the colouring of the surface, while at the same time bringing out any flaw there may be in the material, or fault in the workmanship.

The critic should always bear in mind that he is criticising, that his function is to interpret and expound, not to originate. The faults there are in the object of his criticism, his eye should be the quickest to see, his lips the readiest to deplore. We ought always to feel that he is nearer to the author than we are, but yet never fail to recognise that author and critic are two. The enthusiastic rhapsodies of indiscriminating admirers are just as far removed from the true spirit of criticism as is the groundless carping of detractors.

If the difficulty of good criticism were generally recognised, and the uselessness and even harm of any but the best once admitted, we should be rid of that class of small critics who go about seeking whom they can devour, and are ready to fasten on the weak points on the surface of any work they come across, without considering for a moment what is the deeper meaning of the book, or the object of the writer. But great as would be the relief could we clear the world of literature once for all of these criticasters, if we may so call them, there is another class of persons who do far greater harm than they,—the men of high powers, it may be, and great literary skill, who, by way of text for their own writing, undertake to criticise another whose point of view they cannot or will not see. These are doing a great injustice to their author, and an infinite injury to the world, for we have not so many beauties that we can afford to have those we do possess obscured, nor so many heroes that we can afford to lose one through another's misrepresentation.

Many instances of this kind of criticism will occur readily to everyone: perhaps of all authors he who has suffered most at the hands of able and well-meaning, but unsympathetic critics, is Plato, who acting as the whetstone of men's wits from time immemorial, has been used by most of his later critics as a mere peg on which to hang their own theories, while there is hardly one who does not quarrel with him for his ignorance of those "universally accepted truths,"—the laws of gravitation and political economy. The habit of his commentators of fathering their own theories on Shakespeare has passed into a by-word, while of modern writers few have been worse treated than Mr. Robert Browning, and perhaps of none but him can it be safely affirmed that his critics have rarely even attempted to look at his poems from his own point of view.

To these glorious names may be added that of one of the greatest of living writers, M. Victor Hugo, who has, if possible, fared even more cruelly than they. With the exception of one or two—notably of him who acknowledges as "chief of us and lord," the poet, "nursed in airs apart,"—does not every reviewer insist on applying the British standard of perfection to M. Hugo, French of the French as he is, and on branding as exaggeration or verbosity what is in truth merely unfamiliar and foreign?

It is only when we find that the list of the worst sufferers from this spurious criticism includes some of the grandest names of literature that we realise what an immense power for good or ill the critic wields. And seeing this, and recognising that the moral and intellectual qualities required for a true critic are of no mean kind, we should strive to raise our standard of requirements in a critic so high as to prevent every young aspirant to fame from rushing into the ranks of reviewers. In this way there is a hope that we may in some measure check the abuse of a faculty which, when used aright, is the very mainspring of all regulated and lasting enthusiasm.

THINKING AND DOING.

It is told of Sir Walter Scott that he never estimated any amount of literary capacity as at all worthy to be compared with the power displayed by the great masters of practical life. To write things worthy to be read did not in his eyes confer a glory anything like equal to that of doing things worthy to be written. A discussion on the relative value of great books and great deeds, both being so indispensable to the world's progress, would not bring one probably to any definite result, but the relations between thinking and doing in the same person are worth a little consideration.

Does not Sir Walter's opinion, already quoted, indicate that there was in his time a broad line between the active and the contemplative life, and is not that line now-a-days sharply defined? Excluding first of all those thinkers whose mental energies are specially directed towards the attaining and investigating of abstract knowledge which has little relation to active life, let us take as our examples those whose intellectual work is specially intended to produce direct effects on mankind, the poets and writers of pure literature. Let us explain further in regard to active life that we do not mean particularly such forms of activity as are intended to produce effects on men's outward condition, such as politics, but in the case of each man that pursuit which he would have followed supposing him to be endowed with no exceptional gifts of mind.

A broad line did, surely, exist in Sir Walter's Scott's time. That writer did not himself furnish an instance of it, for at the same time as he was engaged on his masterpieces he was diligently following a professional career and filling two legal posts which would, with other men, have been an excuse for avoiding all other work whatever. But look at some of his brilliant contemporaries: Coleridge, whose delight was to dream away the day in his arm-chair; Southey, whose time was so carefully portioned out into periods for reading and writing about men that there was no interval left in which he might himself observe them; Byron, with his genius so often sunk in sloth or grievously misdirected; Wordsworth, hardly happy but when alone; Shelley, occupying his spare hours as his wife said "in just running about the garden." Nor are these all the instances that might be cited. The lesser men only like Rogers seem to have had souls that would condescend to the ordinary prose of existence. And can there be any doubt that the work of these men suffered from their indifference to every-day duty? The Duke of Wellington's criticism on Southey's History of the Peninsular War was: "Mr. Southey, sir, may be a very clever man, but he has not understood the object of one of my campaigns, nor the object of one of my battles," whilst competent critics of his poetry declare it to be already half forgotten. Byron's Poems would have been less full of himself had he exerted his mind more in the ordinary work of his station, and the compulsory work of a profession might have braced Coleridge to more continuous literary effort. The same phenomenon seems apparent also in our own age. Does not our Laureate shun general society, and is not the writer of Sartor a recluse? Charlotte Brontë lived out her life in the depths of the country, and Thackeray's only practical work consisted in the delivery of a course of lectures. Neither can Disraeli, Kingsley, nor the Lyttons be fairly quoted on the other side; the writings of the first are political pamphlets; those of the second are directed, most of them, against social abuses; the two last have endeavoured, indeed, to combine statesmanship and literature, but will the novels of the father or the Vice-royalty of the son be less regarded fifty years hence? Grote alone, since the time of the Great Enchanter, bent his energies to fulfilling the calls of both genius and every day life, and neither his History nor his parliamentary career suffered from the double effort. It is necessary, of course, to look from the side of the writers, because imagination, when it possesses a man, must have a firmer hold over him than any other quality; but what we are contending for is that the possession of this does not exempt men from taking their share in practical life, and moreover that did they so take their share the result would be one not of detriment, but of gain to their higher gifts. It is of no use to assert that the division is a natural one, for our own literary history belies such a view. Chaucer was an able and successful diplomatist; Spenser was employed in political work, and Shakespeare was at least outwardly a man of the world. The careers of Clarendon and Raleigh are known to everybody, nor were Milton, Dryden, Addison, or Steele solely occupied in hidden contemplations. Greek History also supplies us with Æschylus and Sophocles, and if anyone be still inclined to cavil, let him think a moment on the splendid succession of statesmen poets that the Hebrew race produced from Moses to Daniel.

If then there is no necessary dissociation between the two forms of activity what are the causes which have produced a separation between them in our own times? May not one of them be the modern notion of division of labour misapplied?

No one certainly doubts the efficacy of specialization in industrial undertakings; success in many professions depends entirely on it, and a certain amount is required for successful practice of the art of government. But there is a limit to the application of every theory, and the notion that a writer's energies would be dissipated if allowed to seek other pursuits than literature seems to us a fallacy. It has arisen doubtless from the recognition, gradual but now complete, of literature as a profession, not indeed to be sought after and prepared for as other professions, but which may be taken to under special circumstances and followed without loss of social position. This is an external cause, but an internal one also may be found. There have been discussions going on lately about the loss of gladness in modern English life. The sum of joy is said to be less in spite of the triumphs of science and the spread of material comfort. An insouciance about the meaning of existence and a kind of notion that it is a troublesome period to be traversed as comfortably as possible, are the characteristics of this change in English spirit. Whether the facts are exaggerated or not, most people agree in their existence, only differing as to their causes; our poetry surely is similarly affected. There is in it also a loss of gladsomeness, an almost morbid habit of self-inspection; lofty ideals may be presented to us, but those who strive after them are involved in failure, and though the fact is insisted on that the world is out of joint, little hope is held out that any men will be born to set it right. Are not the causes of the one phenomenon, whatever they be, the same as those of the other, and are not the melancholy of our poetry, and the cowardly hopelessness of our life closely related?

Of the two causes suggested, the former would seem to have been more active in the early years of the century, the latter in our own times. It is usually easier to point out causes than to suggest remedies. Supposing those we have mentioned to be the true ones, there would seem to be little hope of the first, the definition of a literary profession, being removed in days when every new avenue of exertion is blocked as soon as opened by the press of men struggling for existence. And yet that the practice of bread and butter writing by young men is in every way pernicious, can hardly be disputed. First, because a young author in his eagerness to make his work saleable is under the strongest temptation to lower his own ideas to catch the fancy of the many, and that which catches the fancy of the many is rather the base and vile than the noble and good. Secondly, because the feverish condition of mind entailed by monetary anxieties is not that in which a man should set about teaching his fellow men. Thirdly, because the experience gained by the ordinary struggles of early life would be of especial value as a training for writing on any subject whatever. It is for these reasons that we see in our periodical literature so much to be ashamed of, and in higher lines the worthless and immature productions of those who with the smallest possible experience of the realities of life set up claims to be the leaders, the instructors, and the consolers of mankind. The second and inner cause can only be affected by the gradual evolution of ideas, or by some national convulsion forcing us to return to a healthier frame of mind.

To revert to our first example,—Scott. Carlyle has denounced him for not endeavouring to grapple with the great problems of existence, and avoiding any special efforts at evoking the latent heroism of men, contenting himself with merely representing human life in an attractive form. But who that has studied that author's works and life has derived no benefit in consequence? Is there no good to be got from truthful delineation of character by which, while our own sense of beauty is gratified, we are never allowed to dwell with satisfaction on baseness, or with contempt on goodness; in the representation of the joys, sorrows and temptations of every class of men, from prince to peasant; in the painting of nature in all its forms and in every proportion, to say nothing of the open air freedom and absolute love of truth pervading the whole?

And the man who did this for us lived the life of a man and not of a recluse, was at ease, and beloved in every class of mankind, and while taking his due share in the world's drudgery has left the memory not only of a stupendous genius but of a spotless character. Were more of our writers to follow his example and make our literature not the vehicle for vapid speculation or disconsolate moaning, but the means by which Englishmen may be braced to their work and cheered in their leisure, whilst they themselves were content to bear their own common burdens, the high place which they so anxiously claim now for their art would be accorded it freely and gratefully, not only by the present, but by future generations.

POETRY.

THE TWO STATUES.

Two statues, carven goddesses, had he,
Fair and shining white,
Statues of delight,
And one was Truth and one was Purity.

And day by day he loved and worshipped each,
Part for themselves, but more
Because in them he saw
The high ideals which he strove to reach.

But one day came a cynic cold and hard,
And saw the statues fair,
And while he was not 'ware,
Besmirched and chipped and left them soiled and marr'd.

And now he worships with a saddened sense;
They are not now the same,
Never can be the same,
As in the days of early reverence.

NARCISSUS.

So all day long he wandered in the woods,
But ever to the pool his steps returned,
And flamed with love he watched the ruddy cheeks
Grow paler, and the wan eyes dim their light;
And oft he left the pool and oft returned,
Held by the loadstar of his own fair eyes,
Till once, restrained no longer, down he stooped,
And smiling, kissed the fleeting vision's lips,
And sank beneath the rippling, circling pool.

THE PAPER-KNIFE.

"The Data of Ethics." By Herbert Spencer. London, 1879.

There is no more striking characteristic of Mr. Spencer's recent volume than the expectations it raises, unless perhaps the expectations it disappoints. Mr. Spencer has attempted, and to the satisfaction of many performed, the herculean task of tracing the progressive realisation of the Law of Evolution, as it manifests itself in life, individual and social. But in all this, he tells us, he has had one end ever in view: "my ultimate purpose, lying behind all proximate purposes, has been that of finding for the principles of right and wrong in conduct at large, a scientific basis." And yet after the five thick octavos of elaborate preparation for this work, and after the Data of Ethics itself, one cannot help repeating at the end of the volume the words the author uses at the beginning of it, that "the establishment of rules of right conduct in a scientific basis is" still "a pressing need."

What Mr. Spencer promises us in this work is the secularization of the theory and the simplification of the practice of morality. For he seems to think that the authority of morality had previously been derived from its "supposed divine sanction"—though that is the theory of a comparatively small school only—and asserts that there has been "a repellent aspect habitually given to moral rule by its expositors," though he does not condescend to names, and though the thought of such different philosophers as Plato, Aristotle, Shaftesbury or Hegel might have convinced him of his error.

It is not, however, for accurate history or appreciation of the theories of opponents that anyone will think of consulting Mr. Spencer. Those who remember the way in which he refers to the doctrine of heredity as refuting Kant's theory of mental forms, and asserts with naïve confidence that though innate in the individual they are acquired experientially by the race (oblivious of the fact that it was not Kant's object to analyse the mental furniture of this or that man, but to exhibit what is necessarily implied by thought and perception wherever found), and those who recall the elaborate missing of the point which constitutes his criticism of Berkeley in the Principles of Psychology, will be scarcely surprised at his rather hazy views of what other moralists have taught, or his easy reference to Plato and Aristotle as making "State-enactments the source of right and wrong" (p. 51).

But we confess that we expected from him if not something more definite, at least something more suggestive by way of positive contribution to this much-vexed question of the basis of ethics. Ethics is the theory of conduct, and conduct is defined by Mr. Spencer as "the adjustment of acts to ends (p. 5) and acts are called good or bad according as they are well or ill adjusted to ends" (p. 25). But it is evident that the most important matter in conduct is not the adjustment of acts to ends, the ends being given, but the determination of the ends themselves. A theory of morals must both fix the ultimate end of conduct and give a reason to the individual why he should make that end his own. Nor are these two requisites identical, for the moral end set up may, for example, enjoin action for the good of humanity as a whole, though that end does not commend itself as prima facie reasonable to the individual whose own private good may appear the most important thing to him.

Now the ultimate end of conduct, according to Mr Spencer, is the greatest possible quantity and extent of life (p. 14), while the measure of life is pleasure (p. 30)—a theory which of course assumes that life is in the whole pleasurable. But the pleasure of life which the individual is to heighten and extend is not, according to our author, his own pleasure or life exclusively; but "evolution becomes the highest possible when the conduct simultaneously achieves the greatest totality of life in self, in offspring and in fellowmen; so that here we see that the conduct called good rises to the conduct conceived as best when it fulfils all three classes of ends at the same time" (p. 26). But all this leaves us quite in the dark as to what relative proportion of our conduct we are to distribute in promoting the life (i.e., pleasure) of self, offspring and fellow-men respectively, or which of the three is to be preferred when they conflict. And it will not do here to say that the conflict will become less and less frequent and pronounced as evolution advances, for what we want is a morality for present circumstances and not for a state of things in which different interests have ceased to clash. Mr. Spencer tells us that neither is Altruism to yield entirely to Egoism nor Egoism to Altruism: "If the maxim 'Live for self' is wrong, so also is the maxim 'Live for others'. Hence a compromise is the only possibility" (p. 238), while "our conclusion" is stated in words which it is hoped give more practical guidance to Mr. Spencer than they are likely to do to his readers; "that general happiness is to be acheived mainly through the adequate pursuit of their own happinesses by individuals; while reciprocally, the happinesses of individuals are to be achieved in part by their pursuit of the general happiness". But if this has any meaning at all—and we have some doubts whether it is seriously meant—it is a distinct relapse into egoism. For if we are all to pursue our own happinesses and to aim at the general happiness only in so far as it promotes our own, we are landed at last in Individualism; and from this point of view Mr. Spenser will find it hard to convince the majority of people that they will be most likely to hit their own happiness if they aim at something else as well. This sentence is no doubt a bid for those "immense benefits" which "are to be anticipated from presenting moral rule under that attractive aspect which it has when undistorted by superstition and asceticism." But though the bid is a high one a rational egoist may well doubt whether it is made by a bona fide purchaser. Mr. Spencer has not shown, for example, why the egoist contented with the life of private pleasure should begin promoting the good of others. He points to "sympathetic gratification" (p. 255) as tending to overcome the abrupt opposition of Egoism and Altruism. But sympathy with the good of others is so little developed, especially in those most in need of conviction on this point, that such a forecast into the future cannot be expected to convince the individual that he ought to live for others as well as for himself. We are afraid then that Mr. Spencer has both failed to make morality easy and failed to make clear what morality is.

William Ewart Gladstone, by G. Barnett Smith. Cassell, Petter, Galpin and Co.; Cheap Edition, 5s.

From a literary point of view we may be said to be living in an age of biographies. On the bookshelves of our circulating libraries "lives" predominate. It is only necessary to call to mind the several lives of Christ, the life of Macaulay, of Dickens, of Kingsley, of the Prince Consort, published within the last five years. Of late, however, the mania for biography has reached such a stage, as to demand the lives of men still living. Not very long ago a Mr. O'Connor was bold enough to write a life of that mystery of mysteriousness, Lord Beaconsfield. It was written in no flattering terms, and was acknowledged to be the work of one by no means a partisan of his lordship. We have in this life of Mr. Gladstone a contrast to the preceding, for it is avowedly written by a sincere admirer of the present premier. The book certainly raises the question whether it is desirable that biographies of men should be written whilst they are still alive. It is an undoubted fact that, except in the case of autobiography, such works must lack the essentials of a true biography—such as in ideal types like Carlyle's "John Sterling" and Forster's "Dickens." They must fail to reveal to us what is most interesting, namely the inner life of the man whose character is depicted. The author is necessarily not in a position to exhibit the real motives of him whose life he wishes us to understand. It may safely be said that this book is wanting in this most important function of biography—for the author makes no pretension to such knowledge, except in the final chapter on "personal characteristics" which might be culled from the newspapers or articles similar to the "World's" Celebrities at Home. Still there is something in what the author says, that Mr. Gladstone of all great men may be said to be the most prone to carry his heart on his sleeve. And in consequence a biography of such an one is more likely to be true than that of his great opponent, Benjamin Disraeli Moreover, it may be said that some account of a statesman whose supreme importance in the direction of the voice of the country has been admitted on all sides during the last few months, is at present not inopportune.

The book is undoubtedly valuable to every student of politics in giving him a collected and chronological account of all those great political movements in which the Premier has taken part, movements, it is scarcely necessary to say, in which there is hardly a break since he first entered Parliament 48 years ago. The account of what the author terms the "Golden age of Liberalism"—1869, —70,—71—rises almost to the pitch of enthusiasm, so great is his admiration for one who could achieve such grand and thorough reforms in so short a time, and most people will probably experience some thrill of sympathy on reading it.

The account of Mr. Gladstone's days at Eton and Christchurch cannot fail to interest 'Varsity men, and his experiences at the Oxford Union must be interesting to all those who take part in the similar debating society at Cambridge.

Mr. Gladstone's opinions on the Reform Bill of 1832 at that time, and his arguments concerning slavery—after the lengthened and effusive rhetoric from the University pulpit a few Sundays ago—will perhaps appear amusing to Cambridge undergraduates. His change of opinion also on the question of Church and State must be especially interesting in such a stronghold of the establishment as this University. The author, however, strives to show that Mr. Gladstone has always been animated by one great idea throughout all these changes, namely—what will be of the greatest benefit to those most interested in the measure or reform at issue.

Mr. Gladstone's administration of finance is traced, a graphic and interesting account being given of his several budgets, and the consequent decrease in taxation he was able to effect, and one is in a position to understand, to some extent at all events, the charm which this famous Chancellor of the Exchequer was able to throw around his yearly financial statements. This part of the book is doubly interesting since Mr. Gladstone has again taken the duties of Chancellor of the Exchequer, and anyone having read it cannot fail in coming sessions to look out with lively expectation for the yearly budget. The unique position held by the right hon. gentleman during the Eastern crisis is brought out and dwelt upon.

Notwithstanding the consciousness on laying down the book that a great deal of the information conveyed is of the newspaper type, one cannot help feeling that one's insight into the great political movements of the last half-century is deepened or at least refreshed, and that one's time might be very much worse spent than in the perusal of Mr. Barnett Smith's popular biography.

SUPPLEMENT TO

The Cambridge Review.

No. 25. WEDNESDAY, JUNE 2, 1880.

Sunday, May 30.

Sermon by the Rev. Dr. SALMON, Regius Professor of Divinity, Trinity College, Dublin.

"Unto man he said, Behold the fear of the Lord that is wisdom, and to depart from evil is understanding."—Job xxviii. 28.

The maxim of the text appears in slightly different forms in more than one of the Old Testament books. In one of the Easter Day Psalms we have "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom; a good understanding have all they that do thereafter, the praise of it endureth for ever." And so again in the Book of Proverbs, "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and the knowledge of the Holy is understanding." And in several other of Solomon's proverbs the same idea is expressed in slightly different words. The name of Solomon has become proverbial among ourselves for wisdom. He deeply impressed his contemporaries both by his acquired knowledge and by his natural sagacity. He was held to be wiser than all men; his wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the East country and all the wisdom of Egypt. He was wiser than all whom the Hebrews of his day reverenced as sages, wiser than Ethan the Ezrahite, wiser than Heman and Chalcol and Darda. His fame was in all nations round about, and travellers came from distant lands to see his riches and to hear his wisdom. Yet in great part of the Book of Proverbs the word wisdom is only used as the name of a quality in which Solomon was confessedly not preeminent; only as another name for goodness and the fear of God. Yet the more we think of the matter, the more reason we shall see to be convinced that other qualities which have been honoured by the name of wisdom are but vain pretenders to that title, and that this alone in truth deserves it.

First, wisdom is not learning. A great part of what his contemporaries admired in Solomon consisted of the accumulated mass of facts with which his memory was stored. He could speak of trees from the cedar that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall; he could speak also of beasts and of fowl, of creeping things and of fishes. Yet it is an observation we are constantly forced to make, how much a man may know and yet what a fool he may be. Even in his own subject his industry in acquiring knowledge may easily outrun his power to make profitable use of it: and from weakness of judgment the opinions he forms on the subjects on which he has bestowed most labour may be absolutely entitled to no respect. But even if he is completely successful in his own department, whether or not it be as common as men of the world are apt to think, it is assuredly common enough that a man may be a very great scholar and yet a simpleton in all that concerns the practical affairs of daily life. That Solomon, for instance, with all his wisdom was a wise ruler we have not the slightest reason to suppose. He did successfully accomplish the ends which he made it his ambition to attain, but, as usually is the case with Eastern rulers, those ends concerned rather the magnificence of the sovereign than the real welfare of the people. He struck out new commercial enterprises, but these probably carried on as monopolies for his personal benefit and adding nothing to the wealth of the nation. They enabled him to astonish his subjects with the sight of foreign luxuries not brought to Jerusalem before; horses and fine linen from Egypt, gold and ivory and apes and peacocks imported from the distant East. Thus the Hebrew monarchy was in his time surrounded with unheard-of state, and the splendour of his court surpassed all that his people had ever heard of; nor probably did either he or they for some time consider whether all this costly splendour did not overpass the resources of the small state which he governed. He had an enormous harem of 700 wives and 300 concubines; he had magnificent palaces at Jerusalem and summer palaces at Lebanon; stately gardens, golden plate in such abundance that silver was nothing accounted of in his reign. The hasty reader is so impressed with all that is told of this magnificence that he often fails to take notice of what is also told of the cost at which it was kept up, the corvées of forced labour, the grinding taxation of the subjects. We find that on the king's death the oppressed people insisted on an absolute change of system, and failing to obtain it hurled his dynasty from the throne; while all the wealth that had been brought together only served as a lure to attract the foreign invader, and in five years from Solomon's death, Jerusalem had been taken and all the accumulated riches carried off to Egypt.

Again wisdom is not cleverness, though it is often mistaken for it, especially by the young who are apt to give to a certain kind of intellectual ability a great deal more of admiration than it deserves. I refer to that kind of ability which finds it easy to invent arguments in favour of any line of action it wishes to commend, which is not easily taken by surprise, is ready with plausible answers to objections, and can throw into the most attractive form the reasons for coming to the desired conclusion. All this, however, is but the cleverness of the advocate; what we really want for our practical guidance is the wisdom of the judge. Suppose that a man urges us to go the way that it is contrary to our real interests to go, the more persuasive is his eloquence, the greater his skill in producing reasons for the wrong course, the greater the mischief he does to those that give ear to him and to himself if he believes in his own arguments. So again in mere literary or scientific investigations, where we are not concerned with action, the cleverness which can maintain an ingenious paradox, or which can so marshal arguments as to make a false explanation of facts appear satisfactory, may receive admiration from the unthinking, but only disgusts him whose sole wish is to know what is the truth. It is natural that in our free country an exaggerated value should be attached to that oratorical or argumentative power which characterizes the successful advocate; for skill to form the wisest schemes of statesmanship would be a barren gift if not accompanied by the ability to commend to others the conclusions which have been arrived at. In order that any useful measure may be carried he who advocates it must be able to persuade a large number of persons of its expedience. Skill in such persuasion is therefore with us an absolute necessity of political success, and there are always among the rulers of the country some who owe their position to their eminence in it. And though no doubt there is a presumption that they who succeed in making others think that they are giving wise counsel really deserve the character they bear, yet it is a very different thing to be a brilliant orator and a wise statesman. Many instances might be given of persons who have exercised great influence in the House of Commons, though with powers of speech less than the average, solely on account of the trust that was put in their honesty and good sense. But we may meet with illustrations enough in our daily life, what very different things are cleverness and wisdom. It may happen to you to be opposed by persons on whose friendship you thought you might have counted; unkind words may have been said to you, a slighting and disparaging estimate of you expressed. And you may have it in your power by a stinging retort to cover your assailant with confusion; and by exposing some inconsistency or fastening on some weakness of his to take ample vengeance. If you do this readily and wittily you may produce a great impression of your intellectual ability. No intellectual ability at all is required for holding your tongue, and yet to submit in silence may be far the wisest course. In such a case the line of conduct dictated by Christian meekness may be also that approved by wordly prudence. A man who opposes you when your interests come into collision with his may not be really your enemy if you do not permanently make him so, or if you do not by damaging his reputation destroy his power as well as his willingness to serve you another time. And if you are angry because a more slighting estimate has been expressed of you than you think you deserve, why, in the first place, it is possible that it may be you who overrate yourself, but if not, it may still be the wisest to wait patiently till misconceptions clear themselves away; for as a general rule people in the long run get quite as much honour as they deserve; and any anger or impatience about such a matter only delays the recognition of their merit.

But I find that in thus giving as an illustration the fact that Christian meekness is true wisdom, I am only anticipating in a particular case, the general principle asserted in the text, that the fear of the Lord is wisdom. From one point of view it will occur to many that this principle must be undoubtedly true. If we look on practical wisdom as that which guides us to the line of conduct best calculated to secure our happiness, it must undoubtedly be wise to secure the favour of him who is infinite in power and whose rewards are eternal. It is quite a commonplace to point out the folly of the man who professes to believe in a future life, yet lives as if this world were to be his home for ever. It is just the same, it has been said, as if an officer under government temporarily employed here, but who knows that he must soon expect orders to proceed to a distant station, and there take up his permanent home, were to invest all his property here in a form incapable of being removed with him. But we are not obliged to make our assent to the principle of the text depend on our faith in the sanctions of a future life. God's commandments are not grievous, and even as far as this life is concerned it is our happiness and our wisdom to obey them. If we glance through the commandments of the decalogue we cannot doubt the folly of disregarding them. We shall own that it is the fool who hath said in his heart There is no God: that those are fools who put their trust in graven images and bow down to the work of their own hands; and so on with regard to the other commandments which enjoin the duty of worshipping God, which maintain the sanctity of family life, proclaiming the duties of children to parents, of husbands and wives, which enjoin personal purity, which forbid injury to our neighbour in person or property, or in his family relations, and which guard the outward conduct by waging war on the sinful desires from which sinful actions spring; all these commandments are such that any thoughtful man must own that it is his interest as well as his duty to comply with them. But when we turn to the New Testament we find a basis for Christian ethics very different from that of the most enlightened selfishness. If we receive the teaching of that book, the spring of our actions must be love to Christ; and likeness to Christ the model of perfection at which we must aim. And what was the character of Christ? The Apostle sums it up in the words "Christ pleased not Himself." It does indeed sound like a truism to say that our Blessed Lord's life on earth was not one of self-indulgence. You are all so familiar with the details of his life that you need not to be reminded what he endured for man's sake. His victory over the temptations of Satan in the wilderness indicated the character of his entire life. The temptations which he rejected there, he rejected absolutely and for ever. The allurements of appetite, the charms of earthly power, the desire of popularity found no place among the motives of his conduct. Destitute of all the world counts necessary for happiness, he went about in ceaseless labours for the good of others, diffusing bodily health and spiritual instruction, regardless of selfish ease, regardless of the opposition he too often met with from those he came to benefit; mindful only of the great object for which he had come, to seek and to save them which were lost. You know that all that he previously submitted to for our sakes was but preliminary to that closing proof of love (the greatest as he himself said that any can give) to lay down his life for his friends. Nay not even then his friends, since as the apostle tells us while we were yet enemies Christ died for us. The Gospels moreover inform us that the Lord's humiliation was a voluntary descent from glory which he possessed with the Father before the world was: that His continuance in this humiliation was equally voluntary; that in the darkest hour of his agony legions of angels stood ready at his call, but the word of summons was not given because then the scriptures of the prophets would not have been fulfilled; those scriptures which had inseparably connected the redemption of man with the travail of the soul of the Redeemer. And it was not merely that our Saviour's humiliation must have been felt more keenly as contrasted with the height of glory from which he had descended; what the Scriptures reveal as to the higher nature he possessed suggests other reflections as to the way in which that very nature must have increased the weight of what his human nature had to bear. His divine foreknowledge must have kept present to him during the whole time of his humiliation, the bitterness of that agony by which on the night of Gethsemane his humanity was almost overwhelmed, while his knowledge of the hearts of men enabled him to discern that even of those whom he had chosen out of the race for which he came to suffer, one was a traitor, and the rest would in the hour of danger desert him. Privations present, and anguish constantly forseen, submitted to, thanklessly submitted to for the sake of others, from all of which a word would at any moment have relieved him; such is the account of the Saviour's life on earth. This was the life which his first converts set before them as the model for their imitation. As he loved us, so ought we also to love one another, was their maxim. It was ever vividly present to their minds what He their Master and Lord had suffered for them, and the thought what he had endured for their sakes was ready to rise to rebuke any selfish shrinking from danger or toil, or privation which their brethren's good required them to encounter. Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus, was the Apostle's exhortation. Christ pleased not Himself, so let every one of you please his neighbour for his good to edification. Here then is the paradox of Christianity. The fear of the Lord is wisdom, is the declaration of the Old Testament. Wisdom teaches us to provide for our happiness in the most enlightened way, rejecting those pleasures which are of a lower order, or which are but temporary, and will be followed by greater pain, and choosing those which are higher and lasting. But here we have what seems quite a different rule; seek not your own happiness at all; live and work for the happiness of others; give up all thought of self, all calculation how you may make yourself greater or more honoured or more prosperous. That may be more noble conduct, but can it be said to be wisdom?

The key to the paradox is found in that golden saying of our Lord which St. Luke has preserved for us in an after gleaning made after his history of our Lord's life had been finished, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." This strikes a higher key than is touched in some of those Gospel lessons in which our Lord had inculcated the duty of giving. Give, he had said, not to those from whom you hope to receive a return; not even with a view to men's praises. Let the praise of him who seeth in secret be enough for you. Give to those who cannot recompense you, and you shall be recompensed at the resurrection of the just. But here we have the doctrine, not of future recompense for self-sacrifice, but of its present blessedness. That it truly is more blessed to give than to receive, however paradoxical the utterance when first made may have sounded, we cannot for a moment doubt. Our Lord in the Sermon on the Mount had told his disciples that in not allowing their love to be repelled by the unworthiness of its object, they should be like their Heavenly Father who maketh his sun to shine on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. And if it must be happiness to be like him who is all blessed as he is all bountiful, his blessedness cannot consist in receiving anything from the creatures who can add nothing to his majesty. To give where no return can be made must be his blessedness, and that must be happiness for those who are like him. And there is no difficulty in understanding that this really is the case. Those to whom God has given powers find happiness in their exercise quite independently of the fruits these powers may gain. It is not true, or it is a mere fraction of the truth that "love of fame is the spur which the clear spirit doth raise, to scorn delights and live laborious days." An unsubstantial recompense if this were all; nor would prudence find it easy to justify the giving up of solid comfort for the sake of having our vanity incensed by praise—praise that perhaps, never reach our ear and may not come till after we are dead. But I believe the truth to be, that though many when trying to give an account to themselves why they lived laborious days may have thought to vindicate their prudence by the prospect of future praise, this was not their real motive. Their happiness was in the work itself and the laborious days brought them higher delight than selfish ease could have offered. And in the case of work done for others, it is not only that there is pleasure in the exercise of our powers; it is not only that it is more flattering to our pride to give than to receive; but the heart must be cold which does not find delight when through our gift happiness springs up for others and their sorrow is turned into joy. Cases are of constant occurrence when no other reward is sought for efforts to give pleasure to others than some evidence that these efforts have been successful. Take for instance maternal love, the most striking example of the happiness love finds in giving without thought of receiving. If a baby laughs and crows it is thought to make an ample return for all the attentions that are lavished on it. If there can be any doubt as to the comparative wisdom of him who places his happiness in receiving or in giving when both are successful in their aims, we can have no doubt in the case when they fail. Indeed when can he be said to succeed who places his happiness in self-aggrandisement? For ever as he reaches those whom in the race for greatness he had made it his ambition to overtake, it seems to him but a poor victory to have conquered these; when he sees, as he must, others still in advance of him, who now appear the only competitors worthy of his rivalry. And when failure comes, as come it will, how ignoble are the sorrows of him who has sought great things for himself and found them not. How little sympathy we can give to the smartings of wounded vanity, to the disappointed graspings of ambition, to the confusion of him who having claimed the highest place is compelled to descend with shame to a lower room. Contrast with these the worst sorrow that can be suffered by one whose happiness is giving, the pain of love repulsed. It will often happen that attempts to do kindness to others are not received in the spirit in which they are offered. If we needed proof that giving has a happiness of its own as much as receiving, we should easily find conviction from our experience that there may be as much selfishness in refusing to receive as in refusing to give. Sometimes the refusal may spring from unamiable perversity of disposition which loves to disappoint expectation and grudges a pleasure which it is perceived is counted on: sometimes it may proceed from scorn of the poor gift offered, which is disdainfully brushed aside without appreciation of the kindly feelings, perhaps the labour and sacrifice, made by the giver; sometimes it may proceed from a sturdy spirit of independence, too proud to bear the burden of an obligation, and willing to forego a coveted good rather than be beholden to another for the enjoyment of it. That even in this last case, with feelings highly worthy of respect there may be mixed up a great deal of selfish disregard of the feelings of others we need not delay to point out. But we plainly are forced to own that it is not the selfish man alone who must count on meeting occasional disappointment: the most generous, the most loving is liable to have his motives misinterpreted, or his love cast back. How are we then to strike a balance? Can we say that the grief of wounded affection is less keen than the pain caused by the failure of schemes for self-aggrandisement? If we cannot say this, perhaps we might say that the sorrows of love are more noble than the delights of selfishness, and that it is a more blessed thing to have even felt disappointment in giving than to have had success in receiving. But it is more to the purpose to observe that such disappointment only brings pain with it in proportion as selfishness has animated the motives of the giver. There were some early Christians who imagined a flame through which all at the end of the world must pass, through which those would pass unscathed who were pure from earthly defilement, but which would fasten on all in the soul that was mean and base, and so give much or little pain in proportion as there was much or little that must be burned away. Of this kind is the pain which the bountiful receive when their gifts are rejected. If their generosity has been but refined selfishness, if they have given only because they wished to have their pride gratified by the acknowledgment of other's dependence, because they delight in receiving thanks and praise, or because in some other way they hope to be paid back again by those whom they have benefited, the disappointment of such expectations as these must not count among the sorrows of love, they rather go to swell the list of the vexations to which selfishness in all its forms is liable. But if the giver's kindly act is really prompted by the single motive, the desire to promote the happiness of its object: if it spring from that truly unselfish love which can rejoice in the happiness of those we love even when they prefer that that happiness shall come to them in a way to which we cannot contribute: then the sting is taken out of disappointment, and what might have been at first pain to us is turned into matter of rejoicing. St. Paul may teach us the spirit proper to those who have their heart more in the cause for which they labour than in the credit to be won for themselves from promoting it. He heard of the exertions made in preaching Christ by men who were his rivals and his enemies; and he exclaimed, Whatever their motives Christ is preached and I therein do rejoice.

If then the New Testament has taught us to understand by "the fear of the Lord" somewhat more than had been distinctly revealed in the Old Testament: if it teaches us that it means to be children of Him who is kind to the unthankful and the evil: to be followers of Him who gave His life for sinners ungrateful and rebellious: still we can truly say the fear of the Lord is wisdom. Butler has illustrated the profitable effects of virtue by imagining the prosperity of a community of perfectly virtuous persons. If you want to know what are the fruits of that which is a higher and a warmer thing than mere virtue, real love for others, such as that of which our Redeemer's earthly life is the highest pattern, we need only imagine his example followed by a single individual. Imagine that any one systematically wove into an entire life the practice of these lessons of our Lord and you would have to own that such a one, whatever his or her intellectual gifts might be, was one of the wisest of human beings, wisest both in providing for his own happiness, and wisest if counsel were sought by others. It is eminently true of love, give and it shall be given to you. If one were found by experience to be perfectly free from selfish aim, one by whom no unkind word was ever spoken, one who was always planning some act of kindness to others, who grudged no trouble to make them happier; it is impossible but that such a one would inspire such perfect trust, and would be surrounded by such love and gratitude as would brighten his own life as he strove to brighten those of others. To such a one we could come in any difficulty for advice, in full confidence that the counsel given would be prompted by no thought of the interests or wishes of the adviser, and that we should be told not what was pleasantest for us, but what was really wise and right for us to do. And in matters of conduct, perplexity as to the right course so often arises not from any real difficulty in seeing what path duty points out, as from shrinking from trouble that following it might impose, or from a hankering after enjoyment of some kind to be found on another road, that mere singleness of mind and purpose confers an insight denied to those whose vision is clouded by selfish desire. And such insight will often prevent charity towards others from degenerating into weak blindness to their faults. For when the right course is discerned it is impossible not to take notice when others turn aside from following it. And the disguises by which they justify their conduct to themselves become transparent to one of greater simplicity of character. It is no small part of practical wisdom in the course of this world's conduct, to have the gift of insight into character and to be able to judge correctly who may be trusted and how far. But you will not need to be told that it is wisdom in a higher sense than this to which the text refers, even though it may not have been amiss to point out how godliness has the promise of the life that now is as well of that which is to come. May we brethren ever daily strive to be more and more like Him who is the eternal Wisdom of the Father, that hereafter we may be with Him where He is—when they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and as the sun in the kingdom of their Father.

CRICKET.

UNIVERSITY v GENTLEMEN OF ENGLAND.

May 24th, 25th, 26th—The fourth and last of the Cambridge home matches was concluded last Wednesday in nearly as sensational a manner as the first one of this season. In the latter, our readers will remember, the University were dismissed for the ridiculous small score of 37, and sustained a severe one innings defeat. This was followed by another heavy beating, though not so disastrous as the first, at the hands of M.C.C. and Ground. Then the tide turned and with the help of two old hands the form of the eleven improved, and they managed to gain a decisive victory over Yorkshire by ten wickets. This success they followed up the next week by making just as huge a score against twelve Gentlemen of England as their first score against England was miserably small.

The state of the weather will naturally account for the enormous score compiled last Tuesday and Wednesday. Continued dry weather and constant practice in batting favoured long scoring and as a perfect wicket had been provided, a large total was only to be expected; still no one thought to see nearly 600 runs on the board. This score is all the more creditable when we remember how well the Gentlemen fielded during the whole of two tiring days and how pluckily the bowling was sustained throughout. Buchanan's analysis, considering that he is nearly half a century old, and was bowling on extremely easy wickets, is really wonderful. He not only bowled the enormous number of 492 balls i.e. 123 overs, but almost half of them were maidens and only 149 runs were made off him, and that too when 4's were common. Rotherham had hard luck. Several times he as nearly as possible bowled both Whitfeld and Jones, the ball only missing the stumps by a fraction.

It is a curious fact that in this match all the twelve men on the Gentlemen's side bowled at one time or another. The palm in batting most certainly must be given to Bligh and Whitfeld, who went in first, when the other side were fresh, and scored as many as 150 for the first wicket. Jones made the highest score, but he was a tremendous time over it: we think he was sometimes almost too cautious, and we should not like to venture at the number of balls that he entirely left alone. The scores of Lancashire and Exham were well got and reflect every credit upon them, but then at the time they went in, the bowling had been knocked all to pieces and the fieldsmen utterly tired out. As to our bowling, we think it was quite up to the form and reputation of the bowlers: Steel and Morton both did very well; the former especially so, while Morton had to encounter a very stiff wind all the time. Too much praise cannot be bestowed on the batting of Hon. A. Lyttelton and F. Penn: theirs were both masterly performances; the former more especially as it was his first essay this season. Penn played in his best form and it was a real test to watch his perfect timing of the ball and his clean hits, especially his cuts off the slow bowlers.

The University did well to get rid of such a strong batting team for 232, which total would undoubtedly have been less, had every chance been held; there were one or two very bad mistakes in fielding. Thornton was unlucky, as he was given out by the umpire, who ought to have known better. Walker on the contrary was lucky, as he was missed quite three times. Bligh dismissed Vernon with a capital catch; in fact, we doubt if there is a safer fieldsman or surer catch than our worthy secretary. Towards the end of the innings our side played up well and the last few batsmen were disposed of very quickly.

It would be too tedious to numerate the various hits of our first two batsmen; suffice it to say that they went in on Monday afternoon and made 27 without being dismissed, while on the following Tuesday they were not parted till 4 o'clock, when Bligh was caught off a bumping ball for a grand innings of 90; he only gave one chance and that a difficult one at short slip when he had made more than 50. Generally it happens that when two batsmen make a long stand they are dismissed almost together, but after Bligh's departure Whitfeld stayed with Jones while another century was added to the score and the adversaries' total passed.

He played in a far freer style that that he generally adopts and made some capital strokes: besides he gave not a vestige of a chance. We heartily congratulate him on reaching his first century on the University ground. Jones, as we stated above, played with wonderful patience and caution throughout: his leg hits were the chief features of his innings: most of them were exceedingly well-timed and powerful. The innings of C. T. Studd and Steel sink to insignificance compared with the enormous ones of their predecessors, but they both played well: Ford too and G. B. Studd made some excellent leg hits. Lancashire and Exham next made a lengthy stand and put on over a hundred runs: the cuts of the latter were first rate. The last two batsmen were the only men who failed to reach double figures, and the innings fell short of 600 runs by only 7 points.

Thus owing to the huge scoring, 825 runs for 22 wickets, only two innings were completed and the match ended in a draw, the University being 361 ahead on the single innings.

The Cambridge Review:

A JOURNAL OF UNIVERSITY LIFE AND THOUGHT.

No. 26.] WEDNESDAY, JUNE 9, 1880. [PRICE SIXPENCE.

EDITORIAL.

The Cambridge Review has now passed from the region of bold enterprise to that of established success. The support which it received at the outset has never diminished, and every term has widened the circle of contributors, so that in looking forward to the work of the coming year the Editors feel their position securer and their responsibilities lighter than at any previous time; for they have not only gained new experience, but have discovered fresh sources of strength.

While the financial results of the year have been successful beyond expectation, it has at the same time been possible, through the energy and ability of our contributors, to maintain a high standard of literary merit in the articles published in the pages of the Review, and to bring into public notice many subjects of interest and importance that could not have been so fully discussed elsewhere.

Every care has been taken to fulfil the promises made in the original prospectus. Personality, bitterness, and party-spirit have, as far as possible, been avoided, and all phases of Cambridge life and thought have, it is hoped, been fairly and adequately represented.

One half of our main object has already been achieved; for much has been done to bind together the different sections and parties of Society in Cambridge. The other half is still left,—to strengthen the ties that unite the past and the present generations of members of the University. This work must by its very nature be gradual in accomplishment, and, though there is still much to do before this end is secured, there is no reason to despair of ultimate success, if all our supporters, whose Cambridge days are over, and who are now on the point of passing into the wider world outside, will still use their personal influence to help us. The rapid and critical changes through which the University is now passing, and the growing diversity of its component elements, combined with many other similar causes, make it more than ever essential that there should be some centre of thought and opinion round which all of us may gather, and some force to counteract the disintegration of University life. Those who are responsible for the conduct of the Cambridge Review will make it their chief end to secure this result, and, while expressing their sincerest thanks for the sympathy and support accorded to them during the past year, they again confidently appeal to old and new supporters to carry on the same work, to perfect efficiency, and to crown success.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

A fresh batch of "Proposed Statutes of the University" has been received from the Commissioners. Of these Chapter I. on "Terms" appears to be important. It runs as follows:—"There shall be three terms in the year, called respectively the Michaelmas Term, the Lent Term, and the Easter Term, and they shall include 227 days at least. The Michaelmas Term shall commence on the first day of October. The Lent Term shall not end later than the Thursday next before Easter Day. The Easter Term shall not commence earlier than the Tuesday next after Easter Day, and shall end on the twenty-fourth day of June. Terms shall be kept by residence within such boundaries in or about Cambridge, and during such part, being not less than three-fourths, of any term, as the University may from time to time prescribe by Grace." The remaining chapters refer to Degrees, Elections, Offices, Discipline, Graces of the Senate, Judicial Proceedings, and the Repeal of Existing Statutes. As might have been expected, none of the proposals are at all revolutionary.

On Thursday last the Senate appointed a Syndicate to consider the memorials received relating to the encouragement to be given to the Higher Education of Women, and to report on the subject before the end of the Lent Term in next year. The appointments to this Syndicate are decidedly in favour of Higher Education; since, we believe, a majority of the Syndics are also memorialists.

The Classical Board has recently published a list of the set subjects for the second part of the Classical Tripos Examination to be held in 1882. The alternative subjects are Philosophy, History, Archæology and Philology. The list, which we print in another column, will be a guide to those students who have not yet selected their special subject. We should add that those who are now in their first year have the option of taking their second examination either in 1882 or 1883. The regulations now published refer only to 1882.

The Cambridge University Association of Classical Tutors is now in working order. Lists of the Classes, &c., arranged for the October Term, may be had from Mr. C. A. M. Fennell, or, after July 3rd, from Mr. J. P. Postgate, Fellow of Trinity. Some of the members of the association are arranging a series of classes for the Long Vacation; a more detailed account of which will be found in another column. In our last number the name of Mr. A. Gray, of Jesus College, was inserted in the list of members. We are requested to state that this was an error, Mr. Gray never having joined the association.

Mr. Charles Roundell will on an early day move in the House of Commons, "That this House, while fully recognising the obligation to make provision for the due fulfilment of the requisitions of Sections 5 and 6 of the Universities Tests Act, 1871 (relating to religious instruction, and to morning and evening prayer in colleges), deems it inexpedient that, save in the case of the deanery of Christ Church, any clerical restriction shall remain or be attached to any Headship or Fellowship in any college of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge." Mr. Bryce will move as an amendment to this resolution, to add the words, "or the professorships of Hebrew and Ecclesiastical History in the University of Oxford and the professorship of Hebrew in the University of Cambridge."

Cambridge is to emulate Oxford in providing popular Saturday Evening Concerts for the townspeople. At a meeting held in the rooms of the Rev. Frederick Wallis, Dean of Caius College, it was decided to engage the Guildhall for most of the Saturdays in the October Term; and a committee was appointed to secure the co-operation of the College Musical Societies and of others who would promote the undertaking. We are requested to inform our readers that those willing to assist may communicate with the Rev. A. F. Torry, the chairman of the committee, or Mr. H. C. Eden, Pembroke College, the secretary. We have no doubt that many will come forward to take part in this excellent work. It will of course be necessary for the Committee to obtain the permission of the Vice-Chancellor and the Mayor.

The Oxford Architectural and Historical Society has recently made an excursion to Cambridge. Over a hundred gentlemen took part in the expedition; among them being Mr. Chavasse (the Senior Proctor) and Mr. James Parker, the well-known archæologist. The Society was shown over Cambridge by several distinguished cicerones—Professor Colvin; Professor Bonney, the Master of Peterhouse, Mr. Aldis Wright, Mr. S. S. Lewis and others.

Those members of the University, who happen to be in town during the early part of the Long Vacation, will have an opportunity of seeing the University Eleven play three matches; viz:—June 17, 18, and 19, v. Surrey Club and Ground, at the Oval; June 21, 22 and 23, v. M.C.C. and Ground, at Lord's; June 28, 29 and 30, v. Oxford, at Lord's.

At the Oxford Commemoration Honorary Degrees will be conferred on Professor Fawcett, Her Majesty's Postmaster-General, and on Professor Sylvester, who was second wrangler in 1837.

A memorial to the Vice-Chancellor is being circulated among the resident members of the Senate, praying that steps be taken for postponing the May festivities in future years till after the conclusion of the various Tripos examinations. Our readers are perhaps aware that next year several of these examinations will take place in the May Term. The memorialists urge that, if the course they advocate, is not followed, the May week will seriously interfere with the examinations. It must, however, be remembered that when the new arrangements were being discussed in the Arts' School, Mr. Jackson expressed his belief that the idleness of the May week would be an excellent preparation for a Tripos.

LECTURES IN THE "LONG."

The Board of Mathematical Studies have recently recommended that Inter-Collegiate lectures on the higher mathematical subjects should be given in the Long Vacation. This recommendation deserves notice as it is the first attempt on the part of the University to make private tuition in mathematics less necessary than it is at present. In fact, unless the Mathematical Board were to recognise the necessity of private tuition it would seem as if no other course was open to them. As the Board in their report say, candidates for the Tripos will in general have to read Solid Geometry, Differential Equations, Analytical Statics, Dynamics, Optics and Astronomy, after they come to Cambridge; this will in general take the first four or five terms with the first Long; the Lent and May terms of the third year will also be occupied in revising for the first part of the Tripos examination, which takes place at the end of the third May. Thus the second May term, the second and third "Longs," and the third and fourth Michaelmas terms are the only times available forreading the subjects in Part III., and probably part of the second May will be spent in revision for the College examinations. It thus appears that the Long Vacations form by far the greatest portion of the time available for reading the higher subjects, and, as the report of the Board says, "it would be a matter much to be regretted if the times at which the students could profit most by the Inter-Collegiate lectures were precisely those in which no such lectures were given." The higher subjects, too, are precisely those in which the student can most advantageously substitute the lecturer for the "coach." The examination in them is not competitive, and thus perhaps the chief reason for private tuition is absent. Under the new regulations, too, we may expect to see the standard of the questions set in the higher subjects raised very considerably; and these subjects are so numerous that no private tutor could be expected to have that acquaintance with any one of them which a lecturer would have, whose chief business would be to lecture year after year on that subject. It is urged against the scheme that the present freedom from lectures in the Long is one of the chief reasons why men work better in the "Long" than in Term time; but the lectures which are objectionable are not in general on the higher subjects, but those which a student is compelled to attend by his College Tutor, apparently as a matter of discipline, or perhaps to enable the Tutor to take the tuition fee with an easy conscience. It is also said that College Lecturers have at present to work so hard that they have no time for original work in term time, and that if they were obliged to lecture in the "Long" they would have no time for original work at all. Without stopping to enquire how many of them do devote the Long to original work, we may point out that the delivery of the same course of lectures year after year would not seem to be a very arduous task, and that the lectures might be so arranged that those which were given in the Long one year might be given in the Michaelmas term of the next year, so that each lecturer need only be up every alternate "Long." As a matter of fact we believe that a large number of lecturers have volunteered to give lectures in the "Long" of 1881, and it is to be hoped that a large number of undergraduates will shew by their presence at these lectures their appreciation of this action on the part of the Mathematical Board.

ELIA IN CAMBRIDGE.

Charles Lamb, most charming of English humourists, was not, as he himself tells us, trained in academic bowers; still it was his pleasure from time to time to spend his brief holiday at one of the Universities. An essay written at Oxford, a sonnet at Cambridge—these bear witness to the affection with which he regarded both ancient seats of learning; but, because his friends lived chiefly there, he was more often to be found in Cambridge. But for an impediment in his speech he would probably, on leaving Christ's Hospital, have come up to Cambridge, which seems to have been the favourite University for Grecians of the time. This defect, however, made it impossible for him to enter the Church, the usual goal of a University career; and thus for thirty-five years he pursued the uncongenial labour of "the desk's dull wood" as a clerk in the East India House.

Digitized by Google

From Christ's Hospital his gifted school-fellow Coleridge came up to Jesus College, George Dyer to Pembroke: but Lamb never visited them there, and his connection with Cambridge was directly due to another friend, Charles Lloyd. Lloyd, an Emmanuel man, after taking his degree, entered on literary pursuits, and, having through Coleridge made Lamb's acquaintance in London, introduced him to Thomas Manning, tutor and mathematical lecturer of Caius, who soon became one of Lamb's most intimate friends and correspondents. In the autumn of 1799, ten years after leaving school, Lamb paid his first visit to Cambridge. The only record we have of the visit is a letter to Manning. In it he makes allusion to the curfew of St. Mary's, though he makes it ring at twelve instead of the orthodox nine. Perhaps times are altered in more senses than one. In the following summer he writes: "for me to come to Cambridge just now is one of Heaven's impossibilities; metaphysicians tell us even it can work nothing which implies a contradiction": and he goes on to suggest that Manning should come to London instead, "ain't you mightily moped on the banks of the Cam?" Later in the same year he promises to spend his first spare week in Cambridge. It will be no matter, he says, if his host is in "a state of pupilage:" he will be able to spend pleasant mornings among libraries, halls, colleges, books, pictures, statues. This visit seems not to have come off in the same year. But on the 5th January, 1801, Lamb was in Caius "crushing a cup to the infant century." From a letter written before starting it seems that the journey from London in those days took from six in the morning till eight in the evening: but if that was the case there must have been a prolonged stoppage at some half-way house. In a postscript Lamb suggests for supper nightingales' brains, the sensorium of a young sucking-pig, or any other Christmas dish approved by Manning and the cook of "Gonville."

This same cook, Richard Hopkins by name, the presiding genius of the Trinity Hall kitchens also, four years later sent Lamb a present of Cambridge brawn, from a recollection perhaps of Elia's tastes. The unexpected gift was highly prized and worthily acknowledged. "He might have sent," writes Lamb, "the tender brown judiciously scalped from a fillet of veal, the tops of asparagus, the eyes of martyred pigs, tender effusions of laxative woodcocks, and such pretty filchings common to cooks; but these had been ordinary presents, the every-day courtesies of dish-washers to their sweethearts. Brawn was a noble thought. . . . . Do me the favour to leave off the business you may be at present upon, and go immediately to the kitchens of Trinity and Caius, and make my most respectful compliments to Mr. Richard Hopkins. . . . We have not many such men in any rank of life as Mr. R. Hopkins. Crisp, the barber of St. Mary's, was just such another. I wonder he never sent me any little token." . .

Early in 1806 Manning left England for China, where he stayed nearly twelve years. But by this time Lamb had formed many acquaintances of his own in Cambridge,—Miss Ayrton, sister of a London friend, "Mrs. P——," "the W——'s in Trumpington Street," and not least the stout lady Mrs. ——, "who broke down two benches in Trinity Gardens, one on the confines of St. John's, which occasioned a litigation between the societies as to repairing it." On their first visit to Miss Ayrton, the Lambs met Emma Isola, whose father was, according to the calendar, Esquire Bedell in 1797: but on his death the little girl was left an orphan. She was soon adopted by the Lambs, and only left their home to become the wife of the publisher Moxon.

At this time Lamb and his sister repeatedly spent their holiday month in Cambridge. No society was more charming to him, no place more congenial. The entire air of antiquity that pervades (or did pervade) a university did "arride and solace" him: and his especial pleasure was in the collegiate repositories of mouldering learning. He sought not to shake the sacred dust from these ancient volumes, nor to turn their moth-eaten leaves: the mere walker there seemed to him to inhale learning. "Salute Trinity Library in my name:" he writes to Miss Wordsworth on a visit to her brother, the Master of Trinity: "two special things are worth seeing in Cambridge, a portrait of Cromwell at Sidney, and a better of Dr. Harvey (who found out that blood was red) at Dr. Davy's." This letter is dated 1822. We can find no indication of any subsequent visit to Cambridge, although he may have stayed there on his way to Bury in the spring of 1830.

More might have been known of Elia as he walked and talked in Cambridge, had he written letters to his friends from there: but he seems to have given himself during his short holiday a thorough rest even from letter-writing.

EGOISTICAL ESSAYS.—No. VIII.

HALL AND OTHER THINGS.

It is a difficult matter to treat of Hall with all the solemnity that it deserves. It forms a very important item in the life of the University man. For many it divides the day into two eras, before Hall and after Hall; and they regulate all their proceedings accordingly. I do not mean to say, of course, that they talk of anything as occurring B. H. or A. H., but they imply it.

Hall is a place where everybody may be found. Those that have been shut up all day at their studies emerge, and those that have been wandering about the face of the earth in pursuit of pleasure immerge; it matters not of what set, or of what persuasion a man may be, but he is pretty certain to turn up in Hall. The primary object of assemblage there is, I believe, to feed, but there are other minor processes connected with Hall. It is a period of recreation and small talk. Some, indeed, there are that cannot talk smally, and have to sit still and listen: while others, who are still further gone, cannot disentangle themselves from the enchantments of shop, and form little societies for its maintenance. But they are very exclusive, and generally also excluded. I once happened for three successive nights to lose my usual place, and had to take my seat amongst a select circle of mathematicians. I did not join extensively in the conversation, but I was very much saturated with it. When, however, on the fourth night, I got back to my former place, some of my newly-acquired knowledge inadvertently leaked out of me. My immediate neighbour inserted a fork into me. Such things are not tolerated among the common type of Hallist.

There are peculiarities about Hall that distinguish it from most other forms of eating. It might, perhaps, by the fastidious be termed somewhat of a scramble. But everything has its use, and perhaps this may be practice for those hurried meals that we so often read of as falling to the lot of great men at critical points of their career. Then the behaviour cannot be absolutely styled Belgravian. I do not hold myself responsible for the High Table; that forms a sort of Valhalla, where the intellectual heroes of the University fare sumptuously, and revel in the successes they have achieved over unwary examinees; nor can I answer for the B.A. table, of which the members are awaiting in a chrysalis form their full development into a higher state; I speak only of the Undergraduates. But I think that it must be the effect of the general uniqueness of Hall. For instance, when in Hall, it does not seem to strike people as being anything out of the common to put their elbows on the table and shout "Waiter!" at intervals between the courses, but I do not suppose they would do it at home. Nor is it the usual thing to attract one's opposite neighbour's attention with a bread pellet at a dinner-party in the height of the season, but I have seen it done in Hall.

There is a good deal of noise, but one cannot perhaps expect a hundred people to be perfectly quiet for long at the same time. Besides, if there is any evil, it is one that brings a remedy to itself. Perhaps there is so much that it drowns itself; occasionally there is a dead silence all at once, and then one notices that there has been a noise; but this only lasts just about long enough to try the pin experiment, and then the gently rippling laughter of some one again breaks forth, and things resume their normal state.

It is only natural, being an Anglo-Saxon, and not ordering the dinner myself, that I should reserve the right of grumbling at my victuals. But I cannot say much on the subject. They are substantial certainly. An entrée that runs well into half a pound of beefsteak, with potatoes and vegetables to match, is not to be sneezed at in point of quantity.

Then there is the waiting. That can be summed up in a very few words; it is very good, especially our part of it.

But there are more impressive things than these to be thought about in Hall, taking it both from a retrospective and a prospective point of view. From the former, because it it a grand thing to feed where so many great men have fed before; to reflect that their Hall formed part of their daily life, and that the attendant associations possibly had great influence on their after career; and from the latter, because it is equally grand to think that I may have a future Archbishop on my right and a Lord Chancellor on my left, and that the mere fact of their having manœuvred so that the place where the two ends of the forms meet has fallen to me may have some serious effect on that department of the general course of events that will fall to my share. I think a great deal in Hall just at present. We are not many now; and our number becomes painfully smaller and smaller every day. Now that the Mays are over, everyone is flitting to different joys, and there are but a few still left up. Some, indeed, are stopping up to read; they go out in canoes on the Freshers', and ride bicycles; it is a harder duty that compels most of us unfortunates to remain. We, the doomed band, have to struggle with the Little-Go. But I cannot dwell long on the subject; it is too painful. They say that in the French Revolution the prisoners in the Conciergerie became callous, and jested day by day as they drew nearer to their fate. Perhaps it is for the same reason that some infatuates do not seem to be conscious of their condition, and talk and laugh as carelessly as if such a thing as Little-Go did not exist. I do not: I cannot talk much, as my conversation would be a bore to my companions: I can think of nothing but Statics, Trigonometry, and Higher Algebra; I sit in moody silence, and look Statics, Trigonometry, and Higher Algebra out of my eyes; everything I do in some way forces itself into an illustration of one of them; my only amusement consists in setting myself test papers and not being able to do them; and though, of course, with our superior knowledge of Anatomy nowadays, it would be ridiculous for me to say so, yet, I am sure, if I had died two or three centuries ago, Statics, Trigonometry, and Higher Algebra would have been found graven on my heart.

And these are not my only troubles. The intervals that I allow myself between my studies of Mathematics are chiefly occupied with disputes with my landlady. She is too fastidious; she objects to my asking her to call me at 7.30 in order that I may get up and read early, because she complains that it has no further effect than getting me up at 10.30,—and she will not listen to explanations; she objects to my going to bed late, and breaking any crockery she has casually left about the passage; and to those objections both to my method of rising and retiring she adds more with regard to my habits during the interval between the two: for instance, if I have visitors she cannot be brought to see that one is justified in extending the period of five o'clock tea from 3.30 to 7.0. So I have concluded that it will be better if we separate. I have not yet taken any very great trouble in taking other rooms, as I foresee probabilities of there being some provided gratis for me out in the Fulbourn direction, but it is this petty form of aggravation that has so often served to wear out many a noble mind.

But all may go well, and then I may break out. My plans for the Long are indefinite: they are also infinite. As far as I can remember, I have engaged myself to go with three separate parties to Ober-Ammergau on foot, to bicycle over the Pyrenees with a fourth, to spend six months in the aggregate at different quiet spots on the continent with different reading parties; while, apart from University engagements, I have promised to spend at least a fortnight with each of a numerous circle of affectionate relatives. However, that all remains to be settled. I fancy the best plan will be to go home.

A MAY DREAM.

It was the 4th of June; quite an historical date, I believe; at least I think the 4th of June was the birthday of his late Majesty King George the Third of——well I was about to use a zoological metaphor, but, being connected with a royal foundation, I must be careful in applying epithets to deceased monarchs—of big-headed memory, then, let me say—yes, this was the king's birthday, the day when Parliament used to rise, and such hard-working members as had not already fled to their country seats, might have been seen getting into post-chaises, composing themselves for the journey which had so long been uppermost in their thoughts and hearts. Ah! tempora mutantur! We can't do that sort of thing now. No, we have already got a month behind, it is clear; else how comes it that on this same 4th of June I am in the middle, no alas! not yet in the middle, only just at the beginning of my "May." I have laid great, perhaps unnecessary stress, on the fact that it was the 4th of June. When I come to think of it, I must admit that it was very near not being the 4th of June at all. For the clocks were striking twelve when, weary and care-worn, I at length sank—or rather tumbled—into the arms of Morpheus. Bye-the-bye it just strikes me that I have literally no conception who Morpheus was or when he flourished! Shall I get down my classical dictionary again, shall I?—no, I won't,—Mythology is not one of my subjects and there's no "Question Paper" in the Tripos; it's not a thing they'll ever ask. Well then, no matter who he is, quisquis is est, as Ovid would say; please excuse the quotation, but it's a tip I have been saving up for the last two years, and have tried, unsuccessfully, to introduce into at least ten copies of Latin Verse —, whoever he is or was, I tumbled into his arms, and then, as it chanced, I dreamed a dream. It was a strange dream, for I had a dim consciousness that I was not myself, nor anybody else for that matter, but an indefinite something, devoid of size, shape, or quality. After a few moments' reflection I was forced to the harrowing conclusion that I was indeed neither more nor less than the $\mu\grave{\eta}\ \check{o}\nu$. A few words of explanation will perhaps illustrate my meaning to mathematical men and others who are uninitiated in the mysteries of ancient philosophy. I once heard of a high Wrangler who, on the night after his Tripos was over, dreamt that he was $\surd(-1)$. Well for practical purposes we may say that $\mu\grave{\eta}\ \check{o}\nu = \surd(-1)$. Now I hope the matter will be clear to every one. To resume once more, I soon discovered that there were certain advantages attached to my new personality. Invisible, inaudible, imperceptible, I could see, hear, and perceive what was going on, and, looking round to see where I was, I found, to my surprise, that I was present at a secret conclave of Examiners. Of course! it was a philosopical paper they were concocting, and I was there in virtue of my "non-entity." I am bound to confess that I felt some qualms of conscience, felt in fact very much as a certain Asiatic gentleman of old, whose conduct, I regret to say, was by no means irreproachable, must have felt when he tried the virtues of the "invisible ring" for the first time. However, my scruples were soon allayed; for right before me was a number of the Review, No. 868, I think it was, and dated 4th June, 1908. Yes the $\mu\grave{\eta}\ \check{o}\nu$ is independent of time as well as place, no doubt. So I felt I might listen with a good conscience. After all they were not "concocting" a paper; they were looking over the answers. Not to make a long story, I soon gathered that some misguided benefactor had recently left a prize to be awarded to the Senior Soph who should most distinguish himself in Ancient Philosophy in the College Examination. And they were met to settle the rival claims of some six candidates. It was, indeed, a hard matter. Only one candidate had finished the paper, and yet, as the Examiners continued to assure one another, it was a ridiculously short paper. There were only 42 questions. Ah! it was a very poor year. Still why not give the prize to the man who had finished the paper. There was, indeed, one slight objection. It was obvious enough that the man had no conception what it was all about. In fact it had evidently never entered his head to enquire. But he had written 73 sheets, and no one else had written more than 30 or done more than two-thirds of the paper. It was, indeed, pointed out by one of the company, a very meek and diffident man, who had been studying paper after paper slowly and laboriously, that Mr. D—— had apparently grasped the main points of his author far more clearly than any one else. "Grasped the main points?" Perhaps! But he had done barely half. What was the use of the main points if he only did half the paper? It was preposterous. It would never do. And so the prize fell to Mr. A——, the voluminous and nimble! * * * Just then the Chapel bell began to ring, and I awoke once more in my own proper person. And when I went into Examination that morning and found only 18 questions, although by ceaseless scribbling I only demolished 10. I could not complain, having had so instructive a vision of what would be required of a generation yet (happily!) unborn. Poor creatures, this would be leisure and luxury to them. We are still allowed to think—a little.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—I am anxious to make an earnest request for contributions of wild plants and seeds for the Botanic Garden, and, if you will allow me, I would beg to enlist the interest of those gentlemen who will shortly travel and therefore be in a position to afford material assistance. I believe that in this way good specimens might be obtained. I am informed by a gentleman of his intended trip to a part of the Mediterranean, which would certainly give good results, and I have no doubt that others will have excellent opportunities. The Alpine plants of Europe are important desiderata, and these packed in a card-board box with a little moss very slightly damp, and sent by post, would be likely to arrive in good condition. The South of Europe is rich in bulbs, and these, if growing, would travel safely in the same way, but, if with dry leaves only, it would merely be necessary to use a little paper. Orchids travel well in flower, and would be a great acquisition. The boxes should have a luggage label attached by string, so as to avoid crushing under official stamps. I should be very glad to give further details and information to any who would be interested.

I am, faithfully yours,

R. IRWIN LYNCH, Curator.

THE UNIVERSITY SERMON.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—Though the present letter may seem ill-seasoned in its appearance in your last issue for the current term, I trust it may not be the last of its kind. With many others, I have hoped that long ere this some attention would have been called in your columns to the system which now prevails at the two o'clock service on Sundays, in the University Church. I refer to the constant ingress and departure of undergraduates from the galleries during the service.

The practice, as now carried out, is surely most dishonouring to the place in which we meet, it is annoying to an extreme degree to those members of the congregation who are anxious to remain, and to follow with attention the sermon in course of delivery, and it is, finally, lacking in ordinary courtesy to the gentleman (often a member of another University) who may be occupying the University Pulpit. The very audible sound of retreating footsteps, the occasional stick dropped by some chance townsman in the gallery, and the harsh creaking of swinging doors, are sounds sufficient to disconcert any but the most unimpressionable and experienced of University preachers.

In an ordinary congregation, it would be an exceptional thing to see anyone present rise and withdraw, except from illness or other special cause, and such procedure is popularly regarded as marking the strongest disapproval of sentiments expressed from the pulpit; and why should a seat in the gallery at St. Mary's give a license which would not be tolerated in any other congregation?

In suggesting a remedy I cannot forget that there are not a few in the audience at St. Mary's who are called away by the special engagements of Sunday School work, and who, if the sermon is prolonged, must withdraw before its close. For this reason the observance of a similar practice to that now in force in King's Chapel and elsewhere, of shutting the doors during Divine service, would present a difficulty. It might then be arranged that no one should leave or enter the galleries during the sermon; and if even this is too extreme a measure, cannot matting be placed on the floor, which may serve to deaden the otherwise distressing sounds of which we have recently had such a painful experience? If this, too, is impracticable, then is it too much to ask that those gentlemen, who do not intend to remain during the whole service, should the preacher or his subject not meet with their appreciation, would not seat themselves at the extreme east end of the galleries, but nearer the doors whence they may retire, without disturbing the rest of the congregation?

Apologizing for the length of this letter, and trusting its crude suggestions may find a more powerful advocacy, and produce not impossibly a more practical solution of the difficulty than the writer can give.

I remain, yours, &c.,

X. Y. Z.

UNIVERSITY CULTURE.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—I write to you that I may endeavour to refute some of the arguments, which a contributor of yours has mentioned, in regard to the value of a University education, in his article entitled "University Culture." It seems to me that the best way of judging of the relative value of a University education, as compared with the educational results of other institutions which is usual for youths to enter on leaving school, is by observing as far as possible their respective influence on those with whom one comes in contact and it is by following this course that I am led to conclusions different to those of your contributor. I am then not inclined to believe that "a boy of 19 who has passed through every phase of school life is just fitted to enter the world, if anything can make him fit." Youths of this kind have in general scarcely begun even to look into the various schools of thought, and conflicting opinions on a diversity of subjects, such as everyone who wishes to take any place in the world must contemplate. Their notions are crude on a variety of subjects, and they tenaciously hold to firm convictions, founded by an undeveloped mind, on the basis of a little knowledge.

In a preeminent degree, at a University, a man comes in contact with all shades of opinion on all kinds of subjects, and although when at school his opinions meet with a wide acceptance if he has influence, often aquired by athletic skill only, or with contempt if he is not thought much of, perhaps from want of that skill, at College they have to stand on their own merits. This applies not only to the consideration of leading topics but also to all opinions on any minor subjects whatever. In short, a man to do well at college must make himself agreeable to all those with whom he comes in contact, although their natures may not at first be appreciated by him.

As regards morality, the standard at a University is certainly not high; yet when judged by comparison, I think it will be found to be higher than that of any other large body of men of the same standing as undergraduates.

Anyone entering the legal or medical professions, or if he goes into "business," and very often, if he essays the Civil Service, lives "about town," where he is at work during the day and in the evening is thrown on his own resources. I think that few will believe that it is for the good of a youth fresh from school to be thus situated; moreover at the commencement of his career he is not usually harassed by examinations, and has little or no temptation to read; while as regards the society of his equals, it cannot be obtained in the same manner as at College.

Your contributor speaks of a University man being "for three years, without any responsibility or any discipline, except the pseudo-discipline of deans and proctors." Does not the very fact of the discipline being framed on broad rules of general behaviour, without the detailed control necessary at a Public School, involve a large amount of responsibility?

Regarding still further the social relations of a man going into the world straight from school, your contributor implies that anyone acting thus remains in "home society." Working for what profession can a man, in the majority of cases, live at home? And from what professional studies or occupations can anyone obtain leave for six clear months in the year?—a time which the same author thinks too little for the cultivation of home society.

I am, Sirs, yours most obediently,

B.A.

To the Editors of the Cambridge Review.

SIRS,—I shall endeavour to suggest some advantages of a University career, which your correspondent "F." has ignored, and at the same time to criticise his conclusions and protest against the point of view he adopts.

And first, as to his point of view, he confesses himself to be an orthodox champion of the Public School System, and he seems to me in his zeal to utterly overlook the fact that Universities and Public Schools are things of quite different nature and play quite a different part in forming a man for the world. Owing to the nature of school things strong discipline is necessary and possible. A public school boy is always either obeying or being obeyed: the spirit thus inculcated may fit a man for military life, but disqualifies him for the position of a civilian in modern England: the majority of men, now-a-days, are neither centurions nor legionaries. It takes some time, always, to shake off the effects of precocious authority; but University life is a potent purge and should be used in such cases. A public school man can here find and enter into society of nearly every sort, men from every school and no school, from the colonies, from the Irish, Scotch, and minor English Universities; he will meet with men whose antecedents have been widely different from his own, and whose aims in life he can scarcely enter into: "Smugs," for instance; that is to say, some who have not like him enjoyed the best teaching money can buy, and who are striving to overcome these disadvantages by intense application: others, who have worked hard and stinted themselves to procure money enough to pass through the University; and who, as is likely enough, are little disposed either to spend money freely or to undervalue the degree they have coveted so long. If he does not learn something of the nature of work from seeing such men, spelling the word with a big W won't do him much good. I will not now discuss the value of Public Schools; I only repeat that the University too has its value, if there still be a stage between boyhood and manhood, partaking of both and demanding a training of its own.

I turn to his conclusions: "F." tells us that in athletic matters up here, enthusiasm is maimed and crippled, patriotism is languishing in an exhausted soil; regarding these matters as very unimportant. I am delighted to hear him say so: if this rivalry could be got rid of, people might learn that the test of a good school or college is not their own short-lived connection with it.

To proceed, is it not a contradiction in terms to say that a man here is "without any responsibility or any discipline;" in educated persons, at least, responsibility begins where discipline ceases; this obviously bears on another question. If the moral sense be weak, the introduction of female undergraduates advocated by some will probably defeat its own ends. Good society all the year round is an advantage few young men can hope to enjoy.

Finally, "F." does not seem to remember that a steady man with a degree can nearly always get a livelihood as a schoolmaster: it is not well in these days of competition to overlook such an easy method of securing a competence. Again, for sucking solicitors, a degree shortens the time spent in articles by two years: surely the time thus lost (seven months only in the case of a Poll man) is amply made up for by the opportunities for travelling in the Long. I say nothing of the experience gained or friendships made.

But what I must insist on still more is this. Undergraduates in Oxford or Cambridge are in the midst of loveliness and luxury of an almost unique kind, achieved for them by generations of men of wealth and taste; so much so that a man need only open his eyes to be happy. Association with a beautiful present and an historic past, ample opportunity for forming friendships, or living in isolation, for exercising hospitality, or practising economy, these things give Cambridge life its distinguishing feature; advantages, none of which a practical man will overlook, if he knows anything of minor modern Universities, or the life of men at "crammers" or walking the hospitals: and unless I am much mistaken, it is advantages of this sort, which sustain certain ancient public schools, however grossly they are mismanaged.

Idleness is not confined to the University: but where else does a man meet with the ready and favourable opportunity for retracing his steps which the idle University-man has when he retires with his Poll or low Honour degree, and begins life afresh?

PROPOSED EDITION OF SHAKSPERE IN OLD SPELLING.

We have received from Mr. F. J. FURNIVALL a letter on the above subject, from which we give the following extracts:—

"In the Prospectus of the New Shakspere Society issued in the autumn of 1873, I said,

'It is surely time that the patent absurdity should cease, of printing 16th and 17th-century plays, for English scholars, in 19th-century spelling. Assuredly the Folio spelling must be nearer Shakspere's than that; and nothing perpetuates the absurdity (I imagine) but publishers' thinking the old spelling would make the book sell less.'

"Accordingly, all the editions of Shakspere's single Plays issued by the New Shakspere Society—Romeo and Juliet, by Mr. P. A. Daniel; Henry V, by Mr. W. G. Stone; The Two Noble Kinsmen (? partly Shakspere's), by Mr. Harold Littledale;—have kept the spelling of the Quarto or Folio on which they were respectively based. But the handsome Quartos of the Society, with their full Introductions and Notes, cost so much, that most likely all our present members will be dead before our Society's edition of Shakspere's Plays in old spelling can be completed. Now I, for one, want such an edition, and have long wanted it, every day of my life,—a handy, working, clear-type edition, with Acts, Scenes, Lines, duly numbered, with Text corrected—though only where such correction is absolutely necessary,—so that I may be able (as far as possible) to read and quote Shakspere's words in the spelling in which his contemporaries of Elizabeth's and James I's days read them. To see Shakspere's words in Victorian dress, is just as offensive to me as it would be to see his bust or picture in Victorian dress. The latter offence, being one against the history of Costume and Art, would meet with such shouts of contempt that it has never yet been tried, and never will be; but the former offence, being one only against the history of the English Language,—which the general reader does not care one brass farthing about—is received with the utmost complacency and approval; and self-satisfied ignorance even pours scorn on the proposal to familiarise Shakspere-students with the look and spelling of their master's words as they appeared to his contemporaries, and as they are necessary for the due appreciation of his text.

"I do not say that, for the benefit of people who cannot spell, or whose brains get muddled by old spelling, or to whom it is a hindrance, there should not be a modernised Skakspere always on sale; but I do say that for folk who can spell, and who know that the English language has a history, with every phase of which they wish to be familiar, a handy working edition of Shakspere in the spelling of his time, should be provided. And I am resolved to provide it, for the first time since Shakspere's death.

"After many unsuccessful tries to find that rare being, a Publisher who was English-scholar enough to care about bringing out an old-spelling Shakspere, I have at length found one in Mr. George Bell, of London and Cambridge, who, as an old member of the Philological Society, naturally takes no mere trade view of the proposed edition."

CAMBRIDGE ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY.

At the Annual General Meeting of this Society on Monday, May 24th, 1880, Professor Hughes, F.S.A. (President), in the Chair, the following new members were elected:—G. F. Cobb, Esq., M.A., Trinity College; Rev. W. M. Gunson, M.A., Christ's College; Rev. A. F. Kirkpatrick, M.A., Trinity College; G. H. Rendall, Esq., M.A., Trinity College.

The following officers were elected for next year:—President, Professor T. McK. Hughes, M.A.; Vice-President, J. W. Clark, Esq., M.A. The Annual Report mentioned successful excavations by members of this Society at Great Chesterford and Barrington, and promised the issue of several books during the coming year.

Professor HUGHES made the following remarks upon the present manufacture of pottery in the Pyrenees: "We have not many descriptions of the mode of manufacture of pottery among rude tribes or people where primitive modes are still kept up, and yet it is from such observations alone that we can hope to obtain any satisfactory evidence as to the conditions which we may infer prevailed among the makers of the primeval pottery we find in caves, in graves, or refuse heaps. One such case I had an opportunity of examining with Sir Charles Lyell under the guidance of M. Vausennat some years ago. At Ordizan, near Bagnères de Bigorre in the Pyrenees, there is a clay derived from the subaerial decomposition of various igneous and metamorphic rocks, which has been found by experience to be especially adapted for making pottery. The process is very simple. The clay is kneaded in small quantities at a time, and the potter, generally a woman, sets herself down by a lump of it, having in front of her a round piece of wood about 18 inches across, fastened by V-shaped braces to a peg which turns in a heavy wooden stand. A piece of clay is placed on this round moveable table, and while the table is turned with the left hand the clay is moulded with the right. Lump after lump is added, and the whole worked into form with the fingers, a simple wooden scraper about six inches long, and a wet rag. A hole about six feet across and two feet deep is dug in the ground. The vessels having been allowed to dry and harden in the air for a time are packed in dry fern in this hole, each vessel being also filled with fern. They are thus built up into a beehive-shaped mass rising about four feet above the ground, and the whole is covered with sods, leaving openings for draught here and there. The fern is fired, and when the fire is burnt out the vessels are finished. In this way, M. Vausennat informed us, vessels exactly resembling those found in the caves and dolmens are now manufactured and used in the Pyrenees. The additions are made in lumps, and therefore when a spiral is seen, it is due to the fingers being withdrawn from the centre as the table is turned by the hand, and does not indicate the clay coil method described by Mr. Hartt as so common in Brazil and the rest of South America."

Mr. NEVILLE GOODMAN, exhibited and described some Burial Urns found near the mouth of the River Amazon. He said that the burial urns exhibited were found by himself and son in the Island of Marajou, which lies between the main mouth of the Amazon and that of the Tocantius River. The immediate locality from which they were taken was a small island of some two or three acres in extent, lying near the bank of a long, narrow and shallow lake, which was almost at the centre of the Island of Marajou, (Long. 49° W., Lat. 1° S.). The lake was called Arary and discharged its water into the Tocantius river by a small stream of the same name as the lake, and which was about 80 miles long. The centre of the small island rose perhaps fifteen to twenty feet above the level of the water of the lake, and attained a greater elevation than any other land adjoining the lake. This elevated central part was of small extent, and was bounded by a low cliff formed by the denudation of the island by the action of the waters of the lake. The remaining surrounding part consisted of a talus sloping very gently on all sides. All round the island was a strand made up of worn and broken pieces of pottery, doubtless washed out from the denuded soil of the island during the very considerable period during which that denudation had been going on. The soil was fine vegetable mould, which, having been subjected to repeated tropical rains and bakings under an equatorial sun, had become very much indurated. The urns were discovered partially projecting from the low cliff. They were buried at no great depth in the soil. The facts adduced showed conclusively that these were burial urns of an ancient people, and the place from which they were taken an ancient cemetery. The aboriginal Indians had ceased to exsist in Marajou with anything like tribal relations or distinctive customs for more than a century, and had become absorbed in the mixed Brazilian people. The works of art of the modern Indians dwelling on various branches of the Amazon higher up present nothing similar to these urns. On the other hand an examination of these vessels and their ornamentation proves that their manufacturers must have had some relations with the ancient peoples of Peru, Granada, Central America and Mexico. He had no hesitation in saying that the art indicated by the pottery was a branch of that wide-spread civilization which extended from Central America through the lands of the Incas to the southern hemisphere along the Andes, and which seemed to shrivel and totally disappear at the rude touch of the fiercer and harsher civilization of the West, whose forces were wielded by the Spaniards under Cortes, Pizarro, &c.

Digitized by Google

Mr. GRIFFITH exhibited two urns from Peru, from the tombs of the Incas, of similar pottery, and with coatings of fine clay, of red and light yellowish colour, exactly similar in this respect to those exhibited by Mr. Goodman; they also had the human figure, in one case with the hands and arms held in the same position as on his, in the other with just a human face as it were carved on the stem of the Mandiora, the roots representing the body and legs. He suggested that the key pattern might have arisen from a repetition of lines representing in a conventional way the eyes, eyebrows and nose, comparing the Anglo-Saxon ornament springing from the same origin, passing through the ϒ (upsilon) on their coins and culminating in the Fleur-de-lis.

Mr. WHITE read a paper on the Chesterford kiln, which Prof. Hughes stated was a kiln for baking or burning pottery, but this Mr. White thought very improbable; both from its shape and size it much resembled the lime kiln of the present day. He then showed the shape of the potter's kiln, by giving as examples one discovered by Mr. Layton at Caistor, near Norwich, the ancient Venta Icenorum, and sketched in Vol. xxii. of the Archæologia; another found by the Hon. R. C. Neville, which Mr. White thought was the flues only of a kiln, sketched in Vol. x. of the Archæological Journal. He then exhibited a drawing of a more perfect one, found by Mr. Joslin, at Colchester, where the flues and furnace are nearly identical is shape with those of Mr. Neville's, but on the top of the flues was built the kiln. The bottom of this flue was pierced through, at regular intervals, to allow the heat the more readily to escape into the kiln. The tops of the flues were much vitrified, which he proved by a specimen he exhibited. When the kiln was loaded it was then arched over with clay, which was, wholly or in part, broken down to take out the pottery when baked. And another, figured by Mr. Artis, from amongst the remains at Castor, in Northamptonshire, the Durobrivae of Antoninus, showed the bottom perforated in a similar manner to the one mentioned above.

COLLEGE CORRESPONDENCE.

CLARE.

The Clayton Pairs were rowed for on Wednesday, June 2nd. H. Roberson, bow, and W. M. Cann, stroke, had first station, and H. H. Noble, bow, and F. Marshall, stroke, second station. Owing to wide steering Cann's boat did not gain much at first, but quickening up in Plough Reach drew away and won by 60 yards. Time 8 mins. 25 secs.

The Roddam Sculls, given last year for Freshmen, were rowed for on Tuesday and Wednesday, June 1st and 2nd. In the first heat, W. J. Ibbeston, with last station, gradually overhauled H. H. Noble and A. N. Campbell, and by the rapidity and impetuosity of his course caused several fouls. Eventually Campbell was left aground, and Ibbetson after a fine breast race with Noble up Long Reach came in 10 yards ahead. In the second heat E. C. Froom taking a beautiful Grassey passed S. J. S. Banks, who was in difficulties on the other side, and won with comparative ease. Ibbetson, winning the final heat in the excellent time of 8 mins. 32 secs., became the first holder of the sculls.

Last week J. C. MacDonnel, a member of last year's Rossall Rifle team, all but succeeded in winning the C company cup of the C.U.R.V., being beaten in the last shot by E. Francis of Caius.

The following Cricket Eleven has been photographed; J. P. Maul, (Capt.), C. F. Weston, W. H. Alderson, J. E. Norman, E. O. Ormerod, J. A. Sidgwick, H. R. Elder, H. J. Ford, J. C. E. Kidson, and O. Puckridge. The last five have received their colours this season.

Clare men in for the present Little-go, General, or Specials seem to have been doing well. The May examinations are in full swing.

CORPUS CHRISTI.

At a full meeting of the Cricket club last Tuesday, the following officers were elected for next May:—Captain, E. L. Richardson; Secretary, W. G. Mosse. The twelve men who have their colours are:—A. Tanner, (late Captain), F. T. Colson, (late Secretary), E. B. Brown, G. M. Davies, W. W. Hough, L. A. Isaacs, W. G. Mosse, A. Paice, H. G. Owen, E. L. Richardson, J. S. Wright. Of these Hough, Mosse, and Paice received them this term.

The boating season ended last Monday with the Rowlandson Pairs. H. Tugwell and W. M. Selwyn, beat H. W. Everingham and T. A. M. Shepherd, after a good race, by 3 secs.

CHRIST'S.

The single Lawn Tennis handicap was won by Pereira, and the single ties by Cooper. The final heat of the double tie has been postponed until the October term. The Lawn Tennis six, who have played a pleasant series of matches with other clubs, winning three and losing four, were photographed on Monday.

In the account of the concert, the pianoforte duet by Messrs. Thompson and Parkin was accidently omitted.

MAGDALENE.

On Thursday last a meeting of the Boat Club was held. Mr. A. T. Holmes was re-elected Captain, and Mr. T. W. Waller second Captain. Mr. W. Brigg was again elected Secretary.

After a few details had been settled about boating affairs, a cricket meeting was held. C. Hughes resigned the captaincy, and proposed E. R. Yerburgh, who was unanimously elected. H. G. Barlow was elected Secretary. We have had to put off two or three matches lately in consequence of the weather.

SIDNEY.

As it affects the public eye, or at least the eye of the river-haunting public, it is perhaps meet to draw attention to the abolition of the old Sidney boating trousers: they have succumbed to the copious abuse heaped upon them, and, for the future, Lady Sidney will be the "Woman in White."

The college examinations ended on Monday, and the results are due on Thursday; for Thursday is the annual Commemoration and feast day in honour of our pious and noble foundress, Lady Frances Sidney, Countess of Sussex: on which occasion no doubt the usual respect will be paid to her (and her dog's) life-like portrait in the college hall.

By the way some men are wondering whether the Essay Prizes have suddenly become extinct, for nobody has yet seen any notice of their subjects upon the screens.

DOWNING.

T. Dale Hart, late scholar of this College, has passed the final bar examination.

The lawn tennis fours have not yet been settled, owing to the badness of the weather and the numerous and unpleasant avocations incident to the last weeks of the May term.

On Monday night, June 7th, the Boat Club re-elected W. P. Schreiner 1st Captain, and R. D. Brinton was elected 2nd Captain, both for the October term.

The College Examinations have been going on for the last week. The results were published on Monday as follows:—Scholars elected: Harris (Law) and Milner (Natural Science); Rooms and Commons awarded to Schreiner; Gratuities of £20 to Cox, in Law, and to Bradshaw and Roe, in Natural Science; Prizes of £3 3s. to Hickson, in Natural Science; Kilvington and Schreiner in Law;

Digitized by Google

prizes of £2 2s. to Davies, in Classics, Harris in Law, Milner in Natural Science, and Smith in Classics. Minor Scholars elected: £40 each, P. J. Edmunds, Natural Science; E. J. Griffith, Law; J. R. Line, Classics.

TRINITY HALL.

At the terminal meeting of the Boat Club, H. Heape, C. S. Brandon, G. L. Stevens, and E. Simpson were elected as Captains of the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 4th boats respectively, vice E. C. Brooksbank, E. C. Freeling, H. Heape, and C. S. Brandon. J. A. Milne was elected Secretary, in the place of H. Henn, and E. C. Brooksbank and A. D. Wilde took the place of L. G. Read and G. L. Stevens, as Auditors. The appeal for subscriptions towards the expenses of the boat at Henley has been liberally responded to.

The eight went into training for Henley on Wednesday last. It is constituted as in the May races. The four, which is entered for the Visitor's Cup, is also in practice. Reed, Heape, Simpson, and Brooksbank were at first the crew, but on Monday Brandon took the seat at No. 3. The eight leaves here on Thursday.

The May examinations were concluded on Monday, but the lists have not made their appearance yet.

Hall men desirous of obtaining tickets for the Hall barge at Henley, should make application to Brooksbank forthwith.

TRINITY.

Since Wednesday the College May Examination has been the chief topic of interest to most of the College, except those who have been engaged in more important examinations. But the May Flies have found time to play off some of the ties of their single-handed tournament. R. A. Pelly beat all comers: B. F. Buxton was second; E. G. Watson third. Their single-handed handicap is not yet finished: four are left in, B. F. Buxton, C. H. G. Wright, M. C. Gibb, and F. P. Gallwey; this event will be decided before the week is out.

The Trinity Lawn Tennis Club were represented last Saturday by B. F, Buxton and R. A. Pelly against West Middlesex: the same pair that were second in the Oxford Tournament last week represented that club: but the Trinity men won easily.

DISCUSSIONS IN THE ARTS SCHOOL.

ON THE REPORT OF THE BOARD OF MORAL SCIENCE STUDIES.

This meeting was held on Saturday, May 29th. Dr. Hort presided. Mr. Verdon, Mr. Cox, Mr. Sidgwick, Dr. Hort, and Mr. Ward took part in the discussion. We have only space to give the speech of Mr. SIDGWICK, who said that the objections made had been directed chiefly against the schedule, which was not strictly a part of the scheme for which the sanction of the Senate would be required. Any details of the schedule which experience might shew to be unsatisfactory could and would be at once altered by the Board. The chief point criticized in the regulations themselves was the distinction between Psychology and Metaphysics. This had become more and more marked in recent years, both in general philosophical discussion and in the preparation for the Moral Sciences Tripos. The Board, however, had not adopted the new terminology merely on this ground, but because they thought that many students who might profitably pursue the empirical study of mind would, if alternatives were allowed, be advised to keep aloof from the perplexed and difficult controversies of Metaphysics. This led him to an objection that had been brought against Part II. of the Schedule, in which the distribution of papers was different to that adopted in Part I. It has been observed that there was no paper on Advanced Metaphysics; and it had been asked whether the Board wished to exclude the advanced part of this important study. But in fact the subject for which the Board had found no place was not Advanced Metaphysics but Elementary Metaphysics; in the view of the Board, Metaphysics, if studied seriously and systematically, must necessarily be classed as an advanced subject. Accordingly the only line of division that it seemed to them expedient to draw in this department (and in that of Ethics) was that afforded by the distinction between the theoretical and the historical methods of study, the latter of which they had reserved for Part II. It had been objected to their scheme that it laid too much stress on the history of philosophy; but as the historical papers were entirely comprised in Part II., they would only be taken by candidates who had made a special study of one or other portion of the history of philosophy. It was not this kind of study, but the superficial and perfunctory getting up of handbooks, which resulted in those useless burdens to the memory that the Board deprecated and desired to remove. The somewhat technical terms 'Psychophysics' and 'Methodology' had been selected as those that would most easily convey to instructed persons precise notions of the subjects which the Board wished to mark out. The importance of including in any advanced study of Psychology some part of the Physiology of the Brain and Nerves was recognised by all existing schools of metaphysicians. 'Methodology' had been used instead of 'Inductive Logic,' to prevent any dispute as to the propriety of including in the subject marked out a complete investigation of the methods of the different physical sciences.

ON THE RIVER ABOVE NEWNHAM.

A meeting was held for the discussion of the Report of the Council on the Edicts respecting boating, on June 4.

The MASTER of CLARE, who presided in place of the Vice-Chancellor, said that he was not at the meeting of the Council at which the Report was considered. If he had been present, he could not have signed the Report, for though it was an amendment on the existing rules it did not go far enough. He should have wished to see the old Edict restored, which forbade boats of less breadth of beam than that set forth in the Edicts, being used at all on the river above Newnham. He thought this was not a serious restriction on the pleasure of those using that part of the river, for they went there for enjoyment of the scenery and not for rapid motion. It was very common for boats to be upset there, and in the summer the river was so impeded with weeds that even a good swimmer might easily become so entangled as to be in great danger.

Mr. VANSITTART entirely agreed with the Master of Clare, and it was on that account that he had not signed the Report. He thought it a doubtful proceeding to ask men to sign the statement that they could swim at least a hundred yards. Men would often not know that they could not swim a hundred yards and would be tempted to sign; it was rather a trap for consciences. The men who went on the part of the river in question did not go to get hard exercise or to row fast, and light broad boats would do well enough for them. Besides, even if the members of the University could swim, the friends male and female whom they took with them might not all be able to swim. He thought it a pity not to take advantage of the aid Mr. Pemberton was so willing to lend, and forbid the more dangerous kinds of boat on that part of the river.

Mr. TROTTER did not think the Edict should be made stringent. The proposal of the Council was sufficient to meet the case and at the same time was not more than was necessary. The fact that men go in such numbers to that part of the river shewed that they have a strong wish to go, and he saw grave objections to prohibiting them. The amended Edict made it practically safe. The old rule, that a man must be "able to swim," might mean little, but few people could have any doubt as to whether they could swim a hundred yards. He would not say that no fatal accident could happen to a swimmer there, but a swimmer would be practically safe. He believed that to go on that part of the river was far less dangerous than riding, with neither of which it was proposed to interfere.

Mr. HILL approved the object of the Council, but could not agree in their course. He took on one point a view exactly the opposite of that taken by Mr. Trotter, believing that a man could say with certainty whether he could swim, but could very often not say whether he could swim a hundred yards or not, for that was in great measure a matter of training; he had himself swum a quarter of a mile, but he felt quite unable to say whether he could at the present time swim a hundred yards. And further, fifty yards would be enough, or twenty-five, if a man could swim with his clothes on and could keep his presence of mind, one of which conditions it was not proposed to test, while the other could never be guaranteed. The existing Edict failed because there was no provision for inspection of the books which were ordered to be kept, and the second part of the proposal of the Council met this objection and would do all that was necessary. He hoped the Council would reconsider the first part.

Mr. BROWNE thought that there was not much difference between asking men to say they can swim and asking them to say they can swim a hundred yards. He had long thought that sails should be forbidden on canoes in the dangerous parts of the river, and he thought the University should feel grateful to Mr. Pemberton for having issued a notice which had that effect. He hoped the Council would re-consider their second proposal. The Proctors entered upon their office for a year and then passed off and others succeeded them. He thought the responsibility for the inspection of the books should be laid on those who kept the books, and that the Edict should require the boatmen to bring their books every term to the Proctors' rooms. And since the Senior Proctor received applications under the Edict respecting entertainments, the duty of receiving the boatmen with their books might fairly be assigned to the Junior Proctor.

THE FITZWILLIAM MUSEUM.

From the Report of the Syndicate, lately published, we learn that the Museum was visited by 68,560 persons during the year ending April 24th, 1880; also that permission was given during the same period to 63 persons to copy in the Picture Gallery. The Syndicate further report that they have ordered the construction of a new iron winding staircase from the basement to the roof of the building at its north-east angle. As no access exists to the first floor except by the principal stairs, this new staircase will answer the double purpose of providing such separate access, and of replacing the wooden winding staircase which at present leads from the first floor to the roof, and which has been condemned by Cols. Shaw and Galton as very dangerous in case of fire. During the past year the Museum has received numerous donations, including casts of the dying Amazon and Gaul, cast of Diskobolos of Myron, cast of the Hermes of Praxiteles and six others, all from Mr. Henry Sidgwick; also casts from statues, &c. from Athens, Olympia and Halikarnassos, presented by Professor Colvin. Besides these there are numerous additions to the Library, most of which are purchases.

CONCERT AT CORPUS CHRISTI COLLEGE.

The members of the C.C.C.M.S. must have felt confident in their powers to charm when they fixed Wednesday, 26th, the busiest day of a busy week, as the date of their concert.

The programme, however, was attractive, as it was generally understood that Bennett's "May Queen" would form the pièce de résistance. This is the first occasion that this cantata has been performed at a College concert, and the Society may congratulate themselves on the general success they achieved.

It would be difficult to have found a more appropriate selection, both from the popularity of the music and the fitness of the words. During the May week it was certainly true that

> The cloud hath passed away
> That was heavy on the May,
> And the river flowed fair,
> And the meadow bloomed green.

The Society had wisely, in our opinion, determined to entrust the solo parts to practised musicians, relying on their own members, assisted by the Clare choristers, for the chorus parts.

The feature particularly striking to an outsider was the kindly help rendered by men of other Colleges to supplement the orchestra. The vocalists were—Miss May Bell (the May Queen), Miss Lloyd (the Queen), Mr. Pearson (the Lover), and Mr. Sprague (Robin Hood). Miss Bell and Mr. Pearson sang with great taste and intelligence, and the latter may be said to be one of the few tenors who can take that part in the May Queen without apparent effort. The chorus "With a laugh as we go round," and the bass solo, "'Tis jolly to hunt," deserve special praise, but a greater point might have been made of the trio if it had been rehearsed.

Digitized by Google

With "The blessing on the Queen" the first part came to an end, and an opportunity was then afforded for the College to show that hospitality for which Cambridge men are proverbial.

Regrets were expressed that little encouragement had been given during the first part to attempts to encore, but the audience made up for their lost privileges in the second part, which opened with a duett pianoforte, followed by Rossini's "La Dauger," a tarantalla, sung with great spirit by Mr. Sprague, an accomplished amateur. To this followed Chopin's nocturne in E flat and Wieniowski's Polonaise in A major for the violin, played by Herr Gompertz, a musician who richly deserves the popularity he has gained in Cambridge for the refinement and artistic skill that characterise his playing. The old favourites, "The Lost Chord" and "The Message" were perhaps the more acceptable, as requiring no mental strain to follow the melodies, but Flemming's quartett, "Integer Vitae," melodious as it sounded, would perhaps have been more so had the singers used the new pronunciation. To the Chimes of Oberwend the most successful oft he Cambridge College concerts terminated.

The Committee of the Cambridgeshire Horticultural Society met on Wednesday evening last to examine the accounts of the May Show, and it was found that there was a considerable deficiency owing to the disastrous weather on the day of the open show. It is rather a singular fact that in seven years out of the last ten similar weather has been experienced, and consequently the Society's Reserve Fund has not only been exhausted, but there is a large debt due to the Treasurer.—Cambridge Chronicle.

We are glad to notice that the collection on behalf of Addenbrooke's Hospital after Canon Farrar's Sermon amounted to over £70.

POLO.

OXFORD v. CAMBRIDGE.

The Inter-University polo match was played at Hurlingham on Saturday, May 29. Oxford won by four goals to one, the single Cambridge goal being secured by H. C. Bentley. The sides were made up as follows:

OXFORD: J. B. Leigh (captain), W. Kavanagh, J. G. Lawson, J. E. Stock and M. S. Kennard.

CAMBRIDGE: H. C. Bentley (captain), E. Lycet-Green, W. Howard, G. le Fleming and B. Barnard.

THE RIVER.

THE MAGDALENE PAIRS.

These annual races took place on Tuesday and Wednesday. The winning pair received two silver presentation cups and oars, which they hold till next year. The president of C. U. B. C. (Mr. J. A. Watson-Taylor) superintended the race and took the times. Results:—

First Heat: C. R. Freeling and E. C. Brooksbank, Trinity Hall, first: F. N. Stokes and J. M. Hutchinson, Jesus, 0. Won easily by eighty yards, in 8 min. 26½ sec.

Second Heat: L. R. Jones and E. H. Prest, Jesus, first; W. W. Baillie and T. E. Hockin, Jesus, 0. Won by sixty yards, in 8 min. 7 sec.

Final Heat: Jones and Prest, first; Freeling and Brooksbank, 0. Won by thirty-nine yards, in the fastest time on record—7 min. 59 sec.

OXFORD LETTER.

The summer term is at an end: and we are in the middle of the dissipations of Commemoration and collections. The place is full of petticoats: Commemoration has spoken the word and there have come all manner of butterflies—one might, almost say, a plague of butterflies: in fact I think we have more petticoats in the place than gowns. Only a few solitary undergraduates walk about without "people,"—excellent euphemism!—and look almost as ashamed without them as they would with them. It is very hard to get lodgings in consequence; and to have people up seems certainly an act of charity—a charity, however, which does not seem to begin at home. I met a friend looking very unhappy and asked him the reason. He told me he had asked an aunt to come, expecting her to bring his cousins: she had accepted and brought his sisters.

The usual balls will take place. On Friday there was the New College ball, which was the greatest success. Everyone seems to agree in praising it, which is a satisfactory summing up of many triumphs.

Among those on whom degrees are to be conferred are Professor Fawcett and Lord Aberdare. The lively proceedings of last year we can hardly hope to see repeated. I suppose it is better in the interests of order, but one rather longs for some variety in the monotony of the usual "fortissimus, sapientissimus, elegantissimus." Some years ago there used to be no lack of exciting incidents: the cheering of Warren Hastings, the derisive howls with which the Duke of Wellington was greeted when he put on his College cap for the first time—the wrong way. But oil has been poured on the water, I mean that men are allowed to sit with ladies, and the mixture has tamed the undergraduate's savage breast.

A new number of "Waifs and Strays" has appeared. Its appearance is most captivating, and its interior is almost worthy of its exterior. We like particularly a sonnet contrasting the "blind hopes" of Prometheus and the "hovering angel Hope" of Milton, and a very delicate little poem on a Roman mirror buried with its mistress. But why is the Oxford undergraduate so sad?

We have had two dramatic performances: "Ici on parle Français," followed by the screen scene from the "School for Scandal," and winding up with "Dinah and Vilikins," and the Agamemnon. For the first we are indebted to the Philothespian Society, whose first meeting, besides its natural charms, had all the sweetness of stolen waters. But we hope yet to see it rival the A.D.C., though "it may rain Vice-Chancellors for a week," to borrow Luther's simile. The second entertainment—the Agamemnon—took place in Balliol Hall; which the Standard, by the way, contrasts with the "splendid refectory of Magdalen." It was a memorable occasion, the first revival of the play in the original Greek. For the first time one realised that the chorus was not dull, and the Greek drama not beyond human interest. We are very much indebted to the men who conceived the idea and carried it through. The scenes were painted by members of the University, under the superintendence of the Slade Professor, and the dresses designed after classical models by Mr. Burne Jones. Certainly the colouring and grouping were very beautiful, and those who could not understand what they heard could well console themselves with what they saw. The acting of Cassandra seemed to elicit the the most applause; but it is, perhaps, the highest praise one could give, that one forgot the individual actors and their faults or virtues. The play is to be acted at Winchester, Eton, and Harrow, on the three last days of the week.

Merton is having its confusions as well as University. A party of undergraduates called on a friend to help him arrange his room. They found the door inhospitably shut. They signified their impatience. The friend awoke (he was in bed), and called for the porter. The next day the undergraduates were sent down. An appeal to the highest authority was received with great kindness, and they remain down. God save the Dean!

The 'Varsity played the Gentlemen of England, on Tuesday and Wednesday, and got beaten by 32 runs, the latter team made 126 and 120, while Oxford made 94 and 120. The Gentlemen were represented by Walker, Heath, Thornton, Pearson, Webbe, Vernon, Hargreaves, Welman, Robertson, Rotherham and Buchanan; and their highest scores were Walker 28 and 4, Thornton 7 and 44, Webbe 53 and 6, Vernon 12 and 17. For the 'Varsity Colebrooke made 10 and 21, Patterson 8 and 31, Thornton 39 and 13, Harrison 8 and 23.

Very little has been doing on the river this week. The Exeter eight are going fairly, though not as well as in the May races. They are now constituted as they were originally with the exception of Pinckney, who has taken Upcott's place. There has been an Oxford Leander crew training up here for a few days, but now they are at Henley. They ought to make a good crew when they get together, and ought to have a good look in for the "Grand." They are composed thus:—Bow, Poole; 2, West; 3, Wharton; 4, Capron; 5, Boustead; 6, Southwell; 7, Edwardes-Moss; stroke, Ellison.

THREE WEEKS IN FRANCE.

Having utilised the Easter vacation by three weeks in France, I think it may be interesting to some to read a few remarks about the French—disjointed, indeed, and without pretending to give a complete account of the moral, economical and political aspects of that nation, but yet attempting faithfully to portray those those of French people with whom I made acquaintance.

I went to stay in a family in a town near Paris.

I do not quite know to what part of my experience to turn first. I may notice, however, that the French display a simplicity, which it would be well for the English to imitate, no enormous spreads or sumptuous fittings: above all, no attempt to appear richer than is really the case. "The French," a lady one day said to me, "have a keen sense of the ridiculous, and, if anyone invites their friends and surpasses that simplicity which is best suited to their means, they are laughed at." And so it was that the landlord of the house where I was staying, though very well to do, did not straightway cast aside his old ways as he would have done in England, but was contented still to let his wife wear the bonnet cap of the lower classes. This simplicity and self respect, which one finds among all classes—the peasant in his blouse is often worth hundreds, if not thousands—is one of the best traits in the French character. Snobbism is unknown.

A French house ought, indeed, to make us feel ashamed of our luxurious habits. Early rising, simple meals are their rule. And what do the French do all day? This can hardly be considered so satisfactory. Physical exercise is, as a rule, at a discount: the majority of French people rarely go outside their town: the women and girls hardly ever walk, except perhaps on household business, and to pay visits. Visits form a great item in French life. The delight of the French is conversation. Each lady has her days at home, either in the afternoon or evening: and their evenings at home, free from ceremony, are, in my opinion, a very sensible arrangement, inasmuch as it ensures pleasant, social gatherings at the end of the day, without necessarily entailing the burden of a dinner-entertainment. Tuesday was Madame's day at home; and in the evening, after some conversation, a play used often to be read out loud by one of the party. As I was there at Easter-time, there were a good many parties and dances going on, to one or two of which I went. At a French dance the étiquette is far stricter than at an English one. Should you, by any chance, ask your partner to take a turn after a dance, instead of returning her straight to her chaperone, you will be liable to be challenged, or, at any rate, called to account by an irate father or brother. Indeed, the whole system of convenances is very absurd: and we may see the evil consequences of the strict separation of girls and men in the immorality and unhappy marriages so frequent in France. When a young girl arrives at marriageable age, her friends and parents look about for some eligible person, who gains her hand from her parents almost without knowing her; and in many cases the young pair are not once allowed to see each other alone before marriage. A few formal calls, in the presence of third parties, and that is all. How can we wonder, when this is the state of matters, that marriage in France ends miserably? Frenchmen do not see enough of ladies' society; he rarely, if ever, visits ladies of his acquaintance, seeing them only at parties or balls; he knows more of the demi-monde: and this, I think, is another cause of the want of refinement and elevation of thought in men among the French. They have liberty written up on every public building: it is a pity that they do not impart it more into their social arrangements.

Society, too, is marked off in rigid divisions of political parties. For instance, an Orleanist told me that he did not intend to go to a ball that was going to be given at the Préfecture, à cause de mes opinions, and the same principle dominates among the Legitimists. They hold rigidly to their exclusiveness: they will have nothing to do with anyone, socially or politically, except their own narrow band. This, at any rate, was the case, as far as I could judge, at the place where I was staying: though of course some of the wiser among them have rallied to the Republic. Perhaps they maintain this extreme exclusiveness because it is all they have left. One cannot help feeling sorry for them, though one is often angry at the bigotry and want of patriotism they display in political matters, and at this foolish exclusiveness. An account of one more rather French scene, and I shall have done. About once a week takes place what the French call a "Conférence," i.e., a public lecture on some political, literary, scientific or artistic subject. The topic this time was to be the Livre d'un Père, by M. Victor de la Prade. The Conférence was to be held at the Mairie: a queer little Professor of some four-score years, who insisted on my going three-quarters of an hour before the time, was going to introduce me. We went in, and, after waiting some time, our Conférencier entered. He was deputy for the place: of somewhat radical tendencies, and a poseur. The poems which he read us were pretty; the manner in which he read them absurd. He threw his arms about, shouted till the whole room re-echoed, pointed down at the audience with his forefinger, went into raptures, struck the table in a manner that made me tremble for the lamp, and of course did not omit some of the patriotic poems, one of which, addressed in '71 to the Emperor William, ended up in no complimentary terms, informing him that Guillaume, vous êtes un bandit. What will happen to the provinces? One lady to whom I spoke on the subject hoped there would be some possibility of their being bought back: and I do not see why, at any rate, Lorraine should not be regained in this manner, especially if France, when a new generation shall have sprung up in Germany, should take advantage of any complications that might arise between Germany and some foreign power and make such an arrangement the price of neutrality.

My stay in France was not long; but I came back grateful for the kindness shewn me, with a pleasant recollection of the French; and with a feeling that with all their failings there is in them much good sense, and many good qualities, which the late war has done not a little to bring into prominence, while it has corrected and chastened their weakness and vanity.

NOTES ON SOME PICTURES IN THE GROSVENOR GALLERY.

The following notes are put together without any clear attempt at arrangement or completeness. It is almost impossible to make a study of any of the annual exhibitions of pictures which shall have any just claim to authority, without devoting more time to the work than that usually at a visitor's command. The crowds of people that flock into the rooms, pursuing each their own objects, without regard to the convenience of their neighbours, and without any just power of appreciation themselves, is so utterly destructive to that frame of mind which is necessary for a critic, that he can never be certain, unless after numerous visits, that his opinions have not been more or less the result of accident, or his censure of the discomfort of the moment.

The first picture to which a visitor will naturally turn his attention is Mr. Burne Jones' "Golden Stairs." This is one of the largest in the collection, and quite the most carefully finished. The subject is very simple. A party of maidens, eighteen in number, are represented as descending a staircase. The last of them are coming out of a door on the left in the upper story, whilst their leaders enter another door exactly below it in the bottom left handed-corner of the picture. The staircase is circular and without a balustrade, so that nothing comes between the spectator and the procession of girls. The light enters above from an opening in the roof of the court. The grouping of the figures is excellent. There is no crowding; all is quiet and filled with a spirit of harmony. The maidens carry musical instruments, violins, trumpets, cymbals, and so forth. It is quite clear that they have only just left off playing in the room from which they come. There is in all their faces a dim expression of exalted contemplation, a memory of a quiet enthusiasm. They walk as though their thoughts were far away in some mystic dream. A few of them are represented as talking, but their voices are not raised above a whisper; their laughter is the laughter of the artist when the Spirit of music overshadows him and when thought is lost in feeling.

This idea of pre-occupation is further emphasised in the person of one of the girls who has just reached the bottom of the stairs. She ought to turn to the right to go into the door of the room below, following her companions; but she has forgotten all about it, she sees no one around her, she knows nothing of what is going on, she walks along dreamily beating her cymbals and gazing almost vacantly into the air, so that the others are obliged to call her attention. Another maiden higher up on the stairs with a violin seems almost lost in the music that runs in her mind, she draws the bow softly across the strings and thinks of nothing besides. Whence they come and whither they are going there is nothing to say. What are these Golden Stairs, and why are they gold, or are they gold at all? It is a dream of fairy land, of fairy maidens living in fairy dreams, wandering ever in soft light in a home where the trouble of life enters not, and where the air they breathe wafts only the soft cadencies of music, or comes laden with the scent of flowers. Above is the deep clearness of the sky, and the doves are cooing on the eaves.

The picture is not at first sight attractive, and so far as I could judge from the remarks of many of the spectators meets with almost unqualified condemnation from the hasty visitor. It presents no gorgeousness of colouring, no brilliancy of light, no gloom of shadow. It is remarkable only for utmost refinement of finish, and utmost accuracy of drawing. It is the deliberate work of an earnest man, who has all his powers absolutely under control; and as such it will prove most admirable to those who know what is the misery of impatience, and what the despair of weariness. No one need expect to come away delighted from it after a few moments inspection; all on the other hand may count upon finding real delight in it after—say only half-an-hour's careful study.

Mr. Herkomer's portrait of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, the property of King's College, will probably attract a considerable amount of attention from Cambridge men. It cannot be called pleasing in the ordinary sense of the term. The artist clearly has not wished to flatter his subject; he has simply tried, so far as he could, to see into the man, into the thoughts and feelings of him, and to show him such as he really is. He is seated quietly in an ordinary arm-chair, almost facing the spectator, his hands resting lightly on the arms. The attitude of the head suggests a change from a position of repose to one of attention, as though the spectator had just begun to address him, and he were listening carefully. The mouth is firmly closed, the eyes keenly fixed on the speaker, the skin much wrinkled at the corners of the eyebrows. The eyes are deep set below them, and a shadow falls from the brow and nose. Here is clearly a stern man and a penetrating, a man capable of seeing a fallacy and incapable of tolerating one. Stern he certainly is, but behind all this there lies, as you cannot fail to see, a vast fund of joy, and the features, even when most austere, are always ready to melt into a smile. No lack of sympathy lies in this face as the artist has represented it, but it is not upon this that he has concentrated his attention. He has thrown the other characteristic prominently forward as the key-note of the man, and only suggested many another quality, which a weaker artist would have preferred to make of prime importance.

I must deal much more rapidly with the few paintings which the space allotted still enables me to notice. The portrait of Charles Darwin in his doctor's robe, by Mr. W. B. Richmond, will not fail to be looked at. The red folds, which the Venetian painters would have loved to make rich with a deep warmth of colour, are sadly cold and dull. This is a great drawback, because so much of the canvas is occupied by it alone. The face is a careful study, but it does not go deep enough, it does not tell us much about the man himself. It is at best only a superficial likeness, and leaves us to go away unsatisfied.

M. Bastian Lepage's portrait of Sarah Bernhardt will be well known to many from the numerous chromolithograph reproductions of it, which have been sold for some time past. It is a whispy, fidgety portrait, the young lady being all over tufts and puffs. There is no harmony or peace about her; perhaps it is the character of the subject that is at fault, but the effect is unpleasing, though the colouring is in many respects excellent.

Mr. Watt's Daphne has already been before the public, and no one will regret the opportunity of making a further acquaintance with it.

Amongst the 293 pictures which form the collection there are only two in which clouds are rendered in the sky with any approach to accuracy of effect. These are Mr. Moore's "After a Gale" and Mr. Howard's "Banks of Irthing." No exhibition is complete without its snow mountain. Mr. Donne's Schinglehorn is much less successful in this line than some of his less finished works might have led us to expect.

POETRY.

A SKETCH.

His feet are washed with dews empearled,
He wanders under dawning sky,
In grassy meadows when the world
Awakens with a sigh.

He hangs at heat of breathless noon
Above the babbling of a stream,
And hearkens the cicala's tune
As in a listless dream.

He cometh home at eventide,
When man from labour cometh home;
He cannot at the hearth abide
Or rest, but ever roam.

And round his path the waving wings
Of angel guardians attend,
And in his ear a spirit sings:
"Fear not; I am thy friend."

To him the bird that sings at morn
Praises her young and tells her love,
To him all hearts bereaved that mourn
Chords sympathetic move.

His love on humble flowers doth dwell
And fills the spaces of the sky,
To him the stars their secrets tell
Laying their mantles by.

Their magic mantles that conceal
Their glory from the common gaze,
While their bright-sworded squadrons wheel
Throughout the fiery maze.

"O flowers, and birds, and stars above,
And angel voices day and night,
I wander lonely, reft of love,
Love that is infinite.

"The stream is pure and quick and clear,
The skies are fresh and free from cloud;
Nevermore what I would I hear
Though strains of joy be loud.

"To Man alone can love be full;
O men my brothers, where are ye?
O Nature that art beautiful,
O void—void to me!"

His heart that yearned no answer won
From man; he wandered all alone;
His spirit fled from its earthy bed,
And they found him lying alone.

THE SHEPHERD.

(From Goethe.)

There was an idle shepherd, fond of sleep,
Who never troubled him about his sheep.

But by a maiden was he captive led—
He left the bottle, sleep and hunger fled.

His passion drove him to unrest and flight;
He'd moan and groan and count the stars at night!

* * * * *

But when, at length, the maiden he had ta'en,
Sleep, hunger, thirst—they all came back again.

A LEVY.

AD LEUCONOEN.

Gather roses while they blow,
To-morrow's not to day;
Let no hour delightless go,
Time doth flee away.

Kiss the maiden, quaff the wine,
Thine the chance to-day;
To-morrow will it still be thine?
Time doth flee away.

Put not off a worthy deed,
Worthier done to-day;
'Carpe diem' be thy creed,
Time doth flee away.

THE PAPER-KNIFE.

The Light of Asia, or The Great Renunciation, being the life and teaching of Guatama, Prince of India, and founder of Buddhism. By Edwin Arnold. London, Trübner and Co.

The restless activity of the nineteenth century is as well exemplified in modern religious thought as in matters relating to every-day life. The root-searching critical spirit has attacked the strongholds of all beliefs, and is often mistaken for a love of discord and discontent; but it seems rather to be a search after rest and peace, a striving to obtain some rational object of belief. Peace then is the goal. Various religions offer us the way to obtain it, Positivism through Humanity, Christianity through Jesus the Christ, Buddhism through the doctrine of Siddârtha the Buddha.

'The Light of Asia' is a Poem which attempts to give us the ruling spirit of Prince Guatama, the method of its development and the main doctrines which resulted. It is the central idea of peace, so interesting in the present state of religious unrest, with which we must content ourselves just now; the vestments of the poem, though they may flow in harmonious curves with here and there a wrinkle, and though they may be bedecked with oriental imaginings, we must pass over, and utilise our space with what appears to be the object of the work.

Prince Siddârtha was the only child of King Suddhôdana of the great Solar Race of India. At his birth, which has some resemblance to that of Baldur the Beautiful, he had the prophetic thirty-two sacred marks, and eighty lesser tokens. His youth was spent in the acquiring of all known knowledge and physical prowess, and stories are told of his beauty and tenderness to all living things. It is interesting to note that when a child he soon eclipsed his teachers in learning. The story of his decision of a wife and his early married life must be passed over. The sorrows of mankind soon began to weigh upon him, for, though, kept free from all appearance of misery, yet those chance contacts with suffering, which could not be avoided, so impressed him, that, forsaking father, wife, child and kingdom, he fled by night into a desert place apart, and there in a far-off land he tried to find the First Cause, and to work out redemption from sin and sorrow. With the mistaken zeal of many novitiates, he tried to gain peace of mind, by the crucifixion of the flesh; but, though he subdued the body, the doctrine came not, and after six years of marvellous austerities he left the company of the ascetics.

By example as well as precept he preached universal love, extending it to the whole creation, stopping all sacrifices, pointing out how all can take, but none can give that life which was so dear to all,

"Nor, spake he, shall one wash his spirit clean
By blood; nor gladden gods, being good, with blood;
Nor bribe them, being evil; nay, nor lay
Upon the brow of innocent bound beasts
One hair's weight of that answer all must give
For all things done amiss or wrongfully,
Alone, each for himself, reckoning with that
The fixed arithmetic of the universe,
Which meeteth good for good and ill for ill
Measure for measure, unto deeds, words, thoughts."

The ascetics then tried to convert him to the Brahmistic idea of an actionless, passionless mergence into the vast divine, "but the Prince heard them not yet comforted," and again returned to commune with nature, this time in a sylvan retreat—neglecting his body till "worn by stress of soul, lost day by day the marks which testify the Buddha." He now gave up caste, and, taught by the chance song of a Nautch girl, he also renounced his mode of life since he found that his strength was gone now that he needed it most. Then came the reaction from all his physical restraint, and for a whole night under the shade of the henceforth sacred Bôdhi-tree he passed through that crisis of temptation which occurs to the world's deliverers. The forces of Hell were let loose upon him.

"——— But whether these befell
Without and visible, or whether Buddh
Strove with fell spirits in his inmost heart,
Judge ye:—I write what ancient books have writ."

In the third watch of the night the Buddha attained Sammâ sambuddh, and saw how the present is only the fulfilment of all the past;

"And how in each life good begets more good,
Evil fresh evil, Death but casting up
Debit or credit."

In the middle watch Abhidjna was attained, the result of the past was transmitted to the future, and that the fixed law of fate, the true Nemesis, silently worked,

"———having none to bid,
None to forbid; for this is past all gods
Immutable, unspeakable, supreme.
A power which builds, unbuilds, and builds again."

In the fourth watch the secret of sorrow came, sorrow is the shadow to life which death alone separates. The ignorant cling to the "sad delights and pleasant griefs" of life, this delusion breeds perverse tendency till "Life's thirst quenches itself with draughts which double thirst." The wise, however, tear themselves away from these false shows and steel themselves

"To seek not, strive not, wrong not; bearing meek
All ills which flow from foregone wrongfulness,
And so constraining passions that they die
Famished . . . . . .
Thus 'finishing the path;' free from earth's cheats;
. . . . . saved
From whirling on the wheel; aroused and sane
As is a man wakened from hateful dreams,
Until—greater than kings, than Gods more glad!—
The aching craze to live ends, and life glides—
Lifeless—to nameless quiet, nameless joy,
Blessed NIRVANA—sinless, stirless rest—
That change which never changes!"

Then awoke a new day for the world, and for that day there was peace on earth. The Buddha now preached his doctrines to all men, converting his father, his wife, and multitudes besides.

According to our author, who believes that "a third of mankind would never have been brought to believe in blank abstractions, or in nothingness as the issue and crown of Being," Nirvana is the peace of conquered desire, not the annihilation of sensation; those who are conversant with Christian mysticism will perfectly appreciate the difference, thus like the Kingdom of Heaven, Nirvana commences on earth.

Want of space prevents us from going more fully into the doctrines of Prince Siddârtha; enough has however been given to show, schematically, the development and main drift of the doctrine. The idea is essentially that of evolution—what is results from what has been—what shall be from what is—do wrong and you will reap evil, do good and the harvest will be happiness.

"Such is the law which moves to righteousness,
Which none at least can turn aside or stay;
The heart of it is love, the end of it
Is peace and consummation sweet—obey!"

Leaving unnoticed the various roads and stages to the upper heights of peace we will conclude with the Five Rules whereby to live aright. Kill not—lest you prevent development: give freely and take not by force or fraud; bear not false witness, slander not, nor lie; do not become intoxicated; do not commit adultery nor sins of the flesh.

Elements of Chemistry by Adolphe Wurtz. Sonnenschein and Allen.

The object of the author of this work appears to have been to produce a book, which, being more complete than the text books commonly used by beginners, may serve as a good introduction to the standard treatises of the science. This object seems to us to have been successfully attained. Chemistry is too far advanced to admit of any great amount of originality in a work of this kind, even in treatment; but the most important facts are clearly stated, and perhaps more attention than usual is paid to the theoretical deductions which may be drawn from them.

The section on the non-metals strikes us as particularly good, and is preceded by a short but clear account of the fundamental laws of the science, in which attention is rightly drawn to the partial laws of chemical combination which were known previously to Dalton's statement of the general laws of multiple and equivalent proportions.

In the portion on organic chemistry, the wise course has been taken of limiting the number of compounds considered, and treating them with sufficient fullness to give a clear idea of their relations to each other. In so far as the newest discoveries affect the subject matter they seem usually to have been taken account of; but we cannot help regretting that no mention is made of Körner's researches, which are of great theoretical importance and afford the only sure basis we possess for determining "position" in the various isomeric aromatic bodies.

A Tramp Abroad, by Mark Twain. Chatto and Windus.

It is proverbially inadvisable to do anything by halves, and Mark Twain has not succeeded in escaping the fate of those who set common-places at defiance. The work before us is apparently an attempt to construct a guide-book, whose monotony shall be relieved by humour. The result is that it has to be considered in two lights, as a guide-book and as a work of humour.

As a guide book it is as might have been expected a failure. A general idea of Heidelberg and the Neckar is supplied in the first half of the first volume, and serves moderately well to refresh the memory of those who are acquainted with those regions. Several salient features of the state of things in general are well brought out, mostly by comic incidents; so the abundance of English speaking persons around Heidelberg is well estimated when the traveller is recommended by Harris, his companion, to speak of his more private affairs in German, while travelling in a train with strangers.

The customs of the students of Heidelberg occupy several chapters, duelling of course taking a prominent place. After describing a students' duel, and expressing somewhat favourable opinions of the questionable practice, the author plunges into a wild burlesque of a duel in France, inserted as a satire on the French mode of serious but bloodless duels compared with the frivolous but bloody ones of the Germans; but the juxtaposition of the two accounts serves to increase the feeling of a mixture of the serious and comic which is at the best irritating.

American humour of a fair quality may be found throughout the book, but if the reader wishes to find it he must skip largely.

The travellers afterwards adjourn to Switzerland and the guide book becomes for a time lost in the burlesque. It reappears however apropos of Mont Blanc and the Matterhorn. After a quotation from Mr. Whymper's account of the accident on the latter mountain, it would perhaps have been better if the next chapter did not begin with a somewhat jocose account of the way in which graves are made in Switzerland. The traveller briefly mentions that he climbed Mont Blanc, and recounts some accidents, after which Venice is visited. The work of the humourist is less than that of the guide book writer in this book, but then it is better. A standing joke is maintained throughout that the travellers are on a walking expedition, and consequently trains and carriages are the chief modes of progression. A raft is made use of in going down the Neckar, and an amusing account of a storm encountered on that river. The climax is reached when the waves run "inches high threatening every moment to engulf our frail boat;" a leak is discovered, made by the separation of two of the logs, and the travellers are set to work to bale out the water, i.e. the river, when a man falls overboard, but, as the river, is between two and three feet deep he is saved, and, the raft floating up against the bank, the voyage is terminated.

"Modicus cibi medicus sibi," or "Nature her own physician," by J. E. B. Mayor, M.A., Professor of Latin in the University of Cambridge. Macmillan and Co., 1880. pp. 120.

This book contains a sermon on the text—"Then shall they fast in those days," preached in the Chapel of St. John's College, on the Second Sunday in Lent; to which is prefixed an address to the members of the Cambridge University Branch of the Church of England Temperance Society. After the sermon comes a large body of notes. Mr. Mayor's work in the cause of Dietetic Reform is well known; and we feel sure that many of our readers, though they may not be prepared to go all lengths with the Professor, will still be glad to study the strong arguments with which he fortifies his position. To such as these we can heartily recommend the volume before us. We should have noticed that the book contains a supplementary sermon on "Blessed are the pure," also preached in St. John's Chapel. As a specimen of Professor Mayor's style of preaching, let us quote the following:—

"As men count excess, it cannot be said that our college table, even as it is now, provokes to it Last year a German, present at a College feast, was surprised that, amidst so much abundance, the guests took so little. Waiving the question whether intemperance does not begin far short of the line drawn by the fashion and science of the day, let me address a concluding caution to our imperia in imperio; for a sober College may be ruined by riotous clubs. Our chief club was founded some fifty years ago by men who knew the temptations of good-fellowship: they therefore named it by the name of the lady Margaret, as a talisman against luxury, for to the athlete luxury is suicide. With the foundress join the memory of the hero bishop of the isles, and athletics may be a help, not a hindrance, to the only end of life which Margaret of Richmond or George Selwyn prized: that we may offer and present ourselves, our souls and bodies, disciplined to bear and to forbear, to be areasonable, holy and lively sacrifice unto God."

T. Macci Plauti Captivi, with an introduction, critical apparatus and explanatory notes. School edition. By Edward Sonnenschein, Scholar of University College, Oxford. Ditto. with an appendix containing emendations by Bentley on the whole of Plautus.

This edition appears on examination to be little more than an adaptation of a German edition for English readers. The explanatory notes, which of course are the really important part of any edition, are translated from Brix's commentaries on the Captivi and Trinummus. From the latter also comes the discussion on Prosody in the introduction. A few notes enclosed in square brackets have been added by the English editor.

We will not presume to criticise Dr. Brix'sscholarship; suffice it to say that the notes seem to us to be far less "tall" than German notes generally are: that is to say, they consist less of long paraphrases of passages which are perfectly clear, and more of quotations and illustrations. What the student of every age and degree wants is not to be told straight out what a passage means, but to be provided with the parallel passages from which he can infer the meaning by an inductive process. But we wish that editors and especially editors who are writing for schools, as Mr. Sonnenschein claims to do, would remember that it is much better to illustrate out of books which students generally read. Our editor has done something towards this in his own additions to Brix's notes. He gives us for instance one quotation out of the Epistle to the Philippians and another out of Midsummer Night's Dream. But a good deal more might be done in this way. For instance in illustrating χορηγέω in the sense of "supply," it would be better at least for schoolboys to quote the New Testament, e.g. ii. Cor. ix. 10, than a book like Aristotle's Ethics. And for every reader, schoolboy or otherwise, it would oe more useful to quote Horace's "Oceano dissociabili," than a passage from the "De Naturâ Deorum." By the way the statement on page 79 that "duellum" is always a dissyllable requires at least some explanation for the "intelligent school boy" who remembers "pacem duello miscuit."

Altogether the most interesting point about Mr. Sonnenschein's book is his idea of the schoolboy's requirements. The only difference between the school edition and the other is that the latter contains an excursus on the critical value of the Codex Britannicus and a list of Bentley's emendations on Plautus. With regard to the last all we can say is that the students of the Humanity Classes at Glasgow, for whom this edition was originally intended, must have a good deal more brains and time to spare than their brethren at Cambridge. But we are quite sure that no edition of Plautus has any right to be called a school edition which lays any stress on Plautine prosody. Surely a subject which not 10 men in a Tripos go into is useless to the few clever boys in a school, much more to those extremely average scholars, of which a sixth form is principally composed.

The question of a 'local habitation' for the Philological Society, in which a large number of the members are interested, is still pending. The Syndicate, appointed at the instance of the Antiquarian Society to consider the claims of Archæology to a room in University buildings, had its instructions enlarged to consider the claims of Philology. At present there is a difficulty in finding one which suits the wants of both Societies, but they are hopeful for the future.

THE UNIVERSITY PULPIT:

SUPPLEMENT TO

The Cambridge Review.

No. 26. WEDNESDAY, JUNE 9, 1880.

Sunday, June 6th.

Sermon by the Rev. W. PAGE ROBERTS, M.A., St. John's College.

"I have set God always before me."—Psalm xvi. 9.

It will be admitted, I think, that few men get out of the powers with which they are endowed all that they might get. Even in the matter of common-place pleasure people do not reach all the enjoyment which they might. And the reason is, their lives proceed without rule or system. They do not study the ground on which they stand, nor mark out the surest, straightest way to that which they desire. They neither carefully clear away impediments nor chasten and repress rival impulses. They do not constrain the various forces of their nature into one direction, nor fling them with concentrated intensity upon their object. Dissipation is the parent of mediocrity. Because there is neither government nor concentration nor dominant idea in men's lives, they never do much, never grow to any size; and, to quote the words of Lessing's Nathan,

" . . . Middling good, as we are,
Spring up everywhere in plenty."

I have used the phrase 'dominant idea,' and it is to the subject of self-government by means of a dominant idea that I venture to point your attention.

A dominant idea is an idea which has taken such firm hold of the mind that it necessarily presents itself along with any other idea which may arise, passes judgment upon it, and either allows it free course, or condemns it to inactivity and ultimate suppression. A dominant idea is an idea which mixes itself with all other ideas, giving them its own colour and character; so that you cannot take out any thought from a mind in which a dominant idea exists, and analyse it, but you shall find traces of this one idea. Often in weak or diseased minds, especially in the mental condition we call Monomania, we have noticeable instances of the power of dominant ideas. It has been remarked that in many of the strange facts of mesmerism and its kindred marvels we may see the force of dominant ideas.* Constantly we meet with men who have one thought by which they explain everything, and they infect us with a dominant feeling that they are very tiresome. Everything one man does is right, and everything another man does is wrong, because we interpret everything by a fixed idea. You know how one thought gets attached to another. For instance, you have been in the constant habit of seeing a certain person at a certain place. You could not go to that place without thinking of that person. You could not hear the place mentioned without thinking of that person. As Sir William Hamilton well says:—"There are thoughts associated, whether as principles or accessories, to a greater number of determining circumstances, or to circumstances which recur more frequently. Hence they present themselves oftener than others, they enter more completely into our habits, and take in a more absolute manner the character of customary or habitual notions. It hence results that they are less obtrusive though more energetic in their influences, enacting as they do a principal part in almost all our deliberations; and exercising a stronger influence on our determinations." †

Now it is a fact that restraining, ruling ideas spring up naturally. The emotions are the first parents of ideas. In his lowest state man is the creature of his appetites and unreasoned desires, a state in which no idea impedes the course of animal desire. But early in his history, as in each individual life, is felt the force of some checking idea. Circumstances, experience, what you will, silently extract from the feelings their latent idea; the idea emerges into distinct consciousness and puts forth a claim to command. As man frees himself from the control of the blind impulses of savagery, little intellectual centres gradually form which give forth shocks, originating or regulating action; and the higher he advances the greater the governing power of these intellectual centres. Primitive man hears a voice rebuking mere animal desire, which says "Thou shalt not eat of it," and the moment that voice is heard a moral nature has arisen and heaven become possible. But in many cases these intellectual centres, whose presence within us vindicate our claim to be men, seem to arise accidentally, to be the product rather of external circumstances than of internal intention. They form almost without our notice. Side by side grow up other centres quite unconnected with the former; at one time action is governed by one centre, and at another by another, like an army ruled on alternate days by different generals. There is no supreme co-ordinating centre, like the brain in the nervous system, binding the whole into organic unity. And this is why we see the strange contradictions, and dislocations and inconsistencies which surprise us in the lives of so many men: why men are one thing in one relationship of life, and quite another in a different one, with different sets of principles for different circumstances. And this is why men of power often accomplish so little and why there is so little coherent noble character. For I am afraid that the great majority of men allow their lives, as they do their beliefs, to go anyhow. They have never formed a distinct opinion as to the shape their life is to take. They have never said calmly and strongly to themselves, "this is the intention which is to rule my life." They play the part of a sculptor who has no model and no fixed idea. There is the marble, and they knock a piece out here and another there; but no man can predict the final result. Eating and drinking, working and playing, and all the time gliding swiftly on to the grave,—this is the distracted existence so many of us are living. What shall we be, what shall we do to-morrow? We really cannot tell. It will depend upon the people we meet,—the things which are said to us. We have no real rule. If we are tempted to do wrong, it is possible, it is even probable that we may do it—unless it is some very bad thing quite out of our way. It is not impossible we may say that which is untrue, that for our own gain we may deceive this person and attack with anger that. If opportunity befall us we may yield to intemperance or take the dark road of impurity. We may be good-natured, or fly off into fiery passion. We may help someone who is in trouble, or strike a blow by word or act at a rival or an enemy. We do not know what we shall do because we have no plan, no decision. Instead of our lives being like some well-ordered state, they are more like mob-anarchy, twisted and twirled by the last breath and the latest appeal—a shapeless jumble of good, bad and indifferent. Is not this a disgraceful state of things, which ought to make sensible men hang down their heads with shame? How are we to get rid of it? This is no mere question of Theology. It is a question we ought to settle even if there be no God at all. To be trundled into a grave by anybody who will deign to give us a push, is not a very fine business for the heirs of all the ages. God or no God—this anarchy ought to cease. How can it be made to do so? Clearly by setting up some governing authority endowed with absolute power.

We have seen already that governing, checking ideas get themselves established in the mind almost without our observation and intention; and men come to repress certain impulses because experience has shown that directly or indirectly they result in pain or interfere with some more attractive purpose or pleasure. But it is in our power to choose what idea we shall be ruled by,

and, having chosen, it is in our power to make the idea a ruling one. For many of us know too well the difference between having an idea of what we shall be and do, and of really being and doing it. Look at the dull uninspired beings whose characters have compacted into a common gritty conglomerate unfitted for all high uses, and bid them bring to mind their earlier days filled with ardent hopes and lofty aims. What a terrible contrast it is! and now they are past the age of hopes and aims. With many of you, however, it is different. The future is still in your hands to make. With you it is the season "when great thoughts strike along the brain and flush the cheek;" but unless you take firm hold of them and establish them in your lives and make them dominant, the day will come to you when passion will be dead and your life be spread around you like a dry and dreary desert. How is an idea to be made dominant? Only by continuous effort, only by trying and trying until effort has become habit. It may be that you have seen, in some victim of intemperance, the triumph of a saving purpose. In a moment of mental or spiritual exaltation the slave said "I will be free;" and a vow was made never more to touch the maddening ruin. Opportunities were sought to strengthen the new intention by association with those engaged in the same work by proclaiming the new determination, by seeking to win others to the same side. No doubt there came terrible times of depression and alarm, when all seemed near to shipwreck; but the power of habit which had been growing while that of excited feeling was declining, proved victorious. And it is in a way like this we must make our chosen idea into an established monarchy. The moments of choice are as a rule moments of spiritual elevation. It is when we have been strongly moved that we say "I will be this—I will reach to that." And we begin our work for it, and work at first is easy for the force of feeling is strong. But it is in the nature of excited feelings to decline in power. We must get some other power then able to carry on the work which feeling has begun. That power is habit. For every degree of feeling lost we must gain a degree of habit. In making the most of our comparatively easy day we shall acquire a force for the harder ones;

"And tasks in hours of insight will'd
May be through hours of gloom fulfilled." ¶

We must determine to associate our chosen idea with all our pleasures and labours. We must determine to bring it before the mind every day. We must settle to ourselves that that one thing must be recalled to mind whatever else is forgotten. It is perfectly astonishing how little labour men bestow on the formation of their own characters. Months and years go to the attainment of some branch of knowledge, but greatness of soul, if it come at all, must come by chance as men catch a disease. But if you will take the same pains with your moral culture as you do with your physical and mental culture; if you determine once every hour in every day to think of your rule, if you begin each day with the same determination; if for weeks, and months, and years, never omitting a day, you still bring before your mind your rule and ever try your proceedings by it; in the long run without effort that thought will come with all your other thoughts; and thus not letting your life shape itself by chance, but choosing an authority, and confirming it by unflagging effort you will set up a monarch in your mind, introduce a converting principle of order, and enthrone a dominant idea.

What then shall be our dominant idea? I said that even if there were no God we needed some organising principle to correct our moral anarchy. But the most natural, the most necessary, the most regulating, the most inspiring idea is that of God. The idea of God, I may venture to say without fear of contradiction—since materialist and supernaturalist alike will yield assent to the statement—the idea of God is our birthright. We may be told that it is quite natural, that like all our intuitions and ideas which once were called innate, ideas which necessarily arise under certain circumstances, this too of God is a natural growth, the certain result of thousands of years experience compacted into a mental heritage; the slow concentration of the feelings of wonder and awe into an ever-refining idea. Well, if it be so, what of that? To know how an intuition arose does not destroy the grounds or reasons we have for accepting it. It has been said, "There is no distinction which has to be more steadily kept in view than this between causes and antecedents which produce a belief, and the grounds or reasons which justify one."‡ At least the idea of God stands upon exactly the same ground as all our other intuitions. It is as primary and absolute as all those ultimate propositions, beyond the realms of proof, but which we cannot do without, and on which we found all our scientific conclusions. Our intuitions of space and time and the certainty we have of the existence of an external world are not illusions because they are the product of evolution. They are among the most practical and regulating of all our conclusions. Because a great idea has been reached by evolution; that does not doom it to perish. If it does, then since every thing is the product of evolution all is equally unsubstantial, and that which Athanasian science calls positive, "a vapour which appeareth for a little while and then vanisheth away"—then evolution is a scientific Buddhism, whose end is the sleep of Nirvana—it is the broad way which leads to destruction. But on the other hand, if it be God's method of teaching us of Himself, we must guard and hand on to the future the precious heritage. For even on the confession of those who are supposed to set least store by the idea of God—it is necessary and it is beneficent. Mr. Herbert Spencer says "We are obliged to regard every phenomenon as a manifestation of some power by which we are acted upon. . . . We are unable to think of limits to the presence of this power—and this consciousness of an incomprehensible power, called omnipresent from inability to assign its limits, is just the consciousness on which religion dwells."§ And that distinguished mathematician, over whose early grave so many tears of tenderness have been shed, but whose strong mind when directed to religion always showed symptoms of disease, says:—"The idea of an external conscious being is unavoidably suggested by the moral nature." He says, "belief in God is a comfort and solace to those who can hold it," and again "the conclusion of the whole matter is that belief in God and in a future life is a source of refined and elevated pleasure to those who can hold it." ‖ Here then is an idea ready to our hand; an idea confessed even by those who wish to efface it, to be natural, inevitable, and ennobling; the largest idea which has ever been wrought out in man, before which the comprehending laws of science grow small as the stars when the sun comes out; an idea which is alike an explanation, an inspiration, and an everlasting satisfaction. You have that idea. You cannot help it. But you may either do much to rub it out, or engrave it with still deeper lines into your soul. The idea is your birthright, but it is for you to make it dominant, that a new order may arise in the soul what has been a moral chaos; it is for you to hand on the great gift of the past, in a still finer form, to the future. For did we in our business, and in our pleasures, in our whispered words and public prayings, when love makes us glad and sorrow oppresses, when we speak of religion and perform our public duties, still have it ever present to us that God was near, that God was looking at us, how many a sin would be uncommitted! When called to duty we should not idly excuse ourselves if we felt the great eyes of God upon us. And as for that meanness, that baseness which even now at times despises itself, how would it be shrivelled and scorched by the sight of God! Where God is sin cannot be, and where God is, all beauty must be. Let this idea but become dominant, and new heaven and a new earth will arise wherein dwelleth righteousness,

"Time will run back and fetch the age of gold,
And speckled Vanity
Will sicken soon and die,
And leprous sin will melt from earthly mould,
And hell itself will pass away,
And leave her dolorous mansions to the peering day."

My brethren, the one service I would do you is to stir you to this great achievement. I have but little claim to speak to those who have won high place in this great University. It were fitter that they should speak to me. But memories of other days come back upon me, and I would, if it were possible, do some humble service in the place where so many benefits were conferred on me. "Master," said the reiterated voice of revenge, "Remember the Athenians." Be this my one voice to you, "Remember thy Creator," and let it become the unceasing voice of moral and religious determination within your soul. Then, when dangers assail, you will be strong in the sight of God. Your work will lose its dullness or it will gain new dignity in that grand presence, and spotless honour will be its rule. When long cherished hopes at length are realised, and the heart flows over with joy, it will also rise upward in thanksgiving. And when the world fades away from you, and its voices grow faint in your eyes, then will you fear no evil, because God is with you.

A meeting under the presidency of the Archbishop of Canterbury has been held in the Library of Lambeth Palace in aid of the funds for the establishment of Theological Halls at Oxford and Cambridge; not for Undergraduates, but to educate resident members of the Universities who are candidates for Holy Orders in the principles of the "Reformed Protestant Church." Amongst those present were the Bishop of Mauritius, Bishop Perry and Bishop Ryan.

ALL SAINTS' MEMORIAL CROSS.

Our readers may have lately noticed some building operations going on in Old All Saints' Churchyard. These are the first beginnings of a monumental Cross, the drawings of which have been sent us by the committee; they are designed by Mr. Basil Champneys, the architect of the new Divinity Schools. The Cross will surmount a decorative shaft standing on a pedestal, the whole rising to a height of nearly thirty feet. The shaft is to be adorned with four statues, viz., St. Aidan, (representative of the British Church), St. Augustine, (of the Saxon Church), Venerable Bede, (of Latin Learning) St. Theodore of Tarsus, (of Greek Learning). The following inscription has been provisionally decided upon:—"This Cross marks the site of the Church of All Saints, which was taken down in the year 1865, and is designed to preserve the memory of the literary men, benefactors, and other parishioners, whose names are engraved on the faces of the pedestal." The literary men commemorated are the following:—Henry Kirke White, Isaac Barrowe, M.D., Ambrose Bonwick, Salusbury Jones, M.A., John Powell, B.D., Richard Nethercoat Cooke, Thomas Cubitt, Niccolò Doria, Marchese di Spineto, Charles Henry Cooper, F.S.A. Then follow the names of benefactors to the parish, and other parishioners. The total cost of the memorial has been estimated at £460. Towards this amount about £410 has already been promised. Further subscriptions may be paid at any of the Cambridge Banks, or to Mr. C. S. Bulstrode, the Honorary Treasurer.

HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN.

At the Congregation on Thursday, June 3rd, the following Grace, having received the sanction of the Council, passed the Senate:—"That the Vice-Chancellor, Dr. Bateson, Master of St. John's College, Dr. Phear, Master of Emmanuel College, Dr. Westcott, Regius Professor of Divinity, Dr. E. C. Clark, Regius Professor of Civil Law, Professor Cayley, Professor Adams, Professor Liveing, Professor Stuart, G. F. Browne, B.D., of St. Catharine's College, Senior Proctor, N. M. Ferrers, M.A., of Gonville and Caius College, E. W. Blore, M.A., of Trinity College, R. Burn, M.A., of Trinity College, H. Sidgwick, M.A., of Trinity College, J. Peile, M.A., of Christ's College, A. Austen Leigh, M.A., of King's College, and G. W. Prothero, M.A., of King's College, be appointed a Syndicate to consider four Memorials relating to the encouragement to be given to the Higher Education of Women, and to report to the Senate before the end of the Lent Term, 1881."

SELWYN COLLEGE.

A fresh appeal, bearing the signature of the Dean of Lichfield, chairman of the "Selwyn Memorial" Committee, has just been issued, from which it appears that a sum of upwards of £21,000 has already been raised for a memorial to the late Bishop of Lichfield, of which about £18,000 is available for the proposed college. An eligible site has been purchased at a cost of about £6.000; and the Hon. and Rev. Arthur T. Lyttelton has consented to undertake the headship of the college, provided that it can be opened within a reasonable time. The Committee, however, think it would not be prudent to begin to build until they have secured a further amount of £10,000, which they hope to raise partly by new and increased subscriptions, and partly by means of a "loan fund."

The new Postmaster-General Professor Fawcett, has under consideration the question of the introduction of a sixpenny rate for inland telegrams.

A Provincial Grand Chapter of Freemasons was held at the Lion Hotel, on Wednesday last, under the auspices of the Euclid (University) Chapter.

At the anniversary meeting of the Royal Asiatic Society last Monday a well-earned tribute was paid to the memory of a gallant young member, the late Guybon H. Damant, who was killed while executing his duty as political officer in the Naga Hills last October. Appointed at an unusually early age to posts of serious responsibility, the young Cambridge graduate not only won the complete confidence of his superiors by his official zeal, but he never lost his vivid interest in literary and antiquarian matters. After riding for eight hours in his expeditions of relief during the Bengal famine he would turn for relaxation to writing, and despatch a paper on Bengalee folk-lore, or some such subject, to the Indian Antiquary. Only a few days before his murder he posted to England an article on the languages of the Naga Hills tribes, which has since appeared in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society. Such an example is well worthy of commemoration. Pall Mall Gazette.
